Bismi Allāhi Ar-Raḥmāni Ar-Raḥīm

Allāh the Exalted said:

{Our Lord, indeed we have heard a caller calling to īmān, [saying], 'Believe in your Lord,' and we have believed. Our Lord, so forgive us our sins and remove from us our misdeeds and cause us to die with the righteous. Our Lord, and grant us what You have promised us through Your messengers and do not disgrace us on the Day of Resurrection. Indeed, You do not fail in [Your] promise." And their Lord responded to them, "Never will I allow to be lost the work of [any] worker among you, whether male or female; you are of one another. So those who emigrated or were evicted from their homes or were harmed in My cause or fought or were killed - I will surely remove from them their misdeeds, and I will surely admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow as reward from Allāh, and Allāh has with Him the best reward.} [Sūrah Āl 'Imrān 3:193-195]

Abū Dāwūd and At-Tirmidhī narrated from Abū Tha'labah al-Khushani, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: I asked the Messenger of Allāh (ﷺ) about this verse: "O you who have believed, protect yourselves; it will not harm you if one is misguided when you are guided." [Sūrah al-Mā'idah 5:105]. The Messenger of Allāh (ﷺ) said: "Rather, enjoin what is good and forbid what is evil, until when you see stinginess being obeyed, desires being followed, the world being preferred, and each person being amazed by his own opinion, then attend to your own affairs and leave alone the affairs of the common people. For ahead of you are the 'Days of Patience.' Patience during them is like grasping live coals. For the one who acts righteously during them, there is the reward of fifty." I said, "O Messenger of Allāh, the reward of fifty of them?" He said, "The reward of fifty of you."

Dedication

To believing men and sincere youth, I see them looking at the encroaching Crusader-Zionist forces of disbelief, which have descended upon us led by America, like diners gathering around a bowl, taking souls, violating sanctities, occupying holy sites, trampling lands, and plundering the livelihoods of the servants of Allāh.

Sorrow fills their hearts, oppression chokes their throats, and the pride of manhood holds back tears of pain in their eyes. The verses of Allāh resound in their minds, calling them: {And what is [the matter] with you that you do not fight in the cause of Allāh and [for] the oppressed among men, women, and children...} [An-Nisā': 75]. {O you who have believed, what is [the matter] with you that when you are told to go forth in the cause of Allāh, you adhere heavily to the earth? Are you satisfied with the life of this world rather than the Hereafter? But little is the enjoyment of the life of this world compared to the Hereafter.} [At-Tawbah: 38]. Regret and remorse fill their souls. They wonder! What can one of us possibly do in the face of this encroaching flood of Crusaders, Jews, and their allies from among the apostates and hypocrites in our midst...?

Then comes the decisive response from the Book of Allāh: {So fight in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And encourage the believers [to fight]. Perhaps Allāh will avert the harm of those who disbelieve. And Allāh is stronger in might and stronger in [exemplary] punishment.} [An-Nisā': 84].

{Indeed, Allāh has purchased from the believers their lives and their properties [in exchange] for that they will have Paradise. They fight in the cause of Allāh, so they kill and are killed. [It is] a true promise [binding] upon Him in the Torah and the Gospel and the Qur'ān...} [At-Tawbah: 111].

Hope flutters in their souls, determination shines in their hearts, and the intention is made in their minds. They cry out to their Lord: Labbayk Allāhumma labbayk, labbayka lā sharīka laka labbayk. (Here I am, O Allāh, here I am. Here I am, You have no partner, here I am.) "We have sold ourselves, O Lord, we have sold ourselves... We will not rest nor resign."

To these men, poised to defend the religion of Allāh and the oppressed of the believers everywhere, I dedicate this book.

To serve as a guide for them, a beacon on the path of jihād in the path of Allah, and provisions to aid them in conveying the message, by the help of Allah. And a record that connects them, in thought and methodology, to their predecessors from the caravan of the ghurabā' (strangers) who are manifest upon the truth, fleeing with their religion.

And to acquaint them with the history of those who came before them on the path of light, those who have fulfilled their vows and those who await. From those who emigrated, strived, sheltered, and supported, from the pioneers of the jihādī movement and the blessed Islamic awakening of this era. And to present to them a methodology of jihād, an idea for a movement, and a method of action. A comprehensive program of action that helps them get rid of the burdens of sitting back, the afflictions of worry and grief, the weight of helplessness and laziness, and the regrets of the subjugation of men.

So, to these upcoming mujahidīn, whose specters I glimpse on the horizon, carrying banners of lā ilāha illā Allāh Muhammad rasūl Allāh, fluttering with glory and victory, vanquishing the forces of disbelief and tyranny, and establishing the shari'ah of Allah on earth.

To them and to their predecessors from the mujāhidīn of this era, from the martyrs, prisoners, and displaced, who have drawn the landmarks of the path for the coming generation of jihād and resistance, with their blood, their sighs, and the suffering of their women and children.

To these and to those, I dedicate this book.

Hoping from Allāh, the Clement, the Generous, the Most High, the Almighty, the Forgiving, the Merciful, the Affectionate, the Beneficent, that He does not deprive me of their companionship in the highest company with the Prophets, the truthful ones, the martyrs, and the righteous. My hope in Allāh is great, and in the glad tidings of His beloved Prophet ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa-sallam; that the one who guides to good is like the one who does it, and that the scholar and the student are partners, and that a person will be resurrected with those whom he loves.

‘Umar ‘Abd al-Ḥakīm

About this Book

By the grace of what Allāh facilitated with His help, and enabled by His favor, this book contains many materials. Some of it is a narration of the course of history, whose content is not devoid of enjoyment and lesson.

It also contains political and intellectual analyses of that history and its trajectory, with chapters that offer profound insights and beneficial ideas.

Furthermore, the book delves into intellectual and philosophical reflections, providing valuable lessons and perspectives.

Within its pages are critical analyses of the Ṣaḥwah movement and the experiences of jihād throughout the past decades.

The book includes educational chapters, fiqh rulings, and shar‘ī lessons, along with methodological and uṣūlī guidance.

I have summarized in it the essence of my experiences and a quarter of a century of experience in keeping pace with the Islamic awakening and working within the jihādī movement amidst the internal and external storms it lived through... During the period between (1980 - 2004), during which I worked in the field in various aspects of activity and contribution intellectually, literary, militarily, politically, and security in several hot arenas and issues, and I ask Allāh for acceptance.

The ideas of this book have evolved and matured over fourteen years since the establishment of the New World Order and the American invasion of the Middle East during the Kuwait War in 1990. Its drafts were written in (Kabul) during the Taliban era (1997 - 2001), and it was written in its final form during three lean years that we spent being hunted by the Americans and their apostate allies, moving between hideouts and shelters during (2001 - 2004), until it became the text that is in your hands. To Allāh alone is praise, gratitude, grace, and favor.

With this diversity and breadth in the materials of the book, I hope that it will be for various kinds of readers, and pioneers of Islamic propagation (da‘wah) from various orientations, and for men of various Islamic organizations and groups, especially the youth of the jihādī ṣaḥwah, and men of the coming resistance, by the permission of Allāh. That it will be a wide and diverse table of useful and enjoyable materials... each taking what suits him.

However, any benefit or enjoyment derived from this work – and while I hope for its benefit, reward from Allah, and prayers from my brethren in the unseen – was not the primary or fundamental goal for writing this extensive book. I consider it the book of a lifetime, the culmination of the responsibility of the pen and the word, which I wished to fulfill before I meet Allah Almighty, and I ask Him for pardon and forgiveness.

The goal of this book is to lay the foundations for a call to action, work, and jihād, which I have named:

"The Call for Global Islamic Resistance" (Da'wa al-Muqāwama al-Islāmiyya al-'Ālamiyya).

It is a book written to guide those seeking to work in order to fulfill the obligation, and to carry out the duty of striving against our enemies from the invading disbelievers and their allies and supporters from among the apostates and hypocrites.

The purpose of this book is not entertainment and general culture, as is the goal of most readers of books and newspapers, and followers of satellite channels and the Internet from Muslims in this era... unfortunately.

With this understanding, spirit, and sense of responsibility, the responsibility of receiving a serious call to jihād in the cause of Allāh, I hope that readers will take up this book and read it.

With all the spirit of seriousness and responsibility before Allāh, then before the Ummah (Muslim community), then before the generations of tens of thousands of martyrs who have passed away during these last decades, in order that this religion may live, and in order that the banner of jihād may continue to flutter with the word of tawhīd; the testimony that there is no god but Allāh, Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and that the word of Allāh may be supreme, and the word of those who disbelieve, all those who disbelieve, in every time and place is the lowest.

{And say, "Work, for Allāh will see your work, and [so will] His Messenger and the believers. And you will be returned to the Knower of the unseen and the witnessed, and He will inform you of what you used to do."} [At-Tawbah: 105]

And there is no victor, but Allāh and Allāh is the Greatest, and to Allāh is all praise.

Foreword

- The Ummah is experiencing, at the dawn of the 21st century, the realities of the American-Zionist-Crusader-Western invasion, and the realities of the complete alliance that the ruling regimes and the forces of nifāq in the Arab and Islamic world demonstrate in their cooperation with the invading forces of kufr.
- Many of the cadres of the jihadi movement have been exhausted, and a large segment of its base has perished due to the military and security onslaught of this alliance. The jihadi movement is now threatened in its continuity and in the preservation of its authentic jurisprudential and methodological heritage.
- The Islamic Awakening (aṣ-ṣaḥwah al-ʿislāmiyyah) is also experiencing intellectual and Sharīʿah-related setbacks due to the efforts of the munāfiqūn (hypocrites) among the scholars of the ruling authorities and the misguided deviations of defeated leaders of the Islamic Awakening. These setbacks threaten the Awakening's foundations and its general support, and threaten the Ummah in its creed, identity, and existence.

- It is possible that before the first decade of the 21st century ends, the American ideological war, and the assault on educational curricula and the fundamental constants of the Ummah, will have borne fruit, if the current situation continues. There is a necessity to preserve the creedal, intellectual, and cultural identity of the Ummah, and to safeguard the thought and methodology within the Islamic Awakening and its jihadi vanguard.
- I believe that, due to these circumstances, nuclei of resistance will emerge within this vibrant Ummah, but they will be scattered and uncoordinated.
- Reactions arising from ignorance and confusion may emerge within the various forms of resistance that Muslims will display. The alliance of enemies will exploit those mistakes to tarnish jihād, to drive a wedge between the resistance and its support base within the Ummah, and consequently, to push it towards fragmentation and defeat.
- Due to the successive fall of shuhadā' (martyrs) from among the leaders and cadres who were systematically nurtured and prepared over a long period, most resistance and jihād groups will lack a Sharī'ah-based, political, intellectual, and educational methodology to serve as a reference point. This methodology is needed as a path for preparing their new cadres along the way, a constitution to refer to in their disagreements, and a fixed identity through which they can define themselves to both friends and enemies.

For these reasons, I have written this book, so that it may be, with the permission and help of Allah, a journey.

- It contains a summary of the fundamental political, shar'ī, and intellectual principles upon which the jihādī current was raised since its inception and throughout its long journey.
- It also includes a history of jihādī experiences, and a summary of the lessons learned from them, so that the next jihādī generation can build upon them and benefit from lessons and experiences for which we paid the purest blood and the hardship of the path as a price.
- It also encompasses a summary of the conflict between Muslims and the Romans throughout the centuries, especially the contemporary Romans — the Americans and Europeans— and their conspiracies in the past two centuries to distance Muslims from their religion and the sources of their strength and victory.
- This information provides the mujāhid with a foundational intellectual understanding of the course of this ongoing conflict, its roots, and the enemies' methods of managing it.
- It also contains a guide for mujāhidīn and resisters to the best ways to resist these invading campaigns, as conceived through what Allāh has bestowed upon me through study, reflection, accumulated experience, and keeping pace with the path.
- It outlines for those determined to walk this illuminated path a comprehensive educational methodology that qualifies the mujāhid for resolve, then progression, then steadfastness. And that provides him with what we hope will aid him in work that is accepted by Allāh in the hereafter, and that leads to victory and success in this world.

- Thus, I hope that this book, with all its chapters and messages, has encompassed a complete methodology and shar'ī, intellectual and political identity that will be a reference point between the leaders and followers of jihād and resistance. I also hope it to be a constitution that governs its movement, and a focal point for the meeting of various factions of jihād and resistance, whose diverse groups I see forming in the womb of this giving Ummah. This Ummah, of whom, throughout all times, a Mujahid group has proven, is the best nation brought forth for humanity. And I ask Allāh Ta'ālā to grant me sincerity and acceptance in it, and to make it a foothold that enrages the disbelievers and benefits the believers. And to decree for me through it a righteous deed and beneficial knowledge whose reward is never cut off. And I ask Him for the reward of guiding to goodness, and to grant me truthfulness and steadfastness, and combine for me the reward of jihād with the sword and the pen, and to conclude my life with shahādah in His cause, for He is Forbearing and Generous. And I seek the forgiveness of Allāh the Almighty and repent to Him. And may Allāh bless His trustworthy Messenger, his family, and his good and pure companions. And praise be to Allāh, Lord of the Worlds.

Introduction

Praise be to Allāh alone, worthy of praise and acclaim. Praise be to Allāh alone, Lord of the earth and sky. O Allāh, all praise is due to You.

And to You is all dominion, and to You all affairs return. Lord of the good and guardian of the righteous. Praise be to You, O He who has the command and the creation alone.

Praise be to Allāh alone. He fulfilled His promise and helped His slave and strengthened His soldiers and defeated the factions alone There is nothing before Him and nothing after Him Devoting religion to Him, even if the disbelievers dislike it.

And prayers and peace be upon our master and beloved and delight of our eyes, our leader and intercessor to our Lord, our Prophet Muhammad, and upon all his family and companions. O Allāh, send blessings and peace and blessings upon him, and reward him with the best reward You have rewarded a prophet for his nation for he fulfilled the trust, delivered the message, and advised the Ummah and strove in Allāh as was His due, until certainty came to him.

So bless, O Allāh, and bless him and his good and pure wives and his companions and followers with excellence until the Day of Judgment a prayer that encompasses us with Your mercy, generosity, forgiveness, and concealment, and grants us with it martyrdom in Your cause, O Most Merciful of the merciful.

To Begin:

The contemporary Crusader campaigns led by America have clearly declared their objectives towards the Arab and Islamic world. These objectives encompass all aspects of the civilizational, religious, political, economic, social, and cultural existence of Muslims. The Bush administration has openly declared that their objectives over the next ten years include:

1. Changing the political map in the Middle East and the Arab-Islamic world, meaning altering, restructuring, replacing, or reformulating the regimes.
2. Changing the geographical map of some countries in a way that creates more fragmentation and local religious, ethnic, and political conflicts.
3. Changing the components of cultural identity and social structure by displacing the religious, intellectual, and moral foundations of the region's peoples and reshaping them according to the foundations of Western thought, especially American and Zionist thought.
4. Controlling the sources of wealth in the region, especially oil, gas, mineral resources, and other agricultural and animal resources, to pump them into the artery of the invading occupier coming from overseas, and into the artery of the Zionist entity planted in the heart of the region. And transforming the region into a market for disposing of colonial products through so-called partnership and free trade agreements in the Middle East.

Various media outlets have revealed that America, its ally Britain, and behind them Israel, assisted by all NATO and European countries orbiting them, willingly or unwillingly, have permitted themselves all military, intelligence, economic, media, and other means to achieve these purposes.

In short, the world is witnessing the fiercest and most brutal barbaric colonial attack it has known in its history at the hands of Western civilization, whose leadership has fallen to a band of extremist, Zionist-Crusaders in the American administration.

It can be said that these "Third Crusades," so to speak, are a continuation, in a fierce and organized manner, of the two previous campaigns. The first took place during the eleventh and twelfth centuries AD, and the second took place from the seventeenth century to the mid-twentieth century.

We are facing military aggression armed with the latest military and scientific technological instruments, and equipped with the deadliest intelligence, security, and police apparatus plans. Their tanks carry to us programs for social, religious, and cultural change, including curricula to change the concepts of the Islamic religion and dismantle the national components of Arabs and Muslims. Also included are programs for the reformulation of societies, intellectual and cultural components, school and educational curricula, and media programs. They are reshaping everything, even Friday sermons (khuṭbah) on the pulpits of Muslims' mosques, including the largest centers of religious and intellectual radiance, such as the al-Masjid al-Ḥarām in Mecca, the al-Masjid an-Nabawī in Medina, and al-Jāmi' al-Azhar in Cairo, and their equivalent in influence among the mosques of Muslims, in every country, city, village, and corner of the Muslim lands.

In short, the damage has exceeded the patch. We are required to pause and reflect on ways to confront this campaign, away from the effects of superficial, empty emotions or spasmodic reactions.

This calamity reaches its tragic peak when we know that, for the first time in the history of Muslims, and perhaps the history of colonized and invaded peoples, the colonizer attacking with all this power and its tools relies on a huge fifth column implanted in the various components of Arab and Islamic societies.

The American offensive today relies, however shocking this truth may be, on the full cooperation of the vast majority, if not all, of the current official regimes in the Arab and Muslim countries. These regimes, whose reasons for survival and protecting their interests and the thrones of their Pharaohs have converged with the plans of the American colonizer and his aides. They enlisted—in every sense of the word—under the leadership of the invading armies, implementing their ideas and fighting the religion of their people, the foundations of their existence, and all their interests. Consequently, these regimes have mobilized all their security, media, and authoritarian apparatus to crush any seeds of resistance to this invasion, starting with suppressing any form of change, demonstration, and peaceful rejection, and ending with killing, imprisoning, and displacing anyone who dares any form of resistance, especially the seeds of armed resistance and legitimate jihād.

The calamity reaches its tragic dimension when you see most of the Muslim scholars have sought refuge in the doors of the rulers, their swords, and their gold, to play the most heinous role in favor of the invading colonizer by bestowing legitimacy on him and stripping it from the resistance!

And making his soldiers and troops as those under treaty and protection, safeguarding their blood, money, and equipment, and ruling that those who wage jihād against them and attack them are corrupters in the land, whose punishment is to be killed, crucified, have their hands and feet cut off from opposite sides, or be exiled from the land!

And if only the calamity ended with the alliance of the ruling regimes and their religious, media, and security apparatus with the invading enemy, but the tragedy is greater, because significant segments of the Arab and Islamic societies have been intellectually, culturally, and politically distorted, to be in the trench of the occupiers, Even if some of them are in the opposition sector to the rogue ruling regimes, these oppositions present themselves as more willing to serve the invading colonizer than them.

And so on and so on.

In fact, many of them ally with the enemy to overthrow those regimes, not because they are agents of the colonizer and traitors to their peoples, but to offer their services and loyal competencies to the colonizer himself, on the grounds that they will be more loyal and serve America better than the Pharaohs who worshiped it for decades, and subjugated their peoples to it, to themselves, and to Satan. Where the Afghan and Iraqi model of collaborationist opposition has become a successful example to be followed.

Thus, the collaborative options and alternatives line up before America in our own homeland, from the people of our own kind who bear our names, wear our clothes, and speak our languages. They offer their services to the colonizer to assassinate their Ummah, defeat its religion, kill its sons, and remove all its civilizational components. These collaborationist groups are not limited to a specific intellectual current, nor a particular ethnic or religious group. In this malicious column are those who raise banners of various slogans and identities, starting with the alleged Islamic ones, and passing through the entire secular and political spectrum in our countries, whether from the Arab peoples or other Islamic peoples.

And from some dimensions of the disaster, many good people from among the scholars of Islam, its preachers, and the leaders of its parties and gatherings have been crushed by the media onslaught. They began to promote prostration and the impossibility of resistance, and they are being dragged into paths drawn by the enemy himself, like requesting peaceful coexistence, civilizational exchange, calm dialogue, and intellectual understanding with the colonizer who strikes us morning and evening with his smart bombs and missiles, and kills us, as well as his soldiers and their slaves among our foolish sons.

All of this is under the pretext of moderation at times, and temperateness at others, and wisdom at other times, and not taking risks and needless suicide other times.

Thus, the religion of Allāh Almighty and what it commands with all clarity is abandoned, from the obligation of fighting this onslaught and fighting the enemies of Allāh with everything available and preparing against them with all that we can muster of strength, and resisting them until the last breath. Thus, the sincere cries emanating here and there from the honorable, from various segments of Arab and Islamic societies, have been suppressed.

The cries of objection and demonstrations among Muslims subsided under the blows of the sticks of the "forces of fear" called "security forces," and their tear gas bombs. And under the weight of the heavily armed media machine, spearheaded by the most malicious fatwās and opinions of the scholars of the ruler, the jurists of inaction, and the preachers of prostration, shame, and disgrace.

And there remained in the field only some pure hearts, mujāhid forearms, and faithful resolves. They resist the colonizer here and there. Weakened remnants, whose martyrs fall without return or benefit in most cases, except for a personal victory and an individual triumph that carries its owner from this stench and overwhelming rot on earth, and the darkness of injustice and oppression in it, to the gardens of eternity and the pleasure of Allāh, the Lord of the Worlds, by Allāh's permission.

And there is no doubt that we are threatened if the situation remains like this.

I do not say threatened with extinction and disappearance, because Allāh Ta'ālā, as well as His Messenger – ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam – gave glad tidings to this Ummah of survival, victory, and triumph.

But we are threatened, Allāh forbid, with more oppression, hardship, and torment. And the garment of hunger, fear, killing, humiliation, and shame.

The mujāhid group and the sincere, honorable, educated elite in this Ummah must think about a way to revive the resistance and expand its scope, so that the Ummah may rise and engage in fighting the enemies of Allāh, and preserve the components of its existence, religion, and civilization.

Facets of Resistance

I believe - and this is a situation that is not hidden from any discerning person - that the size of the elite resisting the invading enemies, engaging in jihād in the way of Allāh, is small and limited in the Ummah in a frightening and terrifying way. I do not say this only because of the ferocity of the enemies' attack. But because of what appears to be the worthlessness, collapse, and inherent susceptibility to colonization and defeat in the Ummah these days. There is no better evidence of this than following the news bulletins and the media, which carry morning and evening what fills the soul with grief and pain, what crushes resolve, and brings cowardice to ambitions.

And I believe that in order to wage this long-term war, as its features appear, a multi-faceted program is needed to expand the human base that generates the seeds of resistance in the Ummah.

Bearing arms and preparing for jihād in the way of Allāh and resisting the enemies is, in the end, the fruit of the general climate, in which the heat of awareness and emotion must rise, and in which the concepts of the fighting creed must be firmly established and clarified, in order to reach what can be called the "revolutionary jihādī climate" that automatically generates the mechanisms of resistance.

I think the matter is much broader than to fall on the shoulders of the current jihādī elite. Especially since it has been exposed to near extinction under the global counter-terrorism campaign launched by America in cooperation with the rulers of the Arab and Islamic countries themselves. As well as its allies in the West and the rest of the world, since 1990 and the launch of the new world order. Reaching its peak after the events of September 2001. Where it became a fierce global war in every sense of the word, raging throughout the world.

This attack, with America's exploitation of the September events, has resulted in the consumption of many of the cadres, elements, and groups of jihād in the world, and many of the segments of the Islamic awakening that support jihād.

And I believe that the faithful, aware, and educated elite, from the various honorable and zealous forces in the Ummah, must now work in three areas:

First: The Religious and Cultural Aspect:

By developing action programs, awareness programs, and curricula, to preserve the religious identity, and the original intellectual, cultural, and social components of the Islamic peoples.

Second: The Political and Intellectual Aspect:

By developing action programs and intellectual curricula to revitalize political advocacy, non-governmental organizations, civil social bodies, and peaceful media activity that nourishes the intellectual and cultural existence of the Islamic Ummah.

Third: The Military Aspect:

By working to develop programs and curricula for advocacy and methodology, in the field of jihādī combat doctrine, and preparation in its various educational and psychological aspects, and the necessary training programs and military sciences, in order to launch a global Islamic resistance and put it into effect immediately, to confront America and its allies in the land of our Arab and Islamic countries - firstly - and in its own home and the home of its allies and in all the world - secondly.

These three frameworks that I present in this introduction deserve detailing and explanation. But I do not want the introduction and the general messages to go beyond possible brevity. Although it will take hundreds of pages. I will leave that to another area specific to this idea and its details, in shā' Allāh. But within what this introduction can bear, I summarize some details in brief points:

1. Military action and armed revolutionary jihādī action of resistance are what will force the enemy to retreat and lead this Ummah to victory, in shā' Allāh. Without military resistance, any peaceful action, no matter how important it is in the fields of da'wah, oratory, writing, and authorship, or in the works of demonstration, political and media work, and so on, its effects will go in vain, and will not change anything of the reality without resistant military action.

As long as the invading, Crusader, Zionist, kāfir colonizer is squatting on our chests and our land, the entire Ummah will remain sinful and responsible before Allāh Ta'ālā for not sufficiently repelling the enemy. We are facing a farḍ 'ayn (individual obligation), with nothing more obligatory after the tawḥīd of Allāh than it, as scholars have transmitted consensus on this. This obligation is further emphasized since the assailant has entered our own homes.

2. The act of jihād and armed resistance does not come from a vacuum, nor does it turn into a phenomenon of the required size unless it is generated by a revolutionary jihādī climate. Its creation requires many efforts in non-combat fields, such as da'wah, media, education, and preserving the components of religion. And from the Islamic creed and the rulings of the sharī'ah that fill the believer's heart with conviction of his combat duty as a religious, shar'ī obligation.
3. The formation of the intellectual background, political, methodological, and movement awareness is a necessary foundation, along with religious belief, in the Muslim individual's mentality and conscience. So that he may turn to the actual practice of fighting and resistance, as a mujāhid individual carrying a jihādī creed, a fighting will, and a religious passion that drives him to initiate action, persevere in pursuing it, spread it among people, and call them to it with insight.
4. Embarking on jihād today, and taking up arms against America and its allies, and the subsequent clash with its vanguard in our countries, which is made up of the kāfir, collaborationist, treacherous authorities and their media, security, and military apparatus of hypocrites, the allies of the kuffār, is not usually undertaken except by a percentage of the Ummah whose faith, determination, conviction, and will have reached the level of initiating action. Whereas there is a large sector of the Ummah that is convinced by the reality of the situation of the need for confrontation, but its resolve has not yet reached the point of moving it to the pinnacle of Islam. Many of these may be women, the elderly, and those who are excused by shari'ah from performing the obligation of fighting, or those who are unable to do so for a legitimate and real reason, or for an imaginary and perceived reason, because of weakness in certainty or capabilities.

So, what is their role in this confrontation? There is no doubt that they have an important role of great importance, which they perform in the fields of peaceful jihād, which is working in the fields that I mentioned in paragraphs above.

5. If the elite that understands its religion and is aware of reality does not take action to thwart the enemy's programs in destroying the religious and civilizational structure and the components of awareness in the Ummah, which the enemy originally put in place to eradicate the foundations of resistance from its roots, then the jihādī elite will become extinct - Allāh forbid - due to the enemy's military and security action.

And the Ummah will not, with time, generate a replacement for it, and it will dissolve into the enemy's media and educational programs that it has drawn up, which have even reached children's educational curricula, and even called for amending and distorting the texts of the Qur'an and the Sunnah that speak of jihād and aspects of belief. Most of this has happened at the hands of many of our scholars, unfortunately. The enemy's malicious plan included placing hundreds of preachers and orators in every Islamic country in training courses against "extremism"! To inject them with genetically modified "moderation" made in America, in order to clone suitable "Pentagon Shaykhs" and "colonial jurists."

6. Working in the field of preserving religion and civilizational components in the Ummah requires work programs that may force those in charge of them in some countries to publish and educate secretly if necessary.

As happened in the system of secret chambers in which Muslims preserved the religion of their children under Soviet occupation and its programs to erase identity in the Islamic republics. And likewise, what Muslims did in China under communist rule and its cultural revolution.

As happened in the system of secret chambers in which Muslims preserved the religion of their children under Soviet occupation and its programs to erase identity in the Islamic republics. And likewise what Muslims did in China under communist rule and its cultural revolution.

The atmosphere of "alleged democracy" that America carries to our countries on the muzzles of cannons may enable the establishment of civil and non-governmental organizations and empower them to carry out acts of education and awareness, similar to what Shaykh 'Abd al-Hamid ibn Badis and the Association of Muslim Scholars did in Algeria. When they successfully resisted the "Francization plan" and the distortion of identity that France had put in place to erase Arabism and Islam from Algeria. It was a successful plan when the mujāhid Shaykh Ibn Badis found that the seeds of resistance and its roots had weakened, so he worked to preserve their roots, their foundation, and their sowing anew. Thus, this glorious educational work during the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s provided the seeds of resistance and generations that provided the fuel for the revolution and resistance against France later.

Mosques, katātīb (traditional Qur'anic schools), and religious zawāyā (religious lodges) must have a major role in this field. Home-based religious teaching and education circles also have an important role. Women and female preachers have a great role to play, with families and through homes, in preserving the religion, language, and culture of generations.

Working in this field is peaceful work that does not carry the risks of fighting and armed resistance, which those who believe and are determined to sacrifice must engage in - from this hour -Because it is an individual obligation on every Muslim.

7. As for the fields of political, media, intellectual, and cultural work, they are also fields of peaceful action. Those working in them can spread the idea of civil resistance and its justifications, and they can defend it inside and outside the country. Also, the field of authorship, publishing, demonstrating, sit-ins, and other acts of civil resistance, is a work that may be a possible project within what the "false democracy" allows for colonialism and its traitorous deputies in our countries in order to deceive the people. Those working in these fields will be safe from being placed under the charge of "terrorism" because they are in the field of political, media, and civil work.

There are two very important notes for working in the field of peaceful civil resistance, whether in the religious, political, or intellectual field:

Firstly: It is not permissible under any circumstances, and it is forbidden by shari'ah, to join the governmental and authority apparatuses under the pretext of "peaceful resistance and serving religion," whether that is under the direct administration of colonialism - as is happening in Iraq and Palestine - or under the rule and administration of the current apostate rulers who rule by other than what Allāh has revealed, who are loyal to the colonizing enemies of Allāh - as is happening from many Islamists in various countries. And it is not permissible to work in any of their authority, legislative, executive, and judicial apparatuses. This has details and evidence that will be explained in the first section of the second chapter of the second part, in shā' Allāh.

Secondly: It is not permissible under any circumstances for the worker in the field of civil resistance, da'wah, politics, and media to fall into the crime of denouncing jihād, the mujāhidīn, and the Muslim resisters. Under the pretext of warding off suspicion from himself and his institution, and under the pretext of claiming moderation and temperateness, or under the pretext of preserving his activities and taking permission from the colonizer or his apostate deputies from among the traitorous rulers to continue his work.

Because the purpose of his existence and the justification for his work in that field is to create a climate of jihād and support the resistance. So how will this resistance be generated and continue if the senior preachers, thinkers, leaders, and intellectuals in the Ummah take on the task of distorting jihād and the mujāhidīn?! And destroying the reputation of the resistance and the resisters?! As the ignorant, the wicked, and the lost do today, from some of the scholars of Islam and the intellectuals and thinkers of the Ummah!

At the same time, the mujāhidīn resisters and their jihādī media must not be dragged into denouncing those working in the field of da'wah and peaceful resistance, accusing them of inaction and not engaging in jihād - even if this is true for most of them - as long as they have not entered the context of supporting the colonizer and recognizing him, or fighting jihād and propaganda against the resistance. Because they are performing a very important work for the foundation of the resistance and complementing its efforts.

Levels of Resistance

Participation in the resistance and progression in the field of jihād in the way of Allāh and confronting the enemies of Allāh passes through three levels for each individual:

1. Islamic religious emotion:

This is formed by the general concept of religion, the natural inheritance of chivalry, honor, pride, and zeal in the individual. As a natural reaction to the state of occupation and injustice, the breaking of pride, and the violation of the veils of religious, civilizational, and national dignity by the colonizer and his aides. This emotion drives its owner to participate in the field of civil resistance or emotional reactions in response to the surge of these emotions in the depths of conscience.

2. The will to fight:

This is the foundation for the ability to act on resistance and jihād. The will is a determination that is formed in the mind, heart, and soul to embark on action. It is the first stage of action, and without it, a person does not embark on any action.

Allāh Ta'ālā said about the hypocrites who stayed behind from jihād:

{And if they had intended to go forth, they would certainly have made some preparation for it; but Allāh disliked their being sent forth, so He made them lag behind, and it was said, "Sit you among those who sit (inactive)."} (at-Tawbah: 46). So the stages of embarking on jihād and fighting are (will - preparation - setting forth). The will to fight is formed after the maturation of religious emotion and conviction in fighting. It is aided in its formation, if the conscience is alive and the heart is sound, by what the enemy practices of acts of aggression, injustice, killing, and destruction, and what he clothes the Ummah with of oppression, humiliation, fear, and hunger. So a person takes up arms and resists.

3. The jihādī creed:

This comes only through education and receiving. It is fundamental in matters of utmost importance:

- With the jihādī creed and understanding its pillars and believing in it, fighting becomes jihād in the way of Allāh, because it clarifies the determination and intention. And he who fights so that the word of Allāh may be supreme is in the way of Allāh, since the one killed in that is the shahīd, otherwise not.
- With the jihādī creed, a person knows the rulings of this obligation, its etiquette, and its requirements, and embarks on fighting with clarity and insight from his Lord and his religion. {O you who have believed, when you go forth [to fight] in the cause of Allāh, investigate} (an-Nisā': 94).
- With the jihādī creed and its pillars, the jihādī methodology and thought, and complete awareness based on knowledge of Allāh's shar'ī rulings, and based on understanding the requirements of these rulings from the jurisprudence of the reality that revolves around him, are firmly established in the soul of the mujāhid.
- Without the jihādī creed. Either the work is thwarted, and the fate is bad, Allāh forbid, or the fighter's paths are cut off by the trials of the road and its touchstones of killing, captivity, and displacement. It is the guarantor, after Allāh Ta'ālā, in stabilizing the mujāhid on his intention and determination in the face of the storms of media misinformation, temptation, and deviation that the enemies of Islam and their hypocritical instruments, especially the evil scholars and jurists of misguidance, try to achieve. Those who attempt to confuse the matter for the mujāhidīn, to divert them from the path of Allāh. Therefore, those working in the field of resistance, jihād, and direct military action against the enemies of Allāh must have their scholars, thinkers, intellectuals, intellectual and methodological instruments, and their media tools. To direct the surging emotions in the souls of the believers and transform them through media and jihādī propaganda into a will to fight, and to refine and solidify them as a jihādī creed that enables the generations to continue the resistance and inherit it.

More details will come in the later volumes of the book, God willing.

And the bitter truth must be mentioned, which is that tens of millions of sincere Muslim youth, in the face of these successive dark, overwhelming calamities in this Ummah, are still lost, bewildered, and helpless! They linger in the realm of religious emotion only, swallowing sorrows and bitterness and committing some futile reactions. These emotions have not been transformed into a will to fight, except for a small number of hundreds here and there, and perhaps dozens or individuals in some Arab and Islamic countries.

Looking at the jihādī phenomenon and its pioneers, since it started during the past four decades, as will be detailed in the later volume, in shā' Allāh, we find that their numbers did not exceed hundreds even in countries of millions like Egypt and the Levant, and did not exceed dozens in other countries! While no jihādī initiative has arisen in most Muslim countries. Despite the cases of direct and indirect occupation by various colonial powers, and the kufr, apostasy, and treachery shown by their rulers, in addition to the injustices and corruption that have turned the lives of most peoples into hell.

In fact, unfortunate statistics indicate that since the Americans declared their occupation of the Arabian Peninsula and openly descended upon it in 1990 and continue to do so to this day, for about 13 years, where hundreds of thousands of American, British, and European soldiers roam freely, and hundreds of thousands of their civilians with their families roam around. And they oversee looting, economic plunder, corruption, and spreading corruption. Despite this, the number of jihādī operations, despite their simplicity, did not exceed some operations in which the total American losses did not exceed a few dozen. This is even though the American colonizer's imports from it (all the countries of the Peninsula) exceed one billion dollars daily from oil alone. This colonizer, in whose country hundreds of his citizens die from traffic accidents weekly, in addition to the thousands who die in other crimes and from consuming alcohol and drugs! And the Americans deploy in our Arab and Islamic region, which they call the "Central Operations Area," about one and a half million American soldiers, excluding the soldiers of its allies. So how can such an occupier leave such a country?! Which contains the holiest sanctities of Muslims and constitutes their homeland?! This is a rare phenomenon in the history of colonialism and the colonized throughout humanity!

What is even more regrettable is that the abode of Islam in Afghanistan during the time of the Taliban was established and opened wide for six years, and camps and front lines were established in it, and the opportunity for jihād under the banners of shari'ah was opened. And the number of those who entered it for emigration and jihād did not exceed 1500 mujāhidīn, including about 300 mujāhidīn with their families, i.e. a ratio of one in a million of the Ummah!! Only limited numbers of those whom Allāh blessed benefited from the opportunity of preparation, training, and attending the field of jihād! Even more astonishing is that not a single scholar from among the Muslim scholars, especially their famous ones, nor from the symbols of da'wah who filled the world with empty shouts about emigration and jihād, emigrated to it.

And if we consider the number of those who mobilized for jihād to aid their brothers who fell under the blatant occupation in Afghanistan previously during the time of the Russians, or in Bosnia, Chechnya, Palestine, or other Muslim countries that were subjected to contemporary occupation, we find that the percentage remains in the single digits per million. Despite the media drumming and clamoring to exaggerate the phenomenon of armed jihād or what they call "terrorism" to justify their aggressive goals. [And disregard the imaginary numbers published by America's intelligence through its media outlets, numbers it has entered under the name of al-Qaeda to achieve its goals. And I confirm what I have mentioned from numbers, and in my capacity as one of those who experienced this stage in the field, and praise be to Allāh].

So if we compare this situation with the size of the mobilization for jihād that Muslims undertook throughout their ancient history and even in modern times during colonialism, we find that the state of the Ummah these days is disheartening, if not for hope in Allāh, and what the signs of hope and revival in some segments of the Ummah indicate, which need efforts to bring them to fruition, launch them, and establish them, leading to transforming them into an effective "Global Islamic Resistance" carrying a jihādī creed and an actual will to fight, fueled by an effective emotion.

And for this purpose, and working to spread the seeds of this resistance, call for it, and work to establish it, I have put the materials of this book and made its title expressive of its content:

“Global Islamic Resistance - The Call - The Methodology - The Way”

Trying to put, according to what Allāh has made easy for me; laying the foundations of theories of action that contribute to what the next jihādī generation needs after us, to answer an important question of utmost strategic, religious, and practical importance. This question is:

How do we confront the New World Order? How do we wage jihād against our enemies in the post-September world? How do we resist the Third Crusades led by America?

This book has been written, and the foundations of this call have been laid in order to answer this question, and Allāh is the one sought for help.

For the sake of the third generation of jihādīs: The Generation of Global Islamic Resistance

I believe that a jihādī generation is being born today with the intensity of the conflict reaching what it has reached, after the events of September and the occupation of Iraq, and the Palestinian Intifada reaching its peak. And its standing at a crossroads, after our faithful people there gave everything they had. While the Ummah stands as a spectator to their sacrifices, due to the silence of its scholars and the suppression and paralysis of its rulers.

If we consider the past experiences, since the launch of jihād in the mid-1960s, i.e. about 40 years ago, until today, I can say that two jihādī generations have passed so far in this awakening. Where we will present their history in some detail in the sixth chapter, in shā' Allāh. The generation of the founders and the first batch, which ignited the torch of jihādī thought and presented its first experiences from the beginning of the 1960s to the late 1970s of the last century. The 1980s did not come until most of them had passed away on this illuminated path. Then the second generation, which continued the march from the beginning of the 1980s to the end of the twentieth century. Where jihād revived in Egypt, the Levant, then North Africa and elsewhere. Then the gate of jihād was opened wide for lovers of the absent obligation in Afghanistan, where the second jihādī generation was formed over the 1980s to the early 1990s. The school of the Arab Afghans was a distinct experience, with its pioneers, jihād spread to various parts of the Islamic world. The arenas of Bosnia and Chechnya contributed, then the second Afghanistan phase and the Islamic Emirate with a rich offering, the end of which witnessed the joining of the vanguards of the third jihādī generation.

Then came the events of September 2001, and the second generation entered the furnace of tribulation, as the twentieth century ended, and the third millennium opened with a horrific massacre and a great ditch, which consumed most of its cadres, leaders, and most of its bases. Only a small number of them survived killing or captivity.

And I firmly believe that the third generation must digest the summary of the experience of its roots to develop its theories of action and continue to carry the banner of jihād in extremely difficult circumstances, and a battle with a highly imbalanced balance of power.

And I wanted in this book - as I am one of those remaining from the second generation - to deliver to those who follow in our footsteps part of the trust in this book, and in what I intend to write of this series that follows it. A summary of intellectual and historical methodology, that would help those who prepare to carry the trust to continue the path with insight, without losing great lessons from a glorious path, stained with the blood of tens of thousands of martyrs. And the suffering of a generation that endured in its struggle with the tyrants and those behind them the most severe suffering in this modern era.

The coming generation of jihād must know its roots, digest the experiences of its predecessors, and walk on the lights of what they presented in thought, experience, and example, through understanding the historical roots of the conflict since it began.

In the history of the contemporary Islamic awakening that started at the beginning of the twentieth century until today, and what it is full of wonderful experiences, regardless of whether they are right or wrong, there are great lessons. Also, in the history of the experiences of the contemporary jihādī current that started at the beginning of the 1960s in the last century until our days, there are lessons, examples, a methodology, thought, and a banner. The coming jihādī generation must build on it. First, it must know it as history and methodology and digest it so that the coming jihādī generation becomes a natural link in this chain that draws the path of the glorious caravan towards the desired dream of Islam, in restoring the rule of Allāh to this earth, and establishing His rightly guided Caliphate on the methodology of prophethood, in shā' Allāh.

I have tried to cover this briefly in some chapters of this book. Also, understanding the context of the history of the Ummah in general, what befell it, and its general, and especially political, course, is a fundamental part of knowledge. The coming generation of jihād and those in charge of it must know and understand its course, which can be called the modern history of the Arabs and Muslims during the last century, Since the fall of the Caliphate in 1924. Also, a portion of knowledge about the history of our current struggle with the contemporary Romans, our eternal enemies, I mean knowing the summary of the history of our struggle with the Romans and their historical campaigns, and how our ancestors performed in that struggle, and the summary of the lessons of victories and defeats throughout those epics, Is very important to feel the footsteps of the coming path.

Understanding that and linking it to the history of the entire conflict, and to the roots of this existing international system and its emergence throughout the ages and extracting a summary of the foundations of the conflict between truth and falsehood since humans existed on this earth, paves the way for digesting and understanding the components of creating appropriate theories of action for the current stage.

And if the ordinary mujāhid individual can be ignorant of many of the connections of this series of knowledge, lessons, and experiences, the coming elite of jihād leaders and its coming generation cannot be ignorant of the wisdom and lesson from this entire context.

Therefore, I was keen to include in the first chapters, or more than half of this book, a summary of that in a sequential, logical, and concise manner. Yes, concise despite its bulk.

Knowledge has become the most important weapon of this age. And the ignorant cannot lead this conflict, no matter how sincere they are assumed to be.

This is what I concluded, after a long, special, personal experience, which I spent - I ask Allāh for sincerity and acceptance - amid the turmoil of the experiences of the Islamic awakening, since (1980) until our days in late (2004).

And through field participation in the contemporary jihādī current during this very important and giving period. During which I lived the experience of jihād in Syria in the field since 1980, and I was a member of the military leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood during the events of Hama 1982. Then the experience of the Arab Afghan jihād against the Soviet Union and communism in Afghanistan, also in the field (1988-1992). Then keeping up with the bitter, unfortunate jihādī experience in Algeria closely through media work with the supporters of Algerian jihād in London (1993-1997), until we were forced to abandon it due to the control of deviants over its leadership - as I explained the course of that in my book (My Testimony on Jihād in Algeria 1989-1996). Then working and participating in the field in the last and most important jihādī experiences in the past decade. It is the experience of the Taliban and the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan during (1996-2001). And before that, what the numerous emigrations afforded me, especially in a number of Arab, Islamic, and European countries. And what that provided me with contact with various segments of the Islamic awakening in general, and getting to know most of the movements, organizations, and leaders of the contemporary jihādī current in particular. And what I learned through that about dozens of jihādī and Islamic experiences in general. And through being one of those working in the jihādī current in the field of thought, writing, history, and media activity, in addition to direct field participation.

I do not mention this here for pride, and the situation is not its place - and I ask Allāh for sincerity - but so that the reader knows that what he receives from the pages of the book is the product of a long and diverse field experience, so he gives it its due attention.

I have strived to apply thought and spend many hours in discussions and dialogue with many of those working in this jihādī current, especially its experienced cadres and leaders, and in thinking about the nature of this calamity that has befallen us and ways to confront it. And to put the summary of that between the covers of this book, and through its successive messages, to summarize in that, what contributes to serving the coming jihādī generation, and helps it to resume the path.

As I said in my book and the first of my writings:

(The Islamic Jihādī Revolution in Syria - Pains and Hopes) which I wrote in 1987, I repeat here:

Every jihādī generation must generate its practical theory, through self-experience, and develop it in light of the harvest of previous experiences.

The practical jihādī theory is not born in the heads of authors and thinkers above elegant desks. Nor through a comfortable, easy life. Nor does it descend upon its owners from the top of the organizational pyramid of their movement. Rather, it is born in the trenches of fighting, the fields of preparation, the path of tribulation, and its furnace. A theory that causes its owners hardship, and makes them pay the price of every mistake and experience with their blood and suffering, until those who follow find what is appropriate for each coming stage of the right steps.

Failed experiences are expensive, but failure is often more enriching to the path than victory. As it combines experience with the one experiencing it. So, if steadfastness and determination to continue are granted to him, it forms for him the ground for the decisive coming victory, by Allāh's permission.

I myself have lived through bitter jihādī experiences, and I was able, through my companionship and interaction, to learn about many other wonderful experiences, from the narrations of their owners who carried them out. And I have studied them comparatively with what I have learned about the history of contemporary movements and revolutions. And I have tried in this book to digest all of that, and present it in theories of action that may be helpful on our coming path, and the path of those who will follow in our footsteps with the success granted by Allāh.

America and Western civilization, and what it has inflicted upon us and others of humankind, have represented a disease that has afflicted humanity with all the meanings of the word "disease." And there is no doubt that the affliction of its disease and its cure are included in what was narrated from him, ṣallā Allāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam:

"Allāh has not sent down a disease except that He has sent down a cure for it, known by those who know it, and unknown by those who are ignorant of it."

And I have tried in this book to contribute to the search for the specifications of this cure, perhaps Allāh will make us and those who will follow in the footsteps of those who have passed; among those who know it.

Perhaps we can relieve our Ummah, and perhaps all of humanity behind that, from the symptoms of this disease - America and its allies - and what it has inflicted on innocent humans in general and Muslims in particular, of calamities. So that there may be healing in that by Allāh.

An Introduction to the Stages of Crystallization and Maturation of the Ideas of this Book

The writing of this research was postponed despite my determination to do so many times. Perhaps in Allāh's decree in that delay is good. And perhaps one of these good things is that the fierce attack led by America and its allies is what helps the Muslim reader to a greater understanding, and a clearer conviction of the ideas and work programs, and the call for jihād and resistance that we call him to in this book.

What could not be realized and convinced of except with a degree of insight, more than twelve years ago, when these new Crusades began with the invasion of America and its allies of the Gulf under the guise of liberating Kuwait in 1990, has now become. It is realized today with little sight, even with a small amount of hearing for those whose insight has betrayed him, and blindness has afflicted him after he lost the blessing of sensation.

And perhaps among the horizons of good in delaying the release of this research is also, that these ideas mature after the evidence of the campaigns of America and its allies against Muslims in general, and the Islamic awakening in particular, and the defenders of this Ummah from among its mujāhidīn sons in particular, led to an increase in our conviction of the necessity of the ferocity of the resistance, imposed by the savagery of the fierce barbaric attack.

And perhaps one of the good things also in that delay is that this book is released from the furnace of the tribulation that we are living its peak these days, as we live the stage of pursuits and hiding places, and the peak of confrontation with America and its allies.

And I hope that Allāh has decreed for me facilitation and success in its release, and I ask Him, the Almighty, to inspire me with truth and rightness, to avoid error, and to grant me the reasons for acceptance. He is worthy of that and capable of it.

As for the stages of crystallization of the ideas of this book, it is useful in understanding it to mention their sequence.

This was done in gradual stages over a period of fourteen years, between late 1990 and late 2004.

As for its final wording, I started it at the beginning of 2002, and I am now - by the grace of Allāh - nearing its end at the end of 2004.

The summary of those intellectual stages was as follows:

First Stage: Peshawar (1990 - 1991)

1. The gathering of Arab mujāhidīn that I attended between (1987-1992) in Afghanistan and the Pakistani border areas, especially its capital Peshawar, had reached its peak in 1990, and undoubtedly contained the entire spectrum of the Islamic awakening, especially the Arab one, with its various schools. And that gathering witnessed what can be described as an intellectual and psychological earthquake at the level of the Arab mujāhidīn in particular. This was with the descent of the international coalition forces led by America in the Arabian Peninsula under the guise of what was called the liberation of Kuwait. Which clearly appeared to be just a fragile cover for fierce new Crusades, led by America, Western Europe, and the Jews, on the heartland of Islam in the Levant, Iraq, and the Arabian Peninsula. That earthquake shook the entire Arab and Islamic Ummah, and its religious-political awakening, which had been living its peak since it started more than half a century ago. For the Christians entered this time the land of the Two Holy Mosques, and surrounded the Arabian Peninsula - the heartland of Islam - by land, sea, and air, and landed about a million soldiers in it. More than half of them were Americans. And about twenty percent of them were British. And about ten percent were from NATO countries - Western Europe - and the rest were made up of about 31 countries. And some Arab and Islamic governments such as Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, Pakistan, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, Morocco, and others had a fair share of participation as well. And this is not the place for digression, which scholars, writers, and journalists have elaborated on, which left no room for doubt, that the Islamic Ummah, its sanctities, and its wealth, especially oil, are targeted in a wave of direct military Crusader-Jewish occupation. An occupation that ultimately aims to completely eliminate the civilizational existence of Muslims.

That earthquake was followed, within a few months, and at the beginning of 1991, by another wave of earthquakes with the announcement of peace projects with the Jews, to sell what remained of Palestine and Jerusalem under other false names. From projects of reconciliation, normalization, and peace between the Arabs and the Jews. That wave that was launched from the Madrid Conference in 1991, and in which Israel participated with the Arab surrounding countries (Egypt - Syria - Jordan - Lebanon) in addition to the Palestine Liberation Organization, and with the presence of other Arab countries, headed by Saudi Arabia. Where most Arab and Islamic countries supported this treacherous, surrender path.

One of the most important devastating effects that resulted from that political earthquake was that the peoples of the Arab and Islamic Ummah, and especially the Islamic awakening, woke up to the earthquake and it revealed in a scandalous way very dangerous facts, which can be summarized as follows:

That the Islamic Ummah is being subjected to a direct military occupation attack in order to control its sanctities: (Mecca - Medina - Jerusalem), and in order to impose the Jewish occupation of Palestine, and in order to seize oil - the Muslim treasury - and in order to impose a Western cultural and social occupation, after the political occupation was established through Arab and Islamic regimes and governments, and culminated in the military occupation that was launched with the Desert Storm war (liberation of Kuwait). An attack that intends the Ummah from one end to the other, to subjugate it to the broad slogan that was launched under the name of the "New World Order". Which means in short: subjugating the Ummah to the Zionist-Crusader will be led by America.

That all the governments of the Arab and Islamic countries, without exception, participated in or supported that campaign. And the apostate rulers who established systems of kufr in their countries, provided all forms of support, aid, and logistical services to the occupation forces by land, sea, and air. And they supported them through their media apparatus. In fact, many of them participated militarily, actually or symbolically, to prove their presence and belonging to this campaign against Islam and Muslims. So that these governments prove that they are an essential part of this New World Order in fighting their peoples and their true religion, and in betraying their causes, selling their wealth, and handing over their sanctities.

It became clear that the general religious structure in the Muslim countries, represented by independent scholars on the one hand, or by the leaders of the Islamic awakening and its parties and groups on the other hand, is a bankrupt, collapsed structure, not suitable in any way to confront this attack. But even more astonishing than this is that it became clear that most of those called Sunni scholars, their followed celebrities, and their distinguished jurists had joined the media campaign for these Crusades. They bestowed legitimacy on them and permitted them, and some of the major hypocrites among them even considered that the arrival of the Americans to the Arabian Peninsula was one of the greatest blessings of Allāh on this Ummah and that it deserved prostration of gratitude!! As expressed by Shaykh Abu Bakr al-Jaza'iri, a member of the Council of Senior (Agents) in Saudi Arabia! So, they distorted the true picture, to transform it from a picture of a Crusader-Jewish occupation of Muslims, to a picture of legitimate support from friendly Islamic and non-Islamic countries, for the Dawla of tawḥīd "Saudi Arabia", and the "legitimate" government of Kuwait, which was overthrown by a kāfir, brutal enemy, aggressor against blood, money, and honor (Iraq). With this, the final statement of what was called the Mecca Conference (1991) was issued, which the Saudi government called for about 400 scholars, who are the senior scholars of the Islamic world, and the leaders of the so-called Islamic awakening!! And among those who were in it and signed this final statement: the Council of Senior Scholars in Saudi Arabia, the Shaykhs of al-Azhar from Egypt, and their equivalents of scholars, ministers of endowments and religious affairs, and official and non-official religious associations of all Arab and Islamic countries. As well as most of the heads and symbols of Islamic movements, from the Muslim Brotherhood, Salafi, Sufi, Tablighi, and reformist groups. A statement was issued with the signature of nearly 400 scholars, leaders, and Islamic symbols! Most of those groups also issued their own statements that revolved around this clumsy American colonial jurisprudence!! Only a few of the symbols of the awakening who were protected by Allāh deviated from this calamity. And it was one of the consequences of that; that fatwās were issued by many of these scholars forbidding the attack! On these invading forces of ours, considering them to be legally protected, and considering everyone who wages jihād against them, aggressors against the covenant of the Muslims, corrupters in the land. Their punishment in this world is: (TO BE KILLED OR CRUCIFIED OR HAVE THEIR HANDS AND FEET CUT OFF FROM OPPOSITE SIDES, OR BE EXILED FROM THE LAND)! They even claimed that the aggressor against these legally innocent ones (the American and Crusader forces) will not smell the scent of Paradise!!! With this, a statement was issued by consensus by the Council of Senior Scholars in Saudi Arabia after the two explosions (Riyadh) and (al-Khobar) that targeted American soldiers later.

It became clear, unfortunately, that the armed jihādī groups and organizations that rejected that reality and called for jihād against the Americans and their allies, were, due to their organizational reality, weakness, and displacement from their countries, unable to provide a solution to this devastating calamity that descended on the Muslim countries. Their confrontations with the Americans were limited to statements with limited distribution in the diaspora, far from the Ummah. The position of their leaders and symbols was clear, and it represented the truth, but it was a helpless, defeated position. Far, far away from the circle of action and influence, or the eligibility to lead confrontation.

Finally, and because of these conditions, it became clear that the Islamic Ummah and all its peoples, as a result of the corruption of the two components of righteousness in the Ummah (scholars and rulers), are absent from the event. Exactly as narrated in the tradition:

"Two classes of people, if they are righteous, the people are righteous, and if they are corrupt, the people are corrupt: the scholars and the rulers." And that the Ummah, and most of its kings, presidents, and rulers have committed kufr, and most of its scholars have become hypocrites, is invited to enter a great wilderness greater than the one it is in. And because its apostate rulers have become in the alliance of the enemy. And because most of its scholars and the leaders of its Islamic movements have been distributed, either in the labyrinths of hypocrisy or in the burrows of helplessness. And that the enemy is standing in the position described by the poet, saying:

The wolf is not to be blamed for his aggression... If the shepherd is the enemy of the sheep.

It has become clear that the peoples of the Muslims are completely absent from the reality of what is happening to them, and what is being planned for their Ummah, and that their masses are drowning up to their ears in their pursuit of their worldly life, and wallowing in the wallowing of its pleasures. And that the enemy is determined to complete the seizure of what remains with them of their religion and the crumbs of their worldly life. And their generality is exposed in their heedlessness. And that those who are aware of what is going on are biting their fingers with rage, oppression, and sadness at what is happening to the Ummah, and they complain to Allāh that they are among the weak who cannot devise a plan and are not guided to a way.

Amidst those earthquakes, and the succession of news and analyses of what happened, is happening, and what is expected of it in the coming years, the beginnings of these ideas began to be generated in me.

Those circumstances were a driving force for me to think about what is happening, its dimensions, and ways to confront it. And it was clear from reviewing the spectrum of the awakening and the Islamic, jihādī, intellectual, and other movements that I got to know those of them that I did not know in the Afghan jihād stage, that most or all of them had adopted programs, methodologies, and goals that were far from confronting the coming crisis.

The programs of the Brotherhood and their forms revolve around the idea of parliaments, winning electoral seats, finding common ground with governments, and searching for positions that do not clash with the new invaders of the region. Plans for partial, phased reform, all of which revolve around nationalism according to the affiliations of those parties and their countries. And their personal and partisan interests have intertwined with the interests of da'wah and Islam in a way that is difficult for anyone other than Allāh, Blessed and Exalted, to distinguish!!

The Salafi currents, groups, symbols, sheikhs, movements, and magazines pour their interests on the sector of creeds and doctrinal and jurisprudential polemics. And it seems as if their problems, which go back to the battles of the Hanbalis with al-Jubba'i and the Mu'tazilites, are closer to their interests than discussing the issue of the coming invasion, and issues of the kufr of the ruler. And they have, in turn, found a field for various activities that do not arouse the displeasure of governments, and they have found a foothold for themselves far from confrontation, even if temporarily. And a large sector of them has been convinced of the idea of parliaments and phased da'wah, after some of them had declared the Brotherhood to be kuffār for that.

As for those belonging to schools further from politics, such as the Tabligh, Sufism, and educational and reformist schools, they are in turn further away, according to their intellectual structure and the nature of their interests, from these conflicts. They have found ways for themselves to make peace with their governments and those behind them.

As for the jihādī groups, which are the closest segments and sectors of the awakening to clashing with the coming invasion, due to what they were raised on of thought, methodology, experience, and armed jihādī practices in their countries and then in Afghanistan, they were more concerned than others with addressing thinking and moving towards what is happening. But it soon became clear that they were experiencing in that era a local flourishing in Afghanistan that made the concerns of most of them confined to establishing camps, providing sources of funding, and heading towards mobilization and recruitment to build themselves on the basis of ("secret - nationalist - hierarchical") organizations, whose traditional goal is still the same: (... "overthrowing the governments of their countries ... to establish Islamic governments on their ruins") according to the same foundations that were put forward and spread since the 1970s and during the 1980s and until the early 1990s. These are the attempts that took place in many Arab countries.

I felt at the time that people and their orientations were in one valley, and that the course of events and what we receive from them, is going in another valley.

In those days, the beginnings of the ideas that I will detail in this research, after they crystallized and became in their final form, came to my mind.

And I remember that in those days I discussed some of these ideas with a group of those around me of the Arab mujāhidīn in Afghanistan, who had experience in the world of thought, research, writing, and theorizing. And it seemed to me that those ideas of mine were early, and very far from the reality of the jihādīs, let alone the rest of the non-jihādī segments of the awakening. And a number of initial convictions became clear to me - at the time - that formed the basis of the idea. And from that:

1. That the Desert Storm war is the beginning of the transformations arising from the establishment of the New World Order. And that this invasion highlighted the real enemy who was hiding behind our governments, and they are international Crusaders and its vanguard the NATO countries and behind them Israel, and made them the apparent, real, and most dangerous enemy that must be confronted. And that revolving around preparation and engaging in limited national jihādī battles and confrontations with our ruling regimes will not be successful, Allāh knows best, despite its legitimacy. Because it ultimately serves the interests of the real enemies, because it dissipates energies in useless labyrinths, due to what has been proven and what has passed of experiences. And that the killer and the killed in those jihādī revolutions of ours were prey to the real enemy, who distributed the roles.

2. That the existing international global war, and the system of globalization of everything, including the coming confrontation between Muslims and their enemies who have emerged from hiding into the open, needs a global confrontation system from our side. Global in thinking and methods of confrontation, other than that existing at the time.
3. That the beginnings of the counter-terrorism system put forward by America and Europe through the series of security conferences that followed the Madrid Conference in early 1991 show that security confrontations with jihādī and fundamentalist Islamic movements are moving to the international and global field, after witnessing a development from national to regional. And that this will lead to the abortion of all methods of work of the jihādīs from movements, funding, communications, activity, and methods of organization. Because they rely on movement in the global horizon after being chased in their countries.
4. That the official religious establishment and a large sector of their scholars and religious institutions are automatically preparing to be part of the New World Order! In other words; part of the enemy. After officially choosing to ride in the boat of their kāfir regimes that were employed within the new Jewish-Crusader campaign. Where these religious apparatuses will carry out the task of intellectual and shar'ī abortion of any jihādī resistance project.

5. That the other political Islamic awakening schools, especially political parties, by seeking parliamentary and governmental participation, through positions halfway with the raging jāhiliyyah represented by the apostate regimes, will end up being part of the international system as well. And part of the enemy, whether they intended to or not. Under the guise of gradualism, and slogans that do not convince the livestock of their feasibility and justifications, neither the shar'ī nor the political ones. Especially after the slaps received by "Islamic democracy" in Algeria, Turkey, Tunisia, Kuwait, Jordan, Egypt, and others. And that they will stand alongside their governments, of which these ("Islamic!") parties have become part of their constitutional ("legitimate!") institutions, against the mujāhidīn.
6. I believed that the remaining jihādī organizations or their wreckage, such as those coming from Egypt, the Levant, and others, whether existing or starting to build themselves, like most of the gatherings and jihādī waves coming from North Africa, are building themselves on foundations that are very backward from the developments of the battle. The flames of the new security arrangements to combat terrorism will devour them, Allāh knows best.

And in the face of all this, I saw that what was required was not possible at that stage (1990), in that place (Peshawar and the camps of Afghanistan), unfortunately. Even though it is the focal point of the gathering of jihād and the jihādīs.

And I remember that I once exchanged dialogue with one of the most prominent participants in the field of history and theorizing for jihādī thought, on a moonlit night on the roof of Shaykh Jalaluddin Haqqani's house in Peshawar. And I noticed the beginning of the birth of similar convictions in him. And we decided to call for evaluation sessions for the path and reality of jihādī thought and movements, in order to extract some lessons, evaluate our experience in Afghanistan, and assess what awaits it in the next stage. And we held two sessions, at the possible level of elitism. And it seemed that everyone agreed that a security storm was looming on the horizon, its winds would blow first on Pakistan and Afghanistan to liquidate this gathering, which it seems its role had ended. Especially after Shaykh Abdullah Azzam was assassinated, and the signs of the media campaign began to turn the name of the mujāhidīn into "rebels," then into "dissidents," then into "terrorists"... under a new dramatic name, "Arab Afghans."

And I remember that I said one day to my closest friends at the time, that I was sensing the birth of ideas for developing theories of action for jihād that I believed were correct, and terrifying expectations that I was certain of their danger and the possibility of their occurrence. And it seemed to me that they were early ideas that could not be presented now. And they would be understood - if presented - as a kind of confusion and intellectual disturbance for the Arab scene in Afghanistan.

And I wished I had the courage in early 1991 to gather some of the symbols and leaders of the jihādī movements and organizations to tell them those convictions of mine in short:

As for the Islamic awakening, it has gone bankrupt, and most of its parties and leaders will soon be in the enemy's trench. Either out of conviction after it deviated, or practically and forcibly to find a place for itself in the New World Order. Because the other option is jihād and confrontation, and they are sitting back from it. As for us - the community of mujāhidīn - we have two or three years to reach a dead end in movement, and practical security disintegration. And there is no way to avoid this future - according to my understanding at the time - except by focusing on changing the methods of thinking, military and media action, and organizational structures, A radical, comprehensive change, and I don't think you will do it.

That was not, of course, reasonable or possible, and I had not yet completed the dimensions of the required theories of change as I believe. And I hope - that this has happened now. With this, such talk would be just a herald of defeat without providing realistic solutions.

The truth is that the features of the disaster were clear to some who saw it, by virtue of what Allāh opened and facilitated for them of insight, experience, and thought. They were a few individuals, and most of them were not involved in organizational frameworks that govern the nature of their thinking. And those thoughts and intellectual illuminations were not sufficiently clear to convince others to think seriously and the necessity of creating an internal revolution in the methods of organization and action. It was the decree of Allāh, a matter determined.

It was proven with time that the jihādī organizations, movements, and armed attempts that are based on (national, secret, organizational hierarchy) are on the path of extinction and failure, because they did not absorb the global transformation that occurred with the launch of the New World Order train, and did not understand its political and security dimensions and its reflection on them. And the heat of enthusiasm and the horizons of sincerity and dedication among their leaders and elements, who were the cream of the Ummah's youth at that time, were not sufficient to avoid the fate whose indicators appeared to those who saw them.

At the time, I was unable to do much, except for some lectures in some camps and in the (Al-Nour Center for Media), which was supervised by (Shaykh Abu Hudhayfah), one of the students of knowledge from the Egyptian Jihad Organization, in order to give an intellectual boost in the Arab jihādī scene in Peshawar, which forms the rear line of the Arab jihādī presence in Afghanistan, which at that time exceeded 40,000 mujāhidīn. One of the most important lectures related to the ideas of this research was a lecture I gave during the summer of 1991 entitled (The Political Equation of the New World Order). Its summary was: that the coming conflict will have its equation as follows:

The New World Order vs The Armed Jihādī Current

That is:

[Crusaders and its leader America + Jewish Zionism and its leader Israel + The apostate rulers in the Muslim countries + The deviant sects hostile to the Sunnis + The official religious structure of the Sunnis + The democratic Islamic movements of the awakening] vs [The armed jihādī organizations. They are the vanguard of the Ummah in the confrontation].

These ideas sparked great controversy at the time, but unfortunately, the past decade (1990-2000) has proven their validity clearly.

I followed that with a series of lessons and dialogues, in which I focused on the necessity of revolution against the hypocritical structure of our Sunni scholars. Which, unfortunately, enjoyed amazing sanctification even from the largest sector of those belonging to the jihādī current who carry weapons! And not even the public standing of those scholars alongside the campaign of (Schwarzkopf), the commander of Desert Storm, changed that. And their consideration that those who wage jihād against him and his Marines are corrupters in the land!!

I also gave several lectures on the components of the organization and evaluating the past of the awakening and looking ahead to its future. And the legitimacy of criticizing scholars, and its controls ... and other new ideas.

It was clear that the gap of the required change in thinking and action was very wide, and that the consequences of the new aggression against the Ummah and a portion of the coming affliction were necessary for the majority to help them understand and absorb what is happening.

The first of what we warned against began to be realized when the winds of the Desert Storm blew in the form of a security hurricane on the Arab Afghans in Pakistan, expelling most of them to their countries, and displacing those who could not return to their countries in the countries of the world. It reduced that gathering from tens of thousands to a few hundred of the chased, hidden in Pakistan. Then the installments of affliction followed until they reached their peak today on the echoes of the explosions of September 11, ten years after the beginning of the birth of the ideas that we will present in this book, and we ask Allāh for guidance and righteousness.

Second Stage: Madrid (1991)

The storm blew and scattered the thousands who came for jihād in Afghanistan in all countries of the world. The largest segment returned to their countries to face security pursuits, investigations, and prisons. Some temporary shelters shared those who were originally chased in their countries on charges of belonging to armed jihādī groups, so they became chased under a new identity under the new term given to them by the West, "Arab Afghans." And shortly before that, I had returned to Madrid in Spain, where I had been living for years, and there I wrote research that is considered the basis for a large part of the ideas of this book. It was titled:

"A Statement for the Establishment of Global Islamic Resistance" It was brief research of about 40 pages. And I believed that the appropriate arena for spreading those ideas at that time was still Peshawar, where the gathering that was about to disperse was. And my purpose was for the largest possible number of Arab mujāhidīn to carry it with them, those who seemed to me to be destined for dispersal. And by virtue of their jihādī experience and their military preparation, they are more worthy and more capable than others of working according to those ideas according to my - wrong - assessment at that time. Because I discovered later their unsuitability for that. Because they received high military training, and did not receive the necessary methodological, intellectual, and political doctrinal guidance.

The summary of the ideas carried by that statement (research) was as follows:

A presentation of the reality of the Muslims and what they have reached, especially during the Gulf War (Desert Storm), and a refutation of the claims of those who claimed the legitimacy of the descent of the Crusaders in the heartland of the Muslims. And a call for jihād against this campaign. And a refutation of the claim of those who claimed that Saddam Hussein was the complex of hope in confronting the Crusaders.

Proving that the jihādī forces and organizations, and even the forces of the Islamic awakening, are not sufficient to confront this global Jewish-Crusader campaign.

And that it is necessary to return the task of jihād to the entire Ummah, revive it, and involve it in a global Islamic resistance that will confront the global Jewish-Crusader attack.

Proving that the call to the entire Ummah must be based on the generalities of Islam and the emotional call to jihād, and not on the basis of the complex doctrinal and intellectual details, and jihādī jurisprudence - although they are generally correct, no doubt. By choosing a key to the conflict, and a call for jihād, that all Islamic orientations of the awakening agree on. And all segments and classes of Muslims, their elite and their commoners, are equal in understanding it. And I chose for that, the call to liberate the sanctities as a slogan for the call to resistance. To save the Two Holy Mosques and al-Aqsa from the Jews and the Crusaders. And putting forward the slogan of jihād against an external enemy instead of jihād against the rulers, which the peoples did not digest - thanks to the services of the distinguished Sunni scholars. And choosing jihād against the Jews and their head Israel and the Crusaders and their head America and the European NATO countries as an external, invading enemy as a basis for this call.

Highlighting the importance of the economic dimension of this jihād, and that the Muslim treasury and their wealth, headed by oil, has been looted. And this campaign will loot what remains of it. And that the Muslim must wage jihād against his strength and the stolen sustenance of his children. And giving this type of economic jihād its shar'ī dimension, which was absent from the jihādīs' intellectual presentation and is still absent. Because some jihād jurists from the emerging youth consider that a scratch on the pure creed!

And in short, choosing a popular key to the call for jihād consisting of three dimensions: First: the religious dimension (sanctities) - Second: the political dimension (external occupation) - Third: the economic dimension (wealth, oil).

Calling youth and Muslims in general to practice individual resistance, so that resistance does not rely on structures and hierarchical network systems, the arrest of some of whose members leads to its destruction and the arrest of all its members. By choosing a method of work (work system), and not an organization in the known sense. So that each participant in the acts of resistance in which Muslims in general participate is affiliated with one name, which is (Global Islamic Resistance). Where the benefit of everyone's work is integrated, and the arrest of individuals does not lead to the arrest of everyone because there is no connection between them. This was the core of the military movement idea.

Identifying the hostile targets that must be targeted by striking. They are in short:

All forms of human presence of the enemy in our countries first, and in the countries of the world second, and in their homeland third. Especially the forms of the enemy's political, military, missionary, economic, cultural, and tourist presence... etc. in our countries, especially the Jews, then America, then Britain, then Russia, then all the NATO countries. Then any country that stands with them in aggression against Islam and Muslims.

A summary with shar'ī evidence proving the permissibility of the money and blood of all forms of subjects and interests of these countries, and presenting for that a comprehensive fatwā by the scholar, the muḥaddith Ahmad Shakir, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Urging jihādī groups and organizations and Muslim individuals who have previously had military training and combat practice to start turning the wheel of resistance. And calling the public to methods of civil resistance from semi-military actions to acts of religious and political propaganda to speeches, writings, and slogans... etc. So that all segments of the Ummah participate in this jihād and this open resistance in the form of a general uprising.

Calling the mujāhidīn resistors to form small brigades that finance themselves from the enemy's financial spoils. And calling the rich among Muslims to finance and support those who want jihād and sponsor the families of those affected by them.

Calling on the mujāhidīn working in the resistance to target the external enemy primarily in our countries and their countries. In addition to targeting the senior apostates from the rulers of the Muslims and the senior first-class of their aides. Because they are the main pillar of the occupation. And not to turn the confrontation with the governments into an open revolution, as happened in previous experiences. But rather to confront the local army and security forces in cases of self-defense against killing or captivity only. And to incite these forces with kindness to participate in the resistance as part of the forces of the Ummah.

Denouncing the hypocritical scholars, and the symbols of the Islamic movements that followed in the footsteps of the New World Order. And calling on Muslims to turn away from them and rally around the mujāhid scholars, and calling on this rare class of scholars to lead the popular resistance, In all Muslim countries.

Choosing a slogan that expresses the resistance and its call, which is a form that highlights the three sanctities.

(Kaaba - Prophet's Mosque - Al-Aqsa Mosque) behind prison bars indicating occupation. Underneath it is written the noble verse {So fight, [O Muhammad], in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And encourage the believers} (and above it is written: A Statement for the Establishment of Global Islamic Resistance).

I returned to Peshawar at the beginning of 1991 to publish this book secretly, and spread it among the mujāhidīn there. And since these ideas were of such seriousness as is not hidden, only four brothers, may Allāh have mercy on them, supervised the publication process, which included all Arab houses, guesthouses, and institutions. Where we distributed about 1000 copies that had also been printed secretly. This was done successfully at the beginning of June - 1991, as I remember.

Then the signs of the security storm soon intensified. And those crowds began to leave Peshawar, and I in turn left again. Where I settled in Granada, the last stronghold of Muslims in Andalusia.

Third Stage: London (1996)

It was late 1996. Where I had been involved in supporting and endorsing the jihād that broke out in Algeria, since 1994. This was through an old acquaintance with some of its pioneers whom I knew from Afghanistan. And they had settled in London, establishing a cell for media services for the Armed Islamic Group in Algeria. Because of that, I moved to live in London. The jihādī issue in Algeria went through multiple turning points. Which ultimately led to the leadership of the Armed Islamic Group, after the martyrdom of its sincere, conscious leaders, falling to some ignorant and intellectually deviant people who embraced ideas ranging from takfir and crime and ignorance mixed with some ideas of jihādī origins, through a tight intelligence arrangement, which led to its ruin, failure, and disintegration in early 1996.

And we had no choice at that time - religiously and rationally - but to disavow the Armed Group and what things had come to with jihād in Algeria. I will refer in the sixth chapter to a brief overview of that experience, in shā' Allāh. And I have prepared a book entitled: (A Summary of My Testimony on Jihād in Algeria 1988-1996). And I will publish it soon, in shā' Allāh.

The relevant matter between my experience with Algerian jihād and the ideas of this book that is in our hands is the shock that we faced in London with the success of the international and regional plan to abort jihād in Algeria, by taking it off course, controlling its leadership, dismantling it security-wise, and isolating it from the Muslim masses in Algeria and abroad, because of what they involved them in of massacres against the Muslim people, or what the Algerian intelligence committed in their name of massacres as well.

Despite its dazzling military and popular successes, and despite the availability of the best conditions for success that were available to a jihādī movement in the modern era. That experience was a harsh lesson. It confirmed to me the futility of local attempts at jihād under the New World Order, and the global confrontation of what was called terrorism (i.e., Islamic jihādī movements).

From late 1996 to late 1997, I spent long hours contemplating and dialoguing, with some of the elite of the jihādīs residing from the cadres of the Arab Afghans and jihādī organizations in London. To evaluate the reasons for the failure of the repeated armed jihādī attempts in the modern era:

And we formed for this, dialogue and studied a semi-irregular symposium, for which we held several meetings, in which we compared the failure in all those organizational attempts, and the military successes in the frontal jihādī experiences of Muslims in Bosnia - Chechnya - Afghanistan. We also presented to study the new beginnings of individual jihād actions that began to occur since the Gulf War. Which were carried out by some Muslim youth here and there.

And I can say that my contemplation in those days and attempts to research and write some thoughts in that period, formed for me, in addition to what I had reached of ideas (the statement of Global Islamic Resistance), the basics of the detailed ideas of this book that is in our hands now.

And I carried these ideas in my chest and emigrated with them after my decision to leave completely to Afghanistan, after scouting it twice after the Taliban movement was able to enter Kabul and declare the Islamic Emirate. And after it became clear to me that the signs of a severe security storm blowing on Islamists, especially jihādīs, in Europe were approaching, and I preferred that its whirlwinds not reach me in London, which lost its original democratic virginity when it consorted with the American cowboy.

Fourth Stage: Afghanistan (1997 - 2001)

My emigration to Afghanistan began in August 1997, and continued until our forced departure from it in late December 2001.

My migration to Afghanistan was for many reasons. The reason relevant to the subject of this book is participation in the confrontation that was still escalating with the new world order led by America and Israel, and in which the governments of apostasy in the Arab and Muslim countries participate. I was encouraged in this by things I sensed during two reconnaissance trips I made prior to the decision to migrate permanently, during the year preceding that decision. Among the most important of these things:

The move of Shaykh Usāma bin Lāden and the elite of his administration to Afghanistan, and his adoption of ideas for confronting America and internationalist convictions for that confrontation, and his call to the Islamic Ummah for jihād against America under the slogan "Expelling the mushrikīn from the Arabian Peninsula." And his adoption - finally - of ideas very close to those that had matured in me in stages since the Gulf War of 1990. This became clear to me through several discussions with him and with some of those close to him during my visit to them in 1996. I saw in his adoption of ideas of this kind a real opportunity to move the confrontation in the right direction, given Shaykh Usāma's position and history. And because of the qualities, capabilities, and personal characteristics that God bestowed upon him, I envisioned him at that time as a symbol that enables that confrontation. I wanted to contribute and be present in this confrontation that would be launched from Afghanistan, as I expected after meeting with a number of senior Taliban as well.

It seemed clear to me that Afghanistan would once again be a place of pilgrimage for the mujāhidīn and the muhājirīn in the path of Allah. This was due to the security storms against jihādists in various countries of the world, which had begun to increase in ferocity since 1995. It was also due to the success of the Taliban in forming the nucleus of a state that provides a safe haven for them. I imagined that a suitable jihādi community would soon form in Afghanistan, and I was drawn to be present in it in order to contribute to the call for these ideas that I believed in.

It appeared from the firmness of the Taliban's position and their rule, and the good treatment that the Arab muhājirīn received from them, that the possibility of implementing programs for preparation, training, and practical participation in fighting alongside the Taliban would be possible in order to prepare the nucleus of the generation of the coming global confrontation, if Allah wills it.

These reasons, in addition to personal goals and personal shar'i convictions about migrating to the newly born abode of Islam and providing assistance to it, made me find myself proceeding in this migration that I undertook with full conviction and determination.

And indeed, as I expected, jihādi groups, the symbols of the Arab Afghans, jihād organizations, and many individuals flocked to Afghanistan. This flourished during the years (1998-2001), and it seemed that what I called “the second half of the Arab Afghans” had begun in Afghanistan. It was active in a way that astonished the enemies and sent new hope among the jihād circles and its supporters in the Arab and Islamic world. Such that this gathering once again became one of the hopes of the Islamic Ummah... rather, its greatest hope.

The fiery slogans and media activity launched by Shaykh Usāma with his historical personality in Afghanistan added a distinctive character. The intensity of the American reaction to them and the focus of its media on them in order to justify its aspirations for presence in the Arab and Islamic region, and the wide popular response in the circles of the oppressed Islamic Ummah, as well as the heat of the jihādi confrontations in some other hotbeds during the escalation of events in Afghanistan, such as the outbreak of the intifada in Palestine, and the intensification of the battles in Chechnya at the same time, in addition to the audacity of the American attack, its declared hostility, and its intentions to liquidate the Islamic Emirate and overthrow the Taliban government, and the international mobilization that it mustered in the process of economic, political, and media siege against Afghanistan and against the international jihādi gathering that formed under its auspices. All of this added to the atmosphere a suitable environment for me to mature ideas of the kind in this book. It appeared that some of the veteran jihādīs had reached convictions close to that.

This is not the place to review the history and events of that period, and that very important gathering at the level of the history of jihād in the modern era. I find myself very eager to write about that important, stormy period, and perhaps Allah will make it easy for me to do so in order to cover the events that passed with us at the level of the Arab Afghans since the establishment of the Taliban and our arrival to them in 1996, and until after the events of September 11, 2001, and the role of that gathering in that period and beyond, if Allah wills it for me.

I will not present here many details of that, although they are important, except for what relates to the ideas of this research and their development in the midst of that experience. What concerns me here is the following:

It became clear to me through a number of meetings and discussions in which I explained most of the ideas of this book to a number of leaders of the jihādi current and the supervisors of jihādi groups that were present in the arena there, or others who came to Afghanistan in order to establish jihādi groups on the model of those existing with the same traditional intellectual and operational foundations and concepts of the jihādīs. It appeared that most of them were full of conviction in the goals they had set for themselves, and the organizations and foundations on which they had built their actions! And that they were not ready to make any fundamental shift in thinking and acting on new foundations. And that the idea that I had left them with in 1990 was still prevalent among them!! Which is establishing secret, country-based organizations that want to bring about popular revolutions, or acts of insurgency in order to overthrow the governments of their countries, and establish Islamic governments on their ruins! And all that these organizations seek from Afghanistan - again - is that it is a station for establishment, training, and mobilization, or a safe haven for their cadres and members, fleeing from the international campaign to combat terrorism, with convictions that vary among them in terms of conviction in the Islamic Emirate and the emerging abode of Islam in Afghanistan, and the legitimacy of the Amīr al-Mu'minīn... where convictions range from complete non-existence among some who attribute themselves to “Salafism”!, to complete conviction among some others. As for the general battle with the Judeo-Crusader attack, it did not seem to constitute a practical concern for these organizations except at the level of general sympathy with the issues of the Muslims. Shaykh Usāma and al-Qaeda were not able to budge these organizations, nor most of the youth who came for these goals, from those convictions of theirs in order to adopt his convictions that the battle had become with America only. Until the American attack on the Emirate and the repercussions of the September events came, America convinced everyone to abandon their goals and devote themselves to fighting it.

On the other hand, I saw understanding and conviction in the ideas that I will detail in this book from some of the veteran brothers who were independent of the organizations with country-based goals.

It seemed to me that the only party that bases many aspects of its operational work on foundations similar to the ideas I was convinced of was the organization of Shaykh Usāma bin Lāden (al-Qā'ida). They had realized - especially Shaykh Usāma, and his deputy Abu Hafs, may Allah have mercy on him - that the time of local, country-based organizations had passed, and that it was not suitable for the coming stage. And that the duty is: to mobilize the Ummah to confront the external enemy represented by America, and to focus on the slogan of expelling them from the Arabian Peninsula, and to combine this with the dimension of the conflict with the Jews over Palestine and al-Aqsa, and with the dimension of repelling America's aggression against Muslims in general. This is the same thing that I had reached in 1990, and in which I recorded a few lectures and writings since that time.

Then, after studying all the possibilities available to me for work and giving, I established a camp and a working group that operated independently, like all the fourteen Arab gatherings and organizations recognized by the Taliban. I dealt directly with the Amīr al-Mu'minīn. And I began, through a center I took in a camp I established in one of the military units belonging to the Taliban, and through dozens of meetings I held in my house or in some other places, to broadcast and develop these ideas. I think that the idea crystallized through those activities until it reached the form that I will present in this book.

Despite the efforts we made - the group of the Camp of the Strangers - the general circumstances related to the situation of the Arab mujāhidīn and the Taliban in Afghanistan, and then the subsequent repercussions of September and the fall of the Emirate, prevented me from putting these ideas into practice, which is what I actually tried to do since the establishment of the camp. However, I believe that in this detailed production there was a sufficient presentation of those ideas that I was convinced of the necessity of, to set a new approach and method of work for this global confrontation that we are waging. Perhaps Allah will grant us an opportunity to resume the march, which is what I am doing now, and the first of that is publishing this book. Or He will help us to hand over this banner to those He appoints for it after us from the mujāhidīn in His path on the path of those who are manifest upon the truth in this time, if Allah wills. So that in such writings there will be a performance of part of a trust.

While I was trying to put together a book that brings together these ideas in their final form in Kabul, the events of September 2001 and their subsequent repercussions in Afghanistan and Pakistan came. to enter us into the context of the event. And to end up currently in the stage of dispersion, displacement, and hiding... where I am putting the final touches on this book now, in our beautiful mountain hideout.

Fifth Stage: Pakistan (2002-2003)

Repercussions of the Events of September 2001

The repercussions of the events of September 11, 2001, and the momentum of the American reaction and the programmed Western Crusader attack with the global Jewish orientation cooperating with the forces of apostasy and the organs of hypocrisy in our Arab and Islamic world, increased me, rather, filled me with conviction in the ideas I had reached regarding the method of confrontation necessary for this global war. Which began with America's leadership of the new world order and its Crusader campaign with the international coalition in early 1991 on the Arabian Peninsula and Iraq, and which gradually escalated until it exploded and was declared after the events of September 11 with all audacity, to include the entire Arab and Islamic world, rather, the entire globe as a battlefield with Islam and Muslims wherever they are found. Within a comprehensive eradication program based on the Judeo-Crusader concept of the clash of civilizations adopted by America and the West that pants after it.

The evidence of this in the media has become daily material, even from the Americans themselves. And how I marveled at the frankness of (Jeffrey Steinberg), a journalist and political analyst from the Democratic Party in America, in a dangerous interview, which he conducted with the Syrian satellite channel in (July 2002) and the summary of what came in it was:

"There is an impending catastrophe for America and humanity due to the policies adopted by the Republican Party, led by Bush, which include the principle of the clash of civilizations, built upon the philosophies of Kissinger, Huntington, Nixon, and others. They base their ideas on the principle of the dominance of the white Christian element over the 'colored' people of the earth. They believe that the time has come for the establishment of a global empire led by America, and they are planning, for this purpose, to halt the industrial progress of developing countries, and to spread epidemics and diseases for ethnic cleansing, in order to eliminate 80% of the non-white population of the earth!

The issue is bigger than removing the Iraqi government or claiming to bring stability to the Middle East." He said that the United States is on the verge of a global financial and economic collapse, due to its aggressive military activity in many regions, and that Bush is trying to prevent the bankruptcy of major American companies. He enacted, for this purpose, economic legislation with unconsidered consequences, and imposed taxes and fees on imports, even from America's allies, which created hysterical feelings against America in other countries... He concluded by saying that there is an impending catastrophe due to Bush's policies that will soon befall America and the world, within a week, a year, or more or less... The important thing is that it is near.

The evidence of what is happening today largely supports the description we presented of the nature of the confrontation between us and the contemporary Romans, led by America, such that the call to resistance, according to these perceptions, no longer requires any effort to convince. The enemy and its allies have provided all the necessary evidence and motivations to create conviction in resistance, presenting it with all ferocity and aggression, such that it has pushed even the most peaceful and inactive segments of the Ummah to think about confrontation. This, in shā' Allāh, facilitates the task of those calling for Jihād and comprehensive global resistance against this enemy.

The new reality – which I will detail in this research – has proven, rather imposed, the only direction of the battle and the futility, rather impossibility, of directing it towards creating limited, localized jihādi conflicts. The battle has shifted after September 2001, the invasion of Afghanistan, then Iraq in 2003, and the enemy's preparations for what follows. The enemy has imposed itself on all its arenas in defense of its interests and allies. Not to mention the destruction or disintegration of most, if not all, local jihādi structures and organizations due to this tyrannical campaign and the completely disproportionate capabilities of the parties to the battle. I believe that this new jihādi reality obviates the need for much debate to convince the remaining cadres and jihādi entities of the necessity of changing the way of thinking and acting according to the new direction of the battle.

My thinking about the precursors and repercussions of the events of September has led to a limited and important development of some ideas, which I will record during the research at their appropriate places, indicating this, in shā' Allāh.

I believe, in short, that the events of September and the subsequent global events have perhaps ushered us into the sequences of the battles and tribulations that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) informed us about, and Allāh knows best. Here is the world moving towards being filled with injustice and oppression under the supervision of America, its Jewish masters, and their allies among the Crusaders, apostates, and hypocrites. And here are the believing mujāhidūn, strangers, displaced in the land, finding no refuge, fleeing with their religion from one village to another, exactly as he (peace and blessings be upon him) informed us. Things may be moving towards the confinement of the believing group. In much of what is happening, there is evidence that has been foretold in the traditions of the Sunnah, and even in some traditions found in some of the books of the People of the Book... And here is the balance of power dramatically shifting between us and our enemies, a test for the believing group and a fitnah for those deviating from the guidance of Allāh's law among those affiliated with this religion. Such that the earth will be filled with injustice and oppression, and events will lead to the appearance of the Mahdi (peace be upon him) to lead the march of confrontation and fill the earth with fairness and justice after it has been filled with injustice and oppression. The options before the believing group may now be limited to patience, steadfastness, sacrifice, perseverance, and advancing with faith and firm footing towards the ditch. We must remain steadfast until we, or our patient offspring, are under the banner of fairness and justice after that, and in a time not far off, in shā' Allāh. But the obligation of Jihād continues until the Day of Judgment, and the continuity of the victorious group upon the truth, fighting for this religion, victorious, not harmed by those who forsake them or oppose them until the last of them fights the Masīh ad-Dajjāl, is a firm matter in our religion. If we are to strive to be from this group and continue to carry the banner and hand it over from generation to generation, and from group to group, I believe that the practical options have become limited by virtue of our existing situation, such that we have no choice but to resist according to methods similar to those that I will present in this book, striving for the establishment of a comprehensive "Global Islamic Resistance" to this aggression.

And that the matter is too great to fall on the shoulders of the elite of this Ummah.

The triumphant attack of the nineteen blessed martyrs on the heartland of disbelief and tyranny, America, by striking at the core of its economic and military installations, was a tremendous and historic act by all measures... May Allāh have mercy on them and grant them the greatest reward, and reward all who prepared and helped in bringing about and carrying out this unique, fateful act.

Regardless of some of the details surrounding the circumstances of the event's launch, and the conditions that preceded it, especially in Afghanistan, on the Taliban's side, and on the side of the Arab jihādi gathering in Afghanistan; and regardless of the repercussions of the event and the nature of the confrontation that occurred after it, and the way it was managed, especially in Afghanistan and then Pakistan (details worthy of research, documentation, and the extraction of lessons and morals, matters that have no place for detail here because they are outside the scope of this book, and some aspects of them will come in the folds of this book, in shā' Allāh); regardless of that... it can be said that the direction of Shaykh Usama bin Laden, may Allāh protect him, has placed the battle, in this form, on its correct path, by imposing the confrontation between us and our real enemy, who supports all our enemies from behind the scenes, in all the arenas of confrontation we are fighting, starting with our struggle with the Jews in Palestine, and passing through all our confrontations with our apostate rulers, who are supported by America and its allies. May Allāh reward him well.

The relevant matter between the repercussions of September and the ideas of this book is that if we accept this premise of a war that is happening and imposed on us by the enemy, then we will accept, according to the requirements of our noble religion, that we must confront it, and that defensive Jihād has become a personal obligation (farḍ 'ayn) upon Muslims, as Allāh the Almighty said: "... {And fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you, but do not transgress. Indeed. Allāh does not like transgressors}" (Al-Baqarah: 190), and Allāh the Almighty said: "... {And kill them wherever you overtake them and expel them from wherever they have expelled you, and fitnah is worse than killing}" (Al-Baqarah: 191). If we are going to confront, then there must be losses in this global war. It must be clear to those who want Jihād that one of the most important things is the issue of (choosing the method of confrontation). Either we enter the battle according to the enemy's perceptions, by being partially exhausted here and there, and destroying our energies by fighting with the apostate rulers and those who follow them from among the hypocrites, the coerced, and the ignorant from their armies and security personnel... This is what we have done for more than thirty years, and through dozens of failed and costly experiments. Or we direct the battle towards the main enemy and the driver of all our local enemies, and I mean the malicious trinity... (Israel - America - Europe/NATO). There is no doubt now that logic and reality prove that targeting these is more beneficial. It implicitly includes convincing Muslims of the war against the apostate rulers and the queue of hypocrisy with them, who are loyal to these infidel invaders, because they will enter the battle alongside America and the Jews, due to their reality and their concern for their thrones. The battle with the Jews, America, and Europe/NATO is imposed, and its consequences must be borne, as the poet said:

If death is inevitable... then it is shameful to die a coward

In short:

The war of the Muslims today with the Jews, America, Europe/NATO, and their apostate and hypocritical allies in our countries, will have a heavy price, in an Ummah that has long slumbered, long been inactive, long immersed in the world, long afflicted by the creeping feebleness of the love of the world and the hatred of death in the joints of its elite and its masses, and long accustomed to most of its scholars relying on the tables of its rulers.

There must be a pulse of life, and the birth of a renaissance will be followed by difficult labor. Let not the price terrify an Ummah and youth to whom Allāh the Almighty said:

{Indeed, Allāh has purchased from the believers their lives and their properties [in exchange] for that they will have Paradise. They fight in the cause of Allāh, so they kill and are killed. [It is] a true promise [binding] upon Him in the Torah and the Gospel and the Qur'an. And who is more faithful to his covenant than Allāh? Then rejoice in your transaction which you have contracted. And it is that which is the great attainment} (At-Tawbah: 111).

Nevertheless, it must be said, as an alert to a reality that needs to establish detailed ideological, military, media, and movement foundations for this confrontation, so that the Ummah enters it in the best way:

Shaykh Usama made a good choice of the nature of the battle and identifying the enemy. He was successful – in my opinion – in choosing the key to the conflict and confrontation. The executors of the September attacks also did well in making the detonator, and they began the battle with a triumphant attack that inflicted heavy losses on the enemy, and made Muslims begin the amazing initiative. However, I believe that the Islamic Ummah, with all its energies, is still absent from the battle, even though it is primarily concerned with this Jihād and its material... And that the arena of confrontation is still idle, as its real arena is the Muslim lands, where various forms of the aggression of the Jews, Christians, and their supporters from among the apostates and hypocrites have descended. Those overseeing the jihādi awakening of this Ummah, from among all the jihādīs, must act upon the saying of Allāh the Almighty: {So fight, [O Muhammad], in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And encourage the believers [to join you] that perhaps Allāh will restrain the [military] might of those who disbelieve. And Allāh is greater in might and stronger in [exemplary] punishment} (An-Nisa': 84), so that the believers – all the believers – will carry out the main task of repelling.

The direction of the battle has been chosen well, but we still have a lot of effort ahead of us in the field of da'wah (invitation), clarification, and encouraging the believers, to put the battle, in terms of management and implementation, in its proper field and domain, so that we regain the initiative that America recovered after the events of September, and which is still in its hands until now.

Whatever the positions and opinions in the Islamic and jihādi ranks regarding the events of September, it is recognized that they have created a new reality, which, due to the American attack, constitutes a tyrannical campaign that requires us to confront it, and to focus our attention on that. This is undoubtedly better than wasting time in blaming each other and exchanging opinions about the events, their circumstances, and their perpetrators. The battle has reached the point of being a battle of destiny, where we either exist or we do not.

Sixth Phase: (2003 - 2004)

America's Occupation of Iraq and the Zionist-Crusader Campaign against the Middle East:

Then what is known occurred, the advance of the Americans and their English allies in Iraq, where they implemented a plan similar to what they did in Afghanistan. In record time, they were able to destroy the Iraqi army, dismantle its units, and enter Baghdad, which was destined to fall for the second time under the hooves of the Mongols – the new Mongols of the contemporary Romans, who were no less barbaric than their ancestors who came with Hulagu.

The subject of this campaign, the occupation of Iraq, its precursors, the details of its daily events, and delving into the analysis of its events and lessons, is a large topic that is not the subject of this book. But I draw attention to its relationship to the crystallization of the ideas of this book and the theories of jihādi action that I will present in it for the establishment of a "Global Islamic Resistance", and the most important of that in brief points:

The Most Important Reasons for the American Victory in (Afghanistan/Iraq):

1. Reliance on local agent forces operating under its command on the ground.
2. Reliance on isolating the prey country from its surroundings, neutralizing that neighborhood, or relying on it as a launching point to provide logistical services to its forces.
3. Reliance on overwhelming air and missile superiority in destroying every enemy target on the ground, in the arena of the event.
4. Readiness to commit massacres against civilians in order to achieve military objectives, and disregarding all forms of public opinion.

5. Overriding the international community and all opposing opinions, and subjecting them to its program by enticement, intimidation, or neglect, after America has actually become the sole pole in the world, controlling the policies of states and subjecting them to its interests.
  6. The transformation of Islamic peoples into mere spectators of the events, helpless, after their rulers and scholars removed them from the circle of conflict and action.
- ❖ Following America's victory in Afghanistan, its elimination of the military power of the Taliban and the factions of the Arab and Muslim mujāhidūn from Al-Qaeda and others in Afghanistan, and its victory in Iraq, there was a military and security pursuit of every hotspot expected to resist the American presence, sooner or later. One of the most important of these was the destruction of the sites of the Kurdish Ansar al-Islam group in the Khurmāl area of northeastern Iraq on the Iranian border, using the same method that destroyed the sites of Al-Qaeda and the Arab mujāhidūn in Tora Bora in Afghanistan, by intense and concentrated air and missile bombardment, and the advance of local Kurdish proxy militias to eliminate the remaining mujāhidūn on the ground, and then capturing any survivors across the border in the neighboring country through international agreements and conspiracies.

Likewise, the sites of jihādi gatherings in the Hattat Mountains in Yemen were destroyed and liquidated, relying on the Yemeni army and security forces through aerial bombardment, then advancing on the sites.

America then continued this method in every public hotspot where mujāhidūn opposing America gathered. In addition to this, America adopted a policy of security pursuits through which it liquidated other secret jihādi organizations and cells in many places, in cooperation with local security agencies, as happened in Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Indonesia, and some East Asian countries.

The analysis of these experiences, which I witnessed firsthand in Afghanistan after September 2001, and my investigation of what happened afterward through continuous, focused monitoring, confirmed what I had reached in terms of ideas and theories of resistance over the past ten years, which I have included in this book. The summary of that – and Allāh knows best – is:

Firstly: Confrontation with America or any of its allies militarily in an open manner is not possible as long as it has this complete control over the airspace with these overwhelming technological capabilities, especially with the presence of agent forces operating under its management on the ground, besieging those jihādi hotspots, and participating in the advance on them.

Tora Bora - Afghanistan 2001, Khurmāl - Iraq 2003, and Hattat Mountains - Yemen 2003... and then what is happening in Fallujah as I correct these lines (November 2004), have proven what was already established in the experiences of the open confrontation of jihādi groups in Hama/Syria 1982,(Tripoli, and Tal al-Zaatar - Beirut - Lebanon 1982, and Nabatieh - Lebanon 2000... even though the mujāhidūn faced armies with local capabilities in those experiences, so what about the American military power? The issue of the futility of open confrontation by guerillas against superior regular armies is a well-known matter discussed in most books on guerilla warfare studies.

Secondly: Secret organizations cannot confront the local security systems of agent governments after the establishment of security coordination at the regional and international levels under what has become known as the global war on terror, and under the management and supervision of America, especially through following the old classical methods of hierarchical, networked, local secret organizations.

Thirdly: Since resistance is unavoidable and indispensable, the only method of confrontation that presents itself under these circumstances is the method of secret guerrilla warfare with disconnected cells—numerous, multiple cells. The features of a model for this appear evident in the actions of the multi-faceted Iraqi resistance against American forces, as well as what has been demonstrated by the armed Intifāḍah in Palestine and other urban guerrilla wars around the world. This is what I have attempted to benefit from and incorporate, in its appropriate place, within the context of this book's chapters, which propose theories for activating a call to global Islamic resistance.

At the end of this introduction, I say:

Many of the youth of the Awakening and Jihād, both those we know and those we do not, have paid a heavy price everywhere. They have been subjected to killing, imprisonment, and displacement for nearly half a century before the events of September—and they are the finest of the Ummah of Islam in this era.

As for after the September attacks, the nineteen heroes were martyred and initiated the battle in its new direction. May Allāh have mercy on them, elevate their ranks, and gather us with them in 'Ilīyyīn (the highest level of Paradise).

The Amīr al-Mu'minīn in Afghanistan, Mullā Muḥammad 'Umar, and the sincere Mujāhidīn of the Ṭālibān, paid a heavy price to maintain their trust, fulfill their duty in protecting Islam and Muslims, and not succumb to the enemy's threats. They experienced their share of killing, imprisonment, and displacement. Afghanistan and its entire people paid the price with them. May Allāh accept from them and forgive us and them.

Al-Qā'idah has presented many of its men as a price for starting the decisive round, and Shaykh Usāmah and his aides paid a heavy price and took their share of killing, imprisonment, and displacement. May Allāh accept from them and forgive us and them, and gather us with them in the abode of His mercy.

Many cadres and youth of the Arab Jihādī groups in Afghanistan were killed in the battle to defend the Islamic Emirate and in confronting the blind American assault on Afghanistan. That blessed group paid a heavy price and also took their share of imprisonment, killing, and displacement. They are the elite of the Jihādī current and its vanguard. May Allāh accept from them and forgive us and them, and gather us with them along with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed His favor.

So for what purpose? And for what in return? And why was all this hardship?

The goal was to awaken the anesthetized, sleeping Ummah, absent from the arena of confrontation, to place it face to face with this obligation.

In this research, which I have prefaced with this introduction, we attempt to give a push and to place a step on the path of the great task, which is to lay the foundations that contribute to pushing the Ummah to take its role in this coming battle.

I am convinced that victory is in Allāh's hand, and that one of the first means to it that we must provide is:

Working to transform this confrontation into a battle of the Ummah after it has been ignited by the elite.

The Jihādī current, over four decades, has complied with Allāh's command: {So fight in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself}. Those upon whom the responsibility of the word and the trust of knowledge and the pen have fallen must fulfill the command of the second verse {and encourage the believers}, all of that {so perhaps Allāh will restrain the might of those who disbelieve}.

Yes, we are now passing through the most difficult circumstances, and we are living at the peak of tribulation. The best of our brothers have been killed, the elite of our youth have been imprisoned, and the rest of us have been scattered, snatched by the treacherous, lurking wolves of the apostate (Riddah) governments, their aides, their intelligence services, and their hypocritical agents here and there. However, we know with certainty that Allāh is inevitably the supporter of His religion and His party, and that the glad tidings of our victory, reaching the conquest of Rome, will occur as His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, promised, without a doubt.

Perhaps the Mankūsīn (inverted/perverted ones) among our Ummah do not believe these legal truths and prophetic glad tidings. However, the leaders of our enemies and their senior scholars and monks know them as they know their own sons. They are gathering forces now in an attempt to avoid this fate—like a child trying to block the sunlight with his small hand.

It is the effort of those who {wish to extinguish Allāh's light with their mouths, but Allāh will only perfect His light, even if the disbelievers dislike it} (At-Tawbah: 32). They know that the star of their civilization has set, and that the dawn of our civilization has broken.

So, may Allāh have mercy on the martyrs (Shuhadā') of the Mujāhidīn everywhere, for they have excused themselves.

And may Allāh have mercy on the prisoners of the Muslims and relieve them, for they have excused themselves.

And may Allāh aid every displaced person in His path, from among those who have striven and excused themselves.

And may Allāh accept from all those who have helped, sheltered, and supported.

Let every loving supporter who rejoices in harming the enemies of Allāh hear it from us. And let every Mankūs (inverted), disheartened one who does not believe in Allāh's promise also hear it.

Let the cowardly sitters, who do not want the men of this Ummah to confront the enemies of Allāh so that the tranquility of the mire in which they wallow amidst the swamps of the world is not disturbed, also hear. Foremost among them are the scholars of hypocrisy and the jurists of the Pentagon.

And let all our enemies, and those behind them, in front of them, and with them, hear it:

There is nothing between us and our enemies—all our enemies, from the Jews and the Christians and their disbelieving allies, and their supporters from the apostates and hypocrites in our lands—except the saying of Allāh the Almighty:

{When you meet the disbelievers, strike [their] necks until, when you have inflicted slaughter upon them, then secure their bonds...}

{And prepare against them whatever you are able of power and of steeds of war by which you may terrify the enemy of Allāh and your enemy and others besides them whom you do not know [but] whom Allāh knows. And whatever you spend in the cause of Allāh will be fully repaid to you, and you will not be wronged.}

So, to everyone who conveys on our behalf to America and those in its alliance:

{Return to them; we will surely come to them with soldiers that they will be powerless to encounter, and we will surely expel them therefrom in humiliation, and they will be debased.} (An-Naml: 37).

{And Allāh will surely support those who support Him. Indeed, Allāh is Powerful and Exalted in Might.} (Al-Hajj: 40).

{And whoever strives only strives for [the benefit of] himself. Indeed, Allāh is free from need of the worlds.} (Al-'Ankabut: 6).

For destiny has preceded with the word of truth:

{Allāh has written, "I will surely overcome, I and My messengers." Indeed, Allāh is Powerful and Exalted in Might.} (Al-Mujadila: 21).

{Indeed, We will support Our messengers and those who believe during the life of this world and on the Day when the witnesses will stand.} (Ghafir: 51).

"Letters of the Global Islamic Resistance"

As I mentioned earlier, this book was written to provide a vision that contributes to solving the great dilemma that Muslims are living in this time. This is by answering an important question:

How do we confront our new crusader-Zionist enemies in the days to come?

No discerning, insightful person doubts that we, as Muslims, are living in a crisis—rather, crises of all types and forms. The Islamic awakening that arose to address these problems has ended, with all its schools, in a crisis, or rather, crises. The armed Jihādī segment of this awakening, which took the path of Jihād to solve those problems, has reached, for reasons related to it and due to the enemy's siege, a crisis—or rather, crises.

We, as fundamentalists and Mujāhidīn, are currently passing through the bottleneck of crises on all levels. Indeed, after the events of September 11th, we have come to be presented in the media as representing the crisis that the whole world is confronting.

The enemy's media outlets, and the outlets affiliated with them in our Arab and Islamic world, have imposed us and presented us to the people as the crisis of the world that must be eliminated! In fact, many Muslim scholars address us from the pulpits of Friday sermons, even in the Sacred Mosque, as "the crisis." The plump, well-fed Imām, the inflated (As-Sudays), prays in the Qunūt of the completion of the Qur'an (Ramadan 2004) for all the countries of the world, especially the Islamic ones, to be safe from terrorism, and he prays for the destruction, eradication, and dispersion of the Mujāhidīn! Similarly, the newspapers and media outlets of many of the leaders of the Islamic awakening and its groups address us today with the same perspective. Their justification for this is that by taking up arms against our rulers over four decades, we created the crisis, and by confronting the Americans and their allies today, we have placed them and the Muslims in an unequal confrontation and made them the center of the crisis. This is not to mention many of the Muslim masses who have been convinced by the global and local media machine that we represent the problem and the crisis.

This research divides its main chapters between proving a truth and answering two questions.

The truth is that armed Jihād and resistance are the solution to all our crises—our crises as Mujāhidīn, as an Islamic awakening, and as Muslim peoples.

Chapters One through Five are devoted to proving this truth. As for the first question, it is: Why have the Jihād projects we have undertaken over four decades failed, even though Jihād is the solution? Chapters Six and Seven address this question.

The second fundamental question, for which this research was conducted, is: How do we wage Jihād against our enemies in the days to come? How do we wage Jihād against them with methods in which we hope for Allāh's victory?

How do we wage Jihād against our enemies in the post-September world?

The logic of the research in the book is built so that each chapter introduces the one that follows and serves as a logical precursor to it, leading up to Chapter Eight, where we detail the method we believe is effective for continuing the Jihād as we enter the twenty-first century, which they claimed would be an American century!

We prefaced the research with a brief overview of Ghuraba (strangers), Ghurabā' (strangers) and the group victorious upon the truth, who fight for this religion until the Hour comes. In our belief, this is the state of those who have carried the burden of Jihād throughout these past decades, as well as the coming generation of Jihād to whom we want to hand over the banner of Jihād and its trust. This introduction explained the characteristics of Ghuraba and Ghurabā', the attributes of their members, the tribulations they face in this world, and the reward that awaits them with Allāh in the Hereafter. As well as the features and qualities of those who remain steadfast upon the Truth.

I ask Allāh the Almighty to help us, to grant us sincerity and the means of acceptance, to grant us that which will support His religion, to make us guides who are guided, not astray nor leading others astray, to make us leaders for the pious, and to grant us a share of the reward of those who follow the call to goodness and Jihād. It has been narrated from him, peace and blessings be upon him, that "The one who guides to goodness is like the one who does it," and it has also been narrated from him, peace and blessings be upon him, that "The scholar and the learner are partners."

Ghurabā', and those Victorious upon the Truth

Allāh the Almighty said:

{So why were there not among the generations before you those of enduring discrimination forbidding corruption on earth?} (Hud: 116)

The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said:

- "Islam began as something strange and will return to being strange as it began, so Tūbā (blessedness/a tree in Paradise) for the strangers."
- "There will always be a group from my Ummah fighting for the truth, victorious over those who oppose them, until the last of them fights the Antichrist (Masīḥ ad-Dajjāl)."

In this alleged American-Jewish era, days have overshadowed us in which Muslims have become strangers among the disbelieving people of the earth. Those who pray have become strangers among the hundreds of millions of Muslims. Those who adhere to what Allāh has commanded and forbidden of their religion have become strangers among those who pray. Those who call to faith and correct belief have become strangers among the adherents. Those who call to Allāh, enjoin good, and forbid evil have become strangers among these believers. And those who call for Jihād against the enemies of Allāh and repel the assault of the disbelievers, apostates, and hypocrites have become the strangest of the strange.

The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, spoke the truth, and we are moving towards what he foretold, saying: "Islam began as something strange and will return to being strange as it began, so Tūbā for the strangers."

Praise be to Allāh that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, gave the glad tidings that: "There will always be a group from my Ummah fighting for the truth, victorious over those who oppose them, until the last of them fights the Antichrist (Masīḥ ad-Dajjāl)." And he informed about their steadfastness, peace and blessings be upon him, saying: "There will always be a nation from my Ummah victorious upon the truth, unharmed by those who oppose them, until the command of Allāh comes, and they are victorious over the people."

Because we are writing this book for those strangers victorious upon the truth, who are unharmed by those who forsake them, fighting for this religion until the command of Allāh comes...

And because we are writing it when the steadfast believing group, facing the raging storms of America and its allies, has become patient and steadfast, not caring about America's arrogance, the multitude of its allies, or the betrayal of its slaves—they have become the strangest of the strangers among the people... strangers victorious upon the truth, fighting for the truth here and there... and because we are writing this book for them...

And because we are writing it while we are living, by the grace of Allāh, which He bestows upon whom He wills—and we ask Him for sincerity, steadfastness, and acceptance by His mercy—we are living, along with our Mujāhidīn and migrating brothers in the path of Allāh, in the most severe states of strangeness, siege, pursuit, killing, and imprisonment. Therefore, we provide here from the provisions that strengthen our resolve and make us steadfast... and we present it as glad tidings to those patient, steadfast ones whom we believe have been true to what they pledged to Allāh. Among them are those who have fulfilled their vows, and among them are those who await, and they have not changed in the least. We also present it to all those determined to join the caravan of strangers and the procession of those victorious upon the truth from the coming generations, by whom Allāh will raise, if He wills, the banner of His religion. And He will show every Pharaoh and Haman from among the pharaohs of the disbelievers and apostates, and all their soldiers, what they used to fear.

One of the best provisions, and a sign of imminent and future good tidings, is to preface the chapters of this book with some of the fragrance of the purified Sunnah, and what has come from some of the blessed narrations of the attributes and conditions of Ghuraba, Ghurabā', and those victorious upon the truth, who fight for this religion, not caring about those who forsake them or oppose them, until the command of Allāh comes, and what has come of what Allāh has prepared for them of glad tidings in this world and honor in the Hereafter.

Hoping that it will strengthen the hearts of the believing youth determined to resist—to resist the tyranny of America and its allies—with a heart filled with faith and a hand that grips the trigger.

So, to those who have loved death in the path of Allāh as the slaves of America have loved life... to them and with them, we breathe the fragrance of these fragrant prophetic narrations and their lights:

In the chapter on Ghuraba from the book Madārij as-Sālikīn by the working Imam Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, we extract the following in brief:

Allāh the Almighty said: {So why were there not among the generations before you those of enduring discrimination forbidding corruption on earth, except a few of those We saved from among them? But those who wronged pursued what luxury they were given therein, and they were criminals.} (Hud: 116). His citing this verse in this chapter indicates his profoundness in knowledge, understanding, and comprehension of the Qur'an, for the strangers in the world are the people of this attribute mentioned in the verse. They are the ones whom the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, referred to in his saying...

"Islam began as something strange and will return to being strange as it began, so Tūbā for the strangers." It was said, "Who are the strangers, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said, "Those who reform when the people have become corrupt." 'Abdullah ibn Mas'ud reported that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said, "Islam began as something strange, and it will return to being strange as it began, so Tūbā for the strangers." It was said, "Who are the strangers, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said, "The Nuzzā' (those who withdraw) from the tribes." In the Ḥadīth of 'Abdullah ibn 'Amr, he said: The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said one day while we were with him, "Tūbā for the strangers." It was said, "Who are the strangers, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said, "A few righteous people among many people; those who disobey them are more than those who obey them."

Ahmad narrated from 'Abdullah ibn 'Amr from the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, that he said: "The most beloved thing to Allāh are the strangers." It was said, "Who are the strangers?" He said, "Those who flee with their religion, gathering with Jesus, son of Mary, peace be upon him, on the Day of Resurrection."

In the Ḥadīth of al-Qāsim from Abū Umāmah from the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, he said about Allāh the Almighty: "...The most enviable of My Awliyā' (allies/friends) to Me is a believer who is Khafīf al-Ḥādh (light in possessions), has a share of prayer, perfects the worship of his Lord, his sustenance is just sufficient, and he is obscure among the people, not pointed at with fingers, and he is patient with that until he meets Allāh, then his death comes quickly, his inheritance is little, and his mourners are few." Al-Hasan said: "The believer in this world is like a stranger; he does not despair from its humiliation, nor does he compete for its honor. The people have their state, and he has his state. The people are at ease from him, and he is in exertion from himself."

These are the ones who truly grasp the embers, and most people, rather all of them, blame them. Due to their strangeness among these people, they are considered people of deviation, innovation, and departure from the majority. {Look at this description and compare it to the state of the Mujāhidīn against the Americans, the Jews, and their allies today... and how the media, even most of the Friday sermon preachers on the pulpits of the mosques, address them}.

The meaning of the Prophet's saying, "They are the Nuzzā' from the tribes," is that Allāh the Almighty sent His Messenger when the people of the earth were following different religions. They were either worshipers of idols and fire, worshipers of images and crosses, Jews, Sabians, and philosophers. Islam, in its early appearance, was strange, and those who converted and responded to Allāh and His Messenger were strangers in their neighborhoods, tribes, families, and clans.

So, those who responded to the call of Islam were Nuzzā' from the tribes, even individuals from them. They became estranged from their tribes and clans and entered Islam, so they were truly the strangers. Until Islam appeared, its call spread, and people entered it in crowds. So, that strangeness was removed from them. Then it began to be estranged and travel until it returned strange as it began. Rather, the true Islam, which the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, and his companions were upon, is today stranger than it was at its first appearance, even though its visible signs and rituals are famous and well-known. True Islam is very strange, and its people are the strangest of the strange among the people. How can a single, very small group not be strange, when there are seventy sects with followers, leaderships, positions, and authority, and their market does not thrive except by opposing what the Messenger brought? For what he brought contradicts their whims, desires, and what they are upon of doubts and innovations, which are the essence of their virtue and action, and the desires that are the goals of their intentions and wills.

{Look, glory be to Allāh, what Ibn al-Qayyim says in the eighth Hijri century that Islam in his time is stranger than when it first appeared... So what do we say today, and Allāh is the One sought for help!!}

How can the believer, walking to Allāh on the path of following [the Prophet], not be a stranger among these who have followed their whims, obeyed their greed, and each of them is impressed with his own opinion, as the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Enjoin good and forbid evil until you see greed obeyed, whim followed, the world preferred, and each person with an opinion impressed with his own opinion, and you see a matter that you have no power over. Then focus on yourself, and beware of their masses, for behind you are days in which the patience of the one who is patient is like grasping embers." For this reason, the sincere Muslim in this time, if he adheres to his religion, has the reward of fifty of the Companions. In the Sunan of Abū Dāwūd and at-Tirmidhī, from the Ḥadīth of Abū Tha'labah al-Khushanī, he said: "I asked the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, about this verse:

{O you who have believed, upon you is [responsibility for] yourselves. Those who have gone astray will not harm you when you have been guided.} He said: 'Rather, enjoin good and forbid evil, until you see greed obeyed, whim followed, the world preferred, and each person with an opinion impressed with his own opinion. Then focus on yourself and leave the masses, for behind you are days of patience, in which [patience] is like grasping embers. The one who does good deeds in them has the reward of fifty men who do deeds like his.' I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, the reward of fifty of them?' He said, "The reward of fifty of you.'" This great reward is only due to his strangeness among the people and his adherence to the Sunnah amidst the darkness of their whims and opinions.

So, if the believer, whom Allāh has provided with insight into his religion, understanding in the Sunnah of His Messenger, and comprehension in His Book, and has shown him what the people are in of whims, innovations, deviations, and their turning away from the straight path that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, and his companions were upon—if he wants to walk this path, let him prepare himself for the slander of the ignorant and the people of innovation, their criticism of him, their belittlement of him, their turning people away from him, and their warning against him, just as their predecessors from among the disbelievers used to do with his leader and Imam, peace and blessings be upon him. But if he calls them to that and criticizes what they are upon, then their resurrection will occur, they will seek calamities for him, set traps for him, and bring against him their great horses and men.

So he is a stranger in his religion due to the corruption of their religions, a stranger in his adherence to the Sunnah due to their adherence to innovations, a stranger in his belief due to the corruption of their beliefs, a stranger in his prayer due to the poorness of their prayers, a stranger in his path due to the deviation and corruption of their paths, a stranger in his affiliation to them due to the difference of their affiliations, and a stranger in his interaction with them because he interacts with them in a way that their souls do not desire.

In short, he is a stranger in the matters of his world and his Hereafter. He does not find from the masses a helper or a supporter. He is a scholar among the ignorant, a follower of the Sunnah among the people of innovation, a caller to Allāh and His Messenger among callers to whims and innovations, enjoining good and forbidding evil among a people where the good is considered evil and the evil is considered good." The words of Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, end here.

Among the prophetic narrations that came about the strangers, their honor, the virtue of strangeness, and its conditions:

- It came in (Majma' al-Zawā'id) from 'Abdullah ibn 'Amr ibn al-'As from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, that he said: "Do you know who will be the first to enter Paradise from the creation of Allāh the Almighty?" They said, "Allāh and His Messenger know best." He said: "The poor Muhājirūn (emigrants) by whom the frontiers are secured, and by whom calamities are averted. One of them dies with his need in his chest, unable to fulfill it. Allāh the Almighty says to whomever He wills of His angels: 'Go to them and greet them.' The angels say: 'We are the inhabitants of Your heavens and the best of Your creation, do You command us to go to these and greet them?' He says: 'They were servants who worshiped Me, associating nothing with Me, and by whom the frontiers were secured, and by whom calamities were averted. One of them dies with his need in his chest, unable to fulfill it.' So the angels come to them then, entering upon them from every door: 'Peace be upon you for what you patiently endured, and excellent is the final home.'"

- In the Musnad of Imam Ahmad (7072) from 'Abdullah ibn 'Amr, he said: "Then I was with the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, and the sun rose. He said: 'Allāh will bring a people on the Day of Resurrection whose light is like the light of the sun.' Abu Bakr said, 'Are we they, O Messenger of Allāh?' He said, 'No, and you have much good, but they are the poor Muhājirūn who are gathered from the corners of the earth.'" (Musnad Ahmad 2 - 222).
- In (Fayd al-Qadīr 4 - 274): (Ath-Thawrī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "If you see a scholar with many friends, know that he is a mixer. Because if he spoke the truth, they would hate him.")
- Al-Ghazālī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: ("What the predecessors approved of knowledge has become strange, rather it has disappeared, and what people have devoted themselves to, most of it is innovated. The knowledge of those has become strange such that the one who mentions it is hated.")

This is some of what came of the narrations on Ghuraba, Ghurabā'. May Allāh make us among them and with them in this world and the Hereafter.

And among what came of the prophetic narrations and the sayings of the scholars about the victorious group, victorious upon the truth, fighting for this religion, we extract the following:

- From Mu'āwiyah, may Allāh be pleased with him, raising it [to the Prophet]: "There will always be a nation from my Ummah upholding the command of Allāh, unharmed by those who forsake them or oppose them, until the command of Allāh comes, and they are upon that." (Al-Bukhārī 3641).
- From Jābir ibn Samurah, may Allāh be pleased with him, raising it [to the Prophet]: "This religion will not cease to be standing, with a group of Muslims fighting for it, until the Hour comes." Muslim (13/66).
- From Jābir, raising it [to the Prophet]: "There will always be a group from my Ummah fighting for the truth, victorious until the Day of Resurrection." Narrated by Muslim (13/66).
- In the narration of an-Nasā'ī (3/214) from Salamah ibn Nufayl al-Kindī, he said: I was sitting with the Messenger of Allāh when a man said, "O Messenger of Allāh, the people have devalued horses and laid down their weapons, saying there is no Jihād, the war has laid down its burdens." The Messenger of Allāh turned his face and said: "They have lied! Now the fighting has come, and there will always be a nation from my Ummah fighting for the truth, and Allāh will deviate the hearts of peoples for them and provide for them from them, until the Hour comes, and until the promise of Allāh comes. And good is tied to the forelocks of horses until the Day of Resurrection. It is revealed to me that I will be taken, not remaining long, and you will follow me in groups, some of you striking the necks of others, and the stronghold of the believers is Ash-Shām (Greater Syria)."

- From al-Mughīrah, raising it [to the Prophet]: "There will always be people from my Ummah fighting for the truth, victorious until the command of Allāh comes to them." Ahmad (4/248).
- From Mu'āwiyah, raising it [to the Prophet]: "Whomever Allāh intends good for, He gives him understanding in the religion, and there will always be a group of Muslims fighting for the truth, victorious over those who oppose them, until the Day of Resurrection." Muslim 13/67.
- From Mu'āwiyah, raising it [to the Prophet]: "The Hour will not come except with a group from my Ummah victorious over the people, not caring who forsakes them or who supports them." Ibn Mājah (9).

It came in the book Al-'Umdah fī I'dād al-'Uddah (The Mainstay in Preparing the Equipment), by Shaykh 'Abd al-Qādir ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, may Allāh guide him to His pleasure, relieve his distress, and release him from his captivity. Under the title "Is the Saved Sect the Victorious Group?":

"It is mentioned in most books of creed that the saved sect (Ahl as-Sunnah wal-Jamā'ah) is the victorious group (for example, see the last chapter of Al-'Aqīdah al- Wāsiṭiyyah by Ibn Taymiyyah, as well as the introduction to the book Ma'ārij al-Qabūl by Ḥāfiẓ Ḥakamī, and others). What I believe to be more correct is that the Firqah (sect) and the Ṭā'ifah (group) are not synonymous, and that the Ṭā'ifah is part of the Firqah. The victorious group is the part or portion upholding the support of the religion with knowledge and Jihād, from the saved sect, which is upon the correct methodology and belief. As a branch of this, we also say that the Mujaddid (renewer) is one of the individuals of the victorious group who fulfilled the most important duties of the religion in his time, according to the saying of the majority that the Mujaddid is a single individual, and my evidence for this is the following:"

1 - Allāh's saying: {So why should not a party from each Firqah of them go forth that they may obtain understanding in the religion.} (At-Tawbah). This verse differentiates between the Firqah and the Ṭā'ifah, and clarifies that the Ṭā'ifah is part of the Firqah, and that it is the part upholding knowledge and Jihād from the Firqah, as in the interpretation of this verse (see Ibn Kathīr).

2 - Knowledge and Jihād, which are the most important characteristics of the victorious group, the origin of their legitimacy is that they are from the Furūd al-Kifāyah (collective obligations), which must be fulfilled by some, not all, of the members of the Ummah. This portion upholding knowledge and Jihād from the Ummah is the victorious group.

The intention of this is that every Muslim should strive to be from this victorious group upholding the support of the religion with knowledge, calling, and Jihād. Allāh the Almighty said: {And for this let the competitors compete.} (Al-Mutaffifin: 26). I say: Nevertheless, the Ṭā'ifah may be the entire Firqah, and that is at the end of time when the believers are aligned to Ash-Shām and Jesus, son of Mary, peace be upon him, descends upon them to fight the Antichrist, as in the authentic Ḥadīth. Based on this, the narrations that mentioned that the Ṭā'ifah will be in Ash-Shām or Bayt al-Maqdis (Jerusalem) (the Ḥadīth of Abū Umāmah) are interpreted as referring to the last of this Ṭā'ifah in an absolute sense. As for the times before that, the Ṭā'ifah may be in Ash-Shām or elsewhere, and see the words of the author of the book Fath al-Majīd Sharḥ Kitāb at-Tawḥīd in the explanation of the Ṭā'ifah (Ṭ Anṣār as-Sunnah pp. 278, 279), and Allāh the Almighty knows best. End quote (Al-'Umdah fi I'dād al-'Uddah p. 78).

So I say, and Allāh is the Giver of success:

What is understood from the above is that the scholars considered the following categories for the victorious group:

People of knowledge of the Book and the Sunnah.

People of calling, enjoining good, and forbidding evil.

People of Jihād and fighting in the path of Allāh.

What appears to me, combining these sayings—and Allāh knows best—is the following:

1. Most of the Salaf whom the people of Ḥadīth and the scholars made them say that [referring to Ahl al-Hadith] was because they were the first to go forth for Jihād and fighting if the obligation became specific or if the collective obligation in fighting was not fulfilled. It has even been narrated from some of the Salaf that they entered the frontiers more than a hundred times, not for the purpose of fighting, but to take Ḥadīth, due to the large number of people of Ḥadīth in the places of Ribāṭ and the frontiers of Jihād. This was when the people of Ḥadīth were the people of Jihād, not when most of them became people of Ḥadīth and people of hearsay and much questioning.

The victorious group are those who take the lead in the most important priorities, obligations, and duties in their time from these three areas—knowledge, calling and enjoining and forbidding, fighting and Jihād.

In a time like the time of al-Bukhārī and Imam Ahmad, may Allāh have mercy on them, the Islamic Caliphate was strong, dominant, and invading its enemies, imposing the Jizyah (tribute) and humiliation on those of the disbelievers who were near it. So it was appropriate that the heads of the victorious group, like those Imams, were foremost in the first priority, which is knowledge of the Sunnah and the Jihād of innovations, which is the Jihād of clarification, or foremost in the Jihād against the leaders of falsehood and the rulers of injustice, from those who wronged or innovated, like the stance of Imam Ahmad, may Allāh have mercy on him, against the Banu 'Abbās and the innovation of the creation of the Qur'an. It was a vacant frontier when there was no assailant fighting against the Ummah. While we find Imam Ibn Taymiyyah considering the army of Ash-Shām and Egypt—despite what they had of innovations and ignorance—among the most specific of those to whom belonging to the victorious group applied, due to their repelling the enemy from the religion of Allāh, the core of the Muslims, and their territory, despite their lack of the characteristic of knowledge. The Mamluks were not from the people of Ḥadīth, as is well known... Rather, they were closer to ignorance and innovations than to knowledge in general. But they were on the vacant frontier, which is repelling the assailant.

2. There is no doubt that fighting without knowledge of the religion of Allāh, and without starting from its principles, even if its people are rewarded for their intention in repelling the enemies of Allāh from the religion, souls, honors, and wealth, does not make those who undertake this fully possess the characteristic of the group victorious upon the truth. They will not be victorious upon the truth or upholding the command of Allāh completely and perfectly except with knowledge along with Jihād.
3. It is not necessary that every individual in the victorious group be from the people of knowledge, but it is sufficient that those who have command and leadership in it have, in their totality, the characteristics of knowledge and calling along with Jihād and fighting, and the group is judged by the ruling of the general banner and leadership, the methodology, and the creed.
4. Finally—and undoubtedly—it must be clarified that perfection in the victorious group and its leaders is to combine knowledge with calling, enjoining and forbidding, and fighting and steadfastness upon that, as was the case with the great Imams of Islam, such as Imam Ibn al-Mubarak, may Allāh have mercy on him. He was one of the great scholars of Islam, their Muhaddithīn (Hadith scholars), and their jurists, and one of the great Mujāhidīn stationed in Jihād. Likewise, Imam Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, was also one of the great scholars and people of Ḥadīth, and one of the great Mujāhidīn whenever the assailant descended. And among those was the great Imam al-'Izz ibn 'Abd as-Salām, who was also the Sultan of the scholars and one of their Mujāhidīn during the time of the Tatars.

5. The conclusion is that the victorious group is the group upholding the command of Allāh, victorious upon the truth, steadfast upon it, unharmed by those who forsake them or oppose them, fighting for this religion. There is no doubt that fighting and Jihād are among their most prominent characteristics in the texts (to the point that it is almost a condition upon them), especially if it becomes specific (Fard 'Ayn) or the collective obligation (Fard Kifāyah) is not fulfilled, as is our case today... It is not possible for the victorious group, victorious upon the truth—who are the elite of the people of this religion—to abandon, in that case, the most obligatory of obligations after Tawḥīd (monotheism)—which is repelling the assailant through fighting!—under the pretext of performing actions that are below that by the consensus of the scholars. Whoever does that is from the defeated group, not from the victorious group. He is from the sitting group fleeing from the battle; this is his ruling, and the enemy has surprised us in our own home.

So, according to what has preceded, who are the victorious group in this time? Here, we must know the characteristics of this time, those characteristics that have become known from reason, understanding, and observation by necessity...

Firstly: The lands of Islam, from one end to the other, are occupied by the assailant Jews, Christians, atheists, communists, or polytheist idolaters—directly through invasion and apparent occupation, as is the case in Palestine and Ash-Shām in general, Bosnia and Chechnya, the republics of Central Asia and East Turkestan occupied by China, Kashmir occupied by India, and many lands and people that only Allāh knows, under the rule of the original disbelievers. Or indirectly, through the appointment of apostates by the original disbelievers, as in the generality of the rest of the Muslim lands.

Secondly: All the lands of Islam, from one end to the other, have had the apostate rulers reject the Sharī'ah of Allāh, show hostility towards it, rule by other than what Allāh has revealed, change His laws, and ally with His enemies.

Thirdly: All the lands of Islam, where the Muslims in general, and the people of religion, calling, and adherence in particular, are subjected to injustice, oppression, tyranny, killing, violation of honor, imprisonment, and torture, which has become known to both near and far...

- Is it conceivable in such cases... that we say that the victorious group today are those who do not care about all of this, and devote themselves to refining Isnād (chains of narration), classifying books, and narrating Ḥadīth?!
- Is it conceivable that they are those who do not care about the affairs of the Muslims at all, and devote themselves to worship, devotion, reciting litanies, and seclusion in corners?!
- Is it conceivable that they are those who have not spoken about any of these calamities with a single word, and then their only concern is refining the correct creed, as they claim, and fighting shrines, graves, and the polytheism of the dead?! While disbelief rules them and surrounds them, and immorality, disobedience, and prostitution enter upon them and the offspring of the Muslims through all means of media, and their state with them is at its best?!
- Or would those who sit in the lands of the disbelievers and in their embrace, and call and give Fatwās (religious edicts) on the rulings of Jihād and Hijrah (migration)?! And they open Islamic centers according to the standards of Western Islam.

- Or are they those who sit under the rule of the apostates or the disbelievers, indulging in wealth, spouses, and children, and tearing into the flesh of the Mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh and the migrants to Allāh, with any claim of haste, demolition of the call, premature stages, the correctness of banners, and verbal gymnastics?!

We do not doubt for a moment that the victorious group in this time and in such circumstances are the people of Jihād... the people of fighting... the people of weapons, Mujāhidīn under the banner of Lā ilāha illa Allāh Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh (There is no god but Allāh, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh)... repelling the assailant disbelievers and apostates.

Dr. 'Abd al-Qādir ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz—may Allāh preserve him—author of the book (Al-'Umdah fī I'dād al-'Uddah at the end of his discussion on the victorious group)... who it is and who they are, and the words of the scholars about it. He says on page (80) under the title "The Most Important Duties of the Victorious Group in This Time":

"This, and one of the greatest duties of the victorious group in this time is the Jihād against the apostate rulers who have changed the Sharī'ah of Allāh and who rule the Muslims with infidel, man-made laws..." He continues to say: "... and the corruption of these rulers, their changing of laws and concepts, and their spreading of indecencies among the Muslims. If the Companions, may Allāh be pleased with them, were alive today, their greatest deed would be Jihād against these rulers." He continues: "And I do not see anyone affiliated with Islamic knowledge in our time who has not spoken about this issue, denouncing it and inciting the Muslims to Jihād. I do not see such a person meeting Allāh except that Allāh the Almighty is angry with him. Allāh the Almighty said: {Indeed, those who conceal what We sent down of clear proofs and guidance after We made it clear for the people in the Scripture - those are cursed by Allāh and cursed by those who curse.} (Al-Baqarah: 159)"

Therefore, the assailant disbeliever has entered, and the assailant apostates and hypocrites have joined him. If the victorious group is the elite of the people of this religion, it is inconceivable that they would neglect the most obligatory of obligations after Tawḥīd—which is repelling the assailant—under the pretext of performing actions that are below that by the consensus of the scholars. Whoever does that is from the defeated group, not from the victorious group. He is from the sitting group fleeing from the battle; this is his ruling, and the enemy has surprised us in our own home.

So, the victorious group in this time are the bearers of weapons and the banners of Jihād to repel this assailant:

Firstly: Repelling the assailant original disbelievers, from Jews, Christians, polytheists, atheists, apostates, and their helpers... repelling them with weapons and the sword, and this is the Jihād of the spear. Whoever undertakes this today is from the lineage of the victorious group, its notables, and its people, whether they are individuals or groups.

Secondly: Repelling the assailant hypocrites and those who argue on behalf of these enemies with falsehood, from the scholars of the sultans, the innovating callers, the disheartening ones, and the discouragers—repelling them with proof and evidence, with what Allāh said and what the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said. This is the Jihād of clarification that the scholars have explained.

Whoever undertakes this today and endures for its sake the hardships of pursuit, fighting, and defamation is among the helpers of the victorious group, and we hope that he will join them. They are below the people of fighting unless they are among the people with a legitimate excuse. I have no doubt about that.

As for those who combine the sword with the pen, the machine gun with the quill, and fighting with knowledge, calling, enjoining good, and forbidding evil, there is no doubt that they are among the heads of the victorious group, its leaders, its flags, its scholars, and its Mujāhidīn callers. They are above their predecessors in rank, without a doubt.

We ask the Most High, the Almighty, by His mercy and grace, which He bestows upon whom He wills, to make us among them and with them, in this world and the Hereafter, under the banner of His beloved, the Chosen One, peace and blessings be upon him.

The Reality of Muslims Today

Allāh, the Exalted, says: "And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed [i.e., difficult] life, and We will gather [i.e., raise] him on the Day of Resurrection blind. He will say, "My Lord, why have you raised me blind while I was [once] seeing?" [Allāh] will say, "Thus did Our signs come to you, and you forgot [i.e., disregarded] them; and thus will you this Day be forgotten'."

It was narrated that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "The most wretched of the wretched is the one who is afflicted with both poverty in this world and punishment in the Hereafter."

And He (peace and blessings be upon him) said "O community of Muhājirīn, there are five traits; I seek refuge in Allāh that you should live to see them:

- Immorality never appears among a people to such an extent that they commit it openly, but plagues and diseases that were never known among the predecessors will spread among them.
- People do not cheat in weights and measures except that they will be stricken with famine, severe calamity, and the oppression of their rulers.
- People do not withhold the Zakāh of their wealth, but rain will be withheld from the sky, and were it not for the animals, they would not receive any rain.
- They do not break their covenant with Allah and His Messenger, but Allah will enable their enemies to overpower them and take some of what is in their hands.
- Their leaders do not rule by what Allāh has revealed in His Book, except He will cause their strife to be severe among them."

"The Hour will not come until obscenity and miserliness become widespread, the trustworthy is betrayed, the traitor is trusted, the wu'ul perish, and the tuhut appear. They said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, what are the tuhut and what are the wu'ul?' He said, 'The wu'ul are the prominent and noble people, and the tuhut are those who were under the feet of the people, unknown.'"

And in truth, there is no more concise description of the reality of most Muslims today than these verses and aḥadīth.

The reality of Muslims today can be summarized under three main headings:

First: The loss of religion among the majority of Muslims.

Second: The loss of worldly prosperity for the overwhelming majority of Muslims.

Third: The domination of enemies and their control over all aspects of Muslims' lives.

Let us examine a brief overview of these headings.

The Loss of Religion

The Ummah has nearly lost most of the components of its religion. This is evident in the manifestations of the collapse and corruption of religious life among most Muslims, as well as the corruption of their conditions and the loss of their sanctities. The most important of these is the absence of ruling by the Sharī'ah of Allāh. The most important aspects of this can be highlighted as follows:

The Absence of Ruling by the Sharī‘ah of Allāh in All Muslim Lands:

As it was narrated from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), he said: "The bonds of Islām will be undone one by one. Every time a bond is undone, the people will cling to the one that follows it. The first of them to be undone is ruling, and the last of them is Ṣalāh." (Narrated by Ahmad, 21139).

The prophecy of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) has been fulfilled. The undoing of ruling by Sharī‘ah happened gradually until it completely disappeared. The first breach was with the end of the Rightly-Guided Caliphate (al-Khilāfah ar-Rāshidah), which followed the Prophet's guidance and lasted for about thirty years after his death (peace and blessings be upon him). Following this, the rule transformed into a hereditary system of kingship (mulk 'aḍūḍ) at the hands of the Umayyads. This continued during the rule of the Abbasids and the subsequent kingdoms. Over time, the royal palaces—centers of power—became increasingly corrupt.

With the infiltration of weakness into the Abbasid Caliphate at the end of the third century AH, kingdoms disintegrated in the outskirts of the Islamic state. This led to the establishment of sultanates, kingdoms, and emirates that relied on coercion and tyranny, in which aspects of righteousness and corruption varied and intermingled. The Caliphate gradually transformed into a symbolic figurehead more than a system of governance and authority.

The further the rule moved away from the complete Sharī‘ah of Allāh over time, due to the manipulation of the desires of kings and the deception of the scholars of the Sultan, the more manifestations of corruption spread in all aspects of Muslim life. This continued until the situation reached the point of the Mongol invasion of the eastern lands of Islām and the invasion of the Caliphate in its heartland, after the Crusader attacks by the Byzantines and European Christian kingdoms intensified and they were able to establish Crusader colonies on the coasts of the Levant. The decline continued to reach its peak with the fall of Baghdad to the Mongols in 656 AH, and the dismemberment of the Abbasid Caliphate, bringing all the lands of Islām under the complete control of the Sultans of oppressive rule. However the principle of ruling by Shari‘ah as a basis remained in most of these kingdoms, in general.

Then, an exceptional and limited revival occurred with the rise of the Ottoman state, which transferred the Caliphate to itself and restored its central prestige for a period of time. However, it soon began to decline. Corruption began to affect the field of legislation and ruling by what Allāh revealed. Then, the European colonial powers colluded against it, and the Jews conspired against it to reach Palestine. The alliance of adversaries was able to bring down the Ottoman Caliphate in 1924 AD. This was followed by the fall of all Islamic lands under the colonization of various European Crusader states, foremost among them England, France, Russia, and others. During the colonial period, secularist ideologies arose in the lands of Islām and spread among the educated classes of Muslims under the patronage of the colonizer, who nurtured political parties, figures, and ruling families to pave the way for them to take power after the colonial period, in what was called "independence". This resulted in the rule of ṭawāghīt (tyrants), the ruling by other than what Allāh revealed in all the lands of Islām, under the care and supervision of the colonial powers.

Thus, the rule, which was undone bond by bond, went through the stages that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) informed about, as narrated in the ḥadīth of Hudhaifah: "Prophethood will remain among you for as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be a Caliphate (Khilāfah) on the methodology of Prophethood. It will remain for as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be a biting kingship (mulkan 'aḍḍan), and it will remain for as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be an oppressive kingship (mulkan jabriyyan), and it will remain for as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be a Caliphate on the pattern of Prophethood. Then he was silent." (Narrated by Muslim). And in a very important narration reported by Ibn Hammad in Kitāb al-Fitan from the ḥadīth of Anas (may Allāh be pleased with him), he said: "It will be, then a biting kingship, then oppressive, then ṭawāghīt." This is what has happened in the lands of the Muslims since the departure of colonialism and the establishment of the governments of the ṭawāghīt to look after its interests and rule by its laws until this day. Most of the governments of the Muslim countries openly declare their rule by something other than what Allāh revealed. Moreover most of them declare the unsuitability of Islamic Sharīʿah for ruling in modern times! They even attribute the current backwardness and problems of Muslims to the Sharīʿah itself!

Thus, constitutions were established, and in their light, thousands of laws were enacted that fight against Allāh, His Messenger, and the religion of the Muslims, and oppose the Sharīʿah of their Lord with all audacity and without any pretense or shame.

In many Muslim countries, the sovereignty of the Sharīʿah was explicitly removed from those constitutions. In some, it was kept as a mere title mixed with blatant polytheism (shirk) by saying, "Islamic Sharīʿah is the main source of legislation," making it a source alongside other sources. Meanwhile, some countries, like Saudi Arabia, claimed that "Islamic Sharīʿah is the only source of legislation," but they established civil, secular, or specialized courts alongside the Sharīʿah courts, according to what they called them. All of these rule by legislations, laws, and regulations derived or inspired by European legislations or those invented by secularist disbelievers and legislators who are affiliated with this Ummah just by names and appearances. These legislations became public, and they have courts, administrative structures, and laws that are implemented and rule over the necks of Muslims, alongside what remains in some countries, the laws of Islamic Sharī'ah in some areas of personal status. The ruling disbelieving authorities enforce the laws of disbelief with an iron fist and subjugate people to them.

Thus, the undoing of ruling was completed in all Muslim lands without exception. This calamity is the most important manifestation of the loss of religion, and the basis of all other types of calamities, such as the manifestations of religious corruption, the loss of worldly prosperity, and the domination of enemies. And it is no crime that everything we are in, some of which we will mention in this chapter, stems from this great catastrophe, which is "ruling by other than what Allāh revealed and changing His laws at the hands of our apostate, treacherous rulers and their allegiance to the Jews and Christians from their disbelieving masters."

The Occupation of the Three Holy Sites in the Creed of Islām:

They are Makkah, where the Ka'bah and the Masjid al-Ḥarām are located; Madinah, where the Mosque of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) is located; and Jerusalem (al-Quds al-Sharīf), where the Masjid al-Aqṣā is located, the first of the two Qiblahs and the third of the two Holy Mosques.

Contrary to what is commonly known, that Jerusalem was the first of the holy sites to be lost, in 1967 AD, and that Makkah, Madinah, and the Arabian Peninsula, the heartland of Islām, were placed under the influence of the Americans and the Crusader coalition forces that encompassed it during the Second Gulf War in 1991 AD, then the third in 2003 AD.

The truth is that Makkah and Madinah had already been lost and placed under the influence of the Crusaders much earlier. The loss of Jerusalem was a consequence of the loss of Makkah before it. The forces of apostasy that controlled Makkah played a fundamental role in the loss of Jerusalem in four main stages: 1936, 1947, 1967, and 2002 AD.

This is because the British Empire had occupied, since the beginning of the sixteenth century and over the following three centuries, many parts of the Islamic world, and established its direct control over them, including the peripheries of the Arabian Peninsula (the coasts of Yemen, Oman, the Emirates of the Gulf, and Kuwait).

Britain had become aware of the sanctity that the Hijaz region held for Muslims and the autonomy that the Najd region enjoyed, even from the centrality of the Ottoman Caliphate. Therefore, it resorted to a cunning plot since the beginning of the nineteenth century in order to control it. This was in cooperation with their greatest agent, Abdul Aziz Al Saud, the founder of the current third Saudi state. His father, Abdul Rahman, his family, and his children had sought refuge in Kuwait, fleeing from Najd after the collapse of the second Saudi state.

The British Colonial Office seized their new agent, Abdul Aziz Al Saud, in 1898 AD, when he was just over twenty years old. They saw his suitability for the task that they carried out meticulously. They provided him with military support and British gold, and his advisors suggested to him to exploit the Wahhabi<sup>1</sup> call and the enthusiasm of its Jihādī preachers from the "Ikhwan<sup>2</sup>".

Abdul Aziz was able to control Riyadh and then Najd through several campaigns since 1902 AD. Then, Britain chose him for its project in the Arabian Peninsula, after deceiving Sharif Hussein, their other agent in the Hijaz. Britain was able to declare Abdul Aziz as Sultan of Najd and Hijaz, after they annexed the Yemeni regions of Najran to them, in 1932 AD. They signed a deed of guarantee for his kingdom over those lands under the new name that Britain established, which is "The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia". Through this, Britain guaranteed the throne for Abdul Aziz and his sons after him in exchange for its influence over those lands. They made him promise not to make any contract or conclude any matter, especially in his foreign relations, without their permission and consultation. These agreements have now become known published documents, covered in books that chronicled that period. They are documented in what has been published of the British Foreign Office documents, which publishes some of its archives every thirty years.

With the establishment of the rule of Abdul Aziz Al Saud and his control over the Hijaz region, after the massacres that his army carried out with the help of British air power against the "Ikhwan" in the battle of "Al-Sabilah", he eliminated the forces of good that had brought him to power after deceiving them with his alleged adoption of the Wahhabi call. Thus, the atmosphere cleared for Abdul Aziz and his sons after him to place the nation's financial resources and religious sanctities under their domination and authority, which they pledged not to deviate from the advice of the British Crown.

Since then, Makkah, Madinah, and the Arabian Peninsula have been under the control of the English, and then the Americans, who inherited the Saudi throne, the oil of the Arabian Peninsula, and the supervision of Makkah and Madinah, among what they inherited from the possessions of the British Crown after World War II (1945 AD). That war eliminated the sovereignty of colonial Europe, to be divided between the sovereignty of America and Russia. The Arabian Peninsula and the princes of its British protectorates, including the Al Saud, were among what America inherited from Britain. The American President (Roosevelt) met with King (Abdul Aziz) on board an American warship after World War II. In that meeting, the guarantee of that treacherous Saudi throne was transferred to the Americans after the British, in exchange for their hearing and obedience. He began to receive support from the new masters (the Americans) and gave them allegiance, as was the case with their English predecessors.

Among the documents published from that stage is Abdul Aziz's agreement to the British programs for Zionist immigration to Palestine and his non-objection to giving it to the Jews. And his agreement to the Balfour Declaration.

In 1936 AD, the Great Revolt, ignited by Sheikh Izz al-Din al-Qassam (may Allāh have mercy on him) in Palestine, broke out against the Jewish settlers, who had begun to encroach on Palestine under the supervision of the British, who had pledged to give Palestine as a national home for the Jews through the Balfour Declaration, the British Prime Minister, in 1917 AD. Britain was unable to quell the revolution, so it sought the help of its agent (King Abdul Aziz), who sent his son and Foreign Minister (Faisal) to deceive the Arabs of Palestine and the leaders of the 1936 revolution in order to stop it, after he guaranteed them the fulfillment of "our friend Britain," as he described it. The revolution was stopped and then extinguished, and that was the first step in the loss of Jerusalem.

Then, the seven Arab armies and the rulers of their countries oversaw the formal withdrawals of the Arab armies under British supervision. As a result of those programmed defeats, the State of Israel was established in 1947 AD on most of the land of Palestine, and with it, the western half of Jerusalem was lost.

Through a similar conspiracy in 1967 AD, Israel was able to occupy East Jerusalem, including the Dome of the Rock and Masjid al-Aqṣā, along with what it occupied of the West Bank and parts of Syria, Egypt, and Jordan.

Then the chapters of the conspiracy continued – and this book is not the place to detail them – to pass through the Madrid Peace Conference in 1991 AD for normalization with the Jews, in which Saudi Arabia participated. Historic fatwās were issued permitting this and justifying it with verses and ḥadīths by the Council of Senior Scholars in Saudi Arabia and its head – their father – Sheikh Abdul Aziz bin Baz. This was after they had issued fatwās permitting the entry of the European and American Crusader armies into the Arabian Peninsula under the pretext of the necessity of confronting the threat of Saddam Hussein!

Then the train of conspiracy and disasters continued its journey to reach the “initiative of Prince Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz”, the Saudi Crown Prince and the current de facto ruler of Riyadh, in mid-2002 AD. He offered full normalization with the Jews and recognition of Israel in exchange for the return of what it occupied in 1967 AD, giving up the rest of Palestine! The Arab Summit Conference convened, which turned his initiative into an Arab project, the purpose of which was to abort the Intifada that had erupted violently and powerfully in Rajab 1423 AH, a year before the initiative. Saud Al-Faisal, the Saudi Foreign Minister, marketed the initiative Arab and internationally to complete what his father, uncle, and grandfather had done before, even though Israel accepted half of the initiative (normalization and recognition of it) and rejected half of it (withdrawals from what it occupied in 1967). This culminated in the overthrow of the Palestinian Authority and the reoccupation of what it had been authorized to control in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Its massacres of Palestinians have escalated since then.

During those years, in late 1990 and early 1991 AD, the armies of the international coalition, led by America and Britain, advanced to land in the Arabian Peninsula with a million soldiers, their equipment, military vehicles, warships, and aircraft under the guise of liberating Kuwait. This began the occupation and organized positioning of the Americans and the modern Crusader attack on the Middle East (the Arabian Peninsula, the Levant, Egypt, and Iraq). Thus, the three holy sites of Muslims (Makkah, Madinah, and Jerusalem) were placed under direct Crusader occupation under the supervision of the rulers of the Al Saud and the princes of the Arabian Peninsula, where the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) died while he was enjoining the Muslims and urging them, saying, "Expel the polytheists from the Arabian Peninsula." With the presence of Jerusalem under Jewish occupation, with the help of the Americans and the pledge of the English, the three holy sites of Muslims have been placed under the occupation of the Jews and the Crusaders. This is one of the most obvious manifestations of the corruption of religion among Muslims, who have sadly left a gap between their enemies and their most sacred sanctities.

The Corruption of the Creed of Tawḥīd Among Most Muslims, the Spread of Innovations (Bida'), and the Disappearance of the Sunnah:

The observer of the conditions of the one and a quarter billion people attributed to the creed of Islām today finds that most of them no longer have anything of the religion except its form, or perhaps even its name. He finds that those who adhere to the rituals among them, and they are few among the people of Islām in this time, have adopted distorted creeds, in which there is little of what the predecessors (Salaf) of this Ummah and its first generation believed.

The features of the tolerant creed that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) brought to us, and he described its adherents in summary by saying, "What I am upon today and my companions," have faded. This creed has weakened in the hearts of most of those who are attributed to commitment, and even to belonging to the Islamic awakening<sup>3</sup> and its various schools. What the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold has occurred: the splitting of this Ummah into seventy-three sects, all of them in the Fire except one. Also fulfilled is what he foretold about the emergence of callers at the gates of Hell, whoever responds to them, they throw him into it. This creed has gradually faded among Muslims since the second century AH, and the calamities, innovations, and deviations have gradually overtaken it, due to what the kings and the wicked readers have corrupted of this religion. As Ibn al-Mubarak (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

"And who corrupted the religion except the kings and evil scholars and monks."

The observer of the conditions of the scholars today, their students, and the conditions of those attributed to leading the schools of the Islamic awakening finds only a few isolated strangers here and there who call to what the first generation was upon. Whoever escapes the "nonsense" of the innovators, the misguided, the deviants, and the people of desires, different sects, and creeds, does not usually escape the general calamity in our time, which is the creed of Irjā', which is the religion of the kings in our time and every time. You do not find in most of the leaders, scholars, and symbols of those who are attributed to the Islamic awakening, Islamic action, and the call (da'wah), from the furthest Sufis to the furthest Salafis, passing through most of the pioneers of Islamic and da'wah movements, except praising the Sultans, frequenting the tables and councils of the rulers, and begging for their satisfaction. This has weakened the status of the entire religion in the hearts of the general public. The creed of Irjā' has distorted the Tawḥīd of Lordship (Ulūhiyyah) and the Tawḥīd of Sovereignty (Ḥākimiyyah) in the conscience of most of the Ummah. The apostate, agent rulers who rule by other than what Allāh revealed, who oppress their subjects and the people of their creed, who are immoral in their behavior and conditions, who disbelieve in the Sharī'ah of their Lord, have become, in the eyes of most scholars today, as if the Qur'an – God forbid – was revealed about them: "And whoever does not judge by what Allah has revealed - then it is those who are the righteous believers!!" And not as it was revealed with truth, justice, and sincerity: {then it is those who are the disbelievers} {then it is those who are the wrongdoers} {then it is those who are the defiantly disobedient}." [As expressed by the martyr of Islām, Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him].

This is one of the greatest aspects of the corruption of the creed among the general public and the elite. Not to mention what has spread among those who still have a place for religion in their hearts, of various types of superstitions, innovations, "nonsense," attachment to the dead, graves, shrines, and the charlatanry of charlatans. This is the case with most of those who are attributed to religiosity.

As for the masses and the common people, most of them have forgotten Allāh, so He has made them forget themselves. Most of them have come to worship governments, or worship money, or worship their own desires, or worship satellite channels and television screens, spending their nights on them and believing in all the poison that is stuffed into their heads.

The idols of the age (America and the West), their culture, and their ideas, have become worshipped and sanctified, and believed in more than people worship Allāh with their correct creed. Most people have come to believe in their leaders, elders, and wealthy ones that they [are the ones who] benefit and harm, provide and deprive, give and withhold, raise and lower, and even give life and cause death. So what meaning and what faith remains for the beautiful names of Allāh and His supreme attributes in the hearts of the imams and scholars of these people, let alone their common folk?! And what essence remains in their claim of correcting creeds.

Most of those referred to as "students of knowledge" (ṭullāb al-ʿilm) have been affected by the disease of blindly following scholars and religious leaders. They allow what is forbidden because their scholars permit it, and they prohibit what is lawful because their scholars forbid it, accepting their rulings without question. They also flatter and conform to the wishes of kings and rulers, imitating them and promoting innovations and misguidance for which Allah has given no authority. They falsely claim that these distortions are part of Allah's religion, and so the people follow them.

As for "callers to Islām" and those working in Islamic movements, they have given their parties and leaderships the same status as the students of knowledge gave their sheikhs, in terms of blind following and obedience. This is despite their knowledge that this contradicts the most basic components of the creeds of allegiance and disavowal (al-walā' wal-barā'), and that there is no obedience to a creature in disobedience to the Creator. Then you find nothing but contrived justifications and forced explanations in order to justify blind following and the worship of men. Except for those whom Allāh has shown mercy, and they are few.

The tragedy is that many of them think that correcting the creed is merely delving into the research of names and attributes, and fighting graves, the dead, and shrines. They do not know that the correctness of belief includes all aspects of life: creed, worship, behavior, and adherence.

Until the caller to Allāh, and to the reality of returning to His religion, has become a stranger among people, holding onto the embers of patience, harboring the burning of suffering, exactly as the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) described. Innovations have spread, and many of the Sunnahs have disappeared, even among the committed of the religious, who are the minority in the Ummah. As for the rest of the Ummah, they are neither in the Sunnah nor in innovation. Most of them have begun to follow the ways of male and female singers, male and female dancers, male and female athletes, the living and the dead. Fashion houses, symbols of art and magazines, and stars of the small and big screens have become a model for imitation and following. These people no longer have any affiliation with the people of Islām except being called by names and adhering to some customs and traditions of religious origin, along with some forms of worship and religious seasons.

The Spread of Immorality, Disobedience, and Open Sin:

This has become the characteristic of most of those attributed to Islām. What examples can we give, and what can we present?! The calamity is widespread, and the disasters are overwhelming.

If you come to the world of money, business, and people's livelihoods, you will see that most people do not care whether they obtained their sustenance from lawful (ḥalāl) or unlawful (ḥarām) means. You will see that dealing with interest (ribā) has become prevalent in every corner, and that people consume each other's wealth unjustly, through deception, fraud, 'inah<sup>4</sup> sales, the banking system, and transactions. As for market transactions, they are fundamentally based on the ḥarām. This is not to mention the spread of bribery, corruption, theft, fraud, and looting.

If you come to the media, from satellite channels, dishes, and television screens to radio stations, to the internet and international information networks, to newspapers and magazines, to forums and cultural centers etc., you will see that most of them are the source of calamity and the gates of devils upon human beings. Their basic characteristic is based on various types of prohibitions and destructive things. From music and entertainment to leisure, nudity, displays of mixing, and programs of adultery and prostitution to spreading vice, ideas of corruption, and models of scandalous Western fashion. This is not to mention the spread of philosophies of atheism, secularist ideas, and cultures that fight against Allāh, His Messenger, and the religion of Muslims. This is in addition to what they have recently invented, which is the presentation of what they call "moderate Islām" and the model of life of its adherents and their ways of thinking. This has become the gateway to misguidance, and they have scholars and people giving religious opinions and foundations, that frame, disbelief and leaving of the religion in name of (moderate) Islam, claiming to keep pace with the times and not give the enemies of religion an excuse to accuse us of extremism and terrorism. It is enough for you to follow the programs of "Fatwas on Air" on satellite channels, and if they were truthful, they would write it with the shortened alif to become "Fatwas according to Desires" (Fatāwā 'ala al-hawā), according to the desires of the disbelieving rulers and the immoral ruled.

As for the social and moral life of most Muslims, it is no longer based on the principles of Islām, such as modesty, chastity, truthfulness, sincerity, mercy, and cooperation in righteousness and piety. The life of most of the general public is based on showing off, hypocrisy, backbiting, gossip, severing ties of kinship, turning away from each other, mutual hatred, envy, lying, deception, and unlawful gains. This is not to mention the spread of unveiling, to the extent that the ḥijāb has become rare and is fought against at the official and social levels. The life of mixing and women's work in the midst of men in every field has also led to the spread of corruption, vice, marital infidelity, the prevalence of adultery, and the spread of divorce, which has bequeathed societies serious diseases that were not present in them before. This is in addition to the calamities of tourism, nude beaches, vice clubs, corruption cafes, wedding halls, amusement parks, the spread of alcohol, drugs, gambling halls, and various types of prohibitions.

As for cultural and intellectual life! Cultures are imported from East and West, and philosophies are based on atheism, secularism, and denial of the religion of this Ummah, its identity, and its authenticity in all fields of thought, culture, literature, and the arts. As if what has happened to us over successive decades since the occupation and the subsequent calamity of the governments of independence was not enough, America today is pursuing us with plans to change the curricula of education, media, and religious teaching at every level. It is creating for us cultural change programs to affect every field in language, history, religion, culture, and all our civilizational and religious components.

As for political life it is a more fertile field for corruption and distance from religion. Political parties, currents, and groups based on beliefs and ideas opposed to the religion of Islām have spread. It is enough to review the political segments in Muslim countries within what is called "parliaments." It is enough to look at the laws for forming parties and the conduct of elections to know what kind of people these who are called "Muslims" have become! And to realize that they have a lineage with every nation except with their own Ummah and the religion of their fathers and grandfathers!

"Democracy" and its Western model have become a religion that is believed in, and blood is shed for it in demonstrations and at ballot boxes. As for the parties that are called "Islamic," their political programs are based on a mixture of Islamic principles and Western democracy, with a quantity of imported thought and a variety of deviations and innovations invented by their owners and mixed with some of the principles of religion to call them "Islamic programs" and "Islamic parties" and even to call their misguidance the term "parliamentary jurisprudence" (fiqh birlimānī)!

Thus, corruption has spread in all aspects of life, political, religious, economic, social, moral, intellectual, cultural, etc.

And how can corruption and vice not spread, and the foundations of righteousness in the Ummah of Islām have been afflicted with damage? As it was narrated in the tradition: "Two groups of people, if they are righteous, the people will be righteous, and if they are corrupt, the people will be corrupt: the scholars and the rulers."

How can corruption not spread and open sin not be declared? When the governments in all Muslim countries encourage this?! They spend their budgets and sources of wealth on aspects of corruption and causing corruption. How can it not be, when the political leaders and princes, from kings, presidents, and sultans, and their entourage, ministers, legislators, military, security, and political leaders, are the imams of vice and corruption, and they are among the greatest pioneers of the haunts of evil, and they are the ones who shamelessly disregard the laws of religion and the rituals of Islām?! They are, in short: the imams of disbelief and corruption.

And how can it not be, when the scholars of Muslims, their sheikhs, and their leaders have abandoned enjoining good and forbidding evil, and most of them have become mere "decorations" with which the rulers complete their tables, platforms, and salons? In meetings, parties, and occasions! How can it not be, when the righteous among them have been content with silence in the holes of helplessness and the excuses of concessions and taqiyyah! Until their status and prestige diminished in the eyes of the general public, and they were no longer a role model to be followed. Rather, they made people lose interest in religious matters, and many of them became a model of inferiority, backwardness, servitude, and ignorance.

The Estrangement of the People of Truth:

As a result of the manifestations of religious corruption, the dominance of those who are astray, and the fact that most of the prominent figures in Muslim societies are the chief criminals – whose conditions we have previously described, including prominent figures in politics, commerce, arts, and corruption, as well as those in their entourages who are deviant – the group that adheres to its religion, enjoining good, forbidding evil, and calling for change, has become estranged in society.

The believing group that adheres to correct belief and conduct committed to the rules of religion has become estranged within that righteous group. And the small number striving in the path of Allāh, confronting the enemies of Allāh both internally and externally in order to correct these conditions and ward off this affliction – this small number has become estranged within that group. Their situation has become as described by the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), as we presented in the chapter on estrangement, strangers, and those who prevail upon the truth.

In this state, the twentieth century passed, and we entered the twenty-first century, to find that most people are as if they are preparing to follow the Masīḥ ad-Dajjāl (Antichrist), with nothing preventing them from doing so except his emergence. We seek refuge in Allāh and ask Allāh for safety in our religion, our honor, ourselves, our offspring, and all our affairs.

The Loss of Worldly Life

As for the loss of the worldly life of most Muslims, the vast majority of the one and a quarter billion Muslims live in this time in hardship, due to the poor state of their worldly life and the constraints of their livelihoods, in addition to what we have already mentioned about the corruption of their religion and their distance from their Lord. The condition of most of them almost matches what the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) described in the ḥadīth narrated by Ibn Mājah and authenticated by al-Ḥākim, from the narration of Abū Saʿīd al-Khudrī (may Allāh be pleased with him), where he said: "The most wretched of the wretched is the one upon whom is combined the poverty of this world and the punishment of the Hereafter." It is as if most of them are heading towards this state unless Allāh's mercy and forgiveness reach them.

The manifestations and causes of the loss of the worldly life of Muslims are evident in many matters, perhaps the most important of which are the following:

The Theft of the Muslim Treasury and Their Essential Resources

It is well known to everyone that the Arabian Gulf region contains the largest known oil reserves on Earth. It is the primary oil reservoir in the world. Recent discoveries have also proven that the second most important reservoir in the world is in the region of the Islamic republics of Central Asia, the area extending from the Caspian Sea to the Caucasus. Additionally, other significant oil and gas resources are concentrated in the lands of Iraq and the Levant. There is another oil lake in southern Sudan and the Horn of Africa, and a third extending from Egypt to Algeria. This is in terms of the basic resources in the modern world, namely energy sources, which constitute the main economic, political, and even strategic weight at all levels.

If we add to this that the Islamic world, extending from Afghanistan, Pakistan, and the Philippines in the east to the shores of the Atlantic Ocean and the coasts of Morocco, Mauritania, and Senegal in the west, and from Central Asia, the Caucasus, the Balkans, and North Africa in the north to South Asia, the islands of Indonesia, and Central Black Africa in the south – if we know that this Islamic world possesses a huge strategic reserve of various mineral resources, such that a number of its countries are considered among the top exporters of important industrial minerals, and if we add to that the animal and agricultural resources available in these regions, in addition to what is provided by land, sea, and air transportation sources and transit rights for this region, which contains the four most important global straits and waterways out of five, namely the Strait of Hormuz, Bab al-Mandab, the Suez Canal, and the Strait of Gibraltar, and its airspace forms a transportation hub between the four geographical directions of the world; we would be amazed at how this region includes countries that have topped the lists of the poorest, most backward, ignorant, and illiterate countries in the world!! And that the vast majority of the peoples of this region, including the peoples of oil-producing countries that are members of OPEC, live below the poverty line.

Although the economic statistics published openly by international study centers indicate fantastical wealth, beyond enumeration and astonishing to the observer.

It is sufficient, for example, to know that 65% of Europe's natural gas consumption comes from Algeria through Morocco. And to know that the Arabian Peninsula, the heartland of Islam and their main treasury, contains 75% of the known oil reserves on Earth. And that it produces about 16 million barrels of oil per day!! And that one of the oil fields in southern Iraq is capable of producing 5 million barrels of oil per day, in addition to the gas produced there. This is in addition to what is known about oil and gas reserves in countries like Iran, Algeria, Syria, and Sudan. And about the second largest oil reserve in the world in the vicinity of the Caspian Sea.

So how did this happen?! That the peoples of the richest region on Earth are the poorest peoples on Earth!

The astonishment disappears when we learn about the historical, legendary theft mechanism practiced by the West, with its various countries, led by America, the NATO countries of Europe, and Russia. They are the crusader enemy encroaching upon us today. They finance their wars, which take the lives of our children, with our money and the wealth of our treasury. They simply take it and slaughter us with it! They take our oil to power their planes, fleets, and tanks that come to kill our children and women, and its profits return to their peoples to live in luxury.

The wealth is stolen from its sources, because it is all extracted through foreign companies that oversee the stages of extraction, marketing, and trade, and manage the international banks where the balances are deposited, thus completing the cycle of theft from beginning to end!!

The theft begins with the signing of contracts with the treacherous governments, agents of the colonizing thieves who own and manage those companies. Between 40-60% goes to them through partnership contracts, and this is the first stage of theft!

Then comes the second stage of theft by falsifying the quantities of extracted materials, because they are the ones supervising their extraction through their engineers and experts, in addition to bribing the supervisors from the entourages of their rulers over these resources in order to falsify the quantities in many countries. Then comes the third stage of theft, in determining the prices of these materials and marketing them globally at the lowest prices. It is sufficient to know that the real price that a barrel of crude oil should be, if measured by the prices of manufactured goods and its role in operating their factories, is, according to some international economic study centers in the West itself, supposed to be 260 dollars per barrel. While in reality, its global price in history has not exceeded 45 dollars!! It has mostly fluctuated around 20 dollars per barrel! And sometimes it has fallen below 10 dollars!! All this is because the masters of the global stock exchange, which plays with the prices of basic goods and the value of international currencies, are Jews and major Crusader capitalists, the same occupier colonizing our lands! Then we add to the tragedy a beautiful chapter when we learn that the governments of our client countries, and the local thieves from our rulers, kings, their sons, brothers, and senior entourages obtain from this oil grants from outside the quotas scheduled for global production in those countries, and sell it for about 3 dollars per barrel in international waters and the high seas, thus depressing the price of oil globally. But a small tanker of half a million barrels is sufficient, with its revenue (1.5 million dollars), to cover the expenses of their whims of adultery, debauchery, and gambling for several weeks!!!

This is one example from the world of oil, and you can apply the same to all resources and methods of their theft.

Then comes the fourth stage of theft, when our country's share of the price of these materials is transferred to their banks, to be turned into numbers and electronic zeros accumulated in their accounts, with which they operate their economy and do not allow our governments to withdraw from them except in limited and calculated amounts, most of which goes to buying industrial goods, weapons, and our needs that we import from their industrialized world, where they impose the prices of their goods as they like and desire! They even impose on our countries the type and quantities of weapons and ammunition that we import! And its price, of course! It is sufficient as an example that a member of the Kuwaiti National Assembly exposed a scandal when he revealed a bill of billions of dollars with which America charged Kuwait for the expenses of its forces there, where the price of a head of lettuce used in salad was recorded in the food expenses as 30 US dollars!!

To discover in the end that we get from our wealth only ridiculous percentages, most of which goes to the secret accounts of our rulers and executioners in Swiss, European, and American banks with Jewish management. The people receive only what covers the expenses of those governments and some of their basic projects. As for most of the mineral resources, they are stolen in the same way and often transported in the form of ores, stones, and raw materials for export, so that they are not manufactured and processed locally, so that most of those countries do not have industrial infrastructure and local labor is only used as porters from the mines to the export ports!!

Thus, those resources and the great blessing that Allāh granted the lands of His Muslim servants have turned into a curse that has become a cause for conflict between governments, political and military coups locally in order to seize power and supervise the looting of these resources and hand them over to the colonizing master by the successive apostate rulers of our countries. And ultimately a cause for foreign invasion, wars, death, and the garment of fear and hunger. This is not to mention what America imposes on most of the governments of our countries, especially in their heartland and treasury (the Arabian Peninsula), in the form of bills for the costs of its invasions in our countries in the form of expenses for “peacekeeping” forces and alleged “military aid”!! Which is the euphemism for modern military colonialism. As America did with Saudi Arabia when it estimated the costs of Desert Storm/Liberation of Kuwait at 560 billion dollars! It seized Saudi Arabia's budget and turned what it could not cover into interest-bearing debts that made Saudi Arabia – the largest oil exporter in the world – an interest-bearing debtor to the International Monetary Fund!! This is some of what the media has revealed, and what is hidden from us is even more dire, greater, and bitter.

Poor Distribution of Wealth in Our Islamic Lands:

The tragedy of the theft of the Muslim treasury and their wealth does not end with its theft. The greater calamity is that what is saved of the local resources and what reaches our countries, most of it is stolen by a handful of pharaonic rulers who control the capabilities of the country and the people, to plunder most of it, and to share some of it with those close to their entourages, partners, clients, senior merchants, and those in charge of their authoritarian and tyrannical apparatuses! It is sufficient to know that the oil and gas resources of the Gulf countries, whose revenues exceed one billion dollars per day, are shared by ruling and owning families whose members in some countries do not exceed dozens of princes. And in total, in the Arab Gulf states, they do not exceed a few hundred kings, princes, and their senior sons. They share the wealth of the entire Islamic ummah. It is sufficient to know, for example, that the daily expenses of Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz, the second deputy king of what is called the “Kingdom of Saudi Arabia”, amount to 3 million dollars per day, according to some study centers familiar with the statistics of the world of finance, business, and the lives of the rich! These amounts cover the services of his palaces extending from the coasts of America to Europe to East Asia, including the services of amusement, prostitution, gambling, and corruption.

It is sadly amusing to know that the news reported that Faisal bin Fahd, the King of Saudi Arabia, died suddenly of a heart attack because he lost at the gambling tables in some of his battles on the gambling table (10 billion dollars), meaning ten thousand million dollars. And measure the rulers of the rest of the afflicted Islamic world by him, where the sons of kings and presidents and their senior aides, army commanders, and intelligence agencies share the wealth of the countries, so that most of the members of the Islamic peoples live practically below the poverty line, according to economic and social studies statistics that break the heart and make the forehead sweat. The poor distribution of wealth escalates at all levels.

There is a poor distribution of wealth between the Islamic countries themselves due to the colonial political division of the countries of the Islamic world and their distribution between rich, overstuffed countries and poor, perishing countries. While the average per capita income in some Islamic countries such as Bangladesh, Afghanistan, and some African Islamic countries is less than 100 dollars per year per capita! That is, about a quarter of a dollar per day, the average per capita income in the Gulf countries reaches tens of thousands of dollars annually per capita, with some of them – such as Kuwait and Qatar – recording the highest per capita income in the world. Then there is a poor distribution of wealth within each country.

While the wealth of some individuals in some Islamic countries, even the poor ones, especially in the upper echelons of power in each country, reaches the level of billionaires – where some rulers of Muslim countries and some of their sons and brothers top the lists of the ten richest billionaires in the world – you find some members of their subjects dying of hunger and unemployment crushing most of the members of their peoples.

All this knowing that one of the fundamentals of our religion is that the Islamic ummah is one and that their covenant is one, and their integration is one. To the extent that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) informed us that whoever goes to bed full while his neighbor is hungry has not believed. (ḥadīth).

The wealth of Muslims belongs to Muslims, meaning that all wealth belongs to all Muslims.

But the divisions of the Western colonial ministries of our countries divided the wealth and distributed poverty and wealth. So where is the state of the ummah compared to what it was in the beginning?!

The narrations have reported that when the Companions (may Allāh be pleased with them) conquered Iraq and the spoils and wealth increased, 'Umar considered the vastness of the land after the conquests of Iraq and what Allāh had bestowed upon the believers. He gathered the Companions and discussed with them that he saw leaving the lands of Sawad of Iraq for the Muslim treasury, a wealth for those who come after them, even though some Companions protested and demanded that it be divided among the mujāhidīn who had gained it, and they had evidence and texts for that from the Book and the Sunnah.

Among the narrations on this matter:

Aslam reported: I heard 'Umar say: "Gather this wealth and consider to whom you deem it appropriate. I have recited verses from the Book of Allāh. I heard Allāh say: {What Allāh has bestowed on His Messenger from the people of the towns} - until His saying - {and those who came after them.} By Allāh, there is no one among the Muslims except that he has a right to this wealth, whether he is given from it or prevented, even the shepherd in Aden." Kanz al-'Ummāl, p. 561.

He, may Allāh be pleased with him, thought about those who came after them, and he said, may Allāh be pleased with him: "By Allāh, if I remain for them, the shepherd on a mountain of Sana'a will receive his share of this wealth while he is tending his flock in his place." Kanz al-'Ummāl, p. 524.

And he, may Allāh be pleased with him, said: "There is no Muslim on the face of the earth except that he has a right to this fay' (booty), whether he is given it or prevented, except what your right hands possess." Kanz al-'Ummāl, p. 525.

'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him, set the example of the right of a poor Yemeni man to what Allāh had conquered in Iraq, which was among the farthest reaches of his rule from the Islamic lands to the location of the new wealth and riches. He allocated to its people a share of the wealth that entered Bayt al-Māl (the treasury), even agricultural wealth, which was the lands of Sawād in Iraq. So what about the vast subterranean wealth?!

However, colonial policies divided the lands and humiliated the people, until they were able to steal the largest part, and made the Muslims differ over what remained of it, in the worst example of wealth distribution in history and reality. With the loss of wealth, its waste, and the mismanagement of what remained of it, very serious consequences arose on the economic, social, and political levels in the Muslim lands. This, in addition to the consequences of the absence of Allāh's law and ruling by it, as we have previously mentioned, led to the rest of the symptoms of the loss of worldly life that is hardship of living at every level. Here we will point out some aspects of the loss of worldly comfort and the ensuing hardships for the sake of mentioning and pointing out.

Injustice

The absence of the justice of the Shari'ah, and the absence of fairness in the distribution of wealth, have made most people predatory beasts, devouring one another and oppressing one another. The observer of the hierarchy of injustice and grievances finds it a fundamental characteristic of the lives of Muslims. America and the colonial powers oppress the Muslim lands, rulers and ruled alike, and subjugate them to their tyranny. The pharaonic rulers oppress those under them, from their aides and their peoples, and subjugate them. The senior aides oppress their subordinates according to their varying proximity to and distance from the ruler, and according to their positions and the extent of their tyrannical powers. They, as a whole, oppress the rest of the people according to their ability as well, the rich and the poor alike. They extort their wealth and violate their sanctities. Even within the strata of the people, you find the strong oppressing the weak, the rich oppressing the poor, and so on. Oppression has almost become an accepted norm, you hardly find anyone objecting to it, as if it were a predestined fate that no one has the power or ability to remove. The courts, which are called "houses of justice," have become places for taking bribes and consuming rights. So where can an oppressed person seek justice from an oppressor?!

Oppression and Humiliation

Thus, people are clothed in the garments of humiliation and defeat, every weak person before one who is stronger than him, every poor person before one who is richer than him, and every ruled person before one who holds more power than him. Grudges and feelings of oppression dominate most people towards their rulers in particular, and among the majority in general. This has brought upon people intractable social diseases of hypocrisy, envy, and mutual hatred.

Fear

The cloak of fear is a garment that most Muslims wear from a young age due to the aforementioned symptoms. Muslims, rulers and ruled, fear the dominance and power of the enemies and their aggression, and the peoples fear their rulers, and every weak person fears one who is stronger than him.

In light of the police states, where intelligence agencies are numerous, executioners master the arts of torture, and governments spend a large portion of their budget on building prisons, terror dominates all strata of the people. The employee fears the manager, the teacher fears the informant among the students, the driver fears the traffic police, the citizen fears the intelligence services, the demonstrator fears repression, the Friday preacher fears the spy among the worshipers, the writers fear censorship, and so on, up to the agent ruler who fears America and allies with it out of fear and greed so that it will keep him in power and ensure the inheritance of his kingdom to his sons or relatives and followers.

Hunger and Disease

Due to the theft of the main treasury of the Muslims (their oil and wealth), and due to the mismanagement of what remained and its looting by the elites, people are clothed in the garment of hunger along with the garment of fear. The vast majority of Muslims live below the poverty line, and this is proven by the statistics of local and international organizations concerned with this matter. Many Muslim countries, such as the countries of the Horn of Africa, Bangladesh, and others, are ravaged by famines, diseases, and disasters that claim the lives of hundreds of thousands of people every year. Most Muslim countries, as a result of the imbalance of wealth resources, live a substandard life at the level of health services. This has spread chronic diseases and epidemics, and made the government's capabilities below the level of addressing them, and made the costs of treatment beyond the reach of most poor families.

Poverty has led many young men and men to leave their countries in search of livelihoods, so that many Muslim countries, such as Pakistan, the countries of North Africa, Turkey, and others have become the main source of exporting cheap migrant labor to all parts of the world, men lose their youth away from their families, wives, and children for the sake of a meager living. As for ignorance, it is unspeakable. It suffices, for example, to know that statistics indicate the presence of 65 million illiterate people in the Arab world alone, noting that its population is close to 300 million people.

Mass Killing

Many Muslim countries today are facing campaigns of genocide by the Western colonizers under the New World Order. It is rare for a daily news bulletin to not include at least one report on these massacres. Over the past two decades alone massacres have claimed the lives of hundreds of thousands of Muslims in Bosnia, Chechnya, Kosovo, Kashmir, India, the Philippines, Afghanistan, Iraq, Palestine, Lebanon, Somalia, Indonesia, Nigeria, Burma, Eritrea, Iraqi Kurdistan and others.

Moreover, organized killing campaigns and starvation have affected millions of children, as in Iraq, where America did not stop at killing over 300,000 civilians and military personnel during the Second Gulf War (Desert Storm) but through ten years of sanctions, over one and a half million children died from malnutrition and lack of medicine. The file of massacres, ethnic cleansing, and physical extermination of Muslims today would require volumes of books and full-time historians to track their details and statistics!!

This is in addition to the sterilization and population control operations, defective and disease-spreading medicines sent by the West through food shipments and aid entering the afflicted Muslim countries under the guise of food assistance!!

Not to mention the massacres and extermination carried out by the tyrannical governments and their regimes against their peoples, especially the Muslim youth, whenever they sense any threat. The lists of their crimes are long; Saddam Hussein killed over one million people during his rule in Iraq, King Hussein killed twenty thousand Palestinians in Black September 1970 in Jordan, Hafez al-Assad killed over 40,000 Syrians in the early 1980s, and in Tel al-Zaatar in Beirut – Lebanon, around 60,000 Palestinians were killed, in Tripoli, over 20,000 Lebanese, and the Algerian regime, after the military coup of 1991, has killed over 150,000 people to this day and so on.

Mass Displacement

Similarly, in all areas of war and disaster, and in the aforementioned areas of massacres, we find that many who survived the killings have fled in waves of mass migration to escape the creeping death operations. This occurred in Bosnia, Chechnya, Afghanistan, Somalia, Eritrea, Palestine, Kashmir, Kosovo. It is enough to look at the statistics from international organizations that care for refugees to discover that tens of millions of Muslims are living as displaced persons in camps that lack even the most basic animal rights, let alone human rights.

Violation of Honor

In all those war-torn areas, affected by the aggression of the Crusader, Hindu, atheist, and other kinds of disbelievers, the honor of Muslims has not been spared from the most heinous acts of violation and assault by the disbelievers. In some areas of calamity, it reached a terrifying extent, as in Bosnia, where human rights organizations recorded over 50,000 cases of Muslim women being raped there. In addition to what news reports here and there document of these crimes. This is from external enemies, let alone what the corrupt police states and their intelligence agencies are doing in Muslim countries, assaulting their honor in their prisons with no accountability.

This is regarding the forced violation of honor, not to mention the widespread voluntary violation of honor among Muslims due to the policies of their governments and their media outlets in spreading vice, corruption, and immoral conduct, to the extent that fornication spread among Muslims like an epidemic.

Psychological Anxiety and Confusion:

This is the natural result of all that has preceded. A nation that lives far from the religion of its Lord, alienated from its beliefs, governed by the laws of its enemies, has abandoned its religion and failed to integrate into the religion of its enemies, remains estranged, neither living Islam nor dissolving into another religion. Its individuals experience the reflections of all the calamities we mentioned from poverty, hunger, fear, disease, oppression, humiliation, injustice, corruption, the tyranny of Pharaoh-like rulers, and the aggression of enemies. All this has led to political, economic, social, cultural, intellectual, and psychological crises. There is no doubt that such a nation will experience confusion, loss, and anxiety. It is neither living comfortably in this world, nor is it armed with a religion that helps it endure with patience, reliance, and the ability to confront calamities. This has been proven by well-informed studies and alarming statistics, showing an increase in suicide rates, divorce, mental and social diseases, and the spread of many signs of hysteria and depression. In conclusion, as the Qur'an expressed succinctly and firmly and Allah, the Almighty, has spoken the truth:

*{And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a constricted life, and We will raise him on the Day of Resurrection blind. * He will say, "My Lord, why have you raised me blind while I was [once] seeing?" * [Allāh] will say, "Thus did Our signs come to you, and you forgot them; and thus will you this Day be forgotten."}* (Tāhā: 124-126)

And how concise is the lesson in what was narrated from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him:

"Indeed, the most wretched of the wretched is the one who is afflicted by both the poverty of this world and the punishment of the Hereafter."

The Domination of Enemies and Their Control over All Aspects of Muslim Life

Precisely and literally, and as one of the clearest signs of prophethood, the ummah has been afflicted by what he (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold. Abū Dāwūd narrated from Thawbān that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "The nations will soon summon one another to attack you as people when eating invite others to share their dish." Someone asked, "Will that be because of our small numbers at that time?" He replied, "No, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like the foam of the sea, and Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemy and will cast wahn into your hearts." Someone asked, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is wahn?" He replied, "Love of the world and dislike of death."

The Islamic world today is experiencing a state of complete domination by its enemies over all its resources and ways of life, in a horrific manner unprecedented in its history. This is manifested in several aspects, the most important of which are:

Transforming Muslim lands into an arena for plundering wealth and a market for disposing of enemy products

As for the plundering of wealth, a brief overview has been given. In summary, colonialism, led by America and Western Europe, supervises the extraction of oil and mineral wealth and other resources, then supervises their transportation, sets their prices, trades in them, and seizes their proceeds in their Judeo-Crusader banks.

In contrast, the colonizing West, in our lands which contain about one-fifth of the world's population, is turning them into a market for disposing of its products, starting with weapons, machinery, computers, and various technological products, and ending with ordinary consumer industries, such as various types of food, clothing, and manufactured consumer goods.

Muslims import from the West even underwear and slippers, even bread and toilet paper. Although the colonizing enemy imposes on the colonized countries, including the Islamic world, the prices of their mineral wealth and agricultural and animal products – which are the backbone of its industries and food resources, it even imposes the value of their purchasing currencies – at the same time, it imposes the highest prices and fees on its products exported to us. The tragedy reaches its peak when we learn that the West itself, led by America, is preventing the spread of modern manufacturing and technology, and even medium-level manufacturing in most of the Islamic world, so that we remain a market for disposing of its products. They even impose economic policies, development programs, and agricultural and livestock production plans, which are controlled in detail by the International Monetary Fund, so that our countries do not reach self-sufficiency in basic foodstuffs such as wheat, sugar, rice, and others. There are many glaring examples of this. For example, the International Monetary Fund prevented Sudan from starting a wheat self-sufficiency project after the Bashir government came to power. When it insisted, it was threatened with a halt to aid. America lured it with a supply of wheat for ten years with non-interest-bearing loans, and with quantities of food grants in the form of gifts without compensation! The purpose was clear: to turn fertile lands into barren lands unsuitable for cultivation, and to link the loaf of bread in Sudan to the American decision. It suffices to know that Egypt, which in the Roman era was sufficient for the Roman Empire in wheat, today lives on a reserve of American wheat that is sufficient for Egyptians to have bread for three months. This is not the place to list statistics and reports. In short, it can be said that the economic, food, and health situation of Islamic peoples is terrifying because of these policies.

Harnessing the Islamic workforce to serve the industries of the enemies

Because of the policies of starvation, siege, and governments of oppression, millions of workers, hundreds of thousands of scientists, intellectuals, and certificate holders have migrated from Muslim countries to Western countries, especially Europe and America, to fill huge gaps in the infrastructure of their factories at the lowest prices. Moreover, all Western capitalist countries, especially European ones, have established their factories specializing in simple and medium-sized industries in Muslim countries, especially in the fields of food, clothing, and consumer goods, under the name of the famous international brands affiliated with them, to benefit from the cheap labor in our countries without violating the strict rule imposed by them that these industries should not be of the level of technology so that these countries do not benefit from industrial expertise.

Indeed, the system of harnessing almost free labor by the West from the workforce in Islamic countries and Third World countries, especially non-Christian ones, has entered the military field since the First and Second World Wars. It suffices to know that the fuel for the huge battles that took place in North Africa and other arenas of confrontation between the Allied and Axis powers – such as the Battle of El Alamein and others – was from soldiers recruited from the colonies, most of which were Arab and Islamic countries. And to know that France lost in Vietnam in the battle of the fall of Dien Bien Phu, more than 16,000 special forces, including thousands of Algerians, Moroccans, and soldiers from African colonies, many of whom were Muslims. Today, the United Nations forces and peacekeeping forces in various areas of tension, especially in Islamic countries, are made up of soldiers, mercenaries, and volunteers from Muslims, or from military units contributed by the governments of their tyrannical deputies in our countries! And here is America today using the soldiers of some of our countries to invade other countries. And when it opens them, it forms from their sons a police force and soldiers, making them a shield for its soldiers, and using them to slaughter the sons of their own colonized country, as is happening now in Iraq.

The system of enslavement and harnessed labor to serve them has even reached the field of prostitution and entertainment in importing Muslim women to entertain the occupying colonial soldiers of our countries, as happened and some newspapers and media reported about the use by American and Western forces in the Second Gulf War, known as Desert Storm or the Liberation of Kuwait, of hundreds of prostitutes from some Arab countries who were brought in agreement with the governments of those countries to entertain American and Western forces during the breaks of the Desert Storm battles, while they were liberating Kuwait!

This new system of enslavement is a new invention to restore the system of slavery in a modern way that is compatible with the genius mentality of the civilization of what they call the white European-American race.

Seizure of Will in Favor of the Enemy

Under the Pharaonic regimes existing in Muslim countries, the ordinary citizen is deprived of will, subjugated by the authorities. Even the men of thought, culture, and social, political, and economic activities are deprived of their will in favor of the authorities' multi-branched repressive apparatuses. This calamity does not end here. Our governments themselves are deprived of their will in favor of the will of the colonizing enemy, especially America and its European allies under the new world order.

There are no commercial contracts, no arms system, no transfer of power, no democratic elections or military coups except under the supervision of the hidden, apparent master (America and its allies).

The examples also need specialized volumes on the political history of the Arab and Islamic region. One example of this is:

i. Hafez al-Assad died in Syria in 2000. Madeleine Albright, the Jewish American Secretary of State, attended and supervised the transfer of power. She traveled between Cairo, Amman, Damascus, and Tel Aviv, and did not leave the region until she stated in a press conference with all audacity that America was satisfied with the transfer of power in Syria! This is because Hafez al-Assad had arranged for his eldest son Bassel to succeed him, and arranged future oil contracts, and signed a secret normalization agreement with Israel, and other conspiracies in his name. But Bassel was snatched by fate and died in a car crash suddenly. His uncle, Rifaat al-Assad, aspired to seize power and was supported by some Nusayri leaders. Some Sunni officers from the ruling Ba'ath Party also aspired to power. But Hafez al-Assad, in arrangement with America and its allies, summoned his younger son Bashar, who was studying in Britain. The constitution was amended to reduce the age of the president from 40 years to Bashar's age of 36 years, and the Syrian parliament voted in an emergency session that lasted only half an hour to obtain consensus on Bashar's succession when his father died, under Albright's supervision, despite the displeasure of the majority of the ruled Sunni sect and the minority of the ruling Nusayri sect alike.

ii. Similarly, without going into details outside the scope of the book, we mention what happened with the succession of King Hussein despite the displeasure of the Hashemite family. He excluded his brother and his crown prince for more than forty years, Prince Hassan, and appointed his son Abdullah. The constitution was also amended to remove conditions that stood in the way of his appointment as king, and all this was done during the last minutes of King Hussein's life.

iii. This includes the assassination of King Faisal in Saudi Arabia when he did not adhere in some of his positions to what his father had pledged of loyalty on the deck of the American battleship to Roosevelt!

iv. This includes the assassination of Pakistani President Zia-ul-Haq and the supervision of the appointment of successive leaders in Pakistan, leading to the American coup that brought Pervez Musharraf to oversee the overthrow of the Taliban. Then America supervised the restoration of an American model of democracy in Pakistan to follow the game of its invasion of Pakistan, Central Asia, and the Middle East. As we said, the examples are many and the space is limited. It suffices to know that among the information obtained by Iranian students when they occupied the American embassy shortly after Khomeini's revolution in 1979, the American intelligence agency (CIA) was paying more than 250,000 monthly salaries to agents in the Middle East, ranging from heads of state to ministers and ruling and opposition party and political leaders. The ranks of the agents range from businessmen and artists to street sweepers! This is from the world of politics.

And among the examples from the world of economics, besides politics:

v. The Saudi government wanted to withdraw large sums from its deposits for some of its internal projects. The American government objected, arguing that the American economy could not withstand it. During a visit to America, Fahd was unable to obtain approval from Reagan and returned unsuccessful. Whereas, the Reagan administration wanted to reduce Iran's oil revenues during the First Gulf War with Iraq. Reagan telephoned Fahd and asked him to reduce the price of a barrel of oil from \$40 to \$15 per barrel. In order for Saudi Arabia to maintain its revenues—or more precisely, for Jewish American banks to maintain their income from Saudi deposits—he ordered an increase in daily production from 5 million to 10 million barrels. Thus, Saudi Arabia lost  $10,000,000 \times -25 = -250$  million dollars. This is in addition to the billions of dollars in losses it caused for all oil-exporting Muslim countries, as every time the sun rose and set, Muslim money was drained, while millions of them were dying from hunger. Indeed, all oil-exporting countries in the world suffered losses along with it, and this cost Reagan nothing but a phone call!

vi. As for the intervention of international financial institutions in the financial and economic policies of Arab and Islamic countries, it is too well-known for us to cite examples.

The matter has reached a point today where the Islamic Ummah has lost its will, and the enemy has stolen this will, that it extends to the most private sphere of the Ummah, which is the curricula of education and teaching. America and the West are interfering in these today, and they have the power to delete and add to them! The matter has even reached the sermons in the mosques! And the rope is still on the grinder.

So the Islamic Ummah is deprived of its will before its rulers, and its rulers have no will before their enemies.

Direct and indirect military occupation of all the countries of the Islamic world

The Islamic world today is occupied by various types of Kuffār: Jews, Crusaders, Hindus, atheists, and polytheists either directly or indirectly.

Many regions are languishing under direct occupation, such as the Philippines, parts of Indonesia and Burma, parts of India and Kashmir, Eastern Turkestan, the Islamic provinces in Russia, the Caucasus and Chechnya, the Balkans, Bosnia and Kosovo, Palestine and parts of the Levant, and spots of the Maghreb and Iraq, last but not least and Sudan, which seems to have its turn and the indications of placing Syria and Egypt, and spots of the Arabian Peninsula on the list as well.

As for the rest of the countries of the Islamic world, they are under indirect occupation by the Western Crusader countries, through the deputation of apostate rulers, and by the entrenchment of the economic occupation of the major capitalist monopolies. And by the spread of land, sea, and air military bases in all its parts, and by the network of foreign intelligence offices, especially the (CIA) and (FBI), which have spread in all Muslim countries, openly or under the guise of various organizations and institutions.

Cultural and intellectual subordination to the enemy:

Because of the manifestations of military, economic, political, and security occupation that tied the Ummah to the wheel of the infidel Crusader-Jewish enemy in all fields, came the role of intellectual, cultural, and social colonization where laws are enacted, plans are made, treaties are concluded, and the media, education, teaching, and culture are programmed to Westernize our societies and reshape and restructure them according to the whim of the colonizer. Sometimes in the name of human rights, sometimes in the name of women's liberation, sometimes in the name of cultural normalization, sometimes in the name of social development, and other times to modernize educational curricula, and for programs to reshape societies and so on.

Until the enemy's interference extended to the curricula of children in primary school and beyond. Where the United Nations and UNESCO programs interfere, as well as the embassies of Western countries, in determining what is permissible and what is not permissible in the study materials. The intervention of tyrannical governments, by the orders of their masters, has even reached the point of determining what is said and what is not said in Friday sermons, to the point that they have forbidden mentioning Jews and Christians negatively in them, even in Saudi Arabia! The alleged land of Tawhīd.

Not to mention what is allowed to be published and what is not allowed in newspapers, magazines, and all aspects of intellectual and literary activity. The West has forced the governments of our countries to sign treaties on social programs that are incompatible with the foundations of our religion, customs, and traditions. The news of the war of ideas declared by the American Secretary of Defense (Rumsfeld) is no longer hidden from anyone. This is in addition to the fever of imitating the West, by choice, that has become rampant in our societies, in their ways of thinking, living, their ways of eating, dressing, and even building their bathrooms and toilets!

In Summary:

In short, this is some of the realities of Muslims during the last seven decades of the twentieth century, in which the affliction progressed since the fall of the Khilāfah and the fragmentation of Muslim lands into colonies under Crusader occupation, and then the subsequent stage of the so-called "governments of independence" until the affliction reached its peak after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the singularity of America and its allies in Europe (NATO) in launching what was called the "New World Order" since the early nineties and until today.

It was supposed that the bearers of Islam and its guardians, the scholars, preachers, and what were called the groups of the Islamic awakening and the jihadi movements, would stand up to all these collapses but as we will detail in the coming chapters, the last four decades have witnessed a difficult labor, the conclusion of which was that most of the scholars of the known religious structure of Ahl al-Sunnah in all countries of the Islamic world were distributed either in the labyrinths of hypocrisy towards the rulers and entering into lame justifications in order to justify their betrayals of religion and their collaboration with the new colonizers, or in the burrows of helplessness and contrived justifications, in order to avoid paying the price of enjoining good and forbidding evil and speaking the truth in the presence of unjust, impious, oppressive, infidel rulers.

As for what was called the Islamic awakening, which started shortly after the fall of the Khilāfah, it emerged from its clashes with the governments of its countries with clipped nails and domesticated, divided among the political and partisan formations called "Islamic"! To find places for themselves in the middle of the road with Jāhiliyyah, after having shed most of their principles, slogans, programs, and the ideas of their early founders, may Allah have mercy on them. So that its slogan changed from being "Allah is our goal, the Messenger is our role model, the Qur'an is our constitution, Jihād is our path, and death in the way of Allah is our highest aspiration" to become as if it were "Parliament is its goal, Western democracy is its role model, the secular constitution is its constitution and it swears by it, elections are its path, and winning seats in governments of disbelief is its highest aspiration!!".

As for the creedal awakening to return Muslims to what the righteous predecessors were upon, its efforts were distributed in the dialectics of research and preoccupation with combating types of Bid'ah and combating graves and the dead. It ended in Irjā' and the sanctification of kings and guardians of affairs and combating their opponents, and it took its share of seeking parliaments as well.

As for the reformist, Sufi, and Tablīghī groups they became more absurd and distant from the reality of Muslims.

As for the armed jihadi movement and its organizations in many Arab and Islamic countries. It has done well and offered its best since the early sixties, and its members have sacrificed in an atmosphere of the sitting back of the awakening and its betrayal, and the sitting back of the general public of the Ummah and their loss and bewilderment. The enemy singled them out, and its pioneers and Mujāhidīn recorded their names in the records of the martyrs, prisoners, and displaced in the way of Allah, to be witnesses of a new ditch against a vanquished, sitting, fragmented Ummah. An Ummah most of whose people have forgotten Allah, so He made them forget themselves and afflicted them with the hardship of life, and governments disbelieving in Allah, judging by the laws of His enemies, and scholars who were the main reason for anesthetizing this Ummah, between a hypocrite and a helpless person and preachers of what was called the Islamic awakening, many of whom ended up as preachers at the gates of Hell. Thus, the governments of the Pharaohs singled out the remnants of the Jihādīs, slaughtering, imprisoning, torturing, displacing, and oppressing them.

The Jihād centers collapsed one after another, and the twentieth century did not end until most of the Jihādī attempts were fragmented and scattered, with the remaining pioneers who remained steadfast on the path sharing the labyrinths of migration, displacement, and alienation, experiencing the greatest pursuit of the people of truth known to human history.

The twentieth century ended, and the second millennium AD ended, to welcome the twenty-first century and its third millennium, and for America and its allies from Europe (NATO) to open it with plans that made Islam and Muslims their strategic and historical enemy, existing and coming. And to adopt its policies on the principles of the conflict of Western Christian civilization with the civilization of Islam and Muslims. And for the third Crusades to be launched clearly and openly.

The world woke up to the sound of the explosions of September 11, before the first year of the twenty-first century ended. And we started what was called "the post-September world".

So what is the reality of Muslims today in light of the conditions of this world??

The Reality of Muslims Today in the Post-September 11, 2001 World

As I mentioned in the introduction, the conditions we are living in today in the Islamic world after the events of September 11 are not at all the result of that limited event, even if it was great. What we are in is a stage whose turn came according to the plans of the Americans, the Europeans, and their Jewish masters. They are chapters of the requirements of the New World Order that was launched in the early nineties, after the dismantling of the Warsaw Pact and the entry of its components into NATO, and the beginning of the phase of the unipolar (American-Jewish) world that wants to manage the world's affairs.

Therefore, our saying "the reality of Muslims after September" is from the point of view of chronological history and not a conviction of what America wants to convince the world of, that what we are in is a result of September.

Sufficient evidence of this is what has been published of Zionist plans about the Jews' determination to complete the occupation of Palestine and demolish the Al-Aqsa Mosque, expel the remaining Palestinians from it, and impose a policy of comprehensive normalization with its neighbors from the rulers of the Arabs and Muslims. This normalization, whose plans were announced at the Madrid Conference in 1991.

Among the evidence of this is also what was published about the American programs to reoccupy the Middle East and control the oil resources in it and in Central Asia. And the formation of rapid intervention forces in America for this purpose since the days of Carter in 1973. And the subsequent declared American colonial policies.

The current security storm that America is stirring up and what it has called the "global war on terror" is nothing but the implementation of the programs of the security conferences that were launched in 1990 and followed at a rate of a global or regional conference every three months; such as the Barcelona, Paris, Milan, and Sharm el-Sheikh conferences and the meetings of Arab interior ministers in Tunis, Jeddah, and Cairo every six months. And the security conferences of the Mediterranean countries in which Europe, Arab rulers, Israel, and America participated, despite its distance from the Mediterranean! Then the sequence of security conferences in Asia and Africa.

Among the evidence of this campaign before September is that the number of public FBI offices in the Middle East reached 23 before 2001, in Riyadh, Amman, Khartoum, Tunis, Morocco and others. This is in addition to the hundreds of secret CIA offices.

As I said, we are now living in a state of programmed American-Jewish media exploitation. And media hype about September, its repercussions, and its owners, in order to justify their aggression and convince the world of the opposite of the truth, which indicates that September and other operations, as well as the Intifāḍah and other acts of resistance are nothing but reactions to aggression and not initial aggression, as they have convinced most of the world, and even many Muslims.

If we want to summarize the statement about the reality of Muslims today after September 2001, we say that their conditions have worsened and deteriorated under all the titles we mentioned previously, from the loss of their religion and their worldly affairs and the dominance of the enemies over them.

In the loss of their religion, the governments' insistence and justifications for changing the laws and fighting Islam have increased. The state of occupation of the holy sites has also increased frankly. The wave of corruption of beliefs, the spread of Bid'ah, and the madness of debauchery and misguidance have worsened, due to the ferocity of the media attack and the spread of satellite channels aimed at policies of corruption. The alienation of the believers, the Mujāhidīn, and those who enjoin good and forbid evil has increased due to the ferocity of the security attack.

As for under the title of the loss of the world: today we are not facing the continued theft of wealth by trickery and proxy, but rather a state of reoccupation of the sources of wealth. As for the maldistribution of wealth, injustice, oppression, humiliation, fear, killing, and violation of honor, its frightening rates have increased, and it has spread where it did not exist before September. In societies that were more secure and stable, such as the societies of the Arabian Gulf and Muslim countries far from the center of the Middle East, such as the countries of Asia and Islamic Africa.

As for the dominance of the enemies, it is the declared characteristic of the post-September world, steeped in aggression. There are no longer governments' wills and peoples' privacies. The program today is a comprehensive reoccupation. This is if we want to summarize. But we should shed light, from the point of view of brief history, and from the point of view of useful description, in order to stir up the motives of resistance in the Ummah. This is by mentioning some of what befell Muslims after the events of September 11, 2001. And the most important of this, in short, is:

The destruction of the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan

America and its allies had announced their policy and their will to overthrow the Taliban government in Afghanistan since mid-1997. The pace of their intentions increased over time, and they took economic and political measures for this, such as the siege, sanctions, and threats of invasion and war. Until the events of September came, they put their intentions into practice. And with Western cooperation, especially from Britain and Europe (NATO). And amid international silence and explicit betrayal by Arab and Islamic governments, especially the governments of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Iran, the Taliban government was overthrown in December 2001 through an American military campaign. At the forefront of which, on the ground, moved the forces of the apostate collaborators in Afghanistan, who entered Kabul under the protection of American planes. Thus, the only nascent experiment to establish an Islamic state since the fall of the Ottoman Khilāfah was aborted. America installed a puppet government in Kabul to turn Afghanistan into an American fortress from which it controls the entire region in Central Asia, which is of economic and strategic importance.

The attempt to exterminate the elite of the Jihādī awakening in the Islamic world

It is known that the establishment of the Islamic Emirate and the consolidation of the Taliban's rule, in light of international conditions in which the attack of the West and its allies on the armed Jihādī movement was escalating, since its disintegration in Afghanistan in 1992, and the subsequent liquidation of its pockets in Bosnia and Chechnya, and the closure of their safe havens temporarily in Europe, Sudan, Yemen, Turkey, and some Arab countries, made the remaining elite of the Jihādī movement naturally flee to Afghanistan, to which many Mujāhidīn from Central Asia also took refuge.

America used the events of September as a cover, and the destruction of the Islamic Emirate as a means. In order to achieve its goal of slaughtering the remaining elite of this Jihādī movement, which represents the last line of defense of the Ummah of Islam for itself in this unfortunate time.

And through battles of savage aerial bombardment. And the fierce attacks of the Afghan apostates who overthrew the Islamic government, America and its allies inflicted heavy losses on the Arab Mujāhidīn and the Mujāhidīn from Central Asia and Pakistan, in terms of deaths and prisoners. The Pakistani government, headed by Musharraf, added a horrific chapter to the massacre. Where it killed dozens on its territory and captured several hundred Mujāhidīn and handed them over to America. Amidst the shameful silence and apathy of the Islamic street in Pakistan, despite the cooperation shown by some righteous Pakistani brothers that saved what could be saved of those who were displaced across Pakistan and Iran, and were able to redistribute in the world, catching their breath after the grinding battles and the blind pursuit [see the details of this in the book: Musharraf's Pakistan - The Problem, the Solution, and the Appointed Obligation]

This attack on Afghanistan was accompanied by a fierce attack and American-Russian cooperation to liquidate the Mujāhidīn in Chechnya. Which succeeded to a large extent. After another Western-American campaign had succeeded in liquidating the Mujāhidīn in Bosnia in 1995. America continued the campaign in an attempt to liquidate the armed pockets in the Philippines, Yemen, the Horn of Africa, and wherever it could after it had clipped their main thorn in Afghanistan. The confrontation with the Jews in the vicinity of Bayt al-Maqdis continued for about three years.

The American security storm against Islām and Muslims worldwide under the pretext of combating terrorism after the events of September

This is a title under which entire books, indeed volumes, could be written, to enumerate the history and events of this barbaric and unjust attack on Islām and Muslims. They have been planning for it over the past three decades, exploiting the events of September. The space here does not allow for detail, but I will mention the most important events in headlines:

The elimination of most of the armed jihādī current at the level of groups, leaderships, figures, organizations, supporters, and loyalists through declared and secret assassinations, kidnapping, and capture operations. This included transferring detainees to the American Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba, or its scattered prisons in its American bases in Afghanistan and in various parts of the world, or in cooperation with the governments of ridda (apostasy) and their major prisons, the doors of which are wide open for Muslim youth in this time. Especially governments with a long history of combating jihād, Islām and Muslims, such as the governments of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Syria, Turkey, Pakistan, Tunisia, Algeria, etc. This campaign has affected many innocents, even from the “jihādī accusation”, if one may say so.

The attempt to eliminate the entire spectrum of the Islamic awakening, politically, in terms of da‘wa, and socially, within its broad general framework, under the pretext of combating terrorism and cutting off the roots of fundamentalism that form an incubator for it. Indeed, the campaign has affected everything attributed to Islām and Islamic identity. This includes humanitarian Islamic relief institutions, social organizations, commercial companies, Islamic banks, groups, and parties, even Islamic banks that are half-usurious. This affliction has even affected ordinary individuals who were assaulted by the Americans because they were wealthy Muslims, a target of American piracy, all under the exploitation of the name of terrorism and the campaign to combat it.

The beginning of a gradual plan to eliminate Islamic and Arab communities and their presence in the West. The US and all European countries have enacted laws to combat immigration and political asylum, and even martial laws that allow them to arrest foreigners, detain them, withdraw their citizenship if they are naturalized, and cancel their official residency if they are residents, while arresting them for open-ended periods without directing any charge. These are martial laws far more ferocious than the martial laws enacted by military coup governments in the Third World. Even the most established democratic countries like Britain, the Scandinavian countries, and France were not spared from this. Amid this frenzy and madness, which was accompanied by a directed media wave from media outlets controlled by Jews and Crusaders through television, newspapers, films, and all means of publication and media. Racist crimes have also increased. One statistic in Europe stated that these racist attacks on Muslims increased after September during the year 2002 by 66% compared to the previous year. During this week in which I am making corrections and final additions to the book, and we are in (November 2004), twenty mosques and Islamic centers were burned in the Netherlands within ten days!

Mosques were burned, bombs exploded on Islamic centers, members of Muslim communities were killed and others injured, and veiled women were assaulted. Some Hindus were even killed in America, with the rabble there believing them to be Muslims because they wear Hindu turbans! This is besides the spread of other aggressions such as insults, curses, beatings in the streets, and sending threatening messages.

America, through enticement and intimidation by all means, forced all countries of the world to join its campaign to combat terrorism. Their Secretary of State (Colin Powell) and their diplomatic and security ambassadors toured the world, making security treaties and police agreements here and there in all parts of the earth. America obligated the governments of Arab and Islamic countries to cooperate fully in the campaign under the threat of military power. Some Arab heads of state even declared this, such as the presidents of Yemen and Egypt.

America also disregarded all voices of opposition from human rights organizations, international bodies, or public figures, despite the large number of objectors to its violations of all international laws and human rights regulations, its mistreatment of prisoners and detainees, its recklessness during its military operations killing civilians, and the scandals of its historical prison in Guantanamo. It ignored all of this regardless of its source, whether from Muslim countries, Europe, its allied countries, or even from within America.

The launch of the Third Crusade towards the occupation of the Middle East

Bush publicly stated this, that he was engaged in a Crusade, and then he apologized foolishly, claiming it was a slip of the tongue. Then, more slips of the tongue followed, by his assistants, as well as statements from ministers and military leaders of some NATO countries to that effect, not to mention thousands of newspaper articles and statements from various sources. Thus, hatred appeared from their mouths, and what their hearts conceal is greater.

America has taken the project of occupying Iraq as the beginning of a program to redraw the region's map politically and geographically. Indeed, information has been revealed about projects to divide the Levant, Iraq, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and even Turkey and Iran. This includes plans to occupy some of them directly. This coincides with a major American program to control Central Asia, starting from Afghanistan and Pakistan. America has gradually adopted flimsy excuses in order to occupy Iraq as a gateway to encroach on the Middle East, starting with the necessity of overthrowing Saddam, and ending with the destruction of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, which were not found. I am not here to chronicle the details of what is happening, which is well known.

It suffices to say that all the details clearly point to a Crusader occupation campaign led by America, Britain, and Israel, with the cooperation of all European NATO countries, Russia, and America's allies in the region, foremost among them India, Turkey, Pakistan, and the rulers of Islamic countries. All this amid frightening international silence and apathy.

Expanding NATO and raising the slogans of the Crusades

NATO held its conference in November 2002, chaired by Bush and the heads of 19 European countries, in order to include several Eastern European countries, after having proposed the inclusion of Russia in another conference a few months earlier. During the ceremony, Aznar, the [right-wing Crusader] Prime Minister of Spain, stated that Russia's entry into the alliance strengthens the identity and ideological spirit of the alliance, a clear reference to the Crusader orientation.

Thus, the Crusader world today is preparing, under the leadership of America and the membership of Western Europe and those who have joined them from Eastern Europe, to begin the main phase of the Third Crusades, which began in 1990 with the Desert Storm war, after the dismantling of the Soviet Union. NATO, under the leadership of America, is moving in this campaign towards the Middle East, after the number of its members reached 26 countries in early 2004, most of them European.

Expanding the European Union on Crusader foundations as well

This is being done by gradually including the rest of the Eastern European countries. Also noteworthy is highlighting the Christian identity of the European Union by rejecting Turkey's membership in the alliance, despite its begging at its door for several years, and despite the secularism of its government, because its people are Muslim. The last meeting of the Union in December 2002, chaired by Denmark, postponed consideration of its membership until late 2004. Former French President d'Estaing summarized the reason frankly by saying: "The European Union includes Christian countries, and if we accept Turkey, we must ask about the borders of Europe." The population of the European Union countries now stands at 450 million!

The launch of the great Jewish Talmudic program

Under the auspices of Sharon, who is moving in a state of political, religious, and social unity in Israel around this project, which includes the demolition of al-Aqsa Mosque and the expulsion of the remaining Palestinian Arabs after carrying out horrific massacres against them, as some leaked news indicates.

The Jews brought Sharon, who headed a national unity government, to confront the intifāda, which broke out fiercely and moved to armed confrontation with the Jews, since 2000, and adopted the method of martyrdom operations that have claimed the lives of more than 400 dead and hundreds of wounded Jews through about seventy martyrdom operations so far.

These days, a series of horrific massacres of Palestinians are being carried out by the Jewish army amid open American support, implicit European support, and shameful international silence, and traitorous Arab cooperation, especially from the governments of Jordan and Egypt. The harmony appears complete between the Zionist project, which requires a large American and Crusader presence to support the military movement of the small-numbered Israeli army, and the Crusader project, which requires Israeli cooperation on the military level, and global Jewish support on the financial, political, and media levels.

The absence of any international opposition to this blatant American arrogance

Except for fragments launched timidly by some countries such as China, Germany, France, and some Russian positions from time to time. These positions can be considered diplomatic plays, displays of restlessness and asserting presence, and seeking a larger share in the dish of Muslims that America oversees the distribution of its portions, rather than taking them seriously. The evidence is abundant, and there is not enough space to expand with more political analysis here.

The Conditions of Arabs and Muslims Under This International Situation

After the Events of September

At the Official Level of Arab and Islamic Governments:

The last summits of the Arab and Islamic leagues clearly summarized the situation in the post-September world. The conference attendees departed from these shameful meetings after prolonged disagreements, and the state of the ummah could be summed up with the saying:

"The wolf is not blamed for its aggression if the shepherd is the enemy of the sheep."

As for the famous Arab summit of 2002, the most prominent aspect of it and its objectives was:

The adoption of the Saudi Crown Prince (Prince Abdullah bin Abdulaziz)'s initiative, which offered Israel full Arab normalization in exchange for its withdrawal from the lands it occupied in 1967.

Israel's response came early, even before the conclusion of the summit's meetings. The Israeli army stormed the West Bank and reoccupied it! They carried out wide-scale massacres targeting the administrative and security infrastructure of the Palestinian Authority, as well as the infrastructure of Palestinian organizations, leaving hundreds of innocent victims and thousands of prisoners. Refugee camps were completely destroyed.

Regarding the initiative, Israel accepted half of it, the normalization, but rejected the other half, the withdrawal demanded in exchange. It embarrassed Prince Abdullah and his Kingdom of Saudi Arabia by asking him to visit Israel or allow their president to visit Saudi Arabia to discuss the initiative if he was serious about it!

As for the subsequent Islamic Summit, aside from its welcoming of the new Afghan delegation of apostates and collaborators appointed by America, the conference ended with similar resolutions, including:

- Support for the Saudi initiative, now adopted by the Arab League for normalization with the Jews, and condemnation of the Jewish aggression without offering anything in return.
- Betrayal of Palestine and Al-Quds, without presenting any serious projects for them.
- Endorsement of the American campaign against terrorism and reaffirmation that the Islam represented by the apostate rulers of over 52 Muslim countries rejects “violence and terrorism”, which is the new global term for jihad and the right of resistance!

The Arab and Islamic situation has been deteriorating since September 2001.

Arab and Islamic countries, especially Turkey, Pakistan, the Gulf States, and Jordan, offered their lands, seas, skies, and armies to serve the American and British campaign to occupy Iraq. Hundreds of thousands of soldiers, hundreds of aircraft, warships, carriers, and military equipment flooded the region. At the same time, the US made threats about attacking Iran, Syria, and Lebanon, dividing Saudi Arabia, and preparing to disarm Pakistan. The audacity and blackmail reached such extremes that the US leaked information about their intention to seize all financial deposits of the Saudi government and citizens in American banks—an astronomical amount in billions of dollars—under the pretext of supporting terrorism.

These conditions only led the Islamic governments to further submission, falling at the doorsteps of the White House. Qatar hosted the US military leadership that was transferred from Florida to manage the invasion of Iraq from its land. The Jordanian army carried out military drills with four thousand US soldiers in the area extending from the Gulf of Aqaba to the Iraqi border shortly before the invasion. Then it was revealed that American forces crossed into Iraq from the west via Jordan! The entire Gulf Cooperation Council supported the war, helping in it, while most of their leaders were absent from the Gulf Cooperation Council summit in Qatar just days before, avoiding responsibility for the announced positions. Kuwait made 60% of its northern territory a military area for the American-British army’s training and logistical services! Over 1,400,000 American soldiers and 45,000 British soldiers passed through it. One-third of it was left for the rest and relaxation of the troops. President Bashar al-Assad of Syria flew to London and European capitals to reassure himself that his regime would be safeguarded amid the earthquakes of the Iraq war and the fires of the Palestinian Intifada. Iran stirred up Shiite opposition in Iraq between Tehran, London, and Washington. Pakistan, like other Islamic governments, hunted down Arab mujahideen and the Taliban, handing them over to America.

Then America invaded Iraq, entered Baghdad, and its soldiers destroyed everything in their path. Then America declared Iraq under occupation, supported by Europe, and authorized by the United Nations! They appointed a puppet government there and forced Arab countries and the Arab League to recognize it.

Then Bush summoned President Ben Ali of Tunisia to convey American orders to the Arab leaders in preparation for the Arab summit in Tunisia, and Arab foreign ministers met, quarreling over their failure to coordinate their positions regarding Bush's demands. The 2004 Arab summit resulted in expected emptiness, without any meaningful resolutions, after public pressure. Thus, the Arab system declared bankruptcy, and each leader continued to chase after Bush's administration, with the common factor being their rush to combat terrorism to please America and the White House.

By the end of 2004, the Arab and Islamic intelligence agencies were still working side by side with the FBI and CIA in combating the "terrorism" of Islam and Muslims, from Syria to Egypt, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Saudi Arabia, and the rest of the Muslim world. Everyone was at America's service. A thorough history and documentation of these events would require many volumes.

At the Level of Islamic Scholars

Alas for those who are claimed to be "scholars" of the Muslims!

To summarize briefly a topic that disgusts the soul and fills it with pain:

The hypocrites among them became even more hypocritical after September, and the silent, fearful ones among them remained silent.

The scholars of the rulers openly declared their hypocrisy, even on the pulpits of Friday sermons in the Grand Mosque of Mecca, the Prophet's Mosque in Medina, and in the major mosques of Arab and Islamic capitals from Cairo to Damascus to Casablanca and beyond. They attacked jihad and the mujahideen, defended the rulers, and called for the sanctity of the blood of the infidel invaders! These sermons were broadcast on television, where the imams were calling for the fight against terrorism, urging the pursuit of its perpetrators, cutting off their financial resources, and praying to Allah to expose them and save the Muslims from their evil. They urged the rulers to pursue them and eradicate their roots, while promoting the rights of infidels that Islam protects in Muslim lands, and confusing legal rulings on types of infidels, dhimmis, and those granted safety, etc.

This is a state of abasement, pleading, and hypocrisy toward the enemies, a propaganda campaign that fills the ears with praise but stabs the hearts with pain and freezes the tears in the eyes with regret and sorrow. Allah's verses are mocked, twisted, and misinterpreted, and the hadiths of the Prophet (peace be upon him) are distorted and manipulated to serve Bush!

The ranks of the scholars who are agents (‘ulamā’ ‘umalā’) raced each other on satellite television screens, competing in a marathon of hypocrisy and betrayal. As an example of how far the affliction has reached, one of the famous Muslim scholars in the land of the Two Holy Mosques, ‘Ā’id al-Qarnī, came out to denounce and exclaim on the MBC satellite channel, commenting on the events of September: "Did the religion command us to kill people? Did it command us to destroy buildings?! Why don't we focus on inviting them to Islam?! Why don't we invite members of the American Congress to Islam? A few years and they will enter the religion of Allah!"

Does this poor man—who had demanded the necessity of capturing the martyred hero Khattāb and his fellow mujāhid hero Shāmil Bāsāyīf, the heroes of jihād in Chechnya, for the bloodshed of Muslims they caused because they were fighting the Russians!—Does he know that statistics indicate that 85% of the members of Congress are Jews or married to Jewish women! And that most of the remaining fifteen percent are fanatical Crusaders and followers of the Evangelical Church, who believe that their Messiah will not appear until after a great massacre that eradicates the green of the Muslims? I think he does not know. Mujāhid brothers from the Arabian Peninsula told us that he wore a military uniform and led the Saudi forces stationed on the borders of Iraq, under the command of Schwarzkopf and under the flags of America, during the days of Desert Storm, and he addressed them, exclaiming: "Go forth, O custodian of the Two Holy Mosques (khādim al-ḥaramayn), and we pledge allegiance to you for jihād!" So how can someone like this know the state of Congress?

Meetings followed with his counterpart, Sheikh Saʿd al-Burayk, who exerted all his efforts on Saudi satellite channels to convince Muslims that Allah subḥānahu wa taʿālā only created the Arabian Peninsula for the polytheists! And to prove that the mujāhidīn, for him and his masters, are the dogs of Hell.

As for the one who deserves the title "devil of the scholars" with all merit, he is the hypocritical, vile, and perverted Sheikh ʿAbd al-Muḥsin al-ʿUbaykān. His lack of shame—may Allah subḥānahu wa taʿālā disgrace him—reached the point where he followed a series of episodes on Saudi satellite channels and on the Lebanese-managed MBC channel funded by Saudi Arabia, where he went on to say in support of the agent government of ʿAllāwī, after the latter's visit to Saudi Arabia: "he is a legitimate waliyy al-ʿamr whose obedience is obligatory". When the questioner said to him, "But America is the one who appointed him and imposed him!" he said: "Even if the infidels appoint a waliyy al-ʿamr for the lands of the Muslims, he is a legitimate imām whose obedience is obligatory.” I do not know, in truth, according to what religion such fatwās are issued, which are not accepted even by the religion of the Magians or the worshippers of cows. All peoples and religions denounce a ruler appointed by the enemy and consider him illegitimate, even the laws of Europe and the United Nations. Therefore, they consider him temporary and not legitimate. As for this misguided misleader, he considers him a legitimate imām! Then, when the questioner asked him about the permissibility of resisting the American soldiers for their aggression, he said to him—and consider: "They [Americans] are defending themselves against those who attack them in Iraq! And they do not strike those who do not strike them!"

Imagine the legitimacy of American defense, armed to the teeth, against a civilian Iraqi defending himself! Such examples are just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to the shameful role of the scholars-for-hire in this crusade. Shaykh Tantawi of Al-Azhar has his own contributions, claiming that the French ban on the hijab is an internal matter and that Muslims should not intervene! Scholars from Syria, Morocco, Pakistan, and other non-Arab Muslim lands are no less adept in hypocrisy and submission to their rulers than their Arab counterparts.

On the Islamic Awakening (Sahwah)

Following the news of the Islamic Awakening<sup>5</sup>, its leaders, parties, youth, and media, one can hardly find anything except debates, endless discussions, and interviews on television. They speak against terrorism with weak criticism of the Americans, while cautiously hinting at their rulers and gently patting their backs. You will find the leaders of the Islamic Awakening in the seats of parliaments that legislate without

Allah's rule, and in ministries in the governments of disbelief, ruling by what Allah has not revealed.

On the Situation of the Muslim Ummah after September

Ironically, while writing this book, I heard the sounds of gunfire, fireworks, music, and shouting. I wondered if perhaps Jerusalem had suddenly been liberated! Or India had withdrawn from Kashmir! When I went out to check the news, I found it was the Muslims celebrating the arrival of the New Year of the Christian calendar, 2003!

This is the state of the Muslims these days, and their situation only reflects increasing confusion, loss, defeat, and destruction. Without hope in Allah and the promises of His Messenger (peace be upon him), despair would have set in. But Allah's grace and the hope in faith remain.

I truly do not know what else this ummah needs before it mobilizes for jihād?!

What is more than the cries for help from Jerusalem and the call of its al-Aqsa Mosque?! What is more than the al-Aqsa Intifada and what it offered?! What is more than Afghanistan and what it gave?! What is more than the news of Chechnya and its excellent performance?! And Bosnia and Kosovo and what they endured? And what the media puts in every home of news of affliction upon Muslims everywhere?!

What shakes the ummah's being and moves its conscience more than the sound of the September explosions?! The scene of the falcons of Islam and its martyrs tearing apart the symbol of America's arrogance and tyranny, storming the fires of the explosion with their pure bodies? What is more than the scene of twenty-five young women and widows of Chechnya, in the prime of their youth, strapping explosives to their bodies, engaging in jihād in the heart of Moscow?

Shame on the turbans, and disgrace on the mustaches and beards! The young women of the Muslims have carried the machine guns and gone out for jihād against the Russians in the very heart of Russia, in Moscow!

What stirs the conscience more than the images of Palestinian children, some of them younger than six years old, confronting tanks and chasing after Jewish soldiers? What is more than the scenes of massive American and British military landings in Muslim lands, and the announcements of the destruction of Iraq and programs for occupying the lands and the people?! What?! And what?!

What is more than the scenes of death, destruction, disgrace, and calamities that television screens put in every Muslim home? They watch them and switch between them and lewd movies, cartoons, fashion shows, sports matches, dance and music parties, and "Star Academy" competitions?!

Souls have died, and consciences have rotted. {No! Rather, the stain has covered their hearts of that which they were earning.}

The Islamic street is dull and still, except for some demonstrations here and some cries of denunciation there. Signs of movement have not yet appeared. Hope in Allah's promise is great, and perhaps what the pharaohs fear and warn America about today will come true that its invasion of Iraq and its military and security campaigns will fertilize the soil of terrorism, as they claim.

We ask Allah to make their omen true and to frustrate their endeavors.

As a comprehensive description of the reality of the Muslims, we must mention that seeds of resistance are sprouting here and there in the form of limited operations and individual initiatives, East and West.

Initiatives are few! But discontent is overwhelming, the atmosphere is charged, and the revolutionary climate is heating up, promising to reach the heat of jihād, by Allah's grace and then by the tyranny of the Americans, the ferocity of Jewish hatred, the greed of the Crusader campaigns, and the exposure of the pharaohs' nakedness and the fall of the last of their fig leaves.

This resistance heralds the birth of the sun of hope. A sun of which almost nothing remains as evidence of its certain rising except the lights of the dawn of true tidings, and a glimmer of hope in the jihād operations of these mujāhidīn. The promise is true, and there is no doubt:

{Allah has promised those of you who believe and do righteous deeds that He will surely grant them succession [to authority] upon the earth just as He granted it to those before them. He will surely establish for them their religion which He has approved for them, and He will surely replace their fear with security. "They worship Me, associating nothing with Me." But whoever disbelieves after that - then those are the defiantly disobedient} (An-Nur: 55). And Allah the Almighty has spoken the truth: *{And We wanted to confer favor upon those who were oppressed in the land and make them leaders and make them inheritors * And establish them in the land and show Pharaoh and Haman and their soldiers through them that which they had feared}* (Al-Qasas: 5-6).

The state of the patient ones is close to what heralds relief: {Until, when the messengers despaired and were certain that they had been denied, there came to them Our victory, and whoever We willed was saved. And Our punishment cannot be averted from the criminal people} (Yusuf: 110).

The summary of the ummah's reality today is what we have presented amidst the vortex of the Crusaders' corruption on earth and the great ascendancy of the Jews in it. {And Allah is predominant over His affair, but most of the people do not know} (Yusuf: 21).

The Conditions of the Jihādīs after September:

As for this, may Allah be our help. May Allah have mercy on the martyrs and grant them spacious gardens in Paradise. May Allah give patience to the prisoners and facilitate their release from the prisons of Guantanamo and its branches, which are in a worse condition, in the prisons of Muslim rulers. May Allah protect the displaced and ease their affairs. May Allah strengthen those who are determined and steadfast on the path, and help them to carry the banner high despite the wounds, and to deliver it proudly to a coming generation that will be sincere in carrying it.

The jihādī movement, in its entirety, at the level of groups, leaders, symbols, and individuals. Even every supporter and helper is going through the most severe ordeal that the contemporary jihādī movement has faced since its inception forty years ago. This is due to the unjust campaign launched by America under the slogan of "combating terrorism."

Many jihādī groups have gone through crises, epics, and very severe calamities in their journey. For example, what happened to the mujāhidīn in Syria, Tunisia, Libya, Algeria, Egypt, and others. However, the ordeal of the current world war on terrorism, as they call it, differs in its breadth, momentum, and the magnitude of its losses. America inaugurated it and mobilized its allies from NATO countries and other disbelievers, and from the forces of apostasy represented by the rulers of the Muslims and their apparatus of oppression. This campaign reached its peak after the events of September. America destroyed the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan, which constituted the last refuge for the elite of the jihādī groups and their cadres. Hundreds of the jihādī movement's cadres were killed in the battle to defend the Emirate. Then America followed that by capturing more than 600 mujāhidīn from various Arab countries in Pakistan and transferring them to its prisons. It also arrested, in cooperation with its allies of disbelievers and apostates in Muslim countries and others, several hundred more. It added to the terrorism list dozens of jihādī groups from various Muslim countries, to pursue their members in all the countries of the world. The remaining members of the jihādīs, especially their symbols, leaders, and veteran cadres, entered a state of dispersion, displacement, and pursuit due to the largest global security campaign in history. They have come to a state reminiscent of what the Messenger of Allah, peace and blessings be upon him, described the believers at the end of time, saying, "Then injustice will spread until the believer does not find a refuge to turn to."

A detailed account of the calamities and hardships that befell the mujāhidīn who stood against America and its allies, defending this ummah and its religion, requires a large volume. It would tell the most wonderful stories of steadfastness, sacrifice, and hardship that befell them, their women, their children, their families, and everyone who sheltered them and extended a helping hand to them. The space here does not allow for narration and lengthiness. In any case, the tongue of those who remain speaks of steadfastness, determination, and defiance.

Praise be to Allah, we are still determined.

And by Allah, we will only give them the sword, Allah willing. Even if we find nothing but dust, we will fight them with it, or this forelock will be alone until Allah Almighty is pleased. And let Allah take from our blood whatever He wills until He is pleased. {Indeed, Allah has purchased}, and we are in a group that has sold. The sale has taken place, and we will not cancel or seek cancellation, Allah willing.

What is our excuse when those who have passed have fulfilled their duty? Perhaps we will join the highest companions: {With those upon whom Allah has bestowed favor of the prophets, the steadfast affirmers of truth, the martyrs and the righteous. And excellent are those as companions} (An-Nisa: 69). As the former, ‘Āṣim (radiya Allāhu ‘anhu) said, when the disbelievers surrounded him, seeking to capture him, but he refused. We recite as he recited:

*What is my excuse when the bow is mine, an archer...
And the bow has a taut string
If I do not fight you, then my mother is Hābil*

We ask Allah (subḥānahu wa ta‘ālā) to protect us from them, alive and dead, as He protected ‘Āṣim (radiya Allāhu ‘anhu).

This, Allah willing, is our state and the state of our mujāhidīn brothers. Let us give good tidings to the believers and let us disgrace America and its allies from among the hypocrites: for Allah (subḥānahu wa ta‘ālā) has left — despite all the calamities that have occurred, from the mujāhidīn in every place — what distresses America and its allies. We ask Allah (subḥānahu wa ta‘ālā) to qualify us for conditions that fulfill these words so let them shout as they wish in Bush's march:

"Exalted be Hubal!" We still repeat, echoing the voice of Umar, may Allah be pleased with him: "Allah is more exalted and more majestic." Let them worship America and say: "We have al-Uzza in America, and you have no Uzza." We say to them as Umar replied to their predecessors: "Allah is our protector and your protector." "Our dead are in Paradise, and your dead are in Hellfire, and they are not equal."

Shar‘ī Rulings in This Reality

Allah the Almighty said: {And thus do We detail the verses, and [thus] the way of the criminals will become evident} (Al-An'am: 55).

And Allah the Almighty said: {And [mention] when Allah took a covenant from those who were given the Scripture, [saying], "You must make it clear to the people and not conceal it} (Al-Imran: 187).

We believe, in brief, that the rulings of the Sharīʿa decree that Jihād is an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) upon every Muslim in a reality such as this today. This is what the rulings of the Sharīʿa decree. Furthermore, reason, logic, and sound understanding indicate that armed Jihād is the solution in order to put an end to the crises of this reality.

As for the Sharʿī evidence for this, it is clearer than the sun at midday, as we will clarify, God willing. Jihād is an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) today upon all Muslims for many reasons. We only mention the rational and logical evidence for this as a means of emphasis, and to silence those who are not convinced by the Sharʿī rulings – we seek refuge in God – otherwise, it is established from the fundamentals of creed that there is no opinion against the opinion of the Sharīʿa, and no choice against the choice of Allah and His Messenger, as He, the Most High, said: {It is not for a believing man or a believing woman, when Allah and His Messenger have decided a matter, that they should [thereafter] have any choice about their affair. And whoever disobeys Allah and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error.} (Al-Aḥzāb: 36). This is the truth: the general resistance to this foreign, disbelieving occupation, and these apostate forces collaborating with it and oppressing the Muslims, is a mandatory obligation (farḍ wājib) decreed by the Islamic Sharīʿa, and a reality necessitated by sound reason. This is the case in every matter, where the evidence of the upright Sharīʿa aligns with the conclusions of sound reasoning in every time and place.

There are important Sharʿī rulings related to the reality of Muslims today that must be clarified to the people by the scholars of Islam and the leaders of the revival and Jihād. We mention here the most important of them for the sake of brevity, leaving the detailed evidence for the second part of this book.

Indeed, among the most important rulings that Sharʿī evidence decrees regarding the reality of Muslims today are the following:

Firstly: The lands of Islam today are in a state of direct or indirect occupation by the enemies. And Jihād against them is an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon the Muslims by consensus (ijmā‘).

Secondly: The governments of Muslim lands today are apostate and disbelieving due to their replacement of the Sharā’i‘ and their governance by other than what Allah has revealed. And due to their allegiance to the disbelievers and their betrayal of Allah, His Messenger, and the believers.

Thirdly: Rebellion against a ruler if he apostatizes from Islam or is a disbeliever (kāfir) is an obligation upon the Muslims by consensus (ijmā‘).

Fourthly: The rulings of the Islamic Sharī‘a decree by consensus (ijmā‘) the disbelief (kufr) and apostasy (ridda) of whoever collaborates with the disbelievers and aids them against the Muslims, and mandates fighting them.

Fifthly: The rulings of the Sharī‘a decree the obligation or permissibility of fighting the aggressor (ṣā’il) against the religion of the Muslims, or their lives, or their honor, or their wealth, even if he is a Muslim.

Let us address these rulings with some detail regarding their evidence:

The lands of Islam are in a state of occupation, aggression, and invasion by the enemies, and Jihād against the invaders today is an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon the Muslims by consensus (ijmā‘)

As we have established in the first chapter under the title “The Reality of Muslims Today,” it has become an accepted fact today for every sane and discerning person that all of our lands, from one furthest end to the other, are occupied, either directly by the enemies, or indirectly by their apostate deputies, with a heavy military presence of the Crusaders through the spread of their bases throughout all its regions, along with complete economic occupation through the control of economic monopolies, and the spread of their intelligence networks and security centers.

Here is America today re-occupying the Islamic world anew, openly and brazenly. It has directly occupied Afghanistan, and extended its control over Pakistan and Central Asia. And here it has occupied Iraq, and deployed hundreds of thousands of soldiers in the Arabian Peninsula, Turkey, and southern Levant, in addition to what it deploys in Egypt, the Horn of Africa, North Africa, and around these regions in the seas. And here is Bush declaring that he is leading a Crusader campaign against the lands of Muslims, along with his allies in NATO from European countries, in addition to the main ally (Israel), which occupies Palestine, and is preparing to demolish Masjid al-Aqsa and expel those who remain in it from the Muslims.

So what is the ruling of the Sharī‘a in such circumstances? And what do the rulings of the Dīn mandate upon every Muslim towards them?

Jihād is an act of worship (‘ibāda) and a duty (farīḍa) that Allah has obligated upon the Muslims. It is established by the tawātur of verses in the Book of Allah and aḥādīth in the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allah, peace and blessings of Allah be upon him, in a way that makes it unnecessary to present proofs here, as they are more famous than being mentioned and more numerous than being counted.

In the book “Defending the Lands of Muslims is the Most Important of Individual Obligations” by the Mujāhid Sheikh, the Shahid, Abdullah Azzam, the Sheikh of the Arab Mujāhidīn in Afghanistan during the Jihād against the Russians – may Allah have mercy on him – the following is mentioned, from which we quote:

Jihād al-Ṭalab (seeking out the disbelievers in their lands), in a situation where the disbelievers are not mobilizing to fight the Muslims. This fighting is a communal obligation (farḍ kifāya). The minimum of communal obligation is guarding the borders with believers to intimidate the enemies of Allah etc.” Then, may Allah have mercy on him, he said – and this is the point of evidence:

“Jihād al-Dafʿ (repelling the disbelievers from our lands), and this is an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn), indeed, the most important of individual obligations (furūd al-aʿyān), and it becomes obligatory in the following cases:

i. Firstly: If the disbelievers enter a town from the lands of the Muslims.

ii. Secondly: If the two ranks meet and the two armies clash.

iii. Thirdly: If the Imam mobilizes individuals or a group, it becomes obligatory upon them to mobilize.

iv. Fourthly: If the disbelievers capture a group of Muslims.”

Then Sheikh Abdullah, may Allah have mercy on him, spoke about the first case, which is the descent of the disbelievers upon a land from the lands of the Muslims, and said:

“In this case, the salaf and khalaf, and the jurists of the four madhāhib, and the muḥaddithūn and mufasssirūn in all Islamic eras have unanimously agreed without exception that Jihād in this case becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) upon the people of this town that the disbelievers have attacked, and upon those who are near to them. Such that the son goes out without the permission of his father, the wife without the permission of her husband, and the debtor without the permission of his creditor. If the people of that town are not sufficient, or are deficient, or are lazy, or sit back, then the individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) expands in circles, the closest then the closest. If they are not sufficient or are deficient, then upon those who are next to them, then those who are next to them, until the individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) encompasses the entire earth.”

Then the Sheikh, may Allah have mercy on him, summarized the evidence for this according to the madhāhib of Ahl al-Sunna and their scholars, and said:

Firstly: Jurists of the Ḥanafī school

Ibn ‘Ābidīn said in his Ḥāshiya, vol. 3, p. 238: “And it is an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) if the enemy attacks a border region of the borders of Islam, then it becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon whoever is near to it. As for those who are behind them at a distance from the enemy, it is a communal obligation (farḍ kifāya) if they are not needed. If they are needed, in that those who are near the enemy are incapable of resisting the enemy, or they are capable but they are lazy and do not perform Jihād, then it becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon those who are next to them, like prayer and fasting, it is not permissible for them to abandon it, then and then, until it becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon all the people of Islam, east and west, in this gradation.” End quote.

Al-Kāsānī issued a fatwā similar to this in Badā’i‘ al-Ṣanā’i‘, vol. 7, p. 72. And likewise Ibn Nujaym in Al-Baḥr al-Rā’iq, vol. 5, p. 191. And likewise Ibn al-Humām in Fath al-Qadīr, from the Imams of the Ḥanafī school.

Secondly: According to the Mālikī school:

It is mentioned in Ḥāshiyat al-Dasūqī, part two, p. 174: “And Jihād becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) by the sudden attack of the enemy: meaning, turning to repelling by sudden attack upon every individual, even if a woman or a slave or a child, and they go out even if the guardian, husband, and creditor prevent them.”

Thirdly: According to the Shāfi‘ī school:

It is mentioned in Nihāyat al-Muḥtāj by al-Ramlī, in part eight, p. 58: “If they enter a town of ours, and there becomes between them and us less than the distance of shortening prayer, then it is obligatory upon its people to repel them, even upon those upon whom Jihād is not obligatory, from the poor, child, slave, debtor, and woman.”

Fourthly: According to the Ḥanbalī school:

It is mentioned in Al-Mughnī by Ibn Qudāma, in part eight, p. 345: “And Jihād becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) in three situations:

- 1. If the two armies meet and the two ranks clash.*
- 2. If the disbelievers descend upon a land, it becomes obligatory upon its people to fight them and repel them.*
- 3. If the Imam mobilizes a group, it becomes obligatory upon them to mobilize.”*

Shaykh al-Islam Ibn Taymiyya says: “As for Jihād al-Daf‘, it is the most severe type of repelling the aggressor against inviolability and religion, and it is obligatory by consensus (ijmā‘). The aggressing enemy who corrupts religion and worldly life, there is nothing more obligatory after īmān than repelling him. And no condition is stipulated for it (like provisions and mount), rather, he is repelled according to ability, and the scholars, our associates and others, have explicitly stated this.”

Ibn Taymiyya says in part four of Al-Fatāwā, p. 608: “(If the enemy enters the lands of Islam, then there is no doubt that it is obligatory to repel him upon the closest then the closest, as the lands of Islam are all like one town, and that it is obligatory to mobilize towards him without the permission of a parent or creditor, and the texts of [Imam] Ahmad are explicit about this).”

Then Sheikh Abdullah Azzam added after these evidences, his saying: “And this is known as general mobilization (nafir ‘āmm)”. Then he said, and the evidences for general mobilization (nafir ‘āmm):

Allah the Almighty said: {Go forth, whether light or heavy, and strive with your wealth and your lives in the cause of Allāh. That is better for you, if you only knew.} (Al-Tawba: 41). And the verse before it came to arrange punishment and replacement as a reward for abandoning mobilization, and there is no punishment except for abandoning an obligation or committing a ḥarām. Allah the Most High said in Sūrat al-Tawba, verse 39: {If you do not go forth, He will punish you with a painful punishment and will replace you with another people, and you will not harm Him at all. And Allāh is over all things competent.} Ibn Kathīr, may Allah have mercy on him, said: “Allah the Most High commanded general mobilization with the Messenger of Allah, peace and blessings of Allah be upon him, in the year of the Battle of Tabuk to fight the enemies of Allah from the Roman disbelievers from the People of the Book.” And al-Bukhārī, may Allah have mercy on him, titled: “Chapter on the Obligation of Mobilization and What is Obligatory of Jihād and Intention,” and cited this verse. And the general mobilization was because it reached the ears of the Muslims that the Romans were preparing on the borders of the Peninsula to invade Medina. So how is it if the disbelievers enter the lands of the Muslims, would mobilization not be more appropriate? Abu Ṭalḥa, may Allah be pleased with him, said regarding the meaning of His saying, the Most High, {light or heavy}, “Old and young, Allah has not heard an excuse from anyone.” Part two, p. 144, from Mukhtaṣar Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr. And al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī said: “In hardship and ease.”

Ibn Taymiyya says in part 28, p. 358: “As for if the enemy intends to attack the Muslims, then repelling him becomes obligatory upon those who are intended, as the Most High said: {And if they seek help of you for the religion, then you must help.} (Al-Anfāl: 72). Just as the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allah be upon him, commanded helping the Muslim, whether the man is from the mercenaries for fighting or not. This is obligatory according to ability upon every individual with his person and wealth, with scarcity and abundance, walking and riding, just as the Muslims were when the enemy intended them in the year of the Trench. Allah did not permit anyone to abandon it.” And al-Zuhrī said: “Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyib went out to ghazw even though one of his eyes was gone, and it was said to him, ‘You are ill,’ and he said, ‘Allah has mobilized the light and the heavy, and if war is not possible for me, I will increase the numbers and guard the baggage.” Narrated by al-Qurṭubī in Al-Jāmi‘ li-Aḥkām al-Qur’ān, vol. 8, p. 150.

Then Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, may Allah have mercy on him, continues the evidences for general mobilization (nafir ‘āmm) and says:

1. And Allah the Almighty says: {And fight against the disbelievers collectively as they fight against you collectively. And know that Allah is with the righteous.} (Al-Tawba: 36). Ibn al-‘Arabī said: “Collectively means encompassing them from every side and condition.” Narrated by al-Qurṭubī in Al-Jāmi‘, 8-150.
2. And He, the Almighty, says: {And fight them until there is no fitna and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allah.} (Al-Anfāl: 39). And fitna is shirk, as Ibn ‘Abbās and al-Suddī said. Mentioned by al-Qurṭubī, part 2, 253. And when the disbelievers attack and seize the lands, then the ummah is threatened in its religion, and exposed to doubt in its ‘aqīdah, so fighting is obligatory to protect religion, life, honor, and wealth.

The Prophet, peace and blessings of Allah be upon him, said: “There is no hijra after the conquest, but Jihād and intention, and if you are [to be] mobilized, then mobilize.” Narrated by al-Bukhārī. So mobilization is obligatory if the ummah is mobilized. And in the case of the disbelievers’ attack, the ummah is mobilized to protect its religion. And the basis of the obligation is the need of the Muslims and the mobilization of the Imam, as Ibn Ḥajar said in the explanation of this ḥadīth. It is mentioned in Fatḥ al-Bārī, part (6 - p. 20). Al-Qurṭubī said: “Everyone who knows of the weakness of the Muslims against their enemy and knows that he can reach them and it is possible for him to aid them, it is also obligatory upon him to go out to them.” Imam al-Jaṣṣāṣ said in Aḥkām al-Qur’ān, vol. 1, p. 242: “We do not know of any disagreement that if a man draws his sword against a man to kill him unjustly, it is upon the Muslims to kill him.” And in this case – ṣiyāl (aggression) – if the aggressor (ṣā’il) is killed, then he is in the Fire even if he is a Muslim, and if the just person is killed, then he is a shahīd. This is the ruling on the aggressor (ṣā’il). So how is it if the disbelievers aggress against the lands of the Muslims, where religion, honor, life, and wealth are exposed to loss and demise?! Is it not obligatory in this case upon the Muslims to repel the aggressing disbeliever and the disbelieving state?

1. Fighting the rebellious group (fi’a bāghiya): Allah the Almighty says: {And if two factions among the believers should fight, then make peace between them both. But if one of them rebels against the other, then fight against the one that rebels until it reverts to the ordinance of Allah. And if it reverts, then make peace between them justly, and act justly. Verily, Allah loves those who act justly.} (Al-Ḥujurāt: 9). If Allah has obligated upon us fighting the rebellious Muslim group (fi’a bāghiya) to preserve the unity of the Muslims’ word and protect their religion, honor, and wealth, then how is the ruling in fighting the rebellious disbelieving states? Is this not more appropriate and fitting?
2. Ḥadd al-Ḥirāba (punishment for highway robbery): Allah the Most High said: {Indeed, the penalty for those who wage war against Allah and His Messenger and strive upon earth [to cause] corruption is none but that they be killed or crucified or that their hands and feet be cut off from opposite sides or that they be exiled from the land. That is for them disgrace in this world, and for them in the Hereafter is a great punishment.} (Al-Mā’ida: 33). This is the ruling on the muḥāribūn from the Muslims who frighten the general Muslims and cause corruption in the land and tamper with the wealth and honor of the people, so how about the disbelieving states that corrupt for the people their religion, wealth, and honor, is fighting them not more obligatory upon the Muslims and more deserving?!

These are some of the evidences and justifications for general mobilization (nafir ‘āmm) if the disbelievers enter the lands of the Muslims, that repelling the disbelieving enemy is the most obligatory of obligations after īmān.” End of the quote from the book Defending the Lands of Muslims, with a slight abbreviation.

And I say: If we contemplate the conditions of the Muslims today, we would find that Jihād has become obligatory upon them from the four aspects, in all the earth. And the clearest aspect of its obligation is the first point (which is the descent of the enemies in most of the lands of the Muslims).

For there is no land from the lands of the Muslims today except that it is occupied by types of disbelievers, from the Jews like the land of Palestine and parts of the Levant, or by the Crusaders, like the lands of Bosnia and the Balkans, and Chechnya and the Caucasus, and the Islamic Republics in Central Asia and the Philippines and others. Or by the pagans like Kashmir, which is occupied by the Hindus, and East Turkestan and parts of Southeast Asia, which are occupied by China and other than that.

And all these lands, their people and those who neighbor them, then those who neighbor them, then all those who followed them and neighbor them, have been unable or lazy or negligent. So the individual obligation (farīḍa ‘ayniyya) of Jihād has encompassed all the people of Islam.

As for the rest of the Islamic and Arab lands, including the heartland of Islam and their Ka‘ba, and the mosque of their Prophet, peace and blessings of Allah be upon him, they are occupied indirectly by the Crusaders and Jews, through the deputyship of apostate rulers, and their hypocritical aides who have placed their armies in the service of the disbelievers, led by America and its mistress Israel and their Crusader allies, who have filled the lands with land, sea, and air military bases, and occupied the lands in this modern way, by concentrating their forces in centralized bases, instead of spreading them out, and they sufficed with spreading out the apostates from their armies from the hypocrites, the ignorant, the coerced, and the lost who play the role of the occupier by proxy, where the Crusaders bring out their forces from their centers when needed. It is sufficient for us to know that America and its Crusader allies have on the land of the Arabian Peninsula more than two hundred thousand soldiers, and weapons and equipment stored that is sufficient for a million soldiers, who can be transported within weeks when needed And in this cunning way, by concentrating forces in centralized bases, and relying on the forces of the apostates in detailed services, the new occupiers avoid provoking the Muslims to Jihād, and they allow the apostate rulers to claim independence, and the scholars of the Sultans to divert people from Jihād and call them to obedience to the apostate guardians!

The outcome is one and the same, the lands are occupied, the wealth is plundered, and the disbelievers inflict upon the believers various kinds of humiliation and degradation at the hands of the apostate aides, and the Sharīʿa of Allah is suspended, and the word of the disbelievers is supreme, and the righteous are residents of prisons and dungeons of torture. And whoever looks into the conditions of the lands of the Two Holy Mosques, the Levant, Egypt, North Africa, Turkey, Pakistan, and Africa and their reasons sees that in its clearest forms.

As for if we come to the second point of the individual obligation (farīḍa ʿayniyya) of Jihād, which is when the meeting of the ranks of the believers meet with the ranks of the disbelievers, we would find it realized in all the lands of the Muslims in its fiercest forms, but in a cunning way as well. For the disbelieving Crusaders and the disbelieving apostates have spread their forces and aligned their ranks and confirmed their presence in every inch of the lands of the Muslims, through hundreds of thousands of soldiers, police, intelligence, security men, spies, and informants not to mention what we mentioned of thousands of Crusader soldiers concentrated in their centers and military bases in every country, such that there is no Muslim who takes a stance of defending his religion and adhering to it and defending the causes of his ummah, except that the hands of those soldiers snatch him and the eyes of those spies watch him! So has the rank of the disbelievers met the rank of the believers or not yet? Or do our mashāyikh need, in order to see that and issue fatwā about it, that all those soldiers, intelligence, and spies gather in one rank in front of the mosques and in front of the doors of their houses?!

As for the third point, which is the mobilization of the Imam, then to Allah is the complaints, and to Him is praise in every situation. For the Muslims do not have on the face of the earth today a single legitimate Imam, and there is none among them today except one who wages war against Allah and His Messenger, striving in the earth causing corruption. For all of them rely on types of disbelievers from the Jews, Crusaders, and pagans, and from those who have bought their loyalty from the hypocrites. So there is no legitimate Imam who mobilizes for Jihād. Rather, there are Imams of disbelief (kufr) and apostasy (riddah) who mobilize the vile against the believers! So has Jihād fallen due to the absence of the legitimate Imam?! Then who repels the aggressor (ṣā'il)?

The truth is that the proof of Allah has been established upon His Muslim servants in most of the lands of the world. For there is no land from the lands of the Muslims except that there have arisen in it callers to guidance, from working scholars, or sincere du'āt, or sincere umarā' of Jihād. They called the people to Jihād and enjoining good and forbidding evil, and mobilized them. And even if a land from the lands was devoid of such Imams and righteous umarā' of Jihād – assuming that – then the ummah of Islam is one. And there is no consideration from the viewpoint of Islam for the borders that the Crusaders drew between our lands, and what they invented of nationalities, affiliations, flags, and passports. The ummah of Islam is one and remains one. And it has not been without umarā' of Jihād who called the Muslims and mobilized them. And it is obligatory upon the Muslims to respond to them and mobilize with them to repel the aggressor (ṣā'il). And from the likes of these at the time of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan was Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, may Allah have mercy on him. And those who stood with him in calling for general mobilization (nafir 'āmm) for Jihād from the scholars of Pakistan and Afghanistan and others. And from them are all the shuyūkh and umarā' of the groups and Jihādī da'awāt in various Islamic lands And from these today is Sheikh Osama bin Laden, may Allah preserve him, who mobilizes the Muslims to Jihād against the Americans and Jews today, and like him are many of the scholars and du'āt of Jihād against them from the lands of the Arabs and non-Arabs in Iraq, Chechnya, Palestine, the Philippines, Indonesia, and others. And it is obligatory upon the Muslims to respond to them for mobilization.

As for if we come to the fourth aspect of the individual obligation (farīḍa 'ayniyya) of Jihād, which is if the enemy captures some of the Muslims, then what do we say? And what do we repeat? And where do we count? And what do we add?

- The prisoners of Muslim youth kidnapped from various lands of the world to the shameful American prison of Guantanamo have today exceeded 700 prisoners from various nationalities, according to the American sources themselves. And a similar number in American prisons in Afghanistan and Pakistan.
- And more than this number is the total number of prisoners of Muslim youth in the prisons of Western Europe (Britain - France - Spain - Germany - Belgium - Italy).
- As for Russia, then in the thousands. And say the same in Kashmir, the Philippines, Eritrea, and the lands of Africa, and the lands of Central Asia and the lands of Turkestan.

- As for the prisons of the tyrants of the lands of the Arabs and Muslims, from the likes of the rulers of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and the lands of the Levant and North Africa, Turkey, and Pakistan the numbers published through human rights organizations, and reports of Amnesty International go to tens of thousands in one country sometimes!! There is no doubt that the numbers about the prisoners of Muslim youth in those lands exceed hundreds of thousands!! And this is a documented truth and not imagined exaggerations.
- As for Palestine, the global news informs us every day about the killing of hundreds and the capture of thousands. The Jews captured in one day from the days of the Intifada more than a thousand prisoners! And captivity has befallen in general those lands women and girls and even children.
- As for the incidents of killing, torture, rape, and violation of the honor of men and women, there is hardly a country free from them!! So has Jihād become obligatory or not yet?! And the scholars of the Muslims have issued fatwā that if a Muslim woman is taken captive in the East, it is obligatory upon the people of the West to free her. And that it is upon the Muslims to rescue their prisoners even if they expend in that, all their wealth.

Perhaps some of the hypocrites or some of the ignorant deny the state of occupation about some of the lands of the Muslims, and prohibit fighting the invaders under the pretext that they came according to agreements with the rulers of the lands of the Muslims. So it is necessary for us to establish for these people that this is not permissible for a Muslim ruler if he were a Muslim. And to clarify for them that these rulers have lost their legitimacy due to their disbelief (kufr) and apostasy (ridda) and their departure from our milla.

Which is what the following section will clarify:

The governments of Muslim lands today are apostate and disbelieving due to their replacement of the Sharā'i' and their governance by other than what Allah has revealed. And due to their allegiance to the disbelievers and their betrayal of Allah, His Messenger, and the believers

Many types of shirk with Allah have seeped into the beliefs of many of the Muslims with the succession of ages until we have reached these miserable later times.

And from that is what has occurred from many people of worshipping other than Him besides Him, and disobeying Him and denying His rulings along with obeying others and obeying their rulings, and abandoning His wilāya and the wilāya of His awliyā', then the wilāya of His enemies instead of His awliyā'.

Every Muslim believes and acknowledges and claims īmān that Allah is the Creator, and that He is the Sustainer, and that He is the Giver of life, and that He is the Giver of death, and that He is the One who harms and benefits, and that He is the Abaser and Exalter, and that He is the Just Judge, to the end of the names and attributes of Allah. But many of the Muslims in their reality turn in bringing benefit and averting harm and seeking sustenance, and fear and hope, and judgment and legislation, and making lawful and unlawful to other than what Allah has commanded, to humans like themselves, and especially from the rulers and notables, and the rabbis and monks and scholars and mashāyikh, and those they believe in from men!

And this is the reality of worship (ʿibāda) and the reality of obedience (ṭāʿa), which negates their claim of īmān in the Lord Creator as they claim. The Lord in whom īmān is not complete except by adhering to His worship (ʿibāda) as God, and obeying Him alone without partner in His rulings, just as it is obligatory to believe in Him as Lord, Creator, Sustainer.

Indeed, from the greatest aspects of worshipping Allah and obeying Him is adhering to His rulings and commands and prohibitions and Sharā'ī and this is self-evident. So is there any greater denial than that a man claims īmān in Allah, then denies His legislations and belittles them! And claims their unsuitability for the age! And that they are the cause of the Muslims' backwardness! And practically presents others from the Sharā'ī of humans over them! And governs the people by them and compels them to their laws by force!

This obedience is not accepted by anyone from his wife, nor his child, nor his servant—and to Allah belongs the highest attribute. Would the head of the household accept his wife's claim of love while she obeys others and carries out their orders in his house? Would he accept his child's claim of obedience and then see him obeying his neighbor and disobeying him? Would he accept from his servant and worker, who eats from his sustenance, that he claims his sovereignty and then acts according to the directives of others? They do not accept this for themselves, and to Allah belongs the highest attribute. This is why the address came to them: "Then do you not fear Allāh?" "Then do you not remember?" This is a false claim and a reprehensible act.

Indeed, the fact that ḥākimiyyah (sovereignty) belongs to Allāh alone, that legislation comes from Him alone, that obedience is due to Him alone, that what Allāh has permitted is lawful (ḥalāl), and what He has forbidden is unlawful (ḥarām), that what He has commanded is binding, and what He has prohibited must be abandoned, are all matters at the core of tawḥīd al-ulūhiyyah (the Oneness of God in worship) and the worship of Allāh alone. The Qur'an has affirmed this and has affirmed the disbelief (kufr) of those who deny it. The Sunnah has also affirmed it, and the consensus (ijmā') of this Ummah (nation), and its leading scholars and jurists throughout the ages, has been established upon it. Religion cannot be wholly for Allāh in truth except in this way. The verses are continuously supportive of these meanings. Among them is the saying of Allāh Almighty: {And judge, [O Muḥammad], between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their inclinations, and beware of them lest they avert you from some of what Allāh has sent down to you. But if they turn away - then know that Allāh only intends to afflict them with some of their [own] sins. And indeed, many among the people are defiantly disobedient. Then is it the judgment of [pre-Islamic] ignorance they desire? But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain?} (Al-Mā'idah 49-50).

Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in his Tafsīr: "(And judge, [O Muḥammad], between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their inclinations) meaning: Judge, O Muḥammad, between the people, Arabs and non-Arabs, literate and illiterate, according to what Allāh has revealed to you in this great Book." Then he said: "(And do not follow their inclinations) meaning: their opinions which they have agreed upon and abandoned because of them what Allāh has revealed to His Messengers. This is why Allāh Almighty said: (And do not follow their inclinations), meaning: Do not turn away from the truth that Allāh has commanded you with, due to the desires of these ignorant, wretched people." Then he said—and pay attention to this great, important statement—Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "And His saying Almighty: (Then is it the judgment of [pre-Islamic] ignorance they desire? But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain?) Allāh Almighty is denouncing those who abandon Allāh's decisive ruling, which contains all good and prohibits all evil, and turn to other than it from opinions, desires, and conventions that men have established without any basis in the law of Allāh, as the people of Jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic ignorance) used to judge with, from the deviations and ignorance that they established with their opinions and desires. And as the Tartars judge with, from the royal policies taken from their king, Genghis Khan, who established for them Al-Yāsā, which is a book compiled from rulings taken from various laws, from Judaism, Christianity, and the Islamic faith, and others. And from it are many rulings that he took from his own opinion and desire, which became among his descendants a followed law, which they give precedence over judging by the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him. So whoever among them does that is a kāfir whose killing is obligatory until he returns to the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger, and does not judge by other than it in little or much. Allāh Almighty said: (Then is it the judgment of [pre-Islamic] ignorance they desire?) meaning: do they seek and desire and turn away from the judgment of Allāh? And His saying Almighty: (But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain?) meaning: Who is more just than Allāh in His judgment for those who understand from Allāh His law and believe in Him and are certain and know that Allāh is the Most Just of judges and more merciful to His creation than a mother to her child, for He Almighty is Knowing of everything, Capable of everything, and Just in everything." End quote.

Among what Ibn Kathīr said about Al-Yāsā in his history book (Al-Bidāyah wal-Nihāyah), he said: "Then al-Juwayni mentioned excerpts from Al-Yāsā, including: that according to it, whoever commits zinā (unlawful sexual intercourse) is killed, whether married or unmarried, and likewise whoever commits sodomy is killed, and whoever intentionally lies is killed, and whoever spies is killed, and whoever urinates in stagnant water is killed, and whoever immerses himself in it is killed" and in all of that, there is a violation of the laws of Allāh revealed to His servants, the prophets, peace be upon them. So whoever abandons the decisive law revealed to Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh, the Seal of the Prophets, and resorts to other than it from the abrogated laws has committed kufr. So how about one who resorts to Al-Yāsā and gives it precedence over it? Whoever does that has committed kufr by the consensus of the Muslims." End quote.

I say:

And Al-Yāsā is a constitution and a collection of laws established by Genghis Khan, (the Tartar king) when he invaded the East and saw the multiplicity of religions and philosophies, so he established this constitution with the consultation of the legislators he had, from what they deemed good with their minds and from the inspiration of their experiences, and they mixed it with rulings from Islam, Christianity, and their pagan religions.

It is the same action that the rulers of the Muslims are doing today with the help of their legislators and parliaments, where they built it primarily on French and English laws, of Roman origin, and mixed in it something of Islamic sharī'ah (law), and what their desires dictated to them! Then they wrote at the top of it, as in some Islamic countries: "Islamic sharī'ah is the primary source of legislation and codification!!" And in some countries, they were even stingy with this false, polytheistic phrase.

So if Ibn Kathīr has conveyed the consensus of the Muslims on the kufr of whoever judges by Al-Yāsā or other human ignorance, then how about one who judges by these man-made laws among the Muslims and forces them upon them with the power and coercion of weapons!!

And it is enough for anyone who wants to see the extent of kufr, wickedness, injustice, altering of the laws, and taking the verses of Allāh as a mockery, to look at a copy of his country's constitution, the laws in force in the courts, and the legislative decrees issued by his country's government every day. This is exactly the case in Pakistan and all Muslim countries. Just as the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, informed, as narrated by Imam Aḥmad: "The ties of Islam will be broken one by one, and every time a tie is broken, people will cling to the one that follows it. The first of them to be broken is governance (ḥukm), and the last of them is prayer (ṣalāh)." There is no doubt that whoever judges by these laws is a kāfir whose killing is obligatory by the consensus of the Muslims.

And in His saying Almighty: {Have you not seen those who claim to have believed in what was revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], and what was revealed before you? They wish to refer legislation to Ṭāghūt, while they were commanded to reject it; and Satan wishes to lead them far astray.} (An-Nisā' 60). Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, says:

"This is a denunciation from Allāh Almighty against those who claim to believe in what Allāh has revealed to His Messenger and to the earlier prophets, while they want to resort in settling disputes to other than the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger." Then he said: "For it—meaning the verse—is a condemnation of all who deviate from the Book and the Sunnah and resort to other than them from falsehood, which is what is meant here by Ṭāghūt. This is why He said (They wish to refer legislation to Ṭāghūt)." That is, as He said in the same Sūrat an-Nisā' after a few verses, in His saying Almighty {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe until they make you, [O Muḥammad], judge concerning that over which they dispute among themselves and then find within themselves no discomfort from what you have judged and submit in [full, willing] submission} : "Meaning, if they make you judge, they obey you inwardly and do not find in themselves any discomfort from what you have judged and submit to it outwardly and inwardly, submitting to that completely without resistance, opposition, or dispute, as mentioned in the ḥadīth: "By the One in Whose Hand is my soul, none of you truly believes until his desire is in accordance with what I have brought." End quote.

And in His saying Almighty from Sūrat al-Aḥzāb, verse 36: {It is not for a believing man or a believing woman, when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter, that they should [thereafter] have any choice about their affair. And whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error.}

Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "This verse is general in all matters. That is, when Allāh and His Messenger have decreed something, no one has the right to oppose it, and no one has any choice, opinion, or saying here, and that is why He was stern in opposing that, saying: (And whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error) and like His saying Almighty {So let those beware who dissent from his [i.e., Muḥammad's] order, lest fitnah (affliction) strike them or a painful punishment}" End quote.

Imam Abū Bakr al-Jaṣṣāṣ said in the explanation of His saying Almighty: {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe} the previous verse: "And in this verse is evidence that whoever rejects anything from the commands of Allāh Almighty or His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, has left the Millah (religion) of Islam, whether he rejects it out of doubt in it or out of failure to accept, submit, and refrain from surrendering. And that necessitates the validity of what the Companions went to in their judgment of the apostasy of one who refused to pay the Zakāh." Aḥkām al-Qur'ān (Rulings of the Qur'an) vol. 2, p. 212.

Imam Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, said: {The only statement of the [true] believers when they are called to Allāh and His Messenger to judge between them is that they say, "We hear and we obey." And those are the successful.} (An-Nūr 51) He said: "So He Almighty has clarified that whoever turns away from obedience to the Messenger and turns away from his judgment is from the Munāfiqūn (hypocrites) and is not a believer. And that the believer is the one who says, "We hear and we obey." So if hypocrisy is established and faith is removed merely by turning away from the judgment of the Messenger and wanting to resort to other than him, even though this is pure abandonment and its cause may be the strength of desire, then how about belittling and the like?" End quote. (Aṣ-Ṣārim al-Maslūl, p. 38).

Likewise, Shaykh al-Islām (Ibn Taymiyyah) conveyed the agreement of the jurists, saying: "And a person, whenever he makes lawful what is unlawful—upon which there is consensus—or makes unlawful what is lawful—upon which there is consensus—or changes the sharī'ah—upon which there is consensus—is a kāfir who has apostatized, by the agreement of the jurists." Al-Fatāwa vol. 3, p. 267.

He also said in Al-Fatāwa vol. 35, p. 406: "And whoever judges by what contradicts the shari'ah of Allāh and His Messenger, while knowing that, is of the same kind as the Tartars who give precedence to the judgment of Al-Yāsā over the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger."

He also says in Minhāj as-Sunnah (The Methodology of the Sunnah) vol. 3, p. 22: "So whoever deems it permissible to judge between people by what he sees as just without following what Allāh has revealed is a kāfir"

And in Al-Fatāwa al-Kubrā (The Grand Edicts) vol. 4, p. 515: "And it is known by necessity from the religion of the Muslims and by the agreement of all Muslims that whoever permits following other than the religion of Islam or following other than the shari'ah of Muḥammad, peace and blessings be upon him, is a kāfir."

Imam Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, says, regarding His saying Almighty: {And if you disagree over anything, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger, if you should believe in Allāh and the Last Day. That is the best [way] and best in result.} (An-Nisā' 59). He said: "And this is conclusive evidence that it is obligatory to refer matters of dispute, in all that people dispute over, from the entire religion, to Allāh and His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, not to anyone other than Allāh and His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him. So whoever refers the response to other than them has opposed the command of Allāh, and whoever calls at the time of dispute to a judgment other than that of Allāh and His Messenger has called with the call of Jāhiliyyah. The servant does not enter into faith until he refers everything that those who dispute disagree over to Allāh and His Messenger, and that is why Allāh Almighty said: {if you should believe in Allāh and the Last Day}, and this is what was mentioned earlier, that it is a condition that negates the conditioned by its negation, which indicates that whoever makes other than Allāh and His Messenger the judge in matters of dispute is outside the requirements of faith in Allāh and the Last Day. And enough for you is this protective, decisive verse as a clarification and cure, for it is decisive for the backs of those who oppose it, protective for those who adhere to it, and embodying what it commanded." (Ar-Risālah at-Tabūkiyyah)

And in the same verse, Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "So it indicates that whoever does not resort in the place of dispute to the Book and the Sunnah and does not refer to them in that, then he is not a believer in Allāh nor in the Last Day." End quote (Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr).

Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, says: "Then He Almighty informed that whoever resorts to other than what the Messenger brought has judged by Ṭāghūt and resorted to it. And Ṭāghūt is everything by which the servant exceeds his limit, whether it be a worshipped object, a followed leader, or an obeyed authority. So the Ṭāghūt of every people is whoever they resort to other than Allāh and His Messenger, or they worship him besides Allāh, or they follow him without clear guidance from Allāh." I'lām al-Muwaqqi'īn (Information for Those Who Sign on Behalf of the Lord of the Worlds) vol. 1, p. 5.

He also said in Madārij as-Sālikīn (Ranks of the Seekers) vol. 1, p. 337: "If he believes that judging by what Allāh has revealed is not obligatory and that he has a choice in it, while being certain of Allāh's judgment, then this is major kufr."

Al-Qāḍī Abū Ya'lā says in Uṣūl ad-Dīn (Fundamentals of the Religion), p. 271: "And whoever believes in making lawful what Allāh has forbidden by explicit text, or from His Messenger, or the Muslims have unanimously agreed upon its prohibition, is a kāfir, like one who permits drinking alcohol, prevents prayer, fasting, and Zakāh. And likewise, whoever believes in prohibiting something that Allāh has made lawful by explicit text or Allāh Almighty has permitted it. The reason for that is that in that, there is a denial of Allāh Almighty and His Messenger in His news, and a denial of the Muslims in their news. And whoever does that has committed kufr by the consensus of the Muslims."

Imam al-Qurṭubī says in his Tafsīr regarding His saying Almighty: {And if they break their oaths after their [treaty] commitment and malign your religion, then fight the leaders of disbelief, for indeed, they have no [regard for] oaths, [O believers,] that perhaps they will desist.} (At-Tawbah: 12). He said: "Some scholars have used this verse as evidence for the obligation of killing whoever maligns the religion, as he is a kāfir, and maligning is to attribute to it what is not befitting of it or to object with contempt to what is from the religion due to what has been established from the definitive evidence for the correctness of its principles and the uprightness of its branches." Vol. 8, p. 82.

So look today at the speeches and statements of these presidents and their assistants and what they contain of maligning the religion and contempt for its rites.

He also said: "If he judges by what he has as being from Allāh, then that is an alteration of it that necessitates kufr." Vol. 6, p. 191.

He also said: "If he seeks other than the judgment of Allāh from where he is not pleased with it, then he is a kāfir." Tafsīr al-Qurṭubī.

We suffice with these statements. And the evidences are very numerous, from the sayings of the Imams and scholars and the texts of the Book and the Sunnah.

A group of contemporary Muslim scholars who have lived the reality of the kufr of our rulers in this era have spoken about this issue, clarifying that what they issue of legislation and alteration of the law of Allāh and judging by other than what Allāh has revealed is major kufr. We quote here a selection of their sayings:

Shaykh Maḥmūd al-Alūsi said in his Tafsīr: "There is no doubt about the kufr of one who approves of the law and prefers it over the sharī'ah, and says it is more in accordance with wisdom and more beneficial for the nation, and becomes extremely angry and fiercely indignant when he is told in a matter of the sharī'ah, 'There is such and such in it,' as we have witnessed that in some of those whom Allāh has forsaken and made deaf and blinded their eyes. So, it is not appropriate to hesitate in declaring as kāfir one who approves of what is clearly contrary to the shari'ah and gives it precedence over the shari'ah rulings, diminishing the truth." [Rūḥ al-Ma'ānī vol. 28, p. 20].

Shaykh Muḥammad Amīn ash-Shanqīṭi, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed, opposing the Messengers and nullifying the rulings of Allāh, then his injustice, wickedness, and kufr are all out of the fold of Islam." Aḍwā' al-Bayān vol. 2, p. 104.

And in his commentary on the ḥadīth of 'Adi ibn Ḥātim and the saying of the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him: "Did they not forbid what Allāh made lawful for you and make lawful for you what Allāh forbade, and you followed them?" He said, "Yes." He said, "That is their worship of them." He, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "And this prophetic explanation: that everyone who follows a legislator in what he makes lawful and unlawful, Mukhālafah (in opposition) to the legislation of Allāh, is worshipping him, taking him as a lord, associating partners with him, and disbelieving in Allāh. It is a correct explanation, and there is no doubt about its correctness. And know, O brothers, that associating partners with Allāh in His judgment and associating partners with Him in His worship are all the same in meaning, and there is no difference between them at all. So the one who follows a system other than the system of Allāh, and a legislation other than the legislation of Allāh, and a law that is Mukhālafah (in opposition) to the shari'ah of Allāh, from the creation of mankind, turning away from the light of the sky that Allāh revealed through the tongue of His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, whoever does this is like one who worships the idol and prostrates to the image, there is no difference between them at all in any way, they are one, both of them are associating partners with Allāh, this one is associating partners in his worship, and this one is associating partners in his judgment." Aḍwā' al-Bayān.

He says in the same Tafsīr: "And with these heavenly texts that we have mentioned, it becomes very clear that those who follow the man-made laws that Satan has legislated through the tongues of his allies, in opposition to what Allāh Almighty has legislated through the tongues of His Messengers, that there is no doubt about their kufr except for those whom Allāh has blinded their insight and blinded them from the light of revelation like them."

He says, may Allāh have mercy on him: "As for the man-made system that is Mukhālafah (in opposition) to the legislation of the Creator of the heavens and the earth, then judging by it is kufr in the Creator of the heavens and the earth, like claiming that preferring the male over the female in inheritance is not fair, and that they must be equal in inheritance, and claiming that polygamy is injustice and that divorce is injustice to the woman, and that stoning and cutting off and the like are barbaric acts that are not permissible to do to a human being, and the like. So judging by this type of system in the lives of the community, their wealth, their lineage, their contracts, and their religions is kufr in the Creator of the heavens and the earth." Aḍwā' al-Bayān vol. 4, p. 84.

Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir, may Allāh have mercy on him, said, and he is a contemporary Imām, a muḥaddith who died in 1958, and he had worked in the field of sharī'ah in Egypt and then resigned from it, said in his commentary and verification of the Musnad of Imam Aḥmad regarding ḥadīth no. 7747: "And whoever judges by other than what Allāh has revealed, deliberately and knowingly, is a kāfir. And whoever is pleased with that and approves of it is a kāfir, whether he judges by what he calls the law of the People of the Book or by what he calls man-made legislation. So all of it is kufr and exit from the Millah, may Allāh protect us from that."

Among what came from him, may Allah (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā) have mercy on him: "Is it permissible, according to the law of Allah, that Muslims in their countries rule with legislation derived from the pagan, atheistic legislations of Europe? Rather, with legislation into which false opinions and desires interfere, changing it and wearing it out as they wish, and its author does not care whether it agrees with the law of Islam or contradicts it. Muslims have never been afflicted with this except in the era of the Tatars," until he said, "I do not think that a man who knows his religion and believes in it wholly and in detail (..) I do not think he can do anything but affirm, without hesitation or interpretation, that the authority of the judiciary in this case is originally invalid, to which no correction or permission can be attached. The matter in these man-made laws is as clear as the sun. It is blatant disbelief (kufr bawwāḥ), with no concealment, no dissimulation, and no excuse for anyone who claims to belong to the people of Islam, whoever he may be, in acting upon them or approving them." 'Umdat al-Tafāsīr, vol. 4, p. 171.

Among the clear proofs in the Qur'ān and Sunnah, regarding the disbelief of whoever gives himself the right to legislate by making lawful and unlawful, changing the laws, and transgressing against the sovereignty of Allah (ḥākimiyyat Allāh), and thus making himself a lord to be worshipped, is what He (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā) informed about the disbelief of the Jews and Christians, in His saying: "They have taken their scholars and monks as lords besides Allāh, and the Messiah, the son of Mary. And they were not commanded except to worship one God; there is no deity except Him. Exalted is He above whatever they associate with Him" (al-Tawbah: 31).

Imām Aḥmad, al-Tirmidhī, and Ibn Jarīr narrated through the path of 'Adī ibn Ḥātim (radiya Allāhu 'anhu), as Ibn Kathīr mentioned in his Tafsīr, that when 'Adī came to the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam) to embrace Islam, and he was a Christian, he found him reading this verse. He said to the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam): "They did not worship them." He (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam) said: "Yes, they made lawful for them what was unlawful, and they made unlawful for them what was lawful, and they followed them, and that was their worship of them."

It is known that explaining the Qur'an with the established Sunnah is among the most correct explanations. And the indication of the verse and the ḥadīth is very clear, indicating that whoever legislates and makes lawful and unlawful has made himself a lord. And that whoever obeys him has worshipped him, and this is the worship of the people of Pharaoh to Pharaoh. So when he said to them {I have not known you to have a god other than me.} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 38) {I am your most high lord.} (An-Nāzi'āt: 24) He did not ask them to believe that he was the one who created them, provided for them, created the universe, and managed it, for the Egyptians in his era had gods they worshipped with this attribute, but rather they worshipped him as a legislating god through obedience. And this is the same role that the rulers of the Muslims today and their legislators and their kāfir (disbelieving), unjust, and wicked parliaments are playing. And He Almighty said: {So he bluffed his people, and they obeyed him. Indeed, they were [themselves] a people defiantly disobedient [of Allah].} (Az-Zukhruf: 54).

How could they not be when in their decrees and parliaments they make lawful alcohol, its manufacture, sale, and licensing, and they collect taxes and duties on it, and likewise houses of zinā and banks of usury, and they equalize in the right to vote on legislation between the believer and the kāfir, between the righteous and the wicked, between the man and the woman, between the scholar and the ignorant and they make forbidden alliances, and they conclude invalid treaties, and they prevent the mosques of Allāh from mentioning His name in them, and they strive to ruin them, and in return, they forbid what they have made lawful: enjoining good, forbidding evil, jihād, jizyah (tax on non-Muslims), iḥtisāb (holding people accountable to Islamic law), and types of lawful sale not to mention the laws that permit unjust taxes and codify the killing, imprisonment, and displacement of people unjustly and aggressively to the end of what they have legislated, codified, made lawful, and made unlawful, may Allāh punish them, how are they deluded.

It is worth drawing attention to an important matter: the survival of traces of the effects of the sharī'ah and snippets of its rulings in the records of man-made laws, such as some rulings on personal status, marriage, divorce, and inheritance, in some Islamic countries, does not make the ruling described as a ruling of the sharī'ah. Just as forgery and laughing at the minds of the simple-minded with the title of the constitution with the empty, deceptive word, which is their saying: "Islamic sharī'ah is the source of legislation and codification" or "Islamic sharī'ah is the primary source of legislation," as in some countries, or even exaggerating with deception by saying, "Islamic sharī'ah is the only source of legislation and codification," then legislating and codifying from other than Allāh under this title, as in some countries such as Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Yemen, this does not make the ruling according to sharī'ah, and Allāh is the One from whom help is sought, how they make light of the minds of their peoples by using some scholars who are agents of the sultan. Who would accept buying a bottle of wine with the word "milk" written on it, claiming it to be milk or oil? Does writing on it purify wine? This is from one aspect. From another aspect, it is known in our religion that impurity cancels out purity, and Allāh is the Richest of the rich from shirk, as He Almighty informed about Himself, and He said in the ḥadīth qudsi (divine ḥadīth): "Whoever does a deed in which he associates with Me someone else, I will leave him and his shirk." Narrated by Muslim. And Allāh does not accept except that the religion be wholly for Allāh. He, Almighty said: {Fight them until there is no fitnah (persecution) and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh.} (Al-Anfāl: 39).

He Almighty said: {Indeed, We have sent down to you the Book in truth. So worship Allāh, [being] sincere to Him in religion. Unquestionably, for Allāh is the pure religion.} (Az-Zumar: 3).

The lesson is not in the greatness or magnitude of this shirk in legislation or in the size of what is mixed with the judgment by other than what Allāh has revealed, but rather in deeming this action lawful, proceeding with it, and transgressing against the ḥākimiyyah of Allāh, who said: {Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him.} (Yūsuf: 67). The fitnah that we are in is that the religion in our countries is no longer all for Allāh. Ibn Kathīr said in the interpretation of His saying Almighty: {Fight them until there is no fitnah (persecution) and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh.} (Al-Anfāl: 39). From Ibn ‘Abbās: "Meaning: There is no shirk."

And from ‘Urwah and other scholars of ours: "[Until there is no fitnah (persecution)]: [Until no Muslim is tempted away from his religion]." And from Muḥammad ibn Ishāq: "And that tawḥīd (Oneness of God) is purely for Allāh, in which there is no shirk, and removes what is besides Him of rivals."

Imam ash-Shāṭibi, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "Every bid'ah (innovation), even if it is little, by legislating an addition or subtraction or changing the correct origin, all of that may be attached to what is legislated, so it is detrimental to the legislated. If someone did something like this in the sharī'ah itself deliberately, he would commit kufr.

As the addition and subtraction in it, or the change, whether little or much, is kufr, so there is no difference between what is little or much." Al-I'tisām.

Imam Ibn Taymiyyah said: "So if some of the religion is for Allāh and some of it is for other than Allāh, then it is obligatory to fight until the religion is all for Allāh. And that is why Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, fear Allāh and give up what remains [due to you] of interest, if you should be believers. And if you do not, then be informed of a war [against you] from Allāh and His Messenger.} (Al-Baqarah: 279).

And this verse was revealed about the people of Ṭā'if when they entered Islam and committed to prayer and fasting, but they refused to abandon usury, and Allāh Almighty clarified that they are at war with Him and His Messenger. So if these are at war with Allāh and His Messenger, it is obligatory to fight them, so how about those who abandon many of the sharā'i' of Islam, and most of them, like the Tartars?! And the scholars of

Islam have agreed that the group that refuses, if it refuses some of the Islamic obligations, then it is obligatory to fight them, if they speak the two testifications and refuse prayer and Zakāh, or fasting Ramaḍān or Ḥajj to the Ancient House, or judging between them by the Book and the Sunnah, or forbidding immoralities or alcohol or marrying close relatives, or deeming lawful the lives and wealth without right, or usury or gambling, or jihād against the kuffār, or collecting jizyah from the People of the Book and the like of the sharā'i' of Islam, that they are fought over until the religion is all for Allāh." Vol. 28, issue 217.

In conclusion:

If the religion of Allāh is mixed with other than His religion, and His legislation with other than His legislation, and His judgment with other than His judgment, then there will be fitnah against the religion of Allāh, and it is obligatory to fight until there is no fitnah. And this is what is happening today and what our rulers have reaped for us of corruption at home, aggression from abroad, hardship in public life, and humiliation at the hands of enemies.

Our Lord Almighty has called such rulers (the disbelievers, the wicked, the unjust), so agents of the sultans came and called these rulers good Muslims and legitimate guardians, as if they have a Qur'an specific to them in which they wrote: "And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed, then those are the Muslims, the believers, the righteous!!!"

Glory be to Allāh!! How so, when they have created specialists in man-made law, who have studied in the kāfir (disbelieving) Christian countries in the West, and they have called one of them "legislator" thus in explicit terms. Not to mention what these kings, presidents, and emirs do of enacting laws and legislating decrees, including dissolving the legislative bodies themselves (the parliament) if it occurs to them! So the ruler sometimes worships the legislator and asks people to worship him, and sometimes he imprisons him, and if he wants to kill him, he kills him!!! Just as the worshippers of idols used to make one of them a god from dates and then eat it! Or a god from wood and then burn it to cook on it! Not to mention the other aspects of kufr that they have clothed themselves with, from allegiance to the kāfirīn, killing the believers, and aspects of nullifying the faith from words and deeds.

This is about the kufr of the rulers of the countries of Islam in this era from the perspective of legislating from other than Allāh and judging by other than what Allāh has revealed.

But these warriors against Allāh and His Messenger have not sufficed with their kufr from this perspective, so they have added to it a kufr that is clearer and easier to prove, which is their allegiance to the enemies of the Muslims and their assistance and support of them against their peoples and the people of their Millah. So let us reflect on some of the concise details in the legal ruling on their other crime.

The Doctrine of Walā' (Loyalty) and Barā' (Dissociation), and the Ruling on Allegiance to the Kāfirīn and Its Types

And the Ruling on Fighting Muslims Alongside the Kuffār (Disbelievers) and the Apostates

Regardless of the races of people, their colors, the differences in their languages and peoples, their wealth and poverty, or any other consideration, the sharī'ah has considered them to have only two affiliations:

Mu'min (Believer) and Kāfir (Disbeliever). And it has been decided by clear texts from the Quran and the Sunnah that the people of faith are brothers and form one Ummah. For Allāh Almighty said: {The believers are but brothers} Al-Ḥujurāt 10.

It has also been decided that the kuffār, despite the differences in their doctrines of kufr, their races, their peoples, and their languages, are one Millah. With this clarity, it is decided that the people of responsibility, both humans and jinn, on this earth are two Ummahs: the people of faith and the people of kufr.

And Allāh Almighty has commanded with all clarity the believers to be loyal to each other and to disavow the kāfirīn, and upon this, the Doctrine of Walā' (Loyalty) and Barā' (Dissociation) is built. This issue is not a subsidiary issue of the issues of faith, but rather it is a fundamental issue, linked to the foundation of tawḥīd, as belief or disbelief is built upon it, and a person's affiliation to one of these two Ummahs.

Allāh Almighty said: {You will not find a people who believe in Allāh and the Last Day having affection for those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger, even if they were their fathers or their sons or their brothers or their relatives. Those - He has decreed within their hearts faith and supported them with spirit from Him. And He will admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow, wherein they abide eternally. Allāh is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him - those are the party of Allāh. Unquestionably, the party of Allāh - they are the successful.} (Al-Mujādilah: 22) And He informed, saying: {The believing men and believing women are allies of one another.} At-Tawbah - 81. {And those who disbelieve are allies of one another.} Al-Anfāl - 73. {The hypocrite men and hypocrite women are of one another.} At-Tawbah - 67.

Allāh Almighty said: {And indeed, the wrongdoers are allies of one another; but Allāh is the protector of the righteous.} Al-Jāthiyah: 19. So they are only two affiliations and nationalities, and two bonds and ties, a Muslim is loyal to a Muslim and a kāfir and a munāfiq (hypocrite) are loyal to each other.

Allāh has commanded us to believe in this doctrine and informed us that if we do not do it, {there will be fitnah on earth and great corruption.} Al-Anfāl 73. The one who looks at the verses of the Noble Qur'an will find that they have covered the issue of commanding loyalty to the believers and what results from it, and the prohibition of loyalty to the kāfirīn and the command to disavow them and what results from it, with all focus and clarity. We can mention some of that briefly by extracting the rulings and Qur'anic decisions as follows:

1. The Believer is the Ally of the Believer:
Allāh Almighty said: {The believing men and believing women are allies of one another. They enjoin what is right and forbid what is wrong and establish prayer and give Zakāh and obey Allāh and His Messenger.} (At-Tawbah: 71).

2. The Kāfir is the Ally of the Kāfir:
Allāh Almighty said: {And those who disbelieve are allies of one another.} Al-Anfāl - 72. {The hypocrite men and hypocrite women are for one another. They enjoin what is wrong and forbid what is right} At-Tawbah - 67.

3. Prohibition of Allegiance to the Kāfirīn:
Allāh Almighty said: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allāh} Āl 'Imrān 28

Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take the disbelievers as allies instead of the believers.} An-Nisā' - 144.

4. The Believer's Allegiance to the Believer is an Allegiance to Allāh and His Messenger, and it is Victory and Triumph:
Allāh Almighty said: {Your ally is none but Allāh and [therefore] His Messenger and those who have believed} Al-Mā'idah - 55.

And he said: {And whoever is an ally of Allāh and His Messenger and those who have believed - indeed, the party of Allāh will be the predominant.} Al-Mā'idah - 56.

5. The Muslim's Allegiance to the Kāfirīn is an Allegiance to Satan, and Entry into His Party:
 And it is a loss and wrath from Allāh Almighty that necessitates eternity in the Fire. Allāh Almighty said: {Have you not considered those who make allies of a people upon whom is the wrath of Allāh? They are neither of you nor of them, and they swear to untruth while they know [it].} (Al-Mujādilah: 14) until His saying Almighty: {Satan has overcome them and made them forget the remembrance of Allāh. Those are the party of Satan. Unquestionably, the party of Satan - they will be the losers.} (Al-Mujādilah: 19).

As Allāh Almighty said: {You see many of them making allies of those who disbelieve. How wretched is that which they have put forth for themselves in that Allāh has become angry with them, and in the punishment they will abide eternally. And if they had been believing in Allāh and the Prophet and in what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them as allies; but many of them are defiantly disobedient.} (Al-Mā'idah: 80).

Allāh Almighty said: {And whoever takes Satan as an ally instead of Allāh has certainly suffered a clear loss.} (An-Nisā': 119)

6. The Muslim's Allegiance to the Kāfirīn is Weak, and Satan Will Disavow Their Allegiance After He Has Entangled Them in Kufr: Allāh Almighty said: {The example of those who take allies other than Allāh is like that of the spider who takes a home. And indeed, the weakest of homes is the home of the spider, if they only knew.} (Al-'Ankabūt: 41)

Allāh Almighty said: {He only said, "You have only taken, other than Allāh, idols as [a bond of] affection among you in worldly life. Then on the Day of Resurrection you will deny one another and curse one another, and your refuge will be the Fire, and you will not have any helpers."} (Al-'Ankabūt: 25)

Allāh Almighty said: {Like the example of Satan when he says to man, "Disbelieve." But when he disbelieves, he says, "Indeed, I am disassociated from you. Indeed, I fear Allāh, Lord of the worlds."} (Al-Ḥashr: 16).

7. The Muslim's Allegiance to the Kāfirīn Makes Him One of Them, Nullifies His Deeds, and Leads Him to Apostasy: Allāh Almighty said in Sūrat al-Mā'idah: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies. They are [in fact] allies of one another. And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them. Indeed, Allāh guides not the wrongdoing people.} (Al-Mā'idah: 51). Then He said after it: {And those who have believed will say, "Are these the ones who swore by Allāh their strongest oaths that they were with you?" Their deeds have become worthless, and they have become losers. O you who have believed, whoever of you should revert from his religion - Allāh will bring forth [in place of them] a people He will love and who will love Him, humble toward the believers, powerful against the disbelievers; they strive in the cause of Allāh and do not fear the blame of a critic. That is the favor of Allāh; He bestows it upon whom He wills. And Allāh is all-Encompassing and Knowing.} Al-Mā'idah - 53 - 54.

After He said: {O you who have believed, do not take the disbelievers as allies instead of the believers. Do you wish to give Allāh against yourselves a clear case?} (An-Nisā': 144). He said after it: {Indeed, the hypocrites will be in the lowest depths of the Fire - and never will you find for them a helper} An-Nisā' - 145.

8. Prohibition of Taking Relatives, People, and Clan as Allies if They are Kāfirīn: And that their affection for them with their kufr because of kinship contradicts faith. Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take your fathers or your brothers as allies if they have preferred disbelief over belief. And whoever among you does so - then it is those who are the wrongdoers. Say, [O Muḥammad], "If your fathers, your sons, your brothers, your wives, your relatives, wealth which you have obtained, commerce wherein you fear decline, and dwellings with which you are pleased are more beloved to you than Allāh and His Messenger and jihād in His cause, then wait until Allāh executes His command. And Allāh does not guide the defiantly disobedient people."} (At-Tawbah - 23 - 24).

Allāh Almighty said: {You will not find a people who believe in Allāh and the Last Day having affection for those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger, even if they were their fathers or their sons or their brothers or their relatives. Those - He has decreed within their hearts faith and supported them with spirit from Him. And He will admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow, wherein they abide eternally. Allāh is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him - those are the party of Allāh. Unquestionably, the party of Allāh - they are the successful.} (Al-Mujādilah: 22).

9. Prohibition of Taking the Kuffār as Intimates and Helpers, and Hatred Has Appeared from Their Mouths:

Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take as intimates those other than yourselves, for they will not spare you [any] ruin. They wish you would have hardship. Hatred has already appeared from their mouths, and what their breasts conceal is greater. We have certainly shown you the signs, if you will use reason.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 118)

10. Prohibition of Allegiance to Those Who Fought Us and Expelled Us from Our Homes:

Allāh Almighty said: {Allāh only forbids you from those who fight you because of religion and expel you from your homes and aid in your expulsion - [He forbids] that you make allies of them. And whoever makes allies of them - then it is those who are the wrongdoers.} (Al-Mumtaḥanah: 9).

11. Prohibition of Allegiance to Those Who Have Taken Our Religion in Ridicule and Play:

Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take as allies those who take your religion in ridicule and play from among those who were given the Scripture before you nor the disbelievers. And fear Allāh, if you should be believers.} (Al-Mā'idah: 57).

12. Emphasis on the Prohibition of Allegiance to the Jews and Christians in Particular Among the Kāfirīn:

The one who looks at the reasons for the revelation of most of the verses prohibiting allegiance to the kāfirīn will find that they were revealed in the prohibition of allegiance to the Jews and Christians. Nevertheless, the verses of the Qur'an have explicitly named them from among the kāfirīn who are prohibited from allegiance to them all. Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies.} Al-Mā'idah - 51. Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take those who take your religion in ridicule and play from among those who were given the Scripture before you nor the disbelievers as allies.} Al-Mā'idah - 57.

13. Command to Take the Millah of Ibrāhīm (Abraham) with Complete Disavowal of the Kāfirīn and Hating and Opposing Them: Allāh Almighty said: {There has already been for you an excellent pattern in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people, "Indeed, we are disassociated from you and from whatever you worship other than Allāh. We have denied you, and there has appeared between us and you animosity and hatred forever until you believe in Allāh alone" except for the saying of Abraham to his father, "I will surely ask forgiveness for you, but I have not [power to do] for you anything from Allāh." Our Lord, upon You we have relied, and to You we have turned in repentance, and to You is the destination.} (Al-Mumtaḥanah: 4)

14. The Qur'anic Verses Have Identified the Excuses of Those Who Are Loyal to the Kuffār from Among the Muslims and Fall into Hypocrisy, as They are Either for Seeking Honor or for Fear of Harm and Disasters: The Qur'an has refuted these excuses, invalidated them, and ruled that their possessors are hypocrites and apostates and belong to the kuffār, because of the sickness of their hearts, and that their consequence is regret in this world and the Hereafter, and that their destination is the Fire. Allāh Almighty said: {Give tidings to the hypocrites that there is for them a painful punishment - Those who take disbelievers as allies instead of the believers. Do they seek with them honor [while] indeed, to Allāh belongs all honor?} An-Nisā' - 138 - 139. Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians

as allies. They are [in fact] allies of one another. And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them. Indeed, Allāh guides not the wrongdoing people. So you see those in whose hearts is disease hastening into [alliance with] them, saying, "We fear that a misfortune may strike us." But perhaps Allāh will bring conquest or a decision from Him, and they will become, over what they have been concealing within themselves, regretful.} Al-Mā'idah - 51 - 52.

Among the most dangerous manifestations of allegiance to the kāfirīn are:

1. Sitting with the kuffār, apostates, and munāfiqūn while they mock the verses of Allāh, His religious rites, and His believing servants: Allāh Almighty said: {And it has already been revealed to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh denied [by them] and mocked at, then do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them. Indeed Allāh will gather the hypocrites and disbelievers in Hell all together.} (An-Nisā': 140). Obeying the kuffār in what Allāh has forbidden, even in something small: Allāh Almighty said in Sūrat Muḥammad, peace and blessings be upon him: {Indeed, those who reverted on their heels after guidance had become clear to them - Satan enticed them and prolonged hope for them. That is because they said to those who hated what Allāh sent down, "We will obey you in part of the matter." And Allāh knows what they conceal.} (Muḥammad: 25-26). So obeying those who hate the law of Allāh in their command, even in something small, is a path to apostasy.
2. Taking the kuffār as intimates, advisors, counselors, and assistants, and placing Muslims under their command and prohibition, is a form of allegiance to them that Allāh has forbidden.

3. Giving advice to the kuffār and guiding them to what strengthens them and supporting them with opinion against the Muslims.
4. Resorting to their laws and sharā'ī is one of the greatest forms of allegiance to them. Imam Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in Majmū' al-Fatāwa vol. 28/199: "And from the same kind of allegiance to the kuffār with which Allāh condemned the People of the Book and the munāfiqūn is believing in some of what they are upon of kufr or resorting to them for judgment without the Book of Allāh, as Allāh Almighty said: {Have you not seen those who were given a portion of the Scripture? They believe in al-Jibt and al-Ṭāghūt and say about those who disbelieve, "These are better guided than the believers as to [their] way."} An-Nisā' 51.

However, the most dangerous and clearest of that in apostasy is:

Fighting with them, under their banner, and in the service of their interests, and this is the greatest form of allegiance, where a person sacrifices his soul for the sake of the kuffār, and it is a kufr that takes one out of the Millah (religion) of Islam and belongs to them by the text of the Qur'an: {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} Al-Mā'idah - 51. And Allāh has disavowed him: {has nothing with Allāh} Al-Baqarah - 28. Allāh Almighty has said: {Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of Ṭāghūt.} An-Nisā' - 76. Allāh Almighty said: {Have you not seen those who practice hypocrisy, saying to their brothers who have disbelieved among the People of the Scripture, "If you are expelled, we will surely leave with you, and we will not obey, in your case, anyone forever; and if you are fought, we will surely aid you." And Allāh testifies that they are liars.} (Al-Ḥashr: 11).

Among the statements that have been mentioned in the explanation of some of the previous Qur'anic texts:

Ibn Ḥazm, may Allāh have mercy on him, said, conveying the consensus: "It is correct that the saying of Allāh Almighty {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} is only on its apparent meaning, that he is a kāfir from the kuffār, and this is a right in which two Muslims do not differ." Al-Muḥallā vol. 13, p. 25.

Al-Ṭabarī said in his Tafsīr vol. 1, p. 277: "Whoever is loyal to the Jews and Christians from other than the believers, then he is one of them, meaning from the people of their religion and their Millah, for whoever is loyal to someone is only pleased with him and with his religion and what he is upon, and if he is pleased with him and pleased with his religion, then he has opposed what is Mukhālafah (in opposition) to it and is displeased and his ruling becomes his ruling."

Ibn Jarīr said in the explanation of whoever takes the kuffār as helpers, supporters, and backers, being loyal to them in their religion and supporting them against the Muslims, then "he has nothing with Allāh, meaning that Allāh has disavowed him by his apostasy from his religion and his entry into kufr." Vol. 3, p. 228.

Ibn al-Qayyim said in his book Aḥkām Ahl adh-Dhimma vol. 1, p. 67: "Indeed, Allāh has judged, and there is no better judge than Him, that whoever is loyal to the Jews and Christians is one of them {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} so if their allies are one of them by the text of the Qur'an, then they have their ruling."

Ibn Kathīr said in the explanation of Sūrat al-Mā'idah, verses 50-53: "Meaning that Allāh Almighty has forbidden His believing servants from being loyal to the Jews and Christians, who are the enemies of Islam and its people, may Allāh fight them. Then He informed that some of them are allies of each other. Then He threatened and warned those who engage in that, saying: {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} Al-Mā'idah - 51. Ibn Abī Ḥātim said that 'Umar ordered Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī to raise to him what he took and gave in one hide, and he had a Christian scribe, so he raised that to him, so 'Umar was surprised and said: This is indeed a memorizer, are you a reader for us of a book in the mosque that came from Syria? He said: He cannot, so 'Umar said: Is he in a state of janābah (major ritual impurity)? He said: No, but Christian: He said: So he rebuked me and struck my thigh and said: Expel him, then he recited: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies.} Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan narrated 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Utbah said: Let one of you fear being a Jew or a Christian without realizing it, he said: So we thought he meant this verse."

Ibn Kathīr stated regarding the verse, "So you see those in whose hearts is disease" [5:52]: "This refers to those with doubt, suspicion, and hypocrisy. "Hastening into [alliance with] them" indicates they rush to pledge allegiance and affection to the kāfirīn, both inwardly and outwardly, "saying, 'We fear that a misfortune may strike us.'" They justify their affection and allegiance by fearing that the kāfirīn might triumph over the Muslims, hoping to gain favor with the Jews and Christians, which would benefit them.

In response, Allāh Almighty says, "But perhaps Allāh will bring conquest." As-Suddi interpreted this as the conquest of Mecca, while others viewed it as judgment and separation, "or a decision from Him." As-Suddi explained this as imposing the jizyah on the Jews and Christians. Consequently, "they will become," referring to those hypocrites (munāfiqūn) who were loyal to the Jews and Christians, "over what they have been concealing within themselves," meaning from allegiance, "regretful." They will regret their actions, which neither benefited them nor averted the feared outcome but instead became the source of their corruption.

Their true nature was exposed, and Allāh revealed their matter to His believing servants in this world, after it had been concealed, and their true state was unknown. Once the reasons exposing them were concluded, their matter became clear to the believing servants of Allāh.

Glory be to Allāh, as if this verse and its explanation narrate the situation of the rulers of the Muslim countries who cooperate with it, like Musharraf and his Pakistani government, in their allegiance to America because they think that it will triumph over the Muslims, so they will have a position with them, and their excuse for that is fear of the disaster and the calamity from it, and the desire to seek honor from it, and what they will regret of the exposure of their matter and their loss and their punishment at the hands of the believers when the victory of Allāh comes).

And in His saying Almighty: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allāh} [Āl ‘Imrān 28] Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, said: "Allāh Almighty has forbidden His believing servants from being loyal to the kāfirīn and from taking them as allies to secretly share with them affection from other than the believers. Then He threatened that, so Allāh Almighty said:

{And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allāh} meaning: And whoever commits this prohibition of Allāh, then Allāh has disavowed him: {And Allāh warns you of Himself} meaning: He warns you of His vengeance in Mukhālafah (opposition) to Him and His power and His punishment for whoever is loyal to His enemies and opposes His allies."

And in His saying Almighty from Sūrat Āl ‘Imrān {O you who have believed, do not take as intimates those other than yourselves}. Ibn Kathīr said: "Allāh Almighty says, prohibiting His believing servants from taking the munāfiqūn as intimates, meaning they inform them of their secrets and what they conceal for their enemies, and the munāfiqūn exert their effort and energy, they do not spare the believers any ruin, meaning they strive in opposition to them and what harms them with every possibility and with what they can of deceit and deception, and they wish what troubles the believers and puts them in difficulty and is hard for them."

As we mentioned, the verses, ḥadīth, statements, and sayings of the scholars are mutually supportive with these meanings.

These facts are among the priorities of Islam and the basics of the ‘Aqīdah (creed), which are summarized with all brevity and clarity by the explicit address of the Qur’an to every Muslim:

{And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} {And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allāh} and this is clear. So whoever is loyal to the kuffār is a kāfir apostate like them, and Allāh has disavowed him.

Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb has counted the support of the kuffār against the Muslims in the ten nullifiers of Islam that he mentioned, which are:

1. Associating partners with Allāh, sacrificing to other than Allāh and to the grave.
2. Whoever makes between himself and Allāh intermediaries whom he calls upon, asks for intercession, and relies upon.
3. Whoever does not declare the polytheists as kuffār (disbelievers), or doubts their kufr (disbelief), or validates their doctrine has committed kufr.
4. Whoever believes that guidance other than the guidance of the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, is more complete than his guidance, or that the judgment of other than him is better than his judgment, like the one who prefers the judgment of the ṭawāghīt (false gods) over his judgment, is a kāfir.
5. Whoever hates something from what the Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, brought—even if he acts upon it—is a kāfir.
6. Whoever mocks anything from the religion of the Messenger or his reward or his punishment has committed kufr, and the evidence is: {Say, "Was it [at] Allāh and His verses and His Messenger that you were mocking?"} (At-Tawbah: 65).

7. Magic, so whoever does it or is pleased with it has committed kufr. {But the two angels do not teach anyone unless they say, "We are but a trial, so do not disbelieve." } (Al-Baqarah: 102).
8. Supporting the polytheists and helping them against the Muslims: {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.} (Al-Mā'idah: 51) and this is the point of evidence.
9. Whoever believes that some people are allowed to go outside the shari'ah of Muḥammad, peace and blessings be upon him, as al-Khiḍr went outside the shari'ah of Mūsā, peace be upon him, is a kāfir.<sup>6</sup>
10. Whoever turns away from the religion of Allāh—neither learning it nor acting upon it—. {And those who disbelieve - from that which they are warned, are turning away.} (Al-Aḥqāf: 3).

Sulaymān ibn 'Abd Allāh ibn al-Shaykh Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb said: "Know, may Allah (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā) have mercy on you, that if a person shows agreement with the polytheists (mushrikīn) regarding their religion out of fear of them, to appease them, and to be lenient in order to ward off their evil – then he is a kāfir like them, even if he hates their religion, detests them, and loves Islam and the Muslims. This is if nothing more than that occurs from him. So how would it be if he were in a place of protection and summoned them, entered into their obedience, and showed agreement with their false religion, helped them with victory, allied with them, and cut off allegiance between himself and the Muslims? There is no doubt that such a person is a kāfir, one of the most severe in enmity towards Allah (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā) and His Messenger (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam), and no one is excepted from that except the coerced. The scholars have unanimously agreed that whoever speaks kufr jokingly, then he commits kufr, so how about one who shows kufr out of fear and greed?" The Sheikh cited twenty proofs for his statement, including: "And the Jews will not be pleased with you, nor the Christians until you follow their religion" (al-Baqarah: 120), "And they will continue to fight you" (al-Baqarah: 217).

{Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers.} (Āl 'Imrān: 28) {And it has already been revealed to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh denied [by them] and mocked at, then do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them.} (An-Nisā': 140) {You see many of them making allies of those who disbelieve. How wretched is that which they have put forth for themselves in that Allāh has become angry with them, and in the punishment they will abide eternally. And if they had been believing in Allāh and the Prophet and in what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them as allies; but many of them are defiantly disobedient.} (Al-Mā'idah: 80 - 81) .

The ḥadīth "Whoever associates with a polytheist and lives with him is like him". Sheikh Sulaymān 'Abd Allāh ibn Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb said that the one who claims Islam and is with the polytheists (mushrikīn) in assembly, support, and dwelling, and whom the polytheists consider to be one of them, is a kāfir like them, even if he claims Islam. This is like the people who resided in Mecca and claimed Islam after the Hijrah, and went out to Badr. Some of the Companions thought that they were Muslims and said: "We have killed our brothers," so Allah (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā) revealed: "Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while wronging themselves" (al-Nisā':67). Whoever displays signs of hypocrisy indicating it, such as apostasy when forming parties against the believers and forsaking them when the enemy gathers, it is permissible to call him a munāfiq.

Therefore, and for the sake of bearing witness for Allah (subḥānahu wa ta'ālā), we say:

Indeed, among the greatest deceptions, injustices, and fabrications against Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā) is lying. And among the greatest alterations of the verses of Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā) and taking them in ridicule, and among selling the religion for worldly gain and purchasing the verses of Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā) for a paltry price, is that the deceivers try to portray this complete allegiance on the part of the rulers of the Muslims, and this strong alliance established between them and the Jews and Christians, from Americans and Europeans and other kuffār, as a matter of necessities and legitimate interests, or cases of coercion, after hypocrisy has become apparent from them, and the forms of their allegiance to the kuffār have varied. Rather, it has reached its highest levels, from fighting with them and defending them, and supporting them against the Muslims, no matter how much it costs in terms of destroying the homes of the Muslims, taking their lives, shedding their blood, selling their lands, and plundering their wealth. This can only be called betrayal, collaboration with them, allegiance to the kāfirīn, and disavowal of the believers.

The undeniable truth is that the apostasy resulting from this allegiance to the kuffār, which most of the rulers of the Muslims today are characterized by, and have dragged their systems and governments into, and have dragged their soldiers, security men, and workers in their governments into, is among the clearest aspects of their kufr and hypocrisy.

In addition to their explicit kufr in changing the laws of Islam and replacing them with the laws of kufr and ṭāghūt, from the philosophies and laws of the enemies of this religion, whom they have allied with, they are two witnesses that brand these rulers with apostasy, kufr, and expulsion from the millah of Islam.

This judgment is not refuted by the deception of the deceivers who have appointed themselves as adversaries against these traitors, despite the saying of Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā): "And do not be an advocate for the deceitful" [An-Nisā:105].

Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā) has said: "Indeed, We have revealed to you the Book in truth so you may judge between the people by that which Allāh has shown you. And do not be an advocate for the deceitful," until His saying: "Here you are who argue on their behalf in [this] worldly life, but who will argue with Allāh for them on the Day of Resurrection, or who will be their advocate?" [An-Nisā:105-109].

So glory be to Allāh! {Then do they not reflect upon the Qur'an, or are there locks upon [their] hearts?} And I do not think it is except for both together.

Hearts locked and not reflecting on the Qur'an, due to what has accumulated on those hearts from the unlawful and eating the wealth of the sultans, in fulfillment of his saying, peace and blessings be upon him: "Whoever comes to the doors of the sultans is tempted. And no servant increases in closeness to the sultan except that he increases in distance from Allāh."

May Allāh distance them.

Rising up against the ruler if he apostatizes from Islam or is a kāfir is obligatory on the Muslims by consensus (ijmāʿ):

What is the legal consequence of the ruler's kufr for the Muslims or his apostasy from Islam?:

As we mentioned earlier, all the misfortunes of the Muslims and the disasters that have befallen them internally are, in reality, due to the absence of the law of Allah (sharīʿat Allāh) from them, their being ruled by other than what Allah (subḥānahu wa taʿālā) has revealed, the kufr of their rulers, and their allegiance to the kuffār. The principle in the Sharīʿah is that the imām (leader) is a shield behind whom one fights, by whom aggression is repelled, by whom justice and equity are established, and by whom rights are adjudicated, so the umma (community) is balanced internally and repels its enemy externally. In proportion to the corruption of the ruler, the affairs of the subjects become corrupt, and the scholars are the controllers of the rulers. In proportion to their corruption, the rulers become corrupt. As it is stated in the saying: "Two groups of people, if they are righteous, the people are righteous, and if they are corrupt, the people are corrupt: the scholars and the rulers." The truth is that discussing the issue of whether our rulers are Muslim or kāfir, and whether they are apostates, after matters have come to what we see today, is an issue of utmost importance and seriousness, because it is the gateway to searching for a way out of the problems of the Muslims today. It is a matter of our religion and our worldly affairs. In short, the legal ruling on whether the ruler is Muslim or kāfir entails one of two completely contradictory jurisprudential consequences.

Before delving into the implications of a ruler's Islam or kufr (disbelief), we must mention a crucial point that serves as the dividing line between guidance and misguidance in this matter. This point is that a ruler's Islam or kufr is entirely tied to the issue of his ruling by the Sharīʿa (Islamic law) with which he governs. In other words:

- If the judgment is for Allāh and the sharīʿah is established, then the ruler is a Muslim, unless his Islam is nullified.
- And if the ruler is a Muslim, then from the requirements of that is that he judge by what Allāh has revealed.

There is no ruling by what Allah has revealed if the ruler is a kāfir (disbeliever), and the ruler is not a Muslim if he rules by other than what Allah has revealed. These are synonymous: a Muslim ruler = ruling by what Allah has revealed.

Conversely: judgment by other than what Allāh has revealed = kāfir ruler.

We clarified this in the previous section when we spoke about ḥākimiyyah (sovereignty) and walāʾ (allegiance).

Among the necessary consequences of the ruler being a Muslim who rules by the Sharīʿa of Allah, shows walāʾ to the believers and enmity to the disbelievers:

- The obligation of hearing and obeying him in everything he commands, as long as it is not disobedience, in ease and hardship, and patience with selfishness, and not disputing with him in his command. Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you.} (An-Nisā': 59).
- The obligation of the Muslims to respect his covenants, contracts, treaties, agreements, security, and protection, as long as they are within the limits of the sharīʿah.
- The obligation of marching with him if he calls the Muslims to jihād in the cause of Allāh against the kuffār or the apostates or the rebels or those who cause corruption in the land.
- The obligation of advising him and cooperating with him in righteousness, piety, and good to the best of one's ability, and not presuming upon him unless he neglects enjoining good and forbidding evil.
- The obligation of patience with him, and obedience to him, even if he takes your wealth and whips your back, and even if he is clothed with wickedness in himself and injustice in his judgment, unless he is clothed with a clear kufr for which there is evidence from Allāh. The ḥadīth indicating these matters are numerous.

All of this is as long as the ruler is a Muslim who has not clothed himself with a nullifier from the nullifiers of faith, or a clear kufr for which there is evidence from Allāh, as in the authentic ḥadīth agreed upon, from ʿUbādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit, may Allāh be pleased with him, he said: "The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, called us, so we pledged allegiance to him, and among what he took from us was: that we pledge allegiance to hearing and obedience in our ease and hardship, our difficulty and ease, and selfishness over us, and that we do not dispute the authority with its people, he, peace and blessings be upon him, said "unless you see a clear kufr for which you have evidence from Allāh"" and this is the narration of Muslim.

The Obligation of Striving Against the Kāfir or Apostate Ruler:

In his commentary on Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, while explaining this ḥadīth, Imam al-Nawawī transmitted the consensus (ijmāʿ) reported by Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ regarding rebelling against a ruler if he commits kufr disbelief. He stated: "Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ said: The scholars have reached a consensus (ajmaʿa) that the imāmah (leadership) cannot be established for a kāfir. And that if kufr occurs to him, he is removed. Likewise, if he abandons establishing the ṣalawāt (prayers) and calling to them." Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ also said: "If kufr occurs to him, or he changes the sharīʿah, or introduces an innovation (bidʿah), he is no longer under the rule of governance, his obedience falls away, and it is obligatory upon the Muslims to rise up against him, depose him, and install a just imām if they are able to do so. If that can only be done by a faction, it is obligatory upon them to depose the kāfir. As for the innovator (mubtadiʿ), it is not obligatory to rise up against him unless they believe they have the power to do so. If they are certain of their inability, it is not obligatory to rise up, and the Muslim must emigrate from his land and flee with his religion." (Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim bi-Sharḥ al-Nawawī, vol. 12, p. 229)

Al-Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Ḥajar said in Fath al-Bārī Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī: "He – meaning the imām – is dismissed due to kufr by consensus (ijmāʿ). Thus, it is obligatory upon every Muslim to rise up in that case. Whoever is strong enough to do so will be rewarded, and whoever compromises is sinful, and whoever is unable must emigrate from that land." (vol. 13, p. 154)

Abu Ya‘lā said: "If something occurs from him that impugns his religion, we consider: if he commits kufr after his īmān (faith), then he has departed from the imāmah, and there is no question about this because he has left the millah and it is obligatory to kill him."

Ustadh ‘Abd al-Qādir ‘Awdah (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in his book, Islām bayna Jahl Abnā’ih wa ‘Ajz ‘Ulamā’ih (Islam Between the Ignorance of its Sons and the Inability of its Scholars): "That permitting what is unanimously prohibited, such as zinā (adultery) and intoxication, permitting the nullification of the ḥudūd and the abrogation of the rulings of the shari‘ah, and legislating what Allāh has not authorized is indeed kufr and apostasy (riddah). And that rebelling against the Muslim ruler if he becomes an apostate is obligatory upon the Muslims. The lowest level of rebelling against the rulers is disobeying their commands and prohibitions that contradict the shari‘ah."

The scholars and commentators have inferred from His saying Almighty to our prophet Ibrāhīm, peace be upon him: {And [mention, O Muḥammad], when Abraham was tried by his Lord with commands and he fulfilled them. [Allāh] said, "Indeed, I will make you an Imam for the people." [Abraham] said, "And of my descendants?" [Allāh] said, "My covenant does not include the wrongdoers."} (Al-Baqarah: 124).

That the Imamate is not established for a kāfir, nor for a wicked or unjust person initially. Likewise, they inferred from His saying Almighty: {And never will Allāh give the disbelievers over the believers a way [to overcome them].} (An-Nisā’: 141). Meaning that Allāh does not give the kāfirīn authority, power, and control over the believers. And among the greatest authority is the authority of the ruler, for it is the supreme Imamate, and the greatest way to obedience and power, but rather the scholars have prevented selling the Muslim slave to a kāfir, and likewise they have prevented positions and authorities in which the Muslim is under the kāfir, and from this aspect, the marriage of a Muslim woman to a kāfir is prohibited, because the authority of the home is for the husband, and the Muslim woman will be under the command of a kāfir, while the opposite is permissible. In conclusion, as an-Nawawi conveyed, the consensus on the invalidity of the authority of the kāfir ruler or whoever apostatized and kufr occurred to him, and the obligation of rising up against him and removing him.

It came in the book Al-Imāmah al-'Uẓmā (The Supreme Imamate) among the people of the Sunnah authored by 'Abd Allāh ad-Dumayjī in the third chapter under the title "Removing the Imam and Rising up Against the Imams" p. 465, from which we quote briefly the following:

It is agreed upon among the scholars that as long as the Imam is fulfilling his obligations placed upon his shoulders in managing the affairs of his subjects, being just among them, then it is not permissible to remove him or rise up against him, but rather that is what Islam has warned against and threatened the treacherous with a painful punishment. But there are great matters that have an impact on the religious and worldly lives of the Muslims, including what leads to the necessity of removing the Imam who has committed them. These matters include what is agreed upon among the scholars and what is disagreed upon. Now we review these reasons to see the opinions of the scholars on them:

The First: Kufr and Apostasy After Islam

The first of the matters and the greatest of the reasons necessitating the removal of the ruler is apostasy and kufr after faith, so if the Imam commits a great crime that leads to kufr and apostasy from the religion, then he is removed by that and he has no authority over a Muslim in any way.

Allāh the Almighty said: "{And Allāh will never grant the disbelievers a way [of authority] over the believers}" [al-Nisā' 141]. And what way is greater than the way of imāmah?

In the ḥadīth narrated by ‘Ubādah ibn al-Ṣāmit (may Allāh be pleased with him), he said: "The Prophet (ﷺ) called us and we gave him the Pledge of allegiance for Islam, and among the conditions on which he took the Pledge from us, was that we were to listen and obey (the orders) both at the time when we were active and at the time when we were tired, and at our difficult time and at our ease and to be obedient to the ruler and give him his right even if he did not give us our right, and not to fight against him unless we noticed him having kufr bawwāḥ (open disbelief) for which we would have a proof with us from Allah" Agreed upon.

Al-Khaṭṭābī said: "The meaning of bawwāḥ is apparent (obvious)." Al-Ḥāfiẓ ibn Ḥajar said in his commentary on al-Bukhārī: "And 'for which you have proof from Allāh' means a clear verse and a sound khabar (report) that does not allow for interpretation." And al-Nawawī said in his commentary on Muslim: "What is meant by kufr here is disobedience (ma‘ṣiyah), and the meaning of the ḥadīth is do not dispute with the rulers in their authority, nor object to them, unless you see from them a verified evil that you know from the foundations of Islam."

From the understanding of this ḥadīth, it is not required that this ruler declares apostasy from Islam or kufr, but it is sufficient for him to show some of the manifestations that necessitate kufr. Shaykh Anwar Shah Kashmiri said in his book Īkfār al-Mulḥidīn (Declaring Atheists to be Disbelievers), p. 22 in the version of al-Majlis al-‘Ilmī in Karachi: "And this ḥadīth also indicates that it is permissible to declare the people of the qibla to be disbelievers even if they do not leave the qiblah, and that kufr may be committed without commitment and without intending to change the millah, otherwise the one who sees it does not need proof."

The apparent event is that whoever becomes a disbeliever must be removed, and this is the least that the Ummah must do towards him, as what is obligatory is that he be fought and his blood be made permissible because of his apostasy, due to his saying, peace and blessings be upon him (Whoever changes his religion, kill him).- Then ad-

Dumayjī narrated the words of al-Qāḍī ‘Iyād and the words of Ibn Ḥajar and al-Qāḍī Abū Ya’lā that we have already mentioned- then he said: as-Safāqisī said: “They agreed that if the Khaleefah is calls to kufr or bid’ah, he is to be removed” Irshād as-Sārī bi-Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī (Guidance of the Traveler in Explaining Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī) vol. 10 p. 217.

The Second: Abandoning Prayer and Calling to It [abandonment]

[Known]

The Third: Abandoning Judgment by What Allāh Has Revealed

What indicates that this reason necessitates the removal of the imām in all its forms, both those that constitute kufr and those that constitute immoral behavior (mufasssiqah), is its unrestricted occurrence in the following authentic prophetic aḥādīth:

On the authority of Anas ibn Mālīk (may Allāh be pleased with him) that the Messenger of Allāh (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) said: “Listen and obey, even if a Habashi slave is appointed over you whose head is like a raisin, as long as he establishes the Book of Allāh among you.” Narrated by al-Bukhārī.

On the authority of Umm al-Ḥuṣayn al-Aḥmasiyyah (may Allāh be pleased with her), she said: “I performed ḥajj (pilgrimage) with the Messenger of Allāh (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) during the Farewell Pilgrimage... until she said: Then I heard him say, 'If a mutilated slave is appointed over you – I think she said, a black one – who leads you with the Book of Allāh, then listen to him and obey him.'” And in a narration by al-Tirmidhi and al-Nasa'i: “I heard him say, 'O people, fear Allāh, and if a mutilated

Habashi slave is appointed over you, then listen to him and obey him as long as he establishes the Book of Allāh among you."

These ḥadīth are clear in indicating that it is a condition for hearing and obedience that the Imam leads his subjects with the Book of Allāh, but if he does not judge among them by the law of Allāh, then there is no hearing or obedience for him, and this necessitates his removal, and this is in the cases of judging by other than what Allāh has revealed that entail wickedness, as for the ones that entail kufr, then they necessitate his removal, even by fighting, as was previously explained in the first reason. And Allāh knows best".

I have come across a statement of great importance as a contemporary witness in our topic:

It came in the book (Takmilat Fath al-Mulhim - In the Explanation of Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim) by the "Shaykh al-Islam of Pakistan" Shaykh Muḥammad Taqī al-'Uthmani: When explaining this noble ḥadīth:

From Junādah ibn Abī Umayyah, he said: We entered upon 'Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit while he was sick, so we said: Tell us, may Allāh rectify you, a ḥadīth that Allāh benefits with, that you heard from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, so he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, called us, so we pledged allegiance to him, and among what he took from us was that we pledge allegiance to hearing and obedience in our ease and hardship, our difficulty and ease, and selfishness over us, and that we do not dispute the authority with its people. He said: Unless you see a clear kufr for which you have evidence from Allāh.

Shaykh Taqī 'Uthmani said: His saying: "and that we do not dispute the authority with its people" meaning we do not dispute the leader in his leadership, and Aḥmad added from the route of 'Umayr ibn Hānī' from Junādah: (and even if you see that you have a right in the matter, then do not act upon that assumption, but rather listen and obey, until it reaches you without going outside obedience) and he added in the narration of Ḥabbān Abī an-Naḍr with Ibn Ḥibbān and Aḥmad: (even if they eat your wealth and strike your back) as in Fath al-Bārī (13/8).

His statement: "(unless you see clear kufran bawwāḥan)", with a fathāh on the bā' and a wāw, meaning apparent and obvious, from their saying: bāḥa bi-shai'in yabūḥu bihi bawḥan wa bawwāḥan: if he announced it and made it manifest. And in some narrations, it occurs as: "barāḥan" with a rā' instead of a wāw, and it is close to this meaning. The origin of barāḥ is barren land in which there is no companion or building. And it was said: al-barāḥ is clarification. It is said: bariḥa al-khafā'u if it became apparent. And it occurs in al-Ṭabarānī in the ḥadīth: "kufran ṣarāḥan" with a ḍammah on the ṣād then a rā'. This is a summary of what is in Fath al-Bārī (13/8).

The Issue of Rising up Against the Unjust Imams:

With this ḥadīth, the majority of scholars have used as evidence that it is not permissible to rise up against the unjust or wicked sultan unless a clear kufr appears from him. Al-Ḥāfiẓ said in al-Fath (13/7) Ibn Baṭṭāl said: "In the ḥadīth is evidence in abandoning rising up against the sultan even if he is unjust. And the jurists have agreed on the obligation of obeying the dominant sultan and striving with him, and that obeying him is better than rising up against him because of what is in that of preserving blood and calming the common people, and their evidence is this report and others that help it, and they have not excepted from that except if clear kufr occurs from the sultan, then it is not permissible to obey him in that, but rather it is obligatory to strive against him for whoever is able to do so".

Some people may understand from this that it is not permissible to revolt against an oppressive imām in any situation as long as he is named with the name of Islam. But the matter is not so absolute, especially according to the school of Imam Abu Hanifa (may Allāh have mercy on him).

Imam Abu Bakr al-Jaṣṣāṣ (may Allāh have mercy on him) says in Aḥkām al-Qurʿān (1/70) under the verse: "{My covenant does not extend to the wrongdoers}": "And his madhhab (school of thought) (meaning Abu Hanifa) was well-known in fighting the oppressors and unjust rulers. That is why al-Awzāʿī said: "We tolerated Abu Hanifa in everything until he came to us with the sword," meaning fighting the oppressors, "so we did not tolerate him.. And his case regarding Zayd ibn ʿAlī is well-known, and in his carrying money to him, and his issuing fatwá (religious verdict) to the people secretly regarding the obligation of supporting him and fighting with him, and likewise his affair with Muhammad and Ibrahim, the two sons of Abdullah ibn Hasan."

As for what al-Jaṣṣāṣ indicated regarding the case of Zayd ibn ʿAlī, what the historians mentioned is that when Zayd ibn ʿAlī revolted against the Banu Umayyah, Imam Abu Hanifa supported him with his wealth. Al-Muwaffaq narrated with his chain of transmission: "Zayd ibn ʿAlī sent to Abu Hanifa, inviting him to join him, so Abu Hanifa said to his messenger: 'If I knew that the people would not abandon him and would stand with him in truth, I would follow him and fight with him against whoever opposes him, because he is a rightful imām. But I fear that they will abandon him as they abandoned his father, but I will support him with my wealth so that he can strengthen himself against those who oppose him.' And he said to his messenger: 'Explain my excuse to him,' and he sent him ten thousand dirhams." Then al-Muwaffaq said: "And in other than this narration, he excused himself with an illness that afflicted him on those days so that he stayed behind from him. And in another narration, he was asked about jihād with him, so he said: 'His revolt resembles the revolt of the Messenger of Allāh (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) on the Day of Badr.' So it was said to him: 'Then why did you stay behind from him?' He said: 'Because of trusts that I had with the people, I presented them to Ibn Abi Layla, but he did not accept them, so I feared that I would be killed while ignorant of the trusts.' And he would cry whenever his killing was mentioned." See Manāqib al-Imām al-Aʿẓam by al-Muwaffaq al-Makkī (1/260 and 261).

As for his story with Muḥammad an-Nafs az-Zakiyyah and his brother Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd Allāh, they rose up against al-Manṣūr, and al-Makkī mentioned in al-Manāqib (2/84) that Abū Ḥanīfah was urging the people to Ibrāhīm and ordering them to follow him, and he mentioned before that that he preferred striving with him over fifty Ḥajj, and al-Kurdī mentioned in his Manāqib (2/22) that Imam Abū Ḥanīfah prevented al-Ḥasan ibn Qaḥṭabah, one of the commanders of al-Manṣūr, from going out to Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd Allāh, and it is said that al-Manṣūr poisoned Abū Ḥanīfah because of this, until he died, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Likewise, the story of our master al-Ḥusayn ibn ‘Alī, may Allāh be pleased with him, with Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah is well-known. As well as a group of the pious that rose up against al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf.

What appears to this weak servant, may Allāh pardon him, after reviewing the shar’i texts and the words of the jurists and muḥaddithīn in this chapter—and Allāh knows best—is that the wickedness of the Imam is of two types:

- The first is what is limited to himself, so this does not permit rising up against him, and upon this is carried the saying of whoever said: that the wicked or unjust Imam is not permissible to rise up against.
- And the second: what is excessive, and that is by promoting the manifestations of kufr, establishing its rites, judging by its laws, belittling the rulings of the religion, and refraining from judging by the law of Allāh with the ability to do so because of his considering it ugly, and preferring the law of other than Allāh over it. So this is what is attached to the clear kufr. And it is permissible at that time to rise up with its conditions.

And the best thing I have seen in this topic is a precious statement by our Shaykh, the Shaykh of our Shaykhs, Ḥakīm al-Ummah (Wise Man of the Ummah), Ashraf ‘Alī ath-Thānawī, may Allāh have mercy on him, in his letter "Jazl al-Kalām fī ‘Azl al-Imām" (Fluent Speech on Removing the Imam) and it is printed in the fifth volume of Imdād al-Fatāwa (pp. 119 to 131).

The summary of what he mentioned, may Allāh have mercy on him, in that letter is that the matters that impair the Imamate are of seven types:

The First Type: That the Imam removes himself without a reason, and this has disagreement, as in Sharḥ al-Maqāṣid (2/282).

And the Second Type: That what prevents him from fulfilling the functions of the Imamate occurs to him, like madness, or blindness, or deafness, or muteness, meaning becoming a prisoner whose release is not hoped for, and this is what the contract of the Imamate is dissolved by, so the Imam is removed in all these cases.

And the Third Type: That kufr occurs to him, whether it is kufr of denial and rejection, or kufr of stubbornness and Mukhālafah (opposition), or kufr of belittling or considering ugly the matters of the religion. And in this case, the Imam is removed, and the contract of the Imamate is dissolved, and if he insists on remaining as Imam, then it is obligatory on the Muslims to remove him on the condition of ability, but it is conditioned in that that the kufr is agreed upon, by the evidence of his saying, peace be upon him: "unless you see a clear kufr for which you have evidence from Allāh" and just as the certainty of the kufr is conditioned, it is also conditioned that its issuance from him is certain like seeing with the eye, and it is not sufficed in that with presumptive narrations, by the evidence of his saying, peace be upon him: "unless you see" what is meant by it is seeing with the eye by the evidence of its transitivity to one object. Then the opinions may differ in the issuance from the sultan being kufr, or in its indication of kufr, or in its being established by the circumstantial and verbal evidences, or in the certainty of the kufr being issued from him. So everyone who acts when such a disagreement occurs with his opinion that he sees in what is between him and Allāh is considered an mujtahid who is excused, so it is not permissible to direct the arrows of blame towards him. On that, the obligation of rising in this case is conditioned by the condition of ability, and by that a harm does not occur that is greater than the harm of the remaining of such an Imam. Ash-Sharīf al-Jurjānī says in Sharḥ al-Mawāqif (8/353): “And for the Ummah is the right to remove the Imam and dismiss him because of a reason that necessitates it, such as that what necessitates the disruption of the conditions of the Muslims is found from him, and the reversal of the matters of the religion, and if his removal leads to fitnah (tribulation), the lesser of the two harms is tolerated”. It is also possible that disagreement may occur in specifying the lesser of the two harms, so everyone acts according to what he sees in what is between him and Allāh. It is not permissible for one to blame the other. And upon such ijtihādī (requiring legal reasoning) matters is carried the disagreement of the Companions and the Tābiʿīn (successors) and those after them in rising up against some of the Imams in their time.

The Fourth Type: That the sultan commits wickedness that is limited to himself, like zinā, and drinking alcohol and what is like that. And its ruling is that he is not removed by it by itself, but he deserves removal, so it is upon the Ummah to remove him unless a fitnah results from the removal. It was said in ad-Durr al-Mukhtār, chapter on the Imamate “It is disliked to appoint the wicked and he is removed by it except for fitna” and Ibn ʿĀbidīn said under it: “His saying: and he is removed by it, meaning by the wickedness if it occurs, what is meant is that he deserves removal as you have learned earlier, and that is why he did not say he is removed”. And Ibn al-Humām said in al-Musāyarah: “And if he appointed a just person and then he became unjust and wicked, he is not removed, even if it does not entail, but he deserves removal, even if it does not entail fitnah” And its conclusion is that it is not permissible to rise up against him in this case with what involves bloodshed and stirring up fitnah (..)

The Fifth Type: That he commits wickedness that its effect extends to the wealth of others, by wronging the people in their wealth, but he interprets that with what has a semblance of permissibility in it, like imposing the jibāyāt (taxes) on the people interpreting it with the interests of the public. And its ruling is that he is not removed by it, and it is obligatory to obey him, and it is not permissible to rise up against him by it. As will come in the expression of Ibn ‘Ābidīn.

The Sixth Type: That he wrongs the people in their wealth, and he has no interpretation for that, nor a semblance of permissibility. And its ruling is that it is permissible for the wronged to repel the injustice from himself, even by fighting, and patience is also permissible, but rather he is rewarded for it, and that this fighting is not for rising up against him, but rather for defending the wealth, so if the Imam refrains from injustice, then it is obligatory to refrain from fighting. Ibn ‘Ābidīn said, narrating from Fath al-Qadīr: “And it is obligatory on everyone who is able to repel to fight with the Imam unless they show what makes permissible for them to fight, like if he wrongs them, or wrongs others with injustice in which there is no semblance of it, unlike if the situation is doubtful that it is injustice, like imposing some of the jibāyāt (taxes) that the Imam has the right to take and causing harm with it to repel a more general harm”. And this is the ruling of the wronged who fights to repel injustice from himself. As for others, is it permissible for them to support this wronged one against the Imam? The expressions of the people differed in it, so it was mentioned in Fath al-Qadīr that it is obligatory on other than the wronged to help this wronged and fighter until the Imam does justice to him and returns from his injustice, and it was mentioned in Jāmi’ al-Fuṣūlayn and al-Mubtaghī and as-Sirāj that it is not appropriate for the people to help the sultan nor to help them. And Ibn ‘Ābidīn reconciled between the two sayings that the obligation of helping them is if it is possible to refrain him from his transgression, otherwise no. See Radd al-Muḥtār, chapter on the rebels (3/341). As for patience being better in this situation, it is because of what will come at the author from the ḥadīth of Ḥudhayfah ibn al-Yamān, may Allāh be pleased with them both, in which he informed about the unjust Imams, and in it: “I said: How should I do, O Messenger of Allāh, if I reach that? He said: Listen and obey, and even if he strikes your back and takes your wealth, then listen and obey” so what is meant by his saying, peace be upon him: “then listen and obey” is his prohibition from rising up. As for fighting to repel injustice, then its permissibility is built upon the ḥadīth that make it permissible, fighting for oneself and for wealth, and since this fighting resembles rising up in appearance, then abandoning it is better to absolve the religion.

The Seventh Type: That he commits wickedness that is excessive in the religion of the people, so he forces them to commit sins, and its ruling is the ruling of coercion that is explained in its place, and this coercion enters in some cases into kufr in reality or in ruling, and that is by insisting on applying the laws that contradict the Islamic sharī’ah, either preferring it over the law of Allāh, and that is explicit kufr, or by reluctance and laziness in applying the sharī’ah of Allāh; with what is most likely from it the assumption that the continuous action in contradiction to the sharī’ah causes belittling of it in the hearts, then such reluctance and laziness, even if it is not explicit kufr by which the one who commits it is declared a kāfir, but it is in the ruling of kufr. By the evidence of what the jurists mentioned that if the people of a town abandon the adhān (call to prayer), it is permissible to fight them, because it is from the signs of the religion, and in abandoning it is apparent belittling of it, see chapter on the adhān from Radd al-Muḥtār (1/384). And at that time this Seventh Type is attached to the Third Type, which is the clear kufr, and it is permissible to rise up upon the explanation that preceded in its ruling.

Then the obligation of rising up in the Third and Seventh Types is conditioned by the ability and strength, and the permissibility of rising up in them is conditioned by hoping to establish the Imamate for a righteous man in whom the conditions of the Imamate are found, but if the matter becomes from unjust to unjust, or entails, like the kuffār (disbelievers) taking control of the Muslims, then it is not permissible to rise up in these two cases either.

What was narrated of the rising of our master al-Ḥusayn ibn ‘Alī, may Allāh be pleased with them both, against Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah, and the support of Imam Abū Ḥanīfah for Zayd ibn ‘Alī, and Muḥammad an-Nafs az-Zakiyyah and Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd Allāh in their rising against the Imams of their time is carried upon the Third or Sixth or Seventh Type. We have mentioned that the opinions may differ in specifying what makes rising up permissible, and Allāh Almighty knows best.] End quote. (Takmilat Fath al-Mulhim vol. 3/ pp. 326 - 331).

As we have stated, we are in front of a case of clear kufr of our rulers from two great doors of the doors of apostasy, which are:

- Legislating from other than Allāh and replacing the law of Allāh with the laws of mankind and judging by it with other than what Allāh has revealed.
- Allegiance to the kuffār from the Jews and Christians and others and fighting the Muslims with them and in the path of their interests.

This is besides what they have clothed themselves with forms of disbelief in sayings and deeds and what they have brought about the reasons for exiting from the Millah of the Muslims. Which necessitates rising up against them, fighting them, and killing them by consensus, as preceded from the evidences.

From the requirements and consequences of the kufr of the ruler, originally or by apostasy:

1. The fall of his authority and the invalidity of his Imamate.
2. The obligation of rising up against him with weapons and removing him.
3. The obligation of killing him for his apostasy. He, peace and blessings be upon him, said: “Whoever changes his religion, kill him”. Narrated by Aḥmad.

4. The obligation or permissibility of fighting his group if they prevent him with weapons.
5. The obligation of not hearing and obeying and collecting wealth for him.
6. The obligation of not helping him, nor working for him, nor participating in his crime of judging by other than what Allāh has revealed in any position or any form.
7. The invalidity of all his covenants, oaths, treaties, and security because he does not represent the Muslims.
8. The obligation of working immediately to install a Muslim Imam in his place and obeying him with what preceded of the rights and obligations.

The issue of the ruler's apostasy and what results from that of the loss of rights and the corruption of systems of governance in blood, wealth, and honor, and what results from that of the tyranny of the disbelievers, the arrogance of the oppressors, and the dominance of the corrupt and immoral, and the control of external enemies from among the disbelievers and atheists, and the cooperation of the hypocrites with them, and what results from that of the loss of the land and the people, is not a secondary, subsidiary issue in which the sharī'ah has no rulings, obligations, commands, and prohibitions? How can it be, when Allāh the Exalted says: "{And We have sent down to you the Book as clarification for all things}" [al-Naḥl - 89].

It is a main issue, even if most people neglect it today, both the common and the elite.

It is also necessary to draw attention to a dangerous condition widespread among many scholars and their followers: that even if they are guided, according to the sharī' (legal) evidence, to the kufr of the ruler today - a condition that even the blind are beginning to see with their senses, their hunger, and their circumstances - these people do not move on to acknowledging the aforementioned consequences of the kufr of the ruler. So you see them acknowledging the kufr of the ruler, but they work for him, take up positions, and enter his disbelieving institutions, legislative, judicial, and executive. They may even fight in his ranks and under his banner, even if he slaughters the Muslims and kills those who enjoin justice from among the people!

This is a calamity that has overwhelmed most Muslim lands, and the reasons for it ultimately lie with the general Muslims and their elite, due to ignorance or inability. They do not revolt against these disbelieving rulers who support the enemies of Allāh, nor do they fight them. They are either ignorant of the obligation of this fighting, or they acknowledge the obligation and claim inability.

Upon investigation into the reasons for this and what they claim of inability, you find that the truth is the opposite, and that the reason that appears with all clarity is what the Prophet (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) summarized in two words: the ummah (nation) has been afflicted with al-wahn (weakness), which he (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold. In the ḥadīth narrated by Abu Dawood in his Sunan: "The nations will soon summon one another against you as diners summon one another to a bowl of food." Someone said: "Will we be few in number on that day?" He said: "Rather, you will be many on that day, but you will be like scum on the floodwaters. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the chests of your enemy, and Allāh will cast al-wahn into your hearts." Someone said: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death." People have loved the world, the general among them and the elite, except for those on whom Allāh has mercy, and they have hated death, so the nations have summoned one another against them, and that has been followed by a miserable life at the hands of their rulers, a life in which death is more merciful, as Allāh the Exalted said: "{And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life}" [Ṭā Hā: 124].

The Rulings of the Sharī'ah Decide by Consensus (Ijmā') the Kufr and Apostasy of Whoever Cooperates from Among the Muslims with the Kuffār and Helps Them Against the Muslims, and Makes Obligatory Fighting Him:

Every group and association that is formed between a faction of people has fundamental components that bind them together, the most important of which are: an idea they believe in, a characteristic upon which they have gathered, and an interest that unites them; a leadership or head upon which they have gathered, whose commands they follow and whose advice they issue; a banner under which they fight; and a common goal that they seek to achieve. If such characteristics are available to a group of people, they are called a jamā'ah (group), or are referred to in sharī' terms as a ṭā'ifah (faction). If they have protection, strength, and power with which they defend themselves, they are called a ṭā'ifah mumtani'ah dhāt shawkah (a protected faction with strength). If this faction gathers upon Islam and īmān (faith), it is called a ṭā'ifah īmān wa islām (a faction of faith and Islam). If they meet upon a nullifier from the nullifiers of Islam, they are called a ṭā'ifah riddah (a faction of apostasy), as was the case with the apostates during the days of Abu Bakr (may Allāh be pleased with him). If they were originally disbelievers, they are called a ṭā'ifah kufr (a faction of disbelief). If they revolt against a legitimate imām while adhering to Islam and transgress against him, they are called a ṭā'ifah bāghiyah (a rebellious faction). If they go out for plunder, looting, and killing, they are called a ṭā'ifah fasād (a faction of corruption), and so on.

It is self-evident that this faction is named with the characteristic that is dominant within it, even with the presence of those whose characteristics do not apply to them while they are with them, such as one of them being ignorant of them, or coerced into being with them, or gathered to them by a personal interest or tribal allegiance or other such thing. There is no doubt that there are hypocrites (munāfiqūn) in the faction of Islam who are not of them. This has happened in most of the history of the Muslims, and even the army of the Messenger of Allāh (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) was not free from it. Likewise, there may be in the ranks of the Muslims those who benefit and are affiliated with Islam for the sake of the world. Likewise, there may be in the faction of kufr a Muslim who is forced to be with them or is ignorant of their situation, and their affair is confused for him. This exception in the existence of one who is not of the faction within it applies to factions of transgressors, corrupters, apostates, and disbelievers. The existence of these outliers from the faction does not have the ruling of the dominant, or the ruling of the banner or the bond upon which it has gathered, and its name or its shar'ī ruling does not change because of these outliers. And in the ruling of the shar'ī'ah, each faction of these factions has its shar'ī ruling. The obligation towards the factions of the people of īmān is allegiance and support, and towards the factions of apostasy and kufr is disavowal and enmity, and towards the people of evil and corruption is repelling and fighting against them if they attack the religion or honor or wealth or life of the people of Islam, and so on.

If the concept of the faction becomes clear to us, and its dominant ruling over those within it who are outliers from it, we move on to talking about the problem of the helpers of the disbelievers and apostates from among those who are affiliated with Islam, and who fight the Muslims with factions of kufr or apostasy or other than that, especially those working in the field of authority and defending it, fighting the Muslims by the orders of the apostate rulers, such as those working in their military and security agencies such as the army, al-darak (gendarmerie), the police, and the security agencies and what follows them of the armed and semi-armed forces and what serves them of affiliated agencies.

What is the shar'ī ruling that must be believed regarding these who are originally affiliated with the millah of Islam, and profess their religion, and are named with their names, and some of them may perform some of the rituals of Islam, then they come to the Muslims and fight them, pursue them, and wage war against them, in implementation of the orders of their masters from among the apostate rulers, and their Islam does not prevent them from fighting even alongside the original disbelievers by the orders of those rulers who have announced their allegiance and support for the disbelievers, and defending their interests and accepting their orders?

We say, and Allāh is the One from whom help is sought and He is the One who guides to the path:

This soldier or security man or policeman, defending the Ṭāghūt, working for him, fighting the Muslims with him and with his kāfir (disbelieving) allies, has one of the following cases:

Firstly: That this follower agrees with his master, the disbelieving ruler, in what he has gone to of enmity towards Islam and allegiance to the disbelievers and aggression against the shari‘ah of Allāh, knowing the conditions of his leader, agreeing with him, convinced of what he is upon of warring against Islam and the Muslims.

Second: That this follower works and fights with his master while he does not agree with his master in warring against Islam and the Muslims. And this has one of three cases:

- That he is ignorant of the matter entirely, not realizing what he is doing, nor understanding that it is a war against the religion and against the Muslims, ignorant of his master's apostasy and his kufr and his hypocrisy to the kāfirīn, so he is ignorant.
- That he is forced to implement the orders of his master, by threatening him with punishment or imprisonment or killing, if he does not implement the orders, a real threat from which he cannot escape or flee. So he is coerced.

- That he is aware of the conditions of his master, and he is not ignorant nor is he forcibly coerced, but rather he has taken his position with them for a worldly interest of gain and position, or for familial tribal or partisan or sectarian allegiance, or any worldly reason, so he is a mercenary or biased.

From a practical point of view: these four categories:

1. The knowing (intentional).
2. The coerced.
3. The ignorant.
4. The mercenary with falsehood.

They do not differ practically in what they are doing of waging war against Allāh and His Messenger and the believers and killing, imprisoning, pursuing, and harming those who enjoin justice from among the people so they kill and are killed by the orders of their masters and their emirs and their leaders, and they war against their peoples or others.

The summary of the shar'ī ruling in these, we summarize it in brief points that do not deviate from the brevity of this book, and the shar'ī ruling is divided into two issues, which are:

The First: Are these still upon the ruling of Islam? Or have they committed kufr and exited from the Millah of Islam?

The Second: Is it permissible to fight them and kill them, or is it not permissible?

As for the first issue, which is the one who is convinced of what his masters are upon of fighting Islam and the Muslims and their allegiance to the disbelievers, then he is like them in the shar'ī ruling: a munāfiq, an apostate (murtadd), a kāfir, by originality and conviction in kufr, and not following his masters, and for the same previously mentioned evidence regarding them.

As for the second type, which is those who do not agree with their masters, but fight with them, and they are the ignorant, the coerced, and the one who fights for the world and its gains and bonds, then these, by their action, commit an act from the acts of kufr, which is fighting the Muslims with the disbelievers. With this, they belong to the faction of apostasy, if they fight under the leadership of an apostate, and to the faction of kufr, if they fight under the banner of an original kāfir. This is established by the saying of Allāh the Exalted: "{Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of ṭāghūt. So fight against the allies of Satan. Indeed, the plot of Satan has ever been weak.}" [al-Nisā': 76]. These verses establish that the believer fights in the cause of Allāh, and fighting in the cause of Allāh is a sign of belonging to the faction of īmān, and that the kāfir fights in the cause of ṭāghūt, and that fighting in the cause of ṭāghūt is a sign of belonging to the faction of ṭāghūt, and that the doer of this is an ally of Satan whom Allāh has commanded to fight and given glad tidings of victory over, and the verse is clear and explicit.

And in another verse, He (Glorified be He) informed about Pharaoh and his faction, and what they were upon of kufr and warring against the believers. He said: "{Indeed, Pharaoh and Haman and their soldiers were deliberate sinners.}" [al-Qaṣaṣ: 8]. So He combined for Pharaoh, his minister, his assistant and deputy Haman, and for his soldiers, the same description: "{deliberate sinners}". And it is known that the sin of Pharaoh is kufr in Allāh and warring against the believers. He - meaning Pharaoh - made himself a lord who legislates and is worshiped and belittled his people, so they obeyed him. Indeed, they were a people defiantly disobedient, so the description encompassed them.

As for the detailed ruling for these soldiers who fight today: the ignorant, the coerced, the one who fights for the world with knowledge, it is as follows, and Allāh the Exalted knows best:

The ignorant with true ignorance that prevents him from realizing what he is upon of the situation, and what the situation of his leaders is [this is assuming the existence of such ignorance]. Likewise, the coerced with true, actual coercion, threatened with killing and harm, unable to flee from his work, nor emigrate from the place of his compulsion. These, the scholars of the ahl al-sunnah wa al-jamā‘ah have stipulated, that their ignorance and coercion (if it is real) is considered for them a shar‘ī excuse, and the ruling of Islam remains for them on its outward appearance, while the general ruling remains, that they are from the faction of kufr because they are with them. And this does not mean definitive kufr for each one of the factions of kufr.

As for the one who fights for the world for gain and position or mercenaryism, or for the allegiance of the people or the nation or the party or the tribe or any sectarian bond. And he knows that he is fighting the Muslims, with a kāfir, unjust ruler who is loyal to the kuffār and helps them. Then this soldier is not ignorant of the matter nor is he coerced by threat, but rather he is a chooser, able to leave his job, or flee from it, or not enter it at all if he wanted. And he has entered it for worldly reasons, so this is a munāfiq who has bought the world in exchange for the Hereafter, and fought the Muslims for the sake of the world, so he is a kāfir fighting under the banner of the kāfirīn. He has no excuse of ignorance or coercion, and as for the intention of the world and its gains, then it is not from the legal excuses in the act of kufr. These excuses are known among the people of the Sunnah and the Jamā‘ah and they are (ignorance, and coercion, and interpretation, and lack of intention for the action), and these will be explained, in shā’a Allāh.

Regarding those like them who have purchased the life of this world at the price of the Hereafter, Allāh the Exalted says: "{And [recall] when We took your covenant, [saying], "Do not shed your [own] blood or evict one another from your homes." Then you acknowledged [this] while you were witnessing. Then, you are those [same ones who] kill one another and evict a group of you from their homes, cooperating against them in sin and aggression. And if they come to you as captives, you ransom them, although their eviction was forbidden to you. Then do you believe in a part of the Scripture and disbelieve in a part? Then what is the recompense for those who do that among you except disgrace in worldly life; and on the Day of Resurrection they will be sent back to the severest of punishment. And Allāh is not unaware of what you do. Those are the ones who have bought the life of this world [in exchange] for the Hereafter, so the punishment will not be lightened for them, nor will they be helped.}" [al-Baqarah: 84-86].

Imam Muslim (may Allāh have mercy on him) narrated from the ḥadīth of Abu Hurayrah (may Allāh be pleased with him) from the Prophet (may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon him) that he said: "Whoever leaves obedience and separates from the community and dies, dies a death of ignorance (jāhiliyyah). And whoever goes out against my ummah, striking its righteous and its wicked, not refraining from its believer, nor fulfilling his covenant to the possessor of a covenant, then he is not of me, and I am not of him."

This is in terms of their theoretical shar'ī ruling, whether they are judged to be disbelievers or Muslims.

As for the second issue, which is the ruling on fighting these who are affiliated with Islam who fight the Muslims with the disbelievers, then it is summarized as follows, and Allāh the Exalted knows best:

Everyone who fights the Muslims with the disbelievers, then fighting him is obligatory upon the Muslims, and the Muslim is not obligated, and Allāh has not burdened him with what he cannot do, of distinguishing the ignorant from the intentional, nor the coerced from the deliberate.

But rather Allāh Almighty said: {Fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you but do not transgress.} Al-Baqarah - 190. The scholars have used as evidence the ḥadīth of ‘Ā’ishah, may Allāh be pleased with her, in which it came that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed about an army that would invade the Ka’bah, until when they were in a desert from the earth, he would cause their first and last to sink, so ‘Ā’ishah said: O Messenger of Allāh, how is their first and last caused to sink and in them are their slaves and their markets and whoever is not of them, so the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed her that their first and last is caused to sink and they are resurrected on the Day of Resurrection according to their intentions. And in the narration of Umm Salamah, may Allāh be pleased with her, as it came in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: “One who seeks refuge seeks refuge in the House, so a delegation is sent to him, so when they are in a desert from the earth, they are caused to sink” so I said: So how about the one who was unwilling? The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: “He is caused to sink with them but he is resurrected on the Day of Resurrection according to his intention”. So the scholars used this ḥadīth as evidence for killing the ignorant and the coerced and the unintentional, from those who intended the Muslims with war with the kāfirīn, and Allāh will resurrect him according to his intention, excused if he has an excuse.

The scholars said: If Allāh—and He is Capable, if He willed, of distinguishing the coerced and the ignorant—did not distinguish him from the sinking, then how can the servants of Allāh distinguish him from the kāfirīn while he is fighting with them?!

So this causing him to sink or killing him with them is from the predestined punishment on the presence of the Muslim in the darkness of the kāfirīn or the oppressors, so he is taken by the punishment with them, and Allāh does not wrong him, but He resurrects him according to his intention, if it is righteous, it benefits him in the Hereafter.

In any case, the one who attacks the Muslims, wanting harm for them, is in the best of his states “a Muslim attacker” and the scholars have spoken about his ruling, which we will point to at the end of this section.

In Conclusion:

For us is the outward, and Allāh takes care of the inward. His outward is fighting with the kāfirīn, so fighting him is obligatory or permissible. And his inwardness is up to Allāh, if it is righteous it benefits him on the Day of Resurrection. Al-Bukhārī, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, narrated in the book of Testimonies from his Ṣaḥīḥ from ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: “People were (sometimes) judged by the revealing of a Divine Inspiration during the lifetime of Allah's Apostle but now there is no longer any more (new revelation). Now we judge you by the deeds you practice publicly, so we will trust and favor the one who does good deeds in front of us, and we will not call him to account about what he is really doing in secret, for Allah will judge him for that; but we will not trust or believe the one who presents to us with an evil deed even if he claims that his intentions were good”.

His general ruling is that he is from “the faction of kufr” if he is with the kuffār. And that he is from “the faction of apostasy” if he is with the apostates. And that he is from “the faction of rebels” if he is with them and so on. And the explanation about the excuses of the coerced and the ignorant will come in the following section, in shā’a Allāh.

For more clarity, we say and Allāh is the One from whom help is sought:

Those who claim that they are Muslims, and are called by their names and wear their clothes, and perhaps they pray or fast, from those who work in the armies of the rulers of the Muslims or their police or their intelligence. Then they implement any order issued to them from their leaders, whether it is ḥalāl (lawful) or ḥarām (unlawful), and they obey them out of conviction or ignorance or coercion, and their masters have raised them on that and taken from them covenants and oaths. They, as is well-known, defend kāfir, unjust, wicked rulers, and they fight alongside the armies of the kāfirīn, as is happening today from the armies of Turkey and Pakistan and some Arab and Islamic countries, and they work alongside the security and intelligence agencies of the Jews and Christians from the Americans and Europeans and others from the kuffār, and they guard their military bases. And their diplomatic and commercial centers, but rather the centers of Christianizing the Muslims, and the centers of spreading prostitution and corruption and immorality. And they do not care in the way of implementing the orders of their masters, whether they killed a Muslim, or terrified a believer, or displaced a Muslim woman, or orphaned a child, or violated the sanctity of homes and the honor of the oppressed.

Rather, you see them ready to fight each other, and to strike the necks of each other, in internal coups, or in civil wars raging between their ṭawāghīt rulers in neighboring countries! Where Islamic or Arab countries often fight with each other. So you see these (Muslim!) soldiers sincere in shedding each other's blood, and in capturing and annihilating each other! And they claim Islam! And the generality of their fighting is for the power of their kings, or for the conflict over lands and the difference in policies, so that the glory may be for so-and-so or so-and-so, and not for the exaltation of right, or the defeat of falsehood, because they were raised on obedience to kings and presidents and allegiance to the homeland or the nation or the party.

The clear sharʿī truth - and Allāh the Exalted knows best - is that these fighters in general have the ruling of their banners and their faction, as we mentioned earlier. Whoever fights us under the banner of an apostate ruler, we fight them as a faction of apostasy, and whoever fights us under the banner of the Americans and the disbelievers, we fight them as a faction of kufr.

Accordingly, it is not permissible to pray over their dead, nor are they buried with the Muslims, with the very important note that we do not judge definitive kufr on every individual among them, as was previously mentioned, unless it is known from him with evidence that he is not ignorant nor coerced, but rather deliberate and intentional. And whoever it is known from him that he agrees with his apostate masters, is loyal to his disbelieving masters from Americans and others, then we judge his kufr and his apostasy, alive and dead, and he takes the rulings thereof, so his marriage to a Muslim woman is invalid, and he does not inherit from a Muslim nor is he inherited from, to the end of the rulings of the apostates.

Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir, the muḥaddith of the Egyptian lands, who died in 1958, says in his famous fatwa on fighting the English and the French and those who resemble them from those who have aggressed against the lands of the Muslims, and the ruling on whoever helps them from the Muslims which he published in the magazine Al-Hady an-Nabawi:

word or deed against his brothers in religion, if he does anything of that, then prays, then his prayer is invalid, or purifies himself with wuḍū' (ablution) or ghusl (ritual bath) or tayammum (dry ablution), then his purification is invalid, or fasts an obligatory or voluntary fast, then his fast is invalid, or performs ḥajj, then his ḥajj is invalid, or pays the obligatory zakāh (charity), or gives voluntary charity, then his zakāh is invalid and rejected upon him, or worships his Lord with any worship, then his worship is invalid and rejected upon him, he has no reward in any of that, but rather upon him is sin and burden. Let every Muslim know that if he rides this vile vessel, then his deed has become worthless, from every worship with which he worshiped his Lord before he relapses into the mire of this riddah, pleased with it for himself. And Allāh forbid that a true Muslim, deserving of this great description, should be pleased with it. That is because īmān is a condition for the validity of every worship, and for its acceptance, as is self-evident, known from the religion by necessity, which no one from the Muslims disagrees with. That is because Allāh (Glorified be He) says: "{And whoever denies the faith - his work has become worthless, and he, in the Hereafter, will be among the losers.}" [al-Mā'idah: 5] and he, in the Hereafter, will be among the losers (...). Let every Muslim, every Muslim woman, know that these who go out against their religion and support their enemies.

Whoever marries from them, then his marriage is originally invalid, which no correction can fix, nor does any effect of marriage result from it, of establishing lineage and inheritance and other such things. And whoever was married from them, his marriage is likewise void, and whoever repents from them and returns to his Lord and to his religion, and fights his enemy and supports his ummah, the woman whom he married during the riddah, and the woman who apostatized while in his marriage contract, was not a wife to him, nor is she in his custody, and it is obligatory upon him after repentance to resume his marriage with her, so he contracts upon her a correct, shar'ī contract, as is self-evident and clear. Let the Muslim women who Allāh has afflicted with husbands who have relapsed into the mire of this riddah be cautious that their marriage has become void, and they have become forbidden to these men, they are not husbands to them until they repent a correct, practical repentance, then marry them in a correct marriage. Let the Muslim women know that whoever is pleased from them to marry a man in this condition, and she knows his condition, or is pleased to remain with a husband in whom she knows riddah, then her ruling and his ruling in riddah are the same. And Allāh forbid that the Muslim women should be pleased for themselves and for their honor, and for the lineages of their children, with anything of this. Indeed, the matter is serious (...). So let every person look to himself, and let him be a fence for his religion against the tampering of the manipulators and the betrayal of the betrayers.” End of the quote from the words of Imam al-Muḥaddith (may Allāh have mercy on him). Quoted from his book (Kalimat al-Ḥaqq - Ahmad Shakir).

These shar’i rulings, which are related to the ‘Aqīdah (creed) and the fundamentals of the religion. From the rules of ḥākimiyyah for Allāh, and walā’ (loyalty) and barā’ (dissociation) for the sake of Allāh, are not subsidiary matters. And the trust, as we have repeated, is related in the necks of the scholars of every country to clarify them to the people and not conceal them, desiring what is with the sultans or fearing what they have. That is because it is a matter of faith and kufr that may affect hundreds of thousands of people who are fighting in the path of Ṭāghūt and thinking that they are Muslims.

It is obligatory to answer important questions with truth, clarity, and manliness, especially from every Muslim scholar, leader, and caller:

Do we want to advance with our Ummah? Do we want to be freed from our colonizers? Do we want to improve with our economy and invest our wealth and reclaim our rights? Do we want to defend ourselves against the various types of kāfirīn?

Before that, do we want to judge by the sharī’ah of Allāh? And get rid of the laws of the Christians and the laws of the kuffār that govern us?

If the answer of one of them to these questions is negative! Then he is not concerned with what is important for the Muslims from the issues of this book. But rather he should not be included in the list of the Muslims.

If the answer is, as is assumed from every Muslim, with yes, then the previous issues, at the top of which is the issue of the kufr and apostasy of the rulers who are loyal to the kuffār, and the issue of fighting them with their allies, and consequently fighting their soldiers comes at the top of those issues and in their introduction, and there is no doubt legally and intellectually and logically in that.

It is superfluous to say, and it is known from the intellect and the sight by necessity, that we know that the Americans today are not waging war towards us directly, nor are they confronting us on the ground with their soldiers except for a few! But rather they are pushing with thousands of those who are affiliated with Islam from these misguided and ignorant and coerced and mercenaries and munāfiqūn, fighting from between their hands and from behind them, from their right and from their left, by the order of their apostate masters, as happened with us in Afghanistan, and is happening with us today also in Pakistan. And as happened in the Kuwait war, where the Arab and Islamic armies entered, opening the way for the Americans. And as America is doing today in Iraq with the Iraqi army and agents, and with the services of the armies of the countries of the Arab Gulf, and Jordan and Pakistan and others.

As for the level of the Americans pursuing the scholars and Muslim youth, every scholar and caller to Allāh, and every young mujāhid, knows that the one who knocks on his door at night and drags him in his sleeping clothes to prison, and exposes the nakedness of his house and family, is not an American, but rather from his own people! So is the executioner who greets him with beatings, kicks, and insults in prison, And so is the judge who judges him with other than what Allāh has revealed, with execution or imprisonment And so are those who carry out these rulings. Are all of those who preceded from these the Jews and the Americans?? Or are they from those who claim that they are Muslims?! They are from the apostates and the misguided from among our people. So will we fight them, or will we surrender to them our religion and our honor, and make permissible for them our wealth and our blood? And consequently, the Jews and the Americans and the Crusaders will strike their roots in our lands and do with us as they please.

We must fight them in defense of the religion of Allāh and the oppressed, and the command of Allāh is clear:

"{And what is [the matter] with you that you do not fight in the cause of Allāh and [for] the oppressed among men, women, and children who say, "Our Lord, take us out of this city of oppressive people and appoint for us from Yourself a protector and appoint for us from Yourself a helper?" Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of ṭāghūt. So fight against the allies of Satan. Indeed, the plot of Satan has ever been weak.}" [al-Nisā': 75/76].

We draw attention to the fact that we are here in the process of knowing the sharʿī ruling for fighting these, and we are not in the process of issues of opinion and war and stratagem, of fighting them offensively or defensively, and presenting that or delaying it from fighting the Americans and the disbelievers, for that is left to the leaders of jihād and the commanders of war from among the Muslims, according to the requirements of necessity and benefit.

Is the Soldier Fighting the Muslims With the Kāfirīn Excused by Ignorance?:

As for being excused due to ignorance (ʿudhr bil-jahl), it is as we said, that a Muslim commits an act of kufr, being ignorant that it is a forbidden act that entails kufr. That is, in the case of our example, this Muslim soldier engages in fighting Muslims, believing that his superior is a Muslim walī al-amr (ruler), and that he is fighting non-Muslims, or Muslims who deserve to be fought (rebels, corrupters), such that his ignorance is real. As if he is ignorant that he is fighting with the kuffār, or he thinks that they are kuffār who came to help his Muslim superior against those whom it is permissible to fight according to Sharī'ah.

If such presumed ignorance is present in this soldier, and he fights Muslims with the kāfirīn while he does not know the state of his superior and those with him, nor the state of the oppressed Muslims whom he is fighting, then he may be excused for his ignorance before Allah; we do not judge his kufr definitively, if such ignorance is proven to us.

But is such ignorance available today to these soldiers, officers, police, and intelligence personnel who fight Muslims and mujāhidīn, by the orders of these apostates, alongside and under the leadership of the armies of Jews and Christians?! Is this conceivable with the spread of various media outlets, such as radio, television, satellite dishes, newspapers, and magazines?! In addition to Muslims holding demonstrations in the streets, speakers in mosques, and people talking everywhere about these issues! It can even be said today that the nature of the battle between Muslims and kāfirīn, the corruption, kufr, and immorality of the rulers, the immodesty of their women, the scandals of their sons and relatives, their rule by other than the Sharī'ah of Islam, their allegiance to the kuffār, and their war against mosques, scholars, and young Muslim mujāhidīn, etc., has become known to everyone in every Muslim country, including Pakistan. If there are among these soldiers those who are so foolish as to be ignorant of these matters, then they are excused for their ignorance, and Allah knows best. We fight him obligatorily or permissibly, and his excuse may benefit him with Allah, and he will be resurrected according to his intention.

Is the soldier who fights Muslims with the kāfirīn excused due to coercion?

We will pause with this excuse, with some detail—despite our desire for brevity—because it is the most important and the most common excuse. Most of these soldiers and officers working in the army, police, and security forces admit that they are aware of the reality. However, they apologize, or those who defend them from the charge of apostasy and kufr apologize on their behalf, claiming that they are coerced and forced to fight Muslims by the orders of their apostate or oppressive masters, alongside and under the leadership of the kāfirīn. As happened in some Arab and Islamic countries, where America drove its slave rulers to fight Muslims, so they drove their slave soldiers to do so.

So, can the excuse of these people be accepted due to 'ikrāh (coercion)? Let's examine this:

'Ikrah (Coercion) in Shari'ah

It is compulsion, and the coerced is the one forced to do or say something he does not want, and would not do if the coercion were removed. Imam Ibn Hajar says in his great book, Fath al-Bārī in explaining Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, in the chapter on coercion, vol. 12, p. 385: "Coercion is forcing someone to do what he does not want. The conditions of coercion are four:

First: That the actor is capable of inflicting what he threatens. And the one ordered is unable to resist, even by fleeing.

Second: That he strongly believes that if he refuses, it will be inflicted upon him.

Third: That what he threatens is immediate. If he says to him, "If you do not do such and such, I will hit you tomorrow," it is not considered coercion. An exception is made if he mentions a very near time, or if it is customary that he does not break his promise.

Fourth: That nothing appears from the one ordered that indicates his choice. Like someone who is forced to commit zinā and penetrates, and he is able to withdraw, but he says, "I ejaculated," and continues until he ejaculates." End quote.

The conclusion from his words, may Allah have mercy on him, is that the coerced is: the one who is forced to do what he does not want, such that:

First: He does not want this act by his choice, but by real coercion.

Second: He is unable to refuse, unable to repel the coercion.

Third: He is unable to get rid of the one who coerced him by fleeing, migrating, or the like.

Fourth: He is certain that the threat will occur soon and with certainty.

Fifth: He does not continue with the act if the coercion is removed from him, for interest or desire.

Do these conditions apply to the one who claims to be a Muslim, then intends to fight Muslims, shedding their blood, violating their honor, and plundering their wealth, under the orders of murtaddīn and in the company of Americans and kāfirīn? This soldier, policeman, or security man must be asked a few questions, to determine whether he is coerced or not. The answers to these questions will determine his acquittal if he is excused for this act of kufr, or his condemnation if he is not excused.

Did this soldier enter the army, police, or intelligence agency by his own choice or by compulsion? This varies from one country to another. There are countries that conscript young men into these forces, and there are countries where entry into these forces is by choice, even requiring wāsiṭah (intermediation) and bribery, due to the gains and opportunities for bribery, plunder, and usurpation of people's wealth.

Can this soldier resign and withdraw from this work after seeing what he is being forced to do, or can he not?

Can he flee from his work if resignation is not possible, by hiding in his country, or migrating from it if necessary, or can he not?

Is he actually threatened if he does not carry out the orders, and is he certain that the punishment will befall him, or not?

Does he persist in killing, plundering, and violating honor, fulfilling his desires and interests, or due to coercion?

Other matters must be clarified in the issue of coercion:

Firstly: When the claimant of coercion performed this action voluntarily—that is, he entered the army and police by his own choice, not through compulsory conscription—did he know that his work would require him to be coerced into doing what Allāh has forbidden, or not? If he knew that he would be coerced into carrying out orders, lawful and unlawful, according to the rules of the army, police, and security, then he was coerced afterward, his coercion is not an excuse for him, because he voluntarily undertook what he knew he would be coerced into regarding kufr, injustice, or what Allāh has forbidden. This is due to the well-known state of these institutions and their actions.

The scholars have given an example for this case: someone who enters the land of a people who force those residing among them to commit kufr, and he knows this before entering, then he enters and they force him, the coercion is not an excuse for him. Does the one who volunteers in these forces by choice know that he will perform these actions, or does he not know? If he knew what he would be tasked with before being coerced, his excuse of coercion is not acceptable, even if he was actually coerced into an action he dislikes.

Secondly: The coerced is of two types:

One who is coerced into saying or doing an act of kufr that does not harm other Muslims

Rather, he commits what invalidates the religion by his action or saying, while he is unwilling, as our master ‘Ammār bin Yāsir was coerced under torture to revile the Messenger of Allah (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him) unwillingly, after they killed his father and mother and covered him in the well until he almost died from torture. So he said the word of kufr, and the Messenger of Allah (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him) excused him and permitted it. And he made it a concession for Muslims, saying: "If they return, then return." And he explained that resolution and patience are better in the case of coercion and have greater reward, and that coercion is an excuse for the one who does it while his heart is reassured with faith. Meanwhile, the scholars did not accept the excuse from one who was threatened with punishment, but was not certain of its occurrence.

Thus, Imam Ahmad bin Hanbal did not accept the excuse of the scholars who answered the ruler to say that the Quran was created when he threatened them, and they excused themselves with the saying of Allah Almighty: {Except for one who is forced while his heart is reassured with faith} and with the ḥadīth (narration) of ‘Ammār (may Allah be pleased with him), Imam Ahmad said: "Ammār was beaten, and you were told we will beat you." And when Yaḥyā bin Ma‘īn, who was a great Imam of the muḥaddithīn, weakened due to the threat, and responded and excused himself with this excuse, Imam Ahmad rejected his argument and said: "He says to me he was coerced, and he was not beaten with a single lash." And he did not speak to him for the rest of his life, and did not return the salām when Ibn Ma‘īn greeted him, and Imam Ahmad was on his deathbed! May Allah have mercy on him and increase his likes in our Ummah! And it was narrated from him saying (There is no coercion except with the sword) and from other scholars that coercion is by threatening with killing, or cutting off a limb, and some of them went to the extent that it is absolute punishment that he cannot bear, and cannot escape from.

Some may say and excuse the action of the government of Pakistan or Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Jordan, for example, in cooperating with the Americans, that Allah has permitted taqiyyah from the kāfir, and they say: We fight with them to ward off their evil from us and our countries. This is a rejected claim. Allah Almighty said in Sūrat Āl ‘Imrān, verse (28): {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allah, except when taking precaution against them in prudence. And Allah warns you of Himself, and to Allah is the [final] destination.}

Ibn Kathīr said in its interpretation: “That is, except for one who fears in some countries and times from their evil, then he may guard against them with his appearance, not with his inner self and intention.

As al-Bukhārī said about Abū al-Dardā’ that he said: We smile in the faces of people whose hearts curse them and al-Thawrī said: Ibn ‘Abbās said: ‘Taqiyyah is not in action, but taqiyyah is in speech’”

One who is coerced into an act that harms other Muslims

Like one who orders the killing of a Muslim, or the violation of his honor, or the plundering of his wealth, or harming him, and the scholars have stipulated that the Muslim is not excused to inflict harm on others if he is threatened with it, so it is not permissible for him if he is threatened with taking his wealth if he does not plunder another Muslim, to defend his wealth by plundering the wealth of another Muslim, then he says “I am coerced”.

More dangerous than that, it is not permissible for him to kill a Muslim, if he is threatened with killing if he does not kill him, so the scholars said: Preserving himself is not given precedence over taking the life of a Muslim, but he must not kill a Muslim even if they kill him, so he is killed patiently and seeking reward, and with this intention he is a martyr, in shā'a-Allah.

Do these soldiers (who claim to be coerced) do this?! If this soldier refuses to kill Muslims, will he be killed? Or will he be imprisoned? Or will his salary and pension be cut off? Or will he only be expelled from his job in the army or police?

So he proceeds to kill Muslims, and Allah has made the destruction of the Ka'bah easier to Him than killing a Muslim man! As the Prophet (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him) informed, and Allah Almighty said: {But whoever kills a believer intentionally - his recompense is Hell, wherein he will abide eternally, and Allah has become angry with him and has cursed him and has prepared for him a great punishment.} (An-Nisa': 93). This is if he kills him in a quarrel over the world, or a temptation of Satan, so how about one who kills him because he is a believing muhājir, a mujāhidin the path of Allah, to please America?!

These soldiers who think of themselves as coerced, kill Muslims so that one of them is not expelled from his job, or suffers some punishment. This is not the case of the coerced, but rather like those whom Allah Almighty said about them: {That is because they preferred the worldly life over the Hereafter and because Allah does not guide the disbelieving people.} There is a difference between one who is coerced and utters a word of kufr while his heart is reassured with faith, and between one who embraces kufr with an open heart, so he says a word of kufr, and does an act of kufr, preserving his share of the world. The Holy Quran has made this clear explicitly: as Allah Almighty said in Sūrat an-Naḥl: {Only those who do not believe in the verses of Allah invent falsehood, and it is those who are the liars. Whoever disbelieves in Allah after his belief - except for one who is forced while his heart is secure in faith. But those who [willingly] open their breasts to disbelief, upon them is wrath from Allah, and for them is a great punishment; That is because they preferred the worldly life over the Hereafter and because Allah does not guide the disbelieving people. Those are the ones over whose hearts and hearing and vision Allah has set a seal, and it is those who are the heedless. Assuredly, it is they who will be the losers in the Hereafter. Then, indeed your Lord, to those who emigrated after they had been trial, and thereafter performed Jihād and were patient, indeed, your Lord - after that - is Forgiving and Merciful.} (An-Naḥl: 105-110).

Are these soldiers in the army, police, security, and intelligence, and the jailers and executioners who torture people to death, coerced?! We seek refuge in Allāh from false words and false testimony! Are these criminals coerced?! Look at their condition and behavior and judge them by the standards of Islam. Look at their prayers, their fasting, and their performance of Islamic rituals. Then look at their illicit earnings from bribes and their oppression of people, and their collection of taxes on the roads, in the markets, and at the doors of houses! Then look at their competition for jobs in these unjust and unclean institutions of the police and intelligence, and overseeing prisons and detention centers!

Yes, there may be someone who is not involved in that, who joined the army to defend the country and fight its enemies, and did not know or imagine that his masters would involve him in fighting Muslims alongside the kāfirīn, but can this be excused for fighting under the leadership and banner of the kāfirīn, the Americans and the British, to shed the blood of the believers? Then he says: I am compelled and coerced!

Did he volunteer for the army knowing the condition of its leadership and presidency and what they are upon from apostasy, by changing the laws and being agents for the kuffār, corruption, bribery, transgression, and injustice, or not??

Did he enter the army to defend the homeland, land, and people? All of this is not in the path of Allah in anything unless it is to make the word of Allah the highest, but rather they are tribal, ignorant intentions!

If he entered with the intention of Jihād in the path of Allah, because he was deceived by some deceitful scholars, that this government and its leaders are Muslims and legitimate wulāt al-umūr (those in authority), and that their evils do not take them out of Islam! And this misleading deception was accepted by him, then he found himself facing the new situation. This may be excused for his ignorance of being in such an army, and fighting under its banner with the intention of defending Muslims, but is he excused for his ignorance and by coercion in killing Muslims to please the kāfirīn, and under their banner and leadership?! Allahumma lā (O Allah, no).

His duty is to resign from this army, or at least refuse orders of this kind, and flee from fighting, even if he is imprisoned, tortured, or expelled from his job. This punishment in his case is a blessing from Allah that takes him out of misguidance and from the wrath of Allah on him - if he is given a choice and forced to kill a Muslim or be killed, then his duty is to choose to be killed patiently seeking reward rather than killing a Muslim, and it is not for him to kill a Muslim and then say I am coerced, this is not a legitimate excuse of coercion, so it is not coercion to proceed to kill Muslims and violate their sanctities and then say: If I do not do it, I will be expelled from my job, or my salary will be cut off, or financial penalties will be imposed on me! The duty of this soldier, if he finds himself coerced into fighting Muslims by his apostate masters, or their American, English, and kāfir masters, is to turn his weapon to fight those who coerce him into committing an act of kufr, and fight him with his weapon and be killed as a patient, striving martyr, and not to be stained with the blood and honor of Muslims and think of himself as coerced. If it is not possible for him to escape except by fleeing from the army and he is unable to fight them due to his weakness or the few with him, he must flee and migrate from his country. And Allah's earth is vast, and then he will be a muhājir in the path of Allah, patient, fleeing from temptation with his religion. Migration and flight from a government like this one existing in Pakistan is obligatory on whoever finds himself facing temptation in his religion and forced to commit an act of kufr by fighting under the leadership and banner of the Americans if he is unable to fight this government. The Holy Quran has informed, and the noble Prophetic biography, and the texts of the Sunnah have explained about a Muslim people who remained in Makkah after the Messenger of Allah (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him) migrated to Madinah and did not migrate because they had interests in Makkah, from family, residences, and trade. When the Battle of Badr was between the Muslims and the polytheists of Makkah, they were forced to go out with the kuffār of Makkah, either by compulsion or out of shame from their people.

Some of them were killed in the battle, so the Muslims regretted their killing and said we killed our brothers! So Allah Almighty revealed about them His saying: {Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while wronging themselves - [the angels] will say, "In what [condition] were you?" They will say, "We were oppressed in the land." The angels will say, "Was not the earth of Allah spacious [enough] for you to emigrate therein?" For those, their refuge is Hell - and evil it is as a destination. Except for the oppressed among men, women, and children who cannot devise a plan nor are they directed to a way. For those it is expected that Allah will pardon them, and Allah is ever Pardoning and Forgiving. And whoever emigrates for the cause of Allah will find on the earth many locations and abundance, and whoever leaves his home emigrating to Allah and His Messenger and then death overtakes him - his reward has already become incumbent upon Allah. And Allah is ever Forgiving and Merciful.} (An-Nisa: 97-100).

These verses have explained clearly, as the commentators have explained, important rulings, including:

- The obligation of migration from the lands of kufr and fleeing from its temptations. Especially for those who are exposed to temptation to where he is not tempted in his religion.
- That whoever is coerced and goes out to fight with the kāfirīn. His excuse is not accepted because he should have migrated instead of staying until he is forced to go out to fight the Muslims with the kāfirīn. And that whoever was killed among them, his fate was to Hell and his excuse was not accepted.
- That Allāh has excused the oppressed who did not migrate because they have no means, and they are not guided to a way for hijrah, nor do they have a way to it. These are excused for not migrating (and not the excuse for fighting with the kuffār) and the verse has promised them forgiveness for their negligence in not migrating.
- Then the Qur'ān gave glad tidings to the muhājir in the path of Allāh with Allāh's guarantee for him of ample provision in the world, and that if he dies, then Allāh is guarantor of his reward in the Hereafter.

Where are these conditions in these affiliates to these unjust armies?

Are they coerced and threatened with death if they do not kill the Muslims? No. And even if that were the case, this is not an excuse, and then they must migrate and flee from those who coerce them.

But the bitter truth is that most of them proceed to commit this act of kufr by fighting the Muslims with the kāfirīn out of greed for what the job in the army, police, or intelligence provides for them, of luxurious houses, fancy cars, and high salaries plundered from the wealth of the Muslims, and the taxes imposed on their weak. Then they excuse themselves by saying that they are in the army and police to defend the homeland, and that they are coerced to fight the Muslims by virtue of the job.

This is not coercion, neither according to Sharī'ah nor reason. Is the excuse of one of them accepted for being coerced into killing a Muslim? And is the excuse of the Muslim muhājir and mujāhid in the path of Allah not accepted for killing these in defense of himself? They are the ones who intended aggression against him and came to him in the company of American soldiers and raided his house on him and his wife and children.

As we mentioned earlier, this is not coercion, but rather a state described by Allāh Almighty in His saying: {That is because they preferred the worldly life over the Hereafter and because Allāh does not guide the disbelieving people.}

As for the state of the coerced excused legally from those who fight the Muslims, it is as follows:

- That he was forcibly conscripted into an army that fights the Muslims and not by his choice.
- That he is actually unable to flee or migrate.
- He must dissimulate in fighting and not extend his weapon to harm Muslims, but rather disable his weapon, even if he is killed by the hands of the kuffār or the Muslims, and with this intention he is a martyr. In shā'a-Allah.

If there are among the armies of the ṭawāghīt and their police those who fought the Muslims, or among those who did their deeds, a soldier who meets the characteristics of this coerced person, then he is excused. Otherwise, there is no excuse for him.

The rulings of the Sharī'ah stipulate the obligation or permissibility of fighting the aggressor against the religion of Muslims or their lives or their honor or their wealth, even if he is a Muslim.

A stubborn person might insist, despite clear evidence, that these soldiers fighting Muslims alongside kāfirīn and murtaddīn are Muslims themselves, praying, fasting, and professing the shahādah: "There is no god but Allah, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allah," and do not consider their fighting against Muslims as an act of disbelief. To such a person, in order to be practical and to settle a pointless argument that is based on emotions and desires rather than evidence, we say: Suppose that is the case, then the Muslim who bears arms against Muslims, either out of aggression or to spread corruption on earth, is subject to rulings that scholars have detailed under the title "Repelling an aggressive Muslim." Scholars have explained that every religion sent down by Allah came to preserve the five necessities: dīn (religion), life, honor, intellect, and property. Therefore, it is obligatory to preserve these necessities by any legitimate means, and from this, Islam has legislated repelling an aggressor.

Ṣiyāl (aggression) in Islamic law, as defined by scholars, is assaulting something inviolable without right. The inviolable thing is life, honor, or property.

An aggressor, as defined by scholars, is: anyone who transgresses against what is legally protected, whether a Muslim protected by the rights of Islam or someone protected by the Muslims' covenant of protection (dhimmah). Fighting to repel such an aggressor is legally sanctioned to defend sanctities and is even obligatory in many cases. God Almighty said: {Then whoever transgresses against you, you transgress against him in the like manner as he has transgressed against you} [Al-Baqarah: 194].

As for the aggressor against the religion:

It is obligatory, according to the saying of the Prophet ﷺ: "Whoever is killed defending his religion is a shahīd." Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "As for defensive fighting, it is the most severe type of repelling the aggressor against sanctity and religion, it is obligatory by consensus. The aggressor enemy who corrupts religion and the world, there is nothing more obligatory after 'īmān than repelling him." al-Fatāwā al-Kubrā, vol. 5, p. 530.

As for the aggressor against honor:

It is obligatory to repel him by agreement of the fuqahā' (jurists), even if it leads to his killing, even if he is a Muslim. Al-Nawawi said: "As for defending honor, it is obligatory without dispute." Shaykh Abdullah Azzam, may Allah have mercy on him, said: "Someone may ask: Is it permissible for us to kill a policeman who prays and fasts, just because he wants to take me to the police station?" He said: "As for the opinion of the fuqahā' by consensus, it is not permissible for anyone to surrender to a person who wants to violate his honor. All the fuqahā' agreed that repelling an aggressor against honor is obligatory by consensus. So, if you let the police raid your house in the late hours of the night, and your wife is naked in her sleeping clothes, uncovering her to search for you sleeping with her, then your honor is violated, and you are sinful before the Lord of the Worlds. The prayer and fasting of such a policeman do not prevent the permissibility of killing him." Al-Jihād Fiqh wa Ijtihād, vol. 3, p. 139.

As for the aggressor against life:

It is obligatory to repel him according to the majority of scholars. Some have gone to permissibility without obligation, even if he is a Muslim. In the authentic ḥadīth: "Whoever is killed defending his property is a shahīd, and whoever is killed defending his blood is a shahīd, and whoever is killed defending his religion is a shahīd, and whoever is killed defending his family is a shahīd." Narrated by Ahmad and Abu Dawood. And it was narrated from him عليه السلام: "Whoever is killed defending his right is a shahīd." Narrated by al-Nasa'i.

Imam al-Jassas said after this ḥadīth in Aḥkām al-Qur'ān, vol. 1, p. 242: "We do not know of any disagreement that if a man draws his sword against another man to kill him without right, it is obligatory for the Muslims to kill him."

Sheikh al-Shahīd ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "And in this case - ṣiyāl - if the ṣā'il is killed, then he is in Hell, even if he is a Muslim, and if the just person is killed, then he is a shahīd."

As for the aggressor against wealth:

The majority of Muslim scholars have gone to its permissibility, and some have considered it obligatory. Abu Huraira, may Allah be pleased with him, reported that a man said: "O Messenger of Allah, what if a man comes wanting to take my property?" The Prophet ﷺ said: "Do not give it to him." He said: "What if he fights me?" The Prophet ﷺ said: "Fight him." He said: "What if he kills me?" The Prophet ﷺ said: "Then you are a shahīd." He said: "What if I kill him?" The Prophet ﷺ said: "He is in Hellfire." Narrated by Muslim.

Imam Ibn Taymiyyah says in Majmū‘ al-Fatāwa, vol. 28, p. 45: "The sunnah and ijmā‘ are agreed that if the aggressor Muslim cannot be repelled except by killing him, he is killed, even if the property he takes is a qīrāṭ (small measure) of a dīnār. For in the authentic ḥadīth: 'Whoever is killed defending his property is a shahīd.'"

Al-Shafi'i, may Allah have mercy on him, said: "If a man enters another man's house at night or during the day with a weapon and orders him to leave but he does not leave, then he has the right to strike him, even if it leads to his death" meaning if the repelled is killed. Al-Umm, vol. 6, p. 33.

This is a summary of the rulings on repelling the aggressor Muslim against individual Muslims. So how about if he comes wanting religion, life, honor, property or all of that, under the banner and leadership of the Americans and the murtaddīn (apostates)?!

We will repeat the presentation of these legal evidences with more detail in addition to other basic legal rulings in such jihād against our enemies these days, in the first chapter of the eighth section in the second part of this book, which is entitled "The Ideology, Methodology, and Jihadi Creed of the Global Islamic Resistance Movement", where we present the details of the legal evidences for some methodological issues, if Allāh wills.

Evidences of Reason and Logic that Armed Jihād is the Solution

We ask whoever wants to argue with us about the fact that armed jihād today is the only real solution!

If the solution to our problems, with the enemy having overwhelmed us, is not armed resistance, then what is it?!

- Is it by clicking prayer beads in the corners of the zawāyā (Sufi lodges)?!
- Or by refining 'asānīd (chains of narrations) and writing legal researches?!
- Or do you see it by staying up late on the computer buttons in the internet battles and their heated discussions?! Or do you see it by the revolutionary telephone calls with satellite interviews?!
- Or do you see it in purification, education, and cleansing of souls?! While the enemy is eliminating the foundations of our existence and raising our generations as they wish every hour and minute!
- Or do you see it in shouting in demonstrations, and what the governments offer of permitting silent or noisy protests in the streets?!

- Or do you see it in the great invention that the ṣaḥwa (Islamic awakening) has reached, and what parliamentary jurisprudence has brought us? By objecting to the occupation, the taking of lives, the plundering of wealth, and the violation of honor, under the dome of parliament?!
- Or by the "Global Campaign to Combat Aggression"?! With a hollow statement sent by fax to satellite channels to denounce what is happening of calamities in the lands of Muslims!!

The truth is that our situation with these opinions is like a household that was sleeping peacefully, when thieves raided them at night. Some of them slaughtered the father, and some inflicted wounds on the mother, and a third intends to violate the sister's honor, and a fourth is busy digging up the treasures to steal the money, and a fifth runs over the children in the darkness of the night, and a sixth plunders the furniture of the house and sets fire to its parts

And the men of the family are distributed in some of the rooms, each of them busy with his own affairs, and their younger brother gets up calling them to rise to defend the shed blood, the violated honor, the plundered money, and the house whose pillars are collapsing but no one answers

One of them is absorbed in performing the night prayer, reciting his daily portion, and from the intensity of his humility, he did not hear what is happening!

The second is bent over the books of knowledge, searching for the verification of a sanad whose correctness he has not been sure of for days!! The third is busy in a discussion with a neighbor, inviting him to righteousness!!!

The fourth is following an open religious dialogue over the internet in front of the computer screen!!!!

The fifth is printing some election advertisements to support the nomination of some scholars and preachers for the upcoming parliamentary elections.

The young man is shouting, and his sister is slapping her cheek and crying for help, and some of the children are throwing stones at the armed thieves, and their brothers are busy with da‘wah and types of Islamic work!!

This is about their committed brothers. They have other brothers who are busy with other things!

Some of them stay up in front of the television watching the Star Academy program on a satellite channel.

Another falls drunk from alcohol in one of the corners of the house!

A third is immersed in an emotional conversation on the mobile phone.. sending love messages via the Rotana channel!

As for the cousins and neighbors around them, some of them are in soirees and evenings of entertainment, others are spending the night over invoices and commercial accounts of that day's sales, and some are drinking tea on the corner of the café until late at night!

The young man gets up to repel the armed thieves with his knife, the children repel with stones, and the sister tries her best with her bare hand. This is the extent of the effort in front of the thieves armed with weapons. Repelling, death and shahādah are more merciful than living in such a house whose walls bear witness to this shame and disgrace and belittlement. This is a model of the state of our Ummah today.

Do the good people, may Allah reward them for their efforts in calling the evildoers to guidance, think that they have been relieved of the individually obligatory duty of repelling?! Or do they think that their da'wa will repel a brutal enemy, or establish an absent law, or change a treacherous, infidel, and immoral government?

Or do they think that if the Crusader campaigns strike with their full force in our lands, and drive their slaves from the rulers to further fight the religion and mislead its people, that they will still have room for propagation, da'wa, and construction of mosques?!

Or do those calling to correct Muslims' beliefs truly believe we will retain our beliefs amidst the Crusader invasion of our lands and the dominance of their secular and apostate agents?

And what beliefs will remain for us after America has become a god worshiped willingly and unwillingly in our lands by many Muslims?! What beliefs will remain for our children and youth after international organizations impose on our countries the curricula in all stages, and even interfere in the texts of Friday sermons in our mosques?! What beliefs will remain after they set policies for us regarding how to deal with our women by obligating our governments to "women's rights" treaties according to their atheistic and permissive cultures?!

What beliefs will remain with the programs of "reforming the societies" of the Gulf, Arab, and Islamic as the Americans have announced?!

Or do the righteous, who are diligent in purifying (tazkiyah) themselves, think that the satellite dishes and channels will leave any of their offspring and children inclined towards good conduct and righteousness in light of these immoral conditions?!

Or do the "Islamic Democrats" believe that there is value in more experiments after what happened in Algeria and Turkey and Tunisia?! And after what the Islamists have achieved in the parliaments of Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan, the Gulf states, Morocco, and others?!

And do they think that their existence as crushed Islamic minorities among the secular opposition and ruling parties in parliament will change the course of history that is being written by the swords of the Crusaders today?!

Or do they believe after the offices of CIA and FBI have spread and hundreds of thousands of Crusader soldiers and armies have poured into the country, and America has begun to appoint whomever it wants from the rulers and dismiss whomever it wants, that they can achieve the majority and establish the rule of Islam, after they saw the storm that uprooted the Taliban government and the government of Iraq, and began to announce that it would redraw the political and even geographical map in the Middle East?!

And Allāh Almighty spoke the truth: {Have they not traveled through the earth and have hearts to understand with or ears to hear with? For indeed, it is not eyes that are blinded, but blinded are the hearts which are within the breasts.} [al-Ḥajj: 46].

Glory be to Allāh.. Truly our situation has become as the poet said:

Nothing is correct in the mind, If the day needs evidence.

We believe that those solutions - may Allāh reward their owners well, each with his intention - will not solve our problem today. And we believe that the global Islamic armed comprehensive resistance is the solution, and that it can - by the permission of Allāh - defeat the enemy.

We say with full mouths, "Yes, that is indeed the case." Yes, supported by sharʿī evidence. And yes, as required by the evidence of reason, logic, and reality. For there are clear facts that support our view:

First: The peoples of the Arab Ummah, and likewise all Islamic peoples, have washed their hands and lost hope in all the doctrines, trends, philosophies, and ideas—both imported and local—that do not proceed from Islam as a possible solution to confront this aggressor. Whoever follows what the newspapers write, what ordinary people write in the readers' corners, what they say in their interventions on satellite channels, or what they shout in their demonstrations finds that everyone, even the fusaq (flagrant sinners) among the Muslims and those who have transgressed against themselves—let alone the committed and religious—all clearly declare that they are with jihād, and that they believe that only the banners of jihād under the slogan (Lā 'ilāha 'illā-llāh Muḥammadun rasūlu-llāh) "There is no god but Allāh, Muḥammad is the messenger of Allāh" will stand up to this invading enemy. Even the secular organizations, national figures, and nationalist movements in Palestine, as everywhere else, have begun to genuinely ta'aslam (become Islamic), or claim to, and have become accustomed to adapting their media and slogans to Islam—either by a sincere return to their roots, or by keeping pace with the Islamic street, which has begun to witness a return to religion as a natural response to the Crusader onslaught on the Ummah of Islam and its targeting of its creed and components.

This was the case of our Ummah in times of calamities throughout our history. Rather, this is the nature of man in the face of major disasters.. to return to his Lord and his belief, hoping for victory and salvation.

Indeed, hope in Islam and jihād under the banners of Islam as a solution to confront the tyranny of America has become a hope for all enemies of America among the oppressed peoples, even the leftist groups and peace groups in the Ṣalībī (Crusader) world itself. The follower of the writings of some Western writers finds that some of them have begun to declare, in the context of what they write about the tyranny of America, that there is no longer any hope of confronting America except through armed Muslims. Indeed, the matter reached a point where one of the anti-globalization and war demonstrations, in which hundreds of thousands participated in Italy, raised, among its slogans, a picture of "Bin Laden" wearing a "Guevara" hat and drawn in a way that resembled him! They wrote slogans against America under his picture, expressing that the symbol of armed Islamic jihād today is the solution to confronting America!

Everyone knows and believes today that the solution must come out of the pocket of the Islamists by jihād to confront the tyranny of the new world order.

Secondly: The masses of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah and its cadres and activists in it, today form a huge mass in terms of numbers in all the lands of the Muslims and in each of them separately. In every conference for tablīgh, sometimes more than tens of thousands gather in the city in their mosques, but their annual gathering from different countries of the world in Pakistan reaches more than what gathers in Makkah for Ḥajj, more than two million Muslims.

As for the Salafis and the followers of the school of 'Ahl al-Ḥadīth and their groups and the students of their school, the follower of their sites on the internet and their newspapers and their activities in the Arab and Islamic countries finds that they today - tābāraka-llāh - are counted in hundreds of thousands if not millions, not to mention those who frequent their mosques from the general public.

As for the Muslim Brotherhood and their branches and the Islamic groups emanating from them and carrying their thought under various names, they still the main segment in terms of number and presence in the Ṣaḥwah in most countries of the Arab and Islamic world, they are counted in the millions as well, in addition to tens of millions of their supporters and voters for them in the elections.

This is not to mention the Sufi groups and their followers and their sheikhs and their disciples. In addition to hundreds of different Islamic groups and parties and blocs that fall as a whole under the name "Islamic Awakening" which constitutes without exaggeration a huge human mass in the Islamic world. If we add to them those who sympathize with them and with the generalities of the slogan of Islam, we would find that we are in front of vast crowds that have grown in their heart today the aspiration to confront America and the Jews and their Crusader allies under the slogan of jihād and Islam. But it is still a worthless mass because it lacks three things:

- The methodology of belief and the jihadi combat creed.
- Serious and direct work programs.
- The field example from the leaders of that Ṣaḥwah and its jihadi symbols in every Islamic country.

Every discerning person realizes today that the problem of this Ummah is that most of its scholars have turned back on their heels, between traitor and incapable. The general leaders of the ṣaḥwah in it have chosen to rest, and the dust of war has settled, searching for middle ground solutions with Jāhiliyyah (ignorance) on the side of the road.. It is wahn (weakness): love of the world and hatred of death. The truthful and trustworthy one spoke the truth.

Thirdly: The experiences of the Islamic and non-Islamic peoples since the stage of colonialism, and especially after World War II until today, have proven the ability of the peoples who took the method of popular resistance to exhaust the colonizers and force them to leave.

This was at a time when the civilizational momentum of that European, American, and Russian colonialism was enormous, and at the height of its violence. And it was able to continue and bear the blows of the resistance. Nevertheless, all those resistances resulted in the defeat of the colonizers and their collapse everywhere.

In our Arab and Islamic world, there are pioneering experiences in that file, in Morocco, Algeria, Yemen, Iraq, Egypt, the Levant, Afghanistan, the Caucasus, India, Indonesia, and others.

In our contemporary experiences as well, we find in our file the glorious victories of jihād in Bosnia, Chechnya, and Afghanistan which proves the ability to achieve victory and defeat the enemy. As for today, as we are waging war against America, it is enough for the observer to see the signs of cracking, collapse, and downfall in it as a result of only one operation in the events of September 11. The confrontations with the Americans in Iraq and Afghanistan recently, and before that in Somalia and in the Desert Storm war, have proven that the Americans are unable to be present and confront on the ground except by using their apostate agents from our own people. Their glories are limited to spreading destruction, death, and devastation over the heads of civilians from the air only. What if America faced a comprehensive global Islamic resistance in all Muslim countries, even in all countries of the world... and in its own backyard? What recourse would it have but to withdraw and flee?

As for its European allies in NATO, they are weaker and more fragile than it militarily, economically, and socially. The alliance between them is already fractured.

Western civilization in general, and American civilization in particular, is a fragile, aging civilization, plagued by political, social, economic, and psychological diseases, to the extent that one wonders how it was able to surround us and seek to re-colonize us. This is only because our Ummah, due to its distance from the law of Allāh, has reached a state of weakness that has made it a bowl for those greedy people despite their frailty!

Armed resistance is required by shari‘ah and reality, and its results are possible and guaranteed by the permission of Allāh, with the evidence of shari‘ah and the evidence of reality and history. However, it needs the participation of the general Muslim masses, and it needs to be led by an Islamic Awakening led by scholars and leaders who are role models. A resistance undertaken by an entire Ummah, not just dozens of sincere fidā’iyyīn (self-sacrificers).

We need a resistance that is the approach and battle of an Ummah, and not the path and sacrifices of an elite only.

As for waiting for solutions to the crises of this reality, through the methods proposed today in the market of Ṣaḥwah, through all its schools, from the extreme of Sufism to the extreme of Salafism, passing through the experiences of Islamic political parties and the proposals of reform and education, it is enough in reviewing the result of their experiences, and the harvest of their giving over more than seventy years now to conclude that they are methods and solutions that have reached the point of bankruptcy. And they have not provided a solution to what we are in. Rather, they have not reached their own results and objectives.

Neither the schools of tarbiyyah (nurturing), taṣfiyyah (purification), 'iṣlāḥ (reform), and sulūk (conduct)—neither the Sufi, nor the Salafī, nor the Tablīghī ones—have been able to reform the individuals of societies. Corruption today is rampant, immorality is widespread, creeds are shaken, and conditions are worse today than they were when those schools started, in many ways.

The Islamic political parties, which intended to reach power in order to establish the rule of sharī'ah, have only reached prisons and detention centers, then to the abrogation of the curricula established by the early founders, may Allāh have mercy on them. Then they reached the point of throwing themselves at the thresholds of oppressive authorities in shameful, marginal political roles. This is not to mention the maze in which they lost the foundations of the 'aqīdah of tawḥīd under the pretext of benefit and gradualism.

The solution is clear in reason and logic, as it is established in religion and shar':

The law of Allāh must be established on the ruins of Jāhiliyyah and the ruling riddah, and on the remnants of the hordes of colonizing invaders.

When the rule of Allāh is established, Allāh deters with authority what He does not deter with the Qur’ān, as our master ‘Uthmān, may Allāh be pleased with him, said.

No rule has been established in the history of mankind, no state has been founded, and no civilization, ancient or modern, has risen except on the points of spears and under the shadows of swords. In the experiences of believers and disbelievers alike throughout history lies the greatest proof. Whoever is daunted by this truth should read history, and if he does not see it and understand it, he should check his mind. This State of Israel, the civilization of modern Western Europe, and the glories of America today are the latest evidence of the establishment of states and the emergence of civilizations.

The conclusion:

The rule of sharī‘ah and the requirements of the rulings of the religion of Allāh in the reality of Muslims today and their shar‘ī and worldly crises indicate that jihād is the solution, and that its only path lies in the establishment of the global Islamic armed resistance, and in the comprehensive confrontation with our occupying enemies and their apostate and hypocritical allies.

There is no solution except on the paths of shahādah—in that the youth of this Ummah seek death so that life may be granted to them and their Ummah, as Allāh the Exalted said: {Fight them; Allāh will punish them by your hands and will disgrace them and give you victory over them and satisfy the breasts of a believing people.} [Qur’ān 9:14].

Only then {And that day the believers will rejoice In the victory of Allāh} [al-Rūm: 4-5].

Then you will see {the people entering into the religion of Allāh in multitudes} [al-Naṣr: 2].

Then prayer is established and justice is ruled and good is enjoined and evil is forbidden, and beliefs are corrected and behavior is refined. Because the allies of Allāh have been empowered in the earth and have established His law as Allāh Almighty said: {Those who, if We give them authority in the land, establish prayer and give zakāh and enjoin what is right and forbid what is wrong. And to Allāh belongs the outcome of [all] matters} [al-Ḥajj: 41].

Before we delve into the core of this book, let us present our point of view on how this jihād should be conducted, the path of resistance, and its methodology, which we believe is the introduction to the solution, by the permission of Allāh. We will pass through a number of introductory chapters, leading to the eighth chapter, which includes that, if Allāh wills.

We begin with a historical survey of our eternal struggle with the Romans and its roots since the conflict between truth and falsehood arose on this earth. That is the following chapter, and the story of that conflict from the days of Cain to the days of Bush, where falsehood still declares in the face of truth: "I will surely kill you."

Because understanding history forms the basis for understanding the reality, the realization of which forms the basis for drawing inspiration from the footsteps of the future.

Roots of the International System and the Path of Conflict

From Qābīl to George W. Bush

Allāh the Exalted said:

{And recite to them the story of Adam's two sons, in truth, when each offered a sacrifice [to Allāh], and it was accepted from one but not accepted from the other. [One] said, "I will surely kill you."} (Al-Mā'idah: 27)

Abū Dāwūd narrated from Thawbān that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "The nations are about to call each other [to attack] you as diners call one another to a dish." Someone asked: "Will that be because of our small number at that time?" He said: "Rather, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like scum, like the scum of the torrent. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and cast weakness (al-wahn) into your hearts." Someone asked: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death."

Roots of the International System and the Path of Conflict from Qābīl to George W. Bush

A brief review of the path of conflict, from the strife between the two sons of Adam (peace be upon him), where the wicked one Qābīl killed his righteous brother Hābīl, to the establishment of the New World Order led by the United States of America on the principles of "Clash of Civilizations" and the inevitability of some civilizations being eliminated by others, provides a summary of the roots of the New World Order. More precisely, it is a review of the history of the international system and the conflict between its parties, until it settled into a conflict between Muslims and the Romans as the most prominent aspect of the ongoing conflict in medieval and modern human history.

In this overview under this title, I will summarize what serves the purpose as a historical introduction to the ideas of this book, which includes a call for global Islamic resistance, its methodology, and its approach.

Beginnings of the Conflict He said: "I will surely kill you":

The Holy Qur'ān has narrated to us the story of the first son of Adam's aggression against his brother and his killing of him after his explicit threat, thereby initiating the practice of killing among mankind. Allāh the Exalted said: {And recite to them the story of Adam's two sons, in truth, when each offered a sacrifice [to Allāh], and it was accepted from one but not accepted from the other. [One] said, "I will surely kill you." [The other] said, "Indeed, Allāh only accepts from the righteous [who fear Him]. If you should raise your hand against me to kill me, I shall not raise my hand against you to kill you. Indeed, I fear Allāh, Lord of the worlds. Indeed, I want you to obtain [thereby] my sin and your sin so you will be among the companions of the Fire. And that is the recompense of wrongdoers." And his soul permitted to him the murder of his brother, so he killed him and became among the losers.} (Al-Mā'idah: 27-30).

Regardless of what some narratives of the commentaries delved into regarding the reasons for the killing, and sufficing with the apparent reason mentioned in the verses, where the fire of hatred ignited in the chest of the wicked one, so he shouted, threatening his brother with his saying, "I will surely kill you!" We find that the raging fire in his chest was not extinguished by the response of the righteous brother with what it contained of exhortation, gentleness, reminder of Allāh, and intimidation of the Fire. So his soul allowed him in fact to commit the first crime on the face of the earth.

The idea of linking Qābīl and George Bush, and the unity of their slogan "I will surely kill you" I heard in a lesson by Sheikh Abū al-Walīd al-Miṣrī - Muṣṭafā Ḥāmid. And it is a matter of honesty to mention this to him here, and I have borrowed the idea for the title of this chapter. The man is one of the geniuses of writers and thinkers and one of the pearls whose value and worth were lost in the sea of turbulent waves of the Arab Jihād movement in Afghanistan. He is a professional journalist, writer, and historian, and a strategic thinker at a high level. I do not know what his fate is after the events. I ask Allāh to keep him in good health, and convey my greetings to him.

Thus, the march of evil continued with a section of the children of Adam, carrying the task of shedding blood, aggression, and injustice throughout the course of humanity until that banner stained with blood reached the hands of Western civilization and its arrogant heir, America, to adopt the theory of the Clash of Civilizations, the theory that the earth cannot accommodate contradictory civilizations, and that the inevitable conflict will make them eliminate each other, and that if Western civilization with its Christian, Crusader character, its capitalist economic theory, its secular philosophy, and its political approach based on democracy can coexist with some civilizations, then its clash with Islamic civilization, its enemy that it assumed after eliminating the Soviet Eastern civilization, is an inevitable clash. As America believed and began dragging behind it Western Europe, collapsed Russia, and the countries of the Warsaw Pact panting to enter NATO, believing that it must remove the civilization of Islam and Muslims and impose its policies, hegemony, culture, and infidel philosophy on their peoples.

Thus, Bush declared that he was leading a Crusader war destined for him by the Lord who chose him for it after healing him from addiction to alcohol!! His Crusader Zionist aides also declared that they are the heirs of Roman Christian civilization and that its enemies in history - meaning the Muslims - are its enemies in the present and the future.

From here, America moved on all fronts to impose on the world what they called the "New World Order" since the dissolution of the Soviet Union at the beginning of the last decade of the twentieth century.

To proceed according to the dreams of American Zionist theorists such as Kissinger, Huntington, Wolf, and others who stated that America must work to make the twenty-first century, the beginning of the third millennium, an American century. Thus, the slogan of evil, "I will surely kill you," returned to rise with the banners of American crime, threatening everyone who stands in the face of the onslaught of American greed and tyranny, especially all forces of resistance and confrontation in the lands of Islam and the Muslims.

Stations from the History of the Conflict and Its Roots Through the Stories of the Prophets and Their Followers

The children of Adam spread and worshipped Allāh according to the religion of monotheism as their father, peace be upon him, taught them. Then the era extended, and the devils enticed them to the right and left away from the straight path, and polytheism, injustice, and tyranny crept into them.

So Allāh sent the messengers successively, as bearers of good tidings and warners in every nation, as He Almighty said: {Indeed, We have sent you with the truth as a bearer of good tidings and a warner. And there was no nation but that there had passed within it a warner.} (Fāṭir: 24).

One of the greatest reasons for the polytheists' adherence to their polytheism was: the imitation of fathers, obedience to leaders, adherence to customs and what souls are familiar with, following desires, and the basis of all of that was the running of the masters and the elite of the great and corrupt religious men after interests, and the public disabling their minds and following their elders out of fear and desire. Thus, Allāh the Exalted informed us: {Then We sent Our messengers in succession. Every time there came to a nation its messenger, they denied him, so We made some of them follow others [to destruction] and made them narrations. So away with a people who do not believe.} (Al-Mu'minūn: 44).

The essence of the prophets' call and the basis of their faith was one:

{And We certainly sent to every nation a messenger, [saying], "Worship Allāh and avoid Tāghūt." And among them were those whom Allāh guided, and among them were those upon whom error was [deservedly] decreed. So proceed through the earth and observe how was the end of the deniers.} (An-Naḥl: 36). Likewise, the responses of the disbelievers and atheists to their messengers were similarly one. The forms of conflict and the stories of those bloody confrontations varied, but the basis of their image was very similar. The people of truth worship Allāh, unify Him, and want to subject creation to Him. The disbelievers, led by their masters, elites, priests, scholars of their rulers, and those with vested interests, worship the ṭawāghīt and desires and want to turn people away from the truth. So they torture its people and persecute them.

The slogans of evil and its threats were repeated. "We will surely expel you," "We will surely stone you," "We will surely kill you," "We will surely imprison you." Thus, it has been since the wicked brother said to his righteous brother: "I will surely kill you."

As for Nūḥ (Noah), peace be upon him, the first of the messengers, he patiently endured his people for nearly a thousand years, and his reward was their constant threat:

{They said, "If you do not desist, O Noah, you will surely be among those who are stoned."} (Ash-Shu'arā': 116).

And these are the people of Ibrāhīm, peace be upon him, saying to the father of the prophets, as Allah the Exalted narrated to us: {But the answer of his people was not except that they said, "Kill him or burn him," but Allāh saved him from the fire. Indeed in that are signs for a people who believe.} (Al-'Ankabūt: 24). Even his father said to him:

{He said, "Are you averse to my gods, O Abraham? If you do not desist, I will surely stone you and avoid me a prolonged time."} (Maryam: 46).

And these are the people of Shu‘ayb, peace be upon him, threatening him and his followers: {Said the eminent ones who were arrogant among his people, "We will surely evict you, O Shu‘ayb, and those who have believed with you from our city, or you must return to our religion." He said, "Even if we were unwilling?"} (Al-A‘rāf: 88). And they increased him in threats: {They said, "O Shu‘ayb, we do not understand much of what you say, and indeed, we consider you among us as weak. And if not for your family, we would have stoned you, and you are not to us one of honor."} (Hūd: 91).

As for the people of Lūṭ, peace be upon him, likewise was their saying: {But the answer of his people was not but that they said, "Expel the family of Lot from your city. Indeed, they are people who keep themselves pure."} (An-Naml: 56).

Until Mūsā, peace be upon him, came and the Qur’ān narrated to us the story of his long struggle with Pharaoh and his people, where Pharaoh declared the origin of the problem: {He said, "If you take a god other than me, I will surely place you among those imprisoned."} (Ash-Shu‘arā’: 29).

{And the eminent ones from Pharaoh's people said, "Will you leave Moses and his people to cause corruption in the land and abandon you and your gods?" He said, "We will kill their sons and keep their women alive; and indeed, we are dominant over them."} (Al-A‘rāf: 127).

Then the Holy Qur’ān informed us of the behavior of the Children of Israel and their corrupt and wicked leaders and priests with their prophets: {And We did certainly give Moses the Torah and followed up after him with messengers. And We gave Jesus, the son of Mary, clear proofs and supported him with the Holy Spirit. Then is it [not] that every time a messenger came to you with what your souls did not desire, you were arrogant [toward them]? And a party [of them] you denied and another party you kill.}

(Al-Baqarah: 87).

Until the Prophet of Allāh ‘Īsā (peace be upon him) came, so the Jewish rabbis and monks plotted against him and sought the Roman ruler to kill and crucify him, but Allāh saved him from them ({and they did not kill him, nor did they crucify him}), so they persecuted his followers for two centuries, killing and displacing them, as the Qur’ān mentioned one of the images of that suffering in the story of the Companions of the Trench: {Cursed were the companions of the trench, [Containing] the fire full of fuel, When they were sitting near it And they, to what they were doing against the believers, were witnesses. And they resented them not except that they believed in Allāh, the Exalted in Might, the Praiseworthy.} (Al-Burūj: 4-8).

Until the final message came, and the affair of the disbelievers of Quraysh with the Prophet of Mercy (peace and blessings be upon him) and with his followers was what the narrations of the Sīrah covered and what the verses of the Qur’ān and texts of the Sunnah immortalized, so that the threat is summarized by Allāh informing him of the summary of the enemies of Allāh's scheming against the believers in every time and place: {And [remember, O Muḥammad], when those who disbelieved plotted against you to restrain you or kill you or evict you [from Makkah]. But they plan, and Allāh plans. And Allāh is the best of planners.} (Al-Anfāl: 30). Imprisonment, or killing, or displacement, and this is what is happening today by America and its allies of disbelievers and apostates to everyone who thinks of resisting them and standing in the face of their tyranny.

Lessons and Observations:

The student of the stories of the prophets, starting from the call of Nūḥ (Noah), peace be upon him, and ending with the fragrant biography of our master, the Chosen One (Muṣṭafā), peace and blessings be upon him, as covered by the texts of the Qur’ān and the Prophetic Sunnah, comes out with endless lessons and insights about the path of conflict with falsehood. Also, the study of human history in general and Islamic history in particular gives the best and clearest lessons about the course of this conflict throughout history. Within the limits of the brevity we are dealing with, we mention the following:

The Impossibility of the Forces of Good and Evil Coexisting in One Place

Although the family of Adam, peace be upon him, was very small, indeed the only family on earth, the entire earth was not vast enough for that wicked brother to tolerate the existence of a righteous brother with whom Allāh accepted sacrifices. He could have said to his brother, "I do not want you near me, go to another land, to another mountain, to another region, to another continent," but he found nothing but the statement: "I will surely kill you." Evil cannot tolerate the existence of good on the entire face of the earth, if it can. This is a point that benefits us in that it is truly absurd, and contrary to the cosmic laws and the logic of history, for some of the people of truth to imagine that the people of falsehood and the forces of evil can tolerate their neighborhood, let alone their mere existence.

From here, all theories of coexistence between them at all levels collapse.

No tyrannical ruler throughout history could tolerate the existence of someone who unified Allāh among his people and did not worship him, even if he left him alone with his tyranny. Similarly, a germ-like state in its structure and idea, such as Israel, cannot tolerate the establishment of a Palestinian statelet in its flank, even with distorted specifications, on a part of the land of Palestine, even if this statelet surrendered to Israel all that it had robbed from it and recognized its originally illegitimate legitimacy. This is what the ridiculous path of the peace agreements has proven, starting with Oslo, passing through Madrid and others, and ending with the "Roadmap" to the abyss.

Political experiences in all Islamic countries have also proven that the forces of disbelief, secularism, atheism, and Westernization did not tolerate the existence of fundamentalist forces and Islamic parties with them under the dome of parliament, except in a distorted, domesticated, and controlled form. They have rejected them even in this state in the vast majority of experiences. It is naive for some Islamists to imagine that the limited space under the dome of parliament can accommodate the forces of faith and disbelief in Allāh's divinity and lordship, coexisting peacefully. The earth as a whole was not vast enough for the neighborhood of truth and falsehood, whereas falsehood soon cried out to truth, "I will surely kill you."

Evil is not Repelled by Preaching and Stirring the Conscience, but by Resisting it and Cutting off its Roots:

It did not benefit Qābīl that his brother reminded him that he was peaceful towards him, that he did not raise his hand against him, reminded him of the fear of Allāh, and warned him of the Fire as a punishment for the wrongdoers.

Allāh Almighty said: {And his soul permitted to him the murder of his brother, so he killed him and became among the losers.} (Al-Mā'idah: 30). Then Allāh Almighty said: {Because of that, We decreed upon the Children of Israel that whoever kills a soul unless for a soul or for corruption [done] in the land - it is as if he had slain mankind entirely. And whoever saves one - it is as if he had saved mankind entirely. And Our messengers had certainly come to them with clear proofs. Then indeed many of them, [even] after that, throughout the land, were transgressors.} (Al-Mā'idah: 32).

Because the lesson is in the audacity to kill, not in the quantity of killing. Whoever kills a soul unjustly, tyrannically, and wrongfully is ready to kill others for the same motives. This is what has been proven by this barbaric, savage Western civilization, whose history pages are filled with horrific stories of crimes.

Since the campaign of geographical discoveries was launched with the authorization and blessing of the Vatican Pope at the beginning of the sixteenth century, the European Christian countries left behind stories of killing and slaughter of people in the other five continents that would make children's hair turn gray.

The West exterminated entire races and nations in the Americas and Australia, and committed atrocities throughout history since that time until today, whose victims exceeded hundreds of millions of people. The Europeans even exterminated each other in their struggle for the proceeds of colonialism and for different interests and policies. About 8 million people were killed in the First World War. The Europeans, in addition to the Russians, Americans, and Japanese, annihilated about 82 million people among themselves in the Second World War. They bombed cities on the heads of civilians and made them a testing ground for their deadly military inventions. America was unique in testing the first two nuclear bombs in modern history, killing nearly a quarter of a million people in moments!

Because of Allāh's knowledge that there are the likes of these among humans, He legislated jihād and defense, saying: {Permission [to fight] has been given to those who are being fought, because they were wronged. And indeed, Allāh is competent to give them victory. [They are] those who have been evicted from their homes without right - only because they say, "Our Lord is Allāh." And were it not that Allāh checks the people, some by means of others, there would have been demolished monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques in which the name of Allāh is much mentioned. And Allāh will surely support those who support Him. Indeed, Allāh is Powerful and Exalted in Might.} (Al-Ḥajj: 39-40).

Allāh Almighty said about them: {They do not observe toward a believer any pact of kinship or covenant of protection. And it is they who are the transgressors.} (At-Tawbah: 10). Therefore, He said: {So whoever has assaulted you, then assault him in the same way that he has assaulted you. And fear Allāh and know that Allāh is with those who fear Him.} (Al-Baqarah: 194).

For this, jihād was legislated and preparation was imposed, the preparation of force with the aim of (intimidation), yes, intimidating this wretched, aggressive race of the sons of Adam wherever they are found. Therefore, Allāh Almighty commanded clearly and explicitly: {And prepare against them whatever you are able of power and of steeds of war} and specified the goal explicitly, completing: {by which you may terrify the enemy of Allāh and your enemy and others besides them whom you do not know [but] whom Allāh knows.} (Al-Anfāl: 60).

The verses in this meaning are many. Allāh knew that this evil, murderous race of humans must be deterred, and their roots must be eradicated if they are not deterred, and they should not be allowed to live except under humiliation and belittlement, paying the jizyah out of hand while they are humbled, and that most of them do not become upright unless you remain standing over them. Thus, history has proven, and Allāh the Great has spoken the truth:

{Does He who created not know, while He is the Subtle, the Acquainted?} (Al-Mulk: 14).

The Conflict between Truth and Falsehood is Eternal. It Was, and Will Continue. And the Enemies of Truth Throughout History are the Arrogant Elite from the Entourage, Aides, and Priests of the Sultan

Since shirk arose, and the nucleus of power was formed and tyranny was established, the interests of the sultan and the ṭāghūt were linked to the interests of the people of wealth and the world through the falsehood of the guardians of misguidance from the priests. So they became the elite, and their guards became the aides. The Holy Qur'ān often used the term "al-mala'" (the elite) or "those who were arrogant" or "those who were given luxury" to refer to this group, the tool of Satan against the people of truth.

Yes, this conflict began since Qābīl and continued with the arrogant ones from the people of Nūḥ, then what followed from the prophets, peace be upon them, of whom the Qur'ān narrated to us, to the details of that in the story of Mūsā, peace be upon him, with the enemy of Allāh, Pharaoh, to the forces of disbelief and the people of interests who sought to kill the Messiah, but Allāh saved him, reaching the call of the Seal of the Prophets, peace and blessings be upon him. And it continued after that, as we will explain, through Islamic history between the states of disbelief and the state of Islam, and between the forces of truth and righteousness and the forces of arrogance, injustice, and oppression within the state of Islam itself, since the sultan and the Qur'ān separated, as the Master of the Messengers, peace and blessings be upon him, informed.

Allāh Almighty said: {We had certainly sent Noah to his people, and he said, "O my people, worship Allāh; you have no deity other than Him. Indeed, I fear for you the punishment of a tremendous Day." Said the eminent among his people, "Indeed, we see you in clear error."} Al-A'raf 59-60.

{And to 'Aad [We sent] their brother Hud. He said, "O my people, worship Allāh; you have no deity other than Him. Then will you not fear Him?" Said the eminent ones who disbelieved among his people, "Indeed, we see you in foolishness, and indeed, we think you are of the liars."} Al-A'raf 65-66.

{And to Thamud [We sent] their brother Salih. He said, "O my people, worship Allāh; you have no deity other than Him. There has come to you clear evidence from your Lord."} Al-A'raf 73.

{Said the eminent ones who were arrogant among his people to those who were oppressed - to those who believed among them, "Do you [actually] know that Salih is sent from his Lord?" They said, "Indeed we, in that with which he was sent, are believers." Said those who were arrogant, "Indeed we, in that which you have believed, are disbelievers."} (Al-A'rāf: 75-76).

{And to Madyan [We sent] their brother Shu'ayb. He said, "O my people, worship Allāh; you have no deity other than Him."} (Al-A'rāf: 85). {Said the eminent ones who were arrogant among his people, "We will surely evict you, O Shu'ayb, and those who have believed with you from our city, or you must return to our religion." He said, "Even if we were unwilling?"} (Al-A'rāf: 88).

Then to the story of Pharaoh and his elite and their position on our prophet Mūsā, peace be upon him, to Quraysh and the masters, the elite who were arrogant and tyrannical until they were thrown into the well, and so on. As Allāh Almighty said: {And We did not send into a city any warner except that its affluent said, "Indeed we, in that with which you were sent, are disbelievers."} (Saba': 34).

And most of the people, although you strive [for it], are not believers

Thus, our Lord, the Exalted, informed us about the people of truth that they are the minority and the few in every nation throughout history on the level of the earth and on the level of every nation and in the face of every call to truth. Thus, it has been proven throughout the history of all calls to truth. Nūḥ called his people for a thousand years minus fifty years, but only a few believed [in Allah] with him.

The commentators have mentioned numbers, the lowest of which are his three sons, and the highest of which is eighty, and the strongest of which is twelve believers! Muslims are few among the disbelievers, and [true] believers are few among Muslims, and only few of Allāh's servants are grateful. Those brought near to Allāh are a large group from the earlier generations but only a few from the later ones. As for the companions of the right among the people of Islam, they include a group from both the earlier and later generations.

Indeed, you do not guide whom you like, but Allāh guides whom He wills. And there is no bond between a believer and a disbeliever Allāh, Glory be to Him, informed His Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, that He guides whom He wills and that he has no part in the matter, and He said to him: {Indeed, you do not guide whom you like, but Allāh guides whom He wills. And He is most knowing of the [rightly] guided.} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 56).

And the verses in this meaning are very numerous, and Allāh knows best who is worthy of mercy and guidance. {For indeed, Allāh sends astray whom He wills and guides whom He wills. So do not let yourself perish over them in regret. Indeed, Allāh is Knowing of what they do.} (Fāṭir: 8).

The creed also firmly established that there is no bond between a believer and a disbeliever. Allāh Almighty said:

{The believers are but brothers.} (Al-Ḥujurāt: 10). And Allāh Almighty said: {The believing men and believing women are allies of one another.} (At-Tawbah: 71). Likewise: {And those who disbelieve are allies of one another.} (Al-Anfāl: 73). Thus, the paternal relationship was severed on the basis of disbelief and faith. Allāh Almighty said, severing the relationship between Nūḥ, peace be upon him, and his disbelieving son: {He said, "O Noah, indeed he is not of your family; indeed, he is [one whose] work was other than righteous."} (Hūd: 46).

The filial relationship between Ibrāhīm and his father was also severed. Allāh Almighty said: {And the request of forgiveness of Abraham for his father was only because of a promise he had made to him. But when it became apparent to him that he was an enemy to Allāh, he disassociated himself from him. Indeed was Abraham compassionate and patient.} (At-Tawbah: 114).

Likewise, between husband and wife: {Allāh presents an example of those who disbelieved: the wife of Noah and the wife of Lūṭ. They were under two of Our righteous servants but betrayed them, so those prophets did not avail them from Allāh at all, and it was said, "Enter the Fire with those who enter."} (At-Taḥrīm: 10). And He, Glory be to Him, clarified that this is the path of good example, saying: {There has already been for you an excellent pattern in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people, "Indeed, we are disassociated from you and from whatever you worship other than Allāh. We have denied you, and there has appeared between us and you animosity and hatred forever until you believe in Allāh alone," except for the saying of Abraham to his father, "I will surely ask forgiveness for you, but I have not [power to do] for you anything against Allāh. Our Lord, upon You we have relied, and to You we have returned, and to You is the destination."} (Al-Mumtaḥanah: 4). Likewise, Allāh Almighty praised the companions of His Messenger when they embodied that and revealed the rule: {You will not find a people who believe in Allāh and the Last Day having affection for those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger, even if they were their fathers or their sons or their brothers or their kindred. Those - He has decreed within their hearts faith and supported them with spirit from Him. And We will admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow, wherein they abide eternally. Allāh is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him - those are the party of Allāh. Unquestionably, the party of Allāh - they are the successful.} (Al-Mujādalah: 22).

This is a fundamental point for understanding the conflict between truth and falsehood from the perspective of the people of faith.

And He said: {O you who have believed, do not take your fathers or your brothers as allies if they have preferred disbelief over belief. And whoever does so among you - then it is those who are the wrongdoers. Say, [O Muḥammad], "If your fathers, your sons, your brothers, your wives, your relatives, wealth which you have obtained, commerce wherein you fear decline, and dwellings with which you are pleased are more beloved to you than Allāh and His Messenger and jihād in His cause, then wait until Allāh executes His command. And Allāh does not guide the defiantly disobedient people."} (At-Tawbah: 23-24).

Growth of Human Settlements and the Rise of Kingdoms. The Emergence of Authority and the Rise of the Recurring Pharaonic Model Throughout History (Ruler - Priest - Aides):

In the early centers of human settlement, nuclei of clans began to form from families close in lineage and residence, from the children of one father and their children. With their growth, tribes began to form from the gathering of clans, the children of one grandfather.

In a natural and instinctive way, the need for the emergence of authority arose, which was formed automatically from the elder of the family or its grandfather or its obeyed sheikh to whom the tribe refers in its affairs and needs.

Since tribes gathered at the sources of food and sustenance from water, pastures, and hunting grounds, the sites soon became too small for their people, so people dispersed in dwellings in search of resources as a result of need and conflict over those resources.

The authority at that stage was composed of the sheikh of the tribe, the chief religious man or priest in it, and the heads of the clans or families and the people of wealth or strength and might.

With the variation in the size of tribes, the strong ones among them dominated those around them from the weak families and tribes, either through intermarriage, alliance, or oppression and control. The swollen tribes began to take the form of small kingdoms. The need for the requirements of kingship, such as aides, weapons, and fortifications, quickly emerged. The class of the elite and aides arose, along with the instruments of kingship and the nuclei of its institutions.

As some tribes grew, some kingdoms grew to swallow those around them or displace them and control their land. The abundance of numbers and resources enabled some of them to transform into strong kingdoms based on a feudal system in which the great leaders and landowners prevailed, who constituted the great aides of the kings, whose influence expanded with the expansion of resources and authority, and consequently, the manifestations of their authority from the abundance of soldiers and weapons and the construction of castles, fortifications, and walls on their cities and kingdoms. Social, economic, and political systems arose according to the condition of each kingdom. Of course, each kingdom had its religion and beliefs, and thus a class of religious men and priests arose who managed the religious life of each kingdom.

As tribes expanded, kingdoms expanded. Conflict arose over influence, authority, resources, lands, and other worldly possessions. Wars broke out between kingdoms, and the strong swallowed the weak, so large kingdoms began to form, in which great civilizations flourished in various regions of the earth at the hands of those powerful kings. Smaller kingdoms were forced to enter their protection, dissolve into them, or move away from their neighborhood to other regions. Those kingdoms expanded to reach the size of empires in some cases.

Due to injustice, as well as the ethnic and religious diversity within the fabric of empires and great kingdoms, and the conflicts that arise from these divisions, such entities have often fragmented into smaller polities, breaking down into minor kingdoms, emirates, or even tribal formations. Thus, the cycle of history repeats itself, with these entities expanding and consolidating, only to later disintegrate and dissolve, continuing this pattern through different forms and circumstances.

The Establishment of the Pharaonic Model and the Triangle of Power: (Ruler - Priest - Aides)

Kings and leaders ruled their peoples and subjects through enticement and intimidation. Gifts, positions, and gains for those who obeyed the sultan, and oppression, killing, and punishment for those who opposed him. With time, kings and tyrants realized the effective impact of the sword and gold - or the stick and the carrot - in governing people.

However, the astute politicians and tyrannical kings noticed the obedience of people to men who did not possess a sword or gold, guards or aides, or any of the sultan's offerings! They were the religious men and priests who resided in their temples, where people came voluntarily to pay them alms and offer sacrifices without coercion, and to perform tasks and services for them, and even to give them their lives by choice. Kings do not obtain that from people except by the sword and the whip.

People obey the priests because of the deep innate motives that Allāh has instilled in the hearts of people to strive to worship and please their Creator.

Either people worship their Lord according to the guidance of the prophets and the legacy handed down by scholars—who lead them to God on the straight path without expecting any reward or thanks from them, but rather acting as divine guides seeking reward from God Almighty—or else devils conspire with people on their right and left, leading them to worship false gods and to associate partners with their Lord. In this case, they are led astray by demons among both humans and jinn—such as magicians, soothsayers, and deviant religious figures. Consequently, every nation goes astray according to its own demon and its own error. This misguidance dates back to when people worshipped the stones of totems, planets, natural phenomena, animals, fire, and idols, or when they worshipped humans and tyrants, evolving into the latest forms of polytheism as societies developed.

People obey their priests and religious men, thinking that they lead to obedience to their Creator. Their innate nature finds rest in worshipping that Creator, as no innate nature finds rest and no soul finds stability except by leaning on its object of worship, in truth or in misguidance.

Therefore, you see a person, no matter how high he rises in the ranks of knowledge, learning, and intelligence, taking off his mind and thinking with his shoes at the door of the temple, and preparing himself, in most cases, psychologically, to obey the religious man residing inside, to guide him to the pleasure of his object of worship and teach him how to worship and obey him. He is ready to sacrifice everything precious and valuable for the sake of this comfort. Thus, you still see today a holder of a doctorate in the most advanced sciences, bending his knees and spreading his palms prostrate to a cow, a mouse, fire, or a dumb, decorated statue! While the priest sprinkles some spray of water from his rotten hand on him, and releases incense smoke to cover his stench and the stench of his temple. Or perhaps this astute person follows a crooked fatwā from a hypocritical religious man to his sultan, even if it does not enter the mind of a goat, such as legitimizing the occupation of the lands of the Two Holy Mosques by Christians under the pretext of seeking help, and making those who fight them corrupters in the land! Thus, it was and still is the way of humans.

Even when people recently revolted against religious men and broke away from their religions, and fled to the darkness of atheism, their souls did not find stability, and they are still wandering in the darkness of magic, sorcery, searching for the unseen, and believing in illusions, ghosts, and flying saucers! To quench this innate thirst to worship a powerful, dominant Lord to whom they resort in difficulties!

Politicians and astute tyrants realized this phenomenon, and they realized that absorbing these people who possess obedience without authority or aides is better than confronting them. They learned that if they submitted to them, the largest segment of the people would submit to them, whom the sword, whip, and gold could not subdue, except temporarily, as the origin in people is to escape and hate the sultan, his sword, and his gold, were it not for fear and need.

The men of kingship brought the religious men close, showered them with gold and gifts, and threatened those who refused with the sword and torture. They tamed most of them. They created for them a paraphernalia like that of kingship, so the domes of temples rose as the towers of palaces rose. They had guards, aides, followers, and servants. Thus, religious men joined the elite of the great commanders, princes, and aides and formed the entourage. The wretched marriage between kings and priests and religious men took place, this marriage that destroyed the future of humanity in most of its history, and made people worship the ṭāghūt instead of worshipping their Lord.

With this, the triangle of power based on "the ruler, the priest, and the aides" was completed. The great priests, the great aides, and their dark soldiers formed what the Qur'ān termed "al-mala'" (the elite) or "those who were arrogant" or "those who were given luxury." These seized what they wanted and took control of what they desired from the world of people and the crushed nations, willingly or unwillingly.

The forms of the triangle of power varied according to the diversity and development of societies, kingdoms, and civilizations. However, history, its remnants, and what those civilizations left behind in terms of written or tangible evidence, as well as what the previous religious books and then the Holy Qur'ān informed us, all indicated that the triangle of power was composed of this alliance: “the ruler, the priest, and the aides”. The righteousness of the elite and the entourage was always with the righteousness of that sultan, and vice versa. Just rulers brought close righteous scholars and sincere religious men. Accordingly, the path of the soldiers and aides became upright. As for the tyrants, they brought close the oppressors and the corrupt. And people were always on the religion of their kings.

Thus, the sorcerer and the charlatan stood by the side of the tribal chief, stirring the fire and managing rituals in primitive societies. Then civilizations developed, and the Pharaonic model arose, which the Qur’ān detailed and elaborated on in its structure and conditions. Nimrod and the priests of idols stood against our master Ibrāhīm, peace be upon him, until they threw him into the fire and then exiled him after his rescue. When Mūsā, peace be upon him, came to Pharaoh, the alliance of sorcerers and aides from the elite stood against him alongside Pharaoh. Then the Jewish rabbis and monks stood alongside the tyrannical kings against the righteous in much of their history. The model of Balaam son of Beor came, whose story Allāh narrated<sup>1</sup> with the mighty people and their king against the prophet of Allāh and the believers from the Children of Israel. Then the Greeks came, and their polytheistic civilization arose, with its emperors, priests, gods, soldiers, and kings. Then the Romans came and inherited the civilization of the Greeks entirely. Many civilizations arose in the East and the West. All of their remains indicate the same paths and structure in the triangle of power (ruler, priest, and aides). When our master ‘Īsā, peace be upon him, came, the Jewish rabbis, monks, the elite from the Children of Israel, and the people of worldly affairs and interests stood with the Roman ruler and sought to kill him, but Allāh saved him from them. Then the Caesars and kings persecuted and killed his followers until they dug for them the ditch mentioned in the Qur’ān, and persecuted the People of the Cave and the like. The first and second centuries AD were called the Age of Martyrs in Christian history.

Then Christianity invaded the Roman Empire, after it was distorted by the monks and Jewish rabbis and mixed with polytheism and some Jewish teachings.

The tradition was repeated, so the Pope, the chief of the Christian monks and rabbis, stood by the side of the Caesar emperor. What is known of the religious institution and its authority arose. The religious structure was completed at the hands of the Christians, so that the great Pope became a crowned religious emperor rivaling the Roman emperor and the kings of Europe in their kingdom, gold, guards, and retinue. Europe witnessed many wars and conflicts between kings and great emperors and the Pope and his great cardinals and monks, and the victory was always for the popes, until some kings revolted and took for themselves sub-popes other than the central pope.

European and church history narrates atrocities from the actions of this triangle of power (the ruler, the priest, and the aides) and what they did to the people, which would make children's hair turn gray and resemble legends. They seized wealth, shed blood, and violated honor as they pleased, until they reached the point of selling people plots in the gardens of the afterlife! Until the people revolted against the religion of the Pope, the god of the Pope, and disbelieved, became atheists, and cast religion aside. Western civilization arose on a mixture of atheism, secularism, and tainted Judeo-Christianity, as the world has witnessed for more than two centuries.

When the final religion of Allāh and His Muhammadan law came, the creed focused on connecting the servant to his Lord and removed and abolished the role of the priest in the Muslim's spiritual life. Religion had scholars in the position of heirs of prophets, guiding people to their Lord without reward, payment, or compulsion. Anyone from the people can follow the path of seeking knowledge to become one of the people of knowledge. The Shariah also codified for the sultan his role, rights, and powers. The Shariah was above the ruler and the ruled.

But what happened on the ground is what the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed of, that the people of Islam would follow the traditions of those before them closely. They said, "O Messenger of Allāh, the Jews and the Christians?" He said, "Who else?" (meaning, "Who else but them?!") The people of Islam have followed them in many things, and the worst of that was the following in the political system and its structure, from the rise of kings, sultans, and their hereditary system. A structure similar to that of the rabbis and monks arose alongside each sultan. Exactly as the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed in one of the hadiths of the miracles of prophecy, in what was narrated from him from the hadith of Hudhayfah: "Prophethood will remain among you for as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be a caliphate on the method of prophethood, and it will be for as long as Allāh wills it to be, then He will lift it when Allāh wills to lift it. Then there will be biting kingship, and it will be for as long as Allāh wills it to be, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be oppressive kingship, and it will be for as long as Allāh wills it to be, then He will lift it when He wills to lift it. Then there will be a caliphate on the method of prophethood." Then he fell silent. (Narrated by Muslim).

In a very important narration reported by Ibn Hammad in the book of Al-Fitan from the hadith of Anas, may Allāh be pleased with him, he said: "It will be a rule of biting kingship, then a rule of tyranny, then the rule of despotic ṭawāghīt"

And in a narration: from Anas ibn Malik, he said: "There will be kings, then tyrants, then ṭawāghīt."

And this is what has happened to the Muslims since the departure of colonialism and the establishment of the governments of the ṭawāghīt to look after its interests and rule by its laws to this day. Thus, the Umayyads established the tradition of kingship in the Muhammadan nation, and the sultans and caliphs of the Muslims followed them (as they were conventionally called). Likewise, it was the habit of the Muslim kings and princes when the kingdoms of the lands of Islam were divided into various states and kingdoms.

Prophethood was among us, as its story is preserved for us by the books of the fragrant Sīrah and the texts of the Sunnah. The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, was the political ruler as well as the source of legislation and reception.

When the rightly-guided caliphate arose on the method of prophethood, the caliph of the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, took on the burdens of governance, politics, and religious leadership, assisted by the people of authority from the scholars of the Companions and the Followers.

When the matter turned into a Caesarian Chosroism, and moved to biting kingship, then to oppressive kingship, kingship and the sultan necessitated the components of the triangle of power from priests and aides.

The people of Islam followed the tradition of those before them. So what about when, what the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, reported of the rise of the ṭawāghīt was realized?

Thus, alongside every righteous king, there were righteous scholars and just aides. This rarely occurred in Islamic history. Likewise, alongside the unjust kings from the caliphs, sultans, and princes of the Muslims, there were deviant scholars of the sultan, according to the injustice of their princes.

Until the tyrants arose ruling the Muslims, their scholars became tyrannical, innovating, adding, and subtracting from the religion of Allāh as much as they could. Only the Holy Qurʾān, which Allāh took upon Himself to preserve, and what was preserved of his Sunnah, peace and blessings be upon him, were safe from their tampering. Nevertheless, the scholars of evil played their role in distorting the word from its places and misinterpreting and twisting the necks of the texts to suit the whims of the kings. The soldiers and aides from the aides of the oppressors and the people of control were at the beck and call of the kings, who plundered from the religion of those scholars and their fatwās what they wanted as much as they could.

Thus, what the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed of, the separation of the Qur'ān and the sultan, happened. It is from the blessing of Allāh upon the people of Islam that He preserved for them the Qur'ān by His preservation and appointed for them those who preserved and refined the Sunnah. He blessed them with some sincere scholars and workers in every circumstance by whom Allāh's proof against His creation is established. They stood on the lookout for that deviation and endured for the sake of Allāh the tyranny of the kings, the tax of confronting the jurists of the sultans and the scholars of misguidance, and the ignorance and tyranny of the soldiers and aides from the followers of the masters and the great.

Thus, alongside every sultan like al-Ma'mun and al-Mu'tasim, there were the likes of Ahmad ibn Abi Du'ad and his companions, who said to al-Mu'tasim, inciting him to kill Ahmad ibn Hanbal: "Kill him, O Imam, and his blood is on my neck," until there was in their successors from the sheikhs of al-Azhar in Egypt who issued a fatwā for the killing of Sayyid Qutb and his brothers, and from the Council of Senior Scholars in Saudi Arabia who issued a fatwā for the killing of the mujahideen against the Americans and ruled that they would not smell the scent of Paradise!!

Understanding this cosmic law is very important for understanding the nature of the conflict between truth and falsehood throughout history in general, and in our time in particular, where all our countries are under the occupation of the forces of disbelief directly and indirectly, as we mentioned in the first chapter. Their deputies, who guard their interests and share the gains with them, are apostate rulers who have shielded themselves behind scholars of misguidance, so they bestowed legitimacy on them and on the Crusader and even Jewish occupation. They issued fatwās for the killing of the mujahideen and the prohibition of cooperation with them, to become part of the American campaign to combat terrorism.

Thus, the Pharaonic model of the triangle of power, which the Qur'ān detailed, explained, and elaborated on in a way that inspires astonishment and wonder, has been repeated across time and throughout civilizations and kingdoms.

The Pharaonic Model Through the Texts of the Qur'ān:

Allāh, Glory be to Him, narrated the story of Pharaoh through a wide area in the Qur'ān in a way that differs in terms of explanation and brevity in 27 surahs of the Qur'ān. The mention of Pharaoh occurred about 76 times, often accompanied by the mention of sorcerers, the elite, or the soldiers and aides. Perhaps the most detailed of them is what is found in Surahs: Al-A'rāf / Yūnus / Ṭāhā / Ash-Shu'arā' / Al-Qaṣaṣ / Az-Zukhruf.

Look at the amazing miracle in depicting the Pharaonic authority and its pillars in every time and place, its methods in the conflict with the truth, the roles of its three pillars (the ruler / the priest / the soldiers and aides), the justifications for the confrontation, the role of the authority's apparatuses, and the performance of the people of truth and falsehood on the stage of the event through the scenes of the conflict. We choose from those texts a quick pause with what is found in Surah Ash-Shu'arā', verses 23-68:

I seek refuge in Allāh from the accursed Satan

{Pharaoh said, "And what is the Lord of the worlds?" He [Moses] said, "The Lord of the heavens and the earth and that between them, if you should be convinced." [Pharaoh] said to those around him, "Do you not hear?" He [Moses] said, "Your Lord and the Lord of your first forefathers." [Pharaoh] said, "Indeed, your 'messenger' who has been sent to you is mad." He [Moses] said, "Lord of the east and the west and that between them, if you were to reason." [Pharaoh] said, "If you take a god other than me, I will surely place you among those imprisoned." He [Moses] said, "Even if I brought you something manifest?" [Pharaoh] said, "Then bring it, if you should be of the truthful." So he [Moses] threw his staff, and suddenly it was a serpent, manifest. And he drew out his hand, and suddenly it was white to the observers. [Pharaoh] said to the eminent ones around him, "Indeed, this is a learned magician. He wants to drive you out of your land by his magic, so what do you advise?" They said, "Postpone [judgment of] him and his brother and send among the cities gatherers. Who will bring you every learned magician." So the magicians were assembled for the appointment of a known day. And it was said to the people, "Will you congregate? That we might follow the magicians if they are the predominant." And when the magicians arrived, they said to Pharaoh, "Is there indeed for us a reward if we are the predominant?" He said, "Yes, and, [moreover], you will then be of those near [to me]." Moses said to them, "Throw whatever you will throw." So they threw their ropes and their staffs and said, "By the might of Pharaoh, indeed it is we who are predominant." Then Moses threw his staff, and at once it devoured what they were falsifying. So the magicians fell down in prostration [to Allāh]. They said, "We have believed in the Lord of the worlds. The Lord of Moses and Aaron." [Pharaoh] said, "You believed him before I gave you permission. Indeed, he is your leader who has taught you magic. But you are going to know. I will surely cut off your hands and your feet on opposite sides, and I will surely crucify you all." They said, "No harm. Indeed, to our Lord we will return. Indeed, we aspire that our Lord will forgive us our sins because we were the first of the believers." And We inspired to Moses, "Travel by night with My servants; indeed, you will be pursued." Then Pharaoh sent among the cities gatherers. [And said],

"Indeed, these are but a small band. And indeed, they are enraging us. And indeed, we are a cautious society." So We removed them from gardens and springs. And treasures and honorable station. Thus. And We caused to inherit it the Children of Israel. So they pursued them at sunrise. And when the two companies saw one another, the companions of Moses said, "Indeed, we are to be overtaken!" [Moses] said, "No! Indeed, with me is my Lord; He will guide me." Then We inspired to Moses, "Strike with your staff the sea," and it parted, and each portion was like a great towering mountain. And We advanced thereto the pursuers. And We saved Moses and those with him, all together. Then We drowned the others. Indeed in that is a sign, but most of them were not to be believers. And indeed, your Lord - He is the Exalted in Might, the Merciful.} (Ash-Shu'arā': 23-68).

And thus came the turn of the sorcerers and the scholars of Pharaoh

The dialogue between Mūsā (peace be upon him) and Pharaoh began theologically. When Mūsā clarified that they and their forefathers had a Lord who is the Master of the dominion and Lord of the east and the west, the devil of tyranny stirred within Pharaoh, so he accused him of madness. Then he threatened him with imprisonment if he took a lord to obey and submit to instead of obeying the king and his religion. Then Mūsā (peace be upon him) presented overwhelming miracles and evidence. Here, Pharaoh was at a loss. These were miracles that could not be debated or imprisoned. At this point, {He said to the eminent ones around him, "Indeed, this is a learned magician. He wants to drive you out of your land by his magic, so what do you advise?} He accused him of having the ability of magic and sought help from the eminent ones, provoking their concern for their dominion. He says, {He wants to drive you out of your land}, and he is feigning democracy at a time when it is he who commands, as he told them at one point, {I do not show you except what I see, and I do not guide you except to the way of right conduct}, to the point that he told them, {I am your most exalted lord}!! Now, he addresses his aides with gentleness and the logic of participation: {What do you advise?} They are always like this, as they do today in the plays of political reform after the earthquakes of Iraq.

Thus, the eminent ones realized that the matter was one of miracles and beliefs that required their own people, so they sought help from the crutch of the pharaohs in every age: the sheikhs and "men of religion." {They said, "Postpone [the matter of] him and his brother}, meaning delay his dialogue for now, {and send among the cities gatherers who will bring you every learned, skilled magician}, every capable one of the soothsayers, a sorcerer who is very knowledgeable and skilled in magic. Here comes an important point, and how similar it is to what is happening today. {So the magicians were assembled for the appointment of a known day}. How often I remembered this verse when I once read a statement from the Council of Senior Scholars after the Mujahideen had detonated sites belonging to the Americans in Al-Khobar and Riyadh in Saudi Arabia. The statement from the Council of Senior Scholars began: "Based on an invitation from the Minister of Interior, His Highness Prince Nayef bin Abdul Aziz ... the Council of Senior Scholars convened in its extraordinary session on ...". Glory be to Allāh, how similar things have become.

Pharaoh sent the Ministry of Interior to the Council of Senior Scholars, gathering them. So they met in their extraordinary session for the appointment of a known day! And it was said to the people that day: "Those who struck the Americans in Saudi Arabia are a small group, they are enraging the ruler, everyone is cautious, and every citizen must be a security man."

So why do the sorcerers gather?! They gather to make the people submit to Pharaoh. [And it was said to the people, "Will you congregate"]. Why? {That we might follow the magicians if they are the predominant}. Here are two important points:

The first: The eminent ones usually follow Pharaoh. So how did Pharaoh accept for them and for the people to follow the sorcerers?! That was only because he knew that their following the sorcerers would ultimately be obedience to Pharaoh because they would command them to do so.

The second: The condition for the people's obedience to the sorcerers is [if they are the predominant]. So the people follow the proof and the religious evidence from them if they prevail or deceive the people into believing they have prevailed.

[When the magicians came, they said to Pharaoh, "Is there indeed for us a reward if we are the predominant?"] They work for the world and for reward. So what is their reward? Pharaoh chose for them the highest reward and the most beloved to souls attached to the world, and said: [Yes, and indeed, you will then be of those near [to me]]. The reward is proximity to the ruler, because through proximity to him, needs are met, and people then approach them with whatever they desire of women, children, and hoards of gold, silver, branded horses, livestock, and crops. As for Pharaoh, he guarantees their corruption by their proximity to him, because as it is said in the narration, "No servant draws closer to the ruler except that he draws further from Allāh." He knows this, and all rulers and kings know it.

When they agreed to cast, they proclaimed the slogan, as the servants of rulers do today. {They said, "By the might of Pharaoh, indeed it is we who are going to be the predominant"}. When they were defeated and the divine miracle became clear to them, and they knew because Allāh had decreed for them happiness, {They said, "We have believed in the Lord of the worlds"}.

Pharaoh realized that the first pillar of the ruler had cracked, broken, and abandoned him. So he brandished his second pillar, namely, (the soldiers and aides), and began threatening and promising, {I will surely cut off your hands and your feet on opposite sides, and I will surely crucify you all}.

When those who believed did so and began to migrate and disappear, the role of the media machine came. {So Pharaoh sent among the cities, gatherers [And said], "Indeed, these are but a small band And indeed, they are enraging us And indeed, we are a cautious society"}. How similar that past is to these nights, and what the media machine is managing today in what they call "combating terrorism."

Glory be to Allah. Just as the path was similar, the outcome will be similar, by Allāh's permission. The [best] outcome is for the righteous, and the bottom of the sea is for every stubborn tyrant.

As for the Eminent Ones (al-mala')

The advisors, aides, entourage, and soldiers. As they appear in the context of the Qur'ān, they are partners in everything: partners in dominance and tyranny, partners in crime, as well as partners in their religious ruling, and also partners in the outcome and destiny.

This word (al-mala') appears in the Holy Qur'ān thirty times. All of them are used, according to the context of the verses, to refer to the senior aides of the king, his advisors, leaders, and those close to him. It has appeared in most of the verses of the stories of the prophets, as previously shown in some examples, in their capacity as the aides who always stand in defense of the ṭāghūt against the prophets and their followers. They are as Allāh described them:

The arrogant: {the eminent ones who were arrogant} (Al-A'rāf: 75). {Said those who were arrogant, "Indeed we, in that which you have believed, are disbelievers"} (Al-A'rāf: 76).

And the affluent: {And those who did wrong followed that by which they were given luxury, and they were criminals} (Hūd: 116).

{And We did not send into a city any warner except that its affluent people said, "Indeed we, in that with which you were sent, are disbelievers"} (Sabā': 34). {And when We intend to destroy a city, We command its affluent people, but they defiantly disobey therein; so the word comes into effect upon it, and We destroy it with [complete] destruction} (Al-Isrā': 16).

The one who follows their matter in the verses, especially in the repeated stories of Pharaoh, notices three things:

1. The ruler relies on them, and they rely on him.
2. Their role is direct in strengthening the pillars of Pharaoh, in planning and conspiring, and in executing the war against the party of faith.
3. The Holy Qur'ān has linked them to Pharaoh in the religious ruling as well as in punishment and destiny.

They carry out the conspiracy, as Allāh the Exalted said: {And a man came from the farthest end of the city, running. He said, "O Mūsā, indeed the eminent ones are conferring over you [intending] to kill you, so leave [the city]; indeed, I am to you of the sincere advisors"} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 20).

They are the pillars of the divinity of the pharaohs and the worshippers of their ṭāghūt: {And Pharaoh said, "O eminent ones, I have not known you to have a god other than me"} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 38).

Therefore, Mūsā included them in his supplication against Pharaoh when he said: {And Mūsā said, "Our Lord, indeed You have given Pharaoh and his establishment splendor and wealth in the worldly life, our Lord, that they may lead [men] astray from Your way. Our Lord, obliterate their wealth and harden their hearts so that they will not believe until they see the painful punishment"} (Yūnus: 88).

How could they not be, when they are partners in injustice, as Allāh the Exalted said: {Then We sent after them Mūsā with Our signs to Pharaoh and his establishment, but they were unjust toward them. So see how was the end of the corrupters} (Al-Aʿrāf: 103).

They are the arrogant ones with him, as Allāh the Exalted said: {To Pharaoh and his establishment, but they were arrogant and were a haughty people} (Al-Muʾminūn: 46).

The call was to Pharaoh and to them equally: {Those are two proofs from your Lord to Pharaoh and his establishment. Indeed, they have been a defiantly disobedient people} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 32).

But they were arrogant and took on the task of persecuting the believers and pursuing them. Allāh the Exalted said: {But no one believed Mūsā except [a few] offspring from his people, for fear of Pharaoh and his establishment that they would persecute them. And indeed, Pharaoh was haughty within the land, and indeed, he was of the transgressors} (Yūnus: 83). When Allāh answered Mūsā's supplication, the painful punishment seized them, and they drowned with him. Glory be to the Just Avenger, and the recompense is of the same nature as the deed.

*{And We had certainly sent Mūsā with Our signs and a clear authority * To Pharaoh and his establishment, but they followed the command of Pharaoh, and the command of Pharaoh was not [at all] right. * He will precede his people on the Day of Resurrection and lead them into the Fire; and wretched is the place to which they are led}* (Hūd: 96-98).

As for the soldiers and junior aides

Their situation is like that of the eminent ones, and they are a part of them, the lower stratum of their formation, and the previous observations apply to them. They are the real support, in number and equipment, in strengthening the pillars of Pharaoh and the eminent ones. They are the direct executors of the torment and punishment of the believers, and they are the ones who sold their Hereafter for the world of others for the sake of some crumbs. Therefore, the verses also indicated their participation in the crime, their being intended by the call, and their inclusion in the punishment of their ṭāghūt along with him, in this world and the Hereafter. The verses are clear and do not need commentary.

Allāh the Exalted said: {Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of the ṭāghūt. So fight against the allies of Satan. Indeed, the plot of Satan has ever been weak} (An-Nisā': 76).

So fighting alongside the believers in the cause of Allāh is a sign of faith. And fighting in the cause of the ṭāghūt is a sign of disbelief.

And Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, Pharaoh and Hāmān and their soldiers were deliberate sinners} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 8). Their sin is one and the same. And was the sin of Pharaoh anything other than disbelief in Allāh and fighting His allies?

{And he was arrogant, he and his soldiers, in the land, without right, and they thought that they would not be returned to Us} (Al-ʿAnkabūt: 39). They are partners in arrogance, partners in denial. {And We took the Children of Israel across the sea, and Pharaoh and his soldiers pursued them in tyranny and enmity} (Yūnus: 90).

They are the tool, the tool of Pharaoh's crime. {Has there reached you the story of the soldiers - [Those of] Pharaoh and Thamūd?} (Al-Burūj: 17-18). What are Pharaoh and Thamūd without the soldiers? {So Pharaoh pursued them with his soldiers, and there covered them from the sea that which covered them} (Ṭāhā: 78). Partnership in punishment in this world, and similar is His saying: {So We seized him and his soldiers and threw them into the sea. So see how was the end of the wrongdoers} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 40). An affirmation of the previous one. Likewise, His saying: {And We wanted to confer favor upon those who were oppressed in the land and make them leaders and make them inheritors And establish them in the land and show Pharaoh and Hāmān and their soldiers through them that which they had feared} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 5-6).

Thus, the soldiers and aides saw from the punishment, along with Pharaoh and Hāmān, what they had feared.

{To Pharaoh and his establishment, but they followed the command of Pharaoh, and the command of Pharaoh was not [at all] right. He will precede his people on the Day of Resurrection and lead them into the Fire; and wretched is the place to which they are led. And they were followed in this [world] with a curse and on the Day of Resurrection. And wretched is the gift which is given} (Hūd:97-99). This is the worst that awaits them from the partnership of destiny in the Hereafter.

{O you who have believed, remember the favor of Allāh upon you when armies came to [attack] you and We sent upon them a wind and armies [of angels] you did not see. And ever is Allāh, of what you do, Seeing} (Al-Aḥzāb: 9). So the soldiers of the ṭāghūt are in opposition to the soldiers of Allāh and His angels, and their destiny is the destiny of their leader, Iblīs, and all his soldiers. {So they will be overturned into Hellfire, they and the deviators And the soldiers of Iblīs, all together} (Ash-Shu‘arā’: 94-95). Thus, they shared in the destiny of the Fire.

Thus, they are the soldiers of Iblīs with every tyrannical ṭāghūt. Crime united them, and punishment in this world and destiny in the Hereafter united them, except as your Lord wills. And thus I return to emphasize:

That I believe, as I have always believed, that the problem of the people of faith and Jihād in this time, as it was in most times, and today it is clearer and greater, is in the priests of this time, the criminal scholars of the ruler, who have confused the people about their religion, legitimized the existence of disbelief, fought those who stood against them, and were a torment and a plague upon the nation of Islam, its callers to Allāh, and its struggling, oppressed Mujahideen. It is no wonder that the Qur’ān singles them out with the most severe verses of warning and punishment, as Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, those who conceal what We sent down of clear proofs and guidance after We made it clear for the people in the Scripture - those are cursed by Allāh and cursed by those who curse} (Al-Baqarah: 159). And His saying: {Indeed, those who conceal what Allāh has sent down of the Book and exchange it for a small price - those consume not into their bellies except the Fire. And Allāh will not speak to them on the Day of Resurrection, nor will He purify them. And they will have a painful punishment} (Al-Baqarah: 174).

And similarly, those who claim to be followers, weak, enslaved, and blameless, such as soldiers, police, and minor aids in intelligence, are not innocent. Likewise, it is not surprising that Allāh, may He be blessed and exalted, will gather them in Hell with their masters and leaders, with whom they gathered in this world. Their disavowal will not benefit them then, as Allāh the Exalted said: {When those who were followed disassociate themselves from those who followed [them], and they [all] see the punishment, and cut off from them are the ties [of relationship]. Those who followed will say, "If only we had another turn [at worldly life] so we could disassociate ourselves from them as they have disassociated themselves from us." Thus will Allāh show them their deeds as regrets upon them, and they will never emerge from the Fire.} (Al-Baqarah: 166-167).

The Rise and Fall of Kingdoms, Ibn Khaldūn's Theory of Civilization's Rise, and Toynbee's Theory of Civilization's Movement Between East and West

Historical studies and archaeological findings around the world indicate that many civilizations and countless kingdoms have arisen and perished. The unknown among them are more numerous than the known. We only have what some archaeological excavations indicate, what has been recorded in some ancient literature, and what some sacred books have mentioned.

Kingdoms have arisen and expanded to the point of becoming great empires. Then, factors of weakness and extinction crept in, and stronger kingdoms invaded them. This led to their disintegration into their components and the emergence of smaller or larger kingdoms, depending on the waves and interactions of human history. The brilliant scholar Ibn Khaldūn (may Allāh have mercy on him) investigated the emergence and disappearance of these kingdoms, the rise and fall of civilizations and urbanization, their causes, factors, stages, and phases. He arrived at fundamental theories in history, sociology, and politics.

He included his theory in his famous book, "Muqaddimah Ibn Khaldūn" ("Ibn Khaldūn's Introduction"). According to these theories or observations, he proved that kingdoms and civilizations are born, develop, mature, age, and die in stages very similar to those experienced by humans.

It is worth mentioning that understanding the logic and context of history in this regard is very important for us to comprehend the causes and stages of the rise of the international system and the historical conflict between kingdoms and civilizations. This is because it helps us understand the reasons for revival and defeat in the history of Muslims, past and present. It allows us to understand and deduce what indicates that contemporary Western civilization, with its current phase led by America, is inevitably declining, and that the civilization of Islam is moving towards the rising of its sun and the establishment of its renaissance, by Allāh's permission. This motivates us to hope, strive, and work. The summary of Ibn Khaldūn's words (may Allāh have mercy on him) is that, just as a human is born weak, lying on the ground unable to move or strive and needing others for all his needs, then develops to crawl on all fours, then grows to stand on his feet and walk unsteadily, until his walking becomes steady. Then he becomes a boy playing and frolicking, then a strong, sturdy youth, then a man with full awareness and strength. When he reaches forty, he reaches his peak and the zenith of his physical and mental powers. Then the decline and regression in all powers begin, he becomes middle-aged, then an old man, then a frail old man. As Allāh the Exalted said:

{And Allāh created you; then He will take you in death. And among you is he who is reversed to the most decrepit [old] age so that he will not know, after [having had] knowledge, a thing. Indeed, Allāh is Knowing and Competent.} (An-Naḥl: 70).

Thus, hair turns gray, bones become brittle, the back bends, and these are messengers of the Angel of Death, signaling departure. Then he walks on three; his two legs and his cane. He may crawl on all fours to fulfill his needs as he began. Then he lies in his bed, motionless, until death overtakes him, and he returns from where he came. We ask Allāh for a good end.

Ibn Khaldūn saw—and the events of the days have proven what he saw—that states also go through these stages. They emerge, mature, their powers become steady, then they wither and weaken, their powers collapse, and then they die, leaving their inheritance, civilization, and the lands of their peoples to be divided among other states, and so on. Just as human lifespans vary, so do the lifespans of states. Just as some die due to internal diseases or external infections, so do states, in most cases. Just as sudden death or killing snatches some humans, states may perish due to the surprise of stronger powers or natural calamities. Some states may last for months or years, and history has seen states and civilizations that have lasted for thousands or hundreds of years. And Allāh the Almighty speaks the truth:

{Say, "O Allāh, Owner of Sovereignty, You give sovereignty to whom You will and You take sovereignty away from whom You will. You honor whom You will and You humble whom You will. In Your hand is [all] good. Indeed, You are over all things competent."} (Āl ‘Imrān: 26).

One important point that Ibn Khaldūn mentioned is that states arise from the unity of their founders on a certain ‘aṣabīyah (meaning a bond), which may be kingship, kinship, religion, national ethnicity, or shared interests. Thus, the ‘aṣabīyah of the kingdom arises. Their affair begins with their reliance on ‘aṣabīyah among themselves, and on harshness, strength, and sacrifice in their endeavors.

Often, the early founders are ascetic in their enjoyment, devoted to war, striving, and building. Then they are followed by a generation born into power and comfort, acquiring qualities from those before them due to their proximity to them, and preserving and developing the kingdom, but with some luxury and enjoyment in kingship. Then they are followed by a generation less robust, more luxurious, and further from toil and fatigue. Thus, generations arise in which ‘aṣabīyah has dissolved, and their strength and joints have been weakened by the effects of luxury and comfort. Weakness creeps into the state, and other states or ‘aṣabīyahs become ambitious for it, attacking it and seizing its kingdom to begin the cycle anew with the newcomers. The causes of the fall may be internal or external, and all factors may combine.

Thus, by reviewing the history of nations and kings close to us, known since humans recorded their remnants about 6,000 - 7,000 years ago, we find that the civilizations of China, India, the Indus Valley, Greece, Rome, the Pharaohs, and others, and the secondary kingdoms that interspersed them, have all gone through these stages, confirming what that great scholar (may Allāh have mercy on him) said.

We must know that this tradition is still ongoing in modern systems and states. Islamic civilization went through it until weakness crept in, and the kingdoms of European civilization inherited its legacy. These kingdoms have been dominant for about 200 years, until the modern world order arose after World War II, and America and Russia emerged as inheritors of the European colonies. Then America and its allies eliminated the Soviet Eastern civilization, leading to the establishment of the "New World Order" based on a single superpower for the first time in known human history.

The renowned English historian Arnold Toynbee (died 1963) added an observation to the logic of the course of history.

He observed and predicted, based on his observation, that civilization had alternated between East and West four times and was undoubtedly heading for a fifth. He said that civilization was born in the East in the kingdoms of the Indus Valley, India, China, ancient Persia, and the civilizations of Iraq, Egypt, and Yemen. Then it moved to the West to Greece and Rome. Then it moved to the East at the hands of the Muslims, and Islamic civilization arose. Then it moved to the West at the hands of Western European and then American civilization. He said that it was undoubtedly moving to return to the East and the Muslims, based on signs of decline and disintegration in Western civilization and seeds of revival and radiance in the Islamic East.

This is confirmed for us in the prophetic glad tidings and even in the prophecies of the ancient books of the People of the Book. Contemporary Western writers and philosophers have explained this more explicitly. Some European and American writers have recently written books predicting the fall of America and Western civilization within twenty years. Some of these writings are about ten years old. Their fall is undoubtedly coming, and our rise is undoubtedly imminent. It is unseen in the knowledge of Allāh. We ask Allāh to make us witness it or to make us among those who have done deeds for it that will benefit them on the Day when neither wealth nor children will avail, except for one who comes to Allāh with a sound heart.

Civilizations and the Old World Order Until the Emergence of Islam:

Although archaeological studies indicate that ancient civilizations, deeply rooted in the past, arose and flourished throughout the earth and all its continents, it has not been possible to know human history in any detail except when writing began, which dates back to about 6,000 or 7,000 years ago. Among the most famous known ancient civilizations are those that arose in China, India, and Persia, and the ancient civilizations of Iraq, such as the Assyrian, Chaldean, Babylonian, and others. The civilizations of the Levant, such as the Phoenician, Sumerian, and Canaanite, and the civilizations of the Arabian Peninsula, such as ‘Ād and Thamūd, and the civilizations of Yemen, such as Saba’, Ḥimyar, and the people of Tubba’. Also, the Pharaonic civilizations of Egypt and the Nile Valley, the civilizations of North Africa and Carthage, as well as the Greek civilization, then the Roman civilization. As well as the civilizations of the Native Americans and their ancestors in the Americas, especially in the south, where advanced and sophisticated civilizations arose.

With the development of civilizations and the establishment of communication between them through peaceful and wartime relations, what can be called the "international system" began. Great civilizations and kingdoms were able to extend their control over their neighbors, and they had political, economic, social, and cultural systems. They also had military policies within and around them, and disputes with neighboring powerful empires.

Among the most famous of these was what arose in the ancient world—Asia, Africa, and Europe—which was a geographically and culturally connected world, such as what existed between the ancient Persian civilization, which lasted for several thousand years, and the Greek civilization, and their conflict on the contact line in the Middle East. These areas were the Levant, Iraq, and Turkey (or what is known as the Anatolian Plateau or Asia Minor). This period witnessed the victory of Persia and the disintegration, weakening, and fragmentation of the Greek civilizations, then their resurgence and unification at the hands of the historical leader Alexander the Great, who united the Greeks and then invaded the East, defeating the Persians and reaching the borders of China. He also entered Pharaonic Egypt and most of the lands of the East.

Then Persia rose again and established an empire whose kingdom extended from Mesopotamia in Iraq to Persia (Iran), the Indus Valley (Pakistan), Afghanistan, and parts of Central Asia. At that time, the Roman Empire arose in the Italian peninsula and inherited the Greek civilization, expanding to include all the countries surrounding the Mediterranean Sea: the Levant, Egypt, North Africa, parts of Anatolia, and the entire European continent.

Thus, the ancient international system resulted in the existence of two competing civilizations, also fighting on the contact lines in the Middle East, in the Levant and Iraq!

This international system had many of its present-day characteristics, such as the influence of the two great powers on their neighbors and their interference in their internal affairs. There was a system of proxy wars between the followers of the Persian Empire from the Arabs of Iraq and Mesopotamia, who were the kings of the Lakhmids, who followed the religion of their Persian masters, Magians who worshipped fire like them, and the followers of the Byzantine Roman Empire, whose capital was Constantinople, who were the Arabs of the Levant, the Ghassanids, who followed the religion of their Roman masters, Christians like them.

The Romans and Persians exchanged victory and defeat several times in fierce wars. During times of peace, they also had relations of cultural and economic exchange.

At that time, the Arabs of the Arabian Peninsula lived in complete political isolation from their surroundings, in a primitive, fragmented, and independent system based on warring tribal and clan groups, politically divided and not united by a king or system. They were religiously divided, with each tribe worshipping its own gods and idols. The Arabs in the peninsula had a primitive economic system based mostly on herding, some agriculture around desert oases, and trade, and its ancient route that crossed Mecca, Medina, and Aqaba from Yemen to the Levant, connecting the trade of the East coming from China and India by sea to Yemen, and the trade of the West coming from the Roman lands from Anatolia and northern Syria. There was no unified and independent system in the Arabian Peninsula except in Yemen, where well-established kingdoms arose, until they were invaded by the Christian Abyssinians, allies of the Romans, and then dominated by kings associated with the Persians, who appointed rulers over them who were subordinate to them.

These were the political conditions and what can be termed the "international system" in the heart of the ancient world: Europe, North Africa, and the western half of Asia.

In this atmosphere, in the early seventh century CE (610 CE), the sun of Islam rose, and the master of the children of Adam, and the best of the first and the last, our master Muḥammad (peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him) was sent. The sun of Islamic civilization rose as the nucleus of the Islamic state was established and the Arabian Peninsula was unified during the remainder of his life and mission (peace and blessings be upon him), which lasted 23 years.

Thus, the Islamic state entered the arena of the international system, which was becoming composed of three poles: the Romans, the Persians, and the Islamic state, since the seventh century CE.

The Importance of Knowing History:

It is very crucial, in order to understand current events, extrapolate the future, and understand the rationale of the conflict between truth and falsehood, both internally (among Muslims) and externally (with their enemies, especially the Romans), to have a general knowledge of the historical milestones that we Muslims have passed through. Likewise, a general knowledge of the history of our enemies and the common milestones between us and them is important. This also has great benefit in understanding the sunan (traditions) of victory and defeat, and the causes of strength and weakness, which helps Muslims in general, and Mujahideen in particular, and their conscious leaderships—as is supposed—in particular, to move in our existing and future conflicts with insight.

Our knowledge of our glorious history also provides us with a strong motivation to move forward, following in the footsteps of glorious ancestors who reached the Pleiades in elevation and honor, when they understood that we are a people whom Allāh has honored with Islam, and whenever we seek honor in other than it, Allāh will humiliate us, as our master ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) said, "Whom Allāh disgraces, there is none to honor him."

Therefore, in the following pages, we will present a brief overview of the milestones of our glorious history and the countless lessons and morals in it.

We will follow this with a brief overview of the history of our eternal enemies... the Romans (Banī al-Aṣfar – the Byzantines). May Allāh fight them.

The International System at the Time of the Prophetic Mission (The Persian-Roman Conflict)

The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) was born in 570 CE. He received revelation, as is well known, in 610 CE. The Romans and Persians shared the sovereignty of the world surrounding the Arabian Peninsula, and each of them was ambitious to seize the sphere of influence extending from the banks of the Euphrates to the shores of the Mediterranean Sea, and worked to destroy the military power of its adversary. For this reason, wars were continuous between them, and were seesawing, interrupted by truces that did not last long. These wars were characterized by various forms of cruelty, including killing, destruction, and sabotage.

This conflict between the two states intensified during the reigns of the kings:

- Justinian I, who was installed as emperor of the Romans in 527 CE.
- Khosrow I (Anushiruwān), who was installed as king of Persia in 531 CE.

In 546 CE, Khosrow Anushiruwān launched a war against the Romans and attacked northern Syria, capturing Antioch, the capital of the East at that time. He also captured Edessa (Odessa), Qinnasrīn, Aleppo, and other cities, and transferred thousands of prisoners from Antioch to a city he built in its likeness near al-Madā'in (Ctesiphon), which he called "Antioch" and was known as "al-Rūmiyyah," and appointed a man from the Christians of Ahwaz to rule it.

Justinian could not repel Khosrow from his lands because he was preoccupied with his wars against the tribes of the Avars and Slavs, who were raiding the borders of his kingdom from Europe. He was forced to make peace with Khosrow. In 563 CE, this peace was concluded, with Khosrow withdrawing from the lands he had occupied in exchange for a large ransom and annual tribute paid by the Romans.

In 565 CE, Justinian I died and was succeeded by Justinian II, who broke the peace treaty concluded by his predecessor with Khosrow. Khosrow retaliated against Syria and destroyed it. Justinian II died in 578 CE and was succeeded by Emperor Tiberius, who made peace with Khosrow for money and tribute.

In 579 CE, Khosrow Anushiruwān died and was succeeded by his son Hormizd. Tiberius also died and was succeeded by Emperor Maurice. The Turkic tribes in the northeast of Persia allied after the death of Khosrow, so Hormizd sent an army led by a commander named Bahrām to fight them. He defeated them and seized their wealth.

The victory tempted him, so he turned against his king, Hormizd, deposed him, and blinded him, seizing the kingship.

Khosrow II (Parvez), son of Hormizd, tried to regain his father's throne but failed, so he sought refuge with the Roman Emperor Maurice, asking for his help against Bahrām. The emperor honored him, responded to his request, married him to his daughter, and provided him with a great army with which he overcame Bahrām, regained his father's throne, and succeeded him in kingship.

In 602 CE, the Byzantine commander Phocas assassinated Emperor Maurice, seized power, installed himself as emperor, and killed Maurice's sons except for one who managed to escape and flee. He sought refuge with Khosrow Parvez, asking for his help against Phocas, just as his father had helped him against Bahrām before. Khosrow demanded that the Romans install him as king in succession to his father and threatened them with war if they did not comply, but they refused.

Khosrow Parvez launched a fierce war against the Romans, capturing the Levant, Egypt, and Nubia, and carrying the wood of the (alleged) cross from Jerusalem to al-Madā'in, the capital of Persia. Then he directed a massive army to Constantinople and besieged it, enlisting the help of the Avars and Slavs, the enemies of the Byzantines, in the siege. They besieged it from Europe. Heraclius, the commander of the Byzantine army, was able to break the siege of Constantinople. He was able, by allying with the Turks, the enemies of the Persians, to expel Khosrow's army from the Roman lands.

In 610 CE, the year of the Prophetic mission, Heraclius deposed Emperor Phocas, due to the widespread corruption of his rule, and handed him over to the people, who killed him. The army installed Heraclius, due to his victory over the Persians and his deposition of a misguided king. Heraclius launched a war against the Persians, regaining what they had seized from the Roman lands. Then he attacked them in their own lands and broke their armies at the Battle of Nineveh in 627 CE, carrying off much of their wealth and imposing an annual tribute on them.

This battle was the last of the wars between the Persians and the Romans, and it is the one referred to in the Holy Qur'ān in the verse: {The Romans have been defeated. In the nearest land. But they, after their defeat, will overcome.} After this battle, the turn of the Muslims came, and they swept away the two states at once with the power of the One and Only.

Summary of the History of States and Kingdoms in Arab and Islamic History

From the establishment of the Prophetic state to the present day (1 AH - 622 CE / 1425 AH - 2004 CE).

In writing this chapter (Chapter Three), which contains the historical summary, I relied on a number of electronic discs containing programs on Islamic history, in addition to a number of historical references. I have rewritten what I have quoted from those programs and references with very extensive modification, because most of them were written by non-Islamic hands, or perhaps hostile to Islam, harboring resentment towards the history of Muslims or some of its makers. They sometimes lacked honesty, and their material sometimes contained some forgery. They did not respect the sanctity of some religious figures such as the Companions, may Allāh be pleased with them, nor the status of some caliphs, kings, and righteous people known for their good conduct and status. Most of them were written with a nationalist, secular spirit, not Islamic or neutral.

I benefited from these references in general information and dates, and quoted some texts that did not contain anything that defamed Islamic history. I modified everything that I found to be distorted or inappropriately phrased, resembling precise surgical cosmetic procedures. I was helped in this by what Allāh facilitated for me in studying history academically, and then delving deeper into it through personal study efforts, especially in Islamic history and books of contemporary political history, and my work in the field of journalism and media.

In general, and for the sake of academic honesty, I mention here that the most important references for this chapter are:

1. Tārīkh al-Islām (History of Islam) program - produced by Ḥarf Foundation - with authorization from Al-Azhar (which was honorable) - as described by Sheikh Ibrahim Ezzat, may Allāh have mercy on him - and it is the main source of the text, and it has been modified and corrected with very extensive modification.
2. Al-Tārīkh al-Islāmī (Islamic History) program - produced by Şakhr Foundation.
3. Tārīkh al-Dawlah al-‘Uthmāniyyah (History of the Ottoman State) - by Farīd Bey, the lawyer. He appears to be an Egyptian of Turkish origin who wrote his book in 1909. His Masonic spirit, his hatred of Sultan Abdul Hamid, may Allāh have mercy on him, his Turkish chauvinistic spirit, and his support for the Jewish-Masonic Committee of Union and Progress are evident in it. His book is published in the well-known Millennium program.
4. Al-Bidāyah wa-al-Nihāyah by Ibn Kathīr - may Allāh have mercy on him - and it is the reference I relied on to correct many of the errors that occurred in the previous references.
5. The writings of the martyr of Islam, Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, especially his books (Khaṭṭ al-Taḥawwul al-Tārīkhī, Aḍwā’ ‘alā al-Qawmiyyah al-‘Arabīyah, al-Saraṭān al-Aḥmar).
6. Other references and special information that I have gathered from the media and other information sources.

The Prophetic State (1-11 AH)

On the twelfth of Rabīʿ al-Awwal (September 24, 622 CE) of the thirteenth year of the Prophetic mission, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) arrived in Yathrib to be the first capital of the Islamic state and to be called al-Madīnah al-Munawwarah (the Illuminated City), and to become the launching point for the conquering Muslim armies. The year of the Hijrah was considered during the reign of ʿUmar (may Allāh be pleased with him) as the beginning of the Islamic calendar.

The Most Important Events of the Prophetic Era from the Emigration of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) to His Death:

The most important milestones in that period can be summarized in the following points:

The Battle of Badr (2 AH)

In Ramaḍān of the second year of the Hijrah, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) learned that a large caravan was coming from the Levant with Abū Sufyān ibn Ḥarb on it, and that it would pass by Badr to get water and rest there.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) prepared a campaign of three hundred and some men, and headed with them to Badr to surprise the caravan. Quraysh were alarmed by what they heard and called for war against the Muslims. Although Abū Sufyān later sent word that he had turned to the coast and escaped from the Muslims and called them to return to Mecca, the leaders of Quraysh were determined to fight the Muslims.

On the 17th of Ramaḍān of that year, the two groups met in the first battle in which the power of faith erupted and the Muslims were victorious despite their small number, killing about seventy of the heroes and leaders of Quraysh, and capturing the same number.

The Battle of Badr was the opening of Islamic history. It was not a war between equals in number and equipment, but rather a war between the love of the creed for which martyrdom is sought, and the love of wealth for which life is sought. The seeker of life cannot conquer the seeker of martyrdom.

This is the main factor that made the Arabs, after their embracing of Islam, defeat the armies of the great powers around them—by the grace of Allāh—with small numbers in the wars of conquest.

The Jews Break Their Covenant with the Prophet

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) returned to Medina and found that the hearts of the Jews had changed. The victory of the Muslims at Badr had pained them, and they had not anticipated it and could not bear to conceal what was in their hearts.

Banū Qaynuqā‘ were the most resentful of the Jews for this victory and belittled it. They began to express their envy of the Muslims for their victory, challenging them and harassing them. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) besieged them in their fortresses. They surrendered to him, and the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) was content with expelling them from Medina and sending them to the Levant.

The Battle of Uḥud (3 AH)

The Jews were enraged by what had befallen Banū Qaynuqāʿ, so they began to incite the Bedouins to raid Medina and attack the Muslims. They also began to incite Quraysh to war against the Muslims to avenge their dead in the Battle of Badr, and they promised them their support in the war. The two most ardent inciters were two leaders of the Jews of Banū al-Naḍīr: Kaʿb al-Ashraf and Sallām ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq.

A group of the Anṣār volunteered to assassinate them by order of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), and they killed them.

Quraysh were affected by the incitement of the Jews, so they prepared their forces for war against the Muslims. Quraysh headed with their mobilized forces towards Medina, led by Abū Sufyān ibn Ḥarb.

When the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) learned of this, he prepared an army and went out with them to Mount Uḥud, near Medina, and placed the best archers on top of the mountain to protect the backs of the Muslims.

The signs of victory appeared, and Quraysh retreated, followed by the Muslims, collecting what they had gained from them. The Muslim archers thought that the battle was over, so they left their positions and hurried to get their share of the spoils.

Khālīd ibn al-Walīd, who was leading the archers of the polytheists, seized the opportunity, ascended the mountain from behind, and began to shower the Muslims with a barrage of arrows. The forces of Quraysh turned back on them, so they were caught between two fires, their ranks were disturbed, and panic spread among them until some of them killed each other, and those who survived the killing fled.

More than seventy men of the Muslims were killed in this battle, including the hero of Islam, Ḥamzah ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the uncle of the Prophet, who was killed by Waḥshī, one of the Abyssinian archers. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) was wounded in his cheek and his noble head was injured. A crier of Quraysh shouted that Muḥammad had been killed, and the polytheists believed it and stopped fighting and withdrew, for they had achieved—in their opinion—what they sought.

The Jews Attempt to Assassinate the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him)

The Jews of Banū al-Naḍīr were not pleased with the survival of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), so they resolved to assassinate him, taking revenge for Ibn al-Ashraf and Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq. They failed, their plot was exposed, and they knew that the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) would punish them, so they took refuge in their fortresses.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) attacked them and besieged them. When they despaired, they asked to be allowed to leave Medina as Banū Qaynuqā' had left. He agreed to their request, and they left with their wealth. Some of them settled in Khaybar and joined its Jews, while the others continued their journey to the Levant.

The Battle of the Trench (5 AH)

Only Banū Qurayzah remained of the Jews of Medina. They were pained by what had befallen their brothers, Banū Qaynuqā' and Banū al-Naḍīr, and they decided to incite Quraysh and their allies from the Arab tribes to war against the Muslims and the elimination of their state, and they pledged to support them in this war.

Quraysh mobilized and called upon their allies and parties, and they came with their men, answering their call, and the mobilization reached ten thousand fighters.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) learned of this great campaign and consulted his Companions, who advised him that the Muslims should stand in defense of their city. Salmān al-Fārisī (may Allāh be pleased with him) suggested digging a trench around Medina, with the archers standing behind it, preventing those who tried to cross it from the polytheists.

Someone came to inform the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) of what Banū Qurayzah had done, so he sent to them two leaders of the Anṣār, Sa'd ibn Mu'ādh, the leader of al-Aws, and Sa'd ibn 'Ubādah, the leader of al-Khazraj, to remind them of the covenant of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), to forbid them from betraying the Muslims, and to warn them of its consequences. They mocked them and showed their determination to support Quraysh.

When the army of the polytheists arrived, they stopped before the trench and could not enter Medina, and the Muslim archers began to strike down those who tried to cross the trench. The siege lasted for a month until the allies of Quraysh (the parties) became weary of the long wait and missed out on the spoils they had hoped for, and discord and dissension occurred between them and Quraysh.

Here, Allāh facilitated the embracing of Islam for a leader of the Arab leaders, Nu'aym ibn Mas'ūd al-Ashja'i. He had come with his people, Banū al-Ashja', to fight the Muslims along with those who had come from the allies of Quraysh. He announced his Islam and asked the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) to participate with the Muslims in defending Medina. The Messenger asked him to conceal his Islam and to discourage Quraysh and Banū Qurayzah and cause dissension between them. He did so, and the plan succeeded.

Then Allāh sent a fierce wind upon the army of Quraysh and the allies, which uprooted the tents, overturned the cooking pots, and filled mouths and eyes with dust. The Holy Qur'ān refers to this divine help in the verse: {O you who have believed, remember the favor of Allāh upon you when armies came to [attack] you and We sent upon them a wind and armies [of angels] you did not see. And ever is Allāh, of what you do, Seeing.}

The parties had grown tired of waiting and the long siege, so they began to retreat, and Quraysh withdrew, swallowing their rage. In this regard, Allāh the Almighty says: {And Allāh repelled those who disbelieved, in their rage, not having obtained any good. And sufficient was Allāh for the believers in battle.}

The Ruling of Sa'd ibn Mu'adh Concerning What the Jews of Banū Qurayzah Did:

Immediately after the Battle of the Trench, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) prepared a detachment and headed to Banū Qurayzah to punish them for breaking the covenant. They fortified themselves in their fortresses. When the siege intensified against them, they requested the arbitration of Sa'd ibn Mu'adh, who was their ally. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) agreed to their request. Sa'd ruled that their men should be killed and their women and children should be taken captive. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) carried out Sa'd's ruling on them.

The Muslims' Transition from Defense to Offense:

After Medina was cleared of the Jews, Islam was safe from the competition of Judaism, and the Muslims were safe from the cunning and deception of the Jews, the Muslims transitioned from a state of defense to a state of offense.

The Prophet began by invading the polytheistic tribes loyal to Quraysh to prove that the Muslims had strength and had not been weakened after the Battle of Uḥud and the Battle of the Trench. He was victorious and returned with great spoils, and the tribes learned that they had no power to fight the Muslims.

The Treaty of al-Ḥudaybiyah (6 AH)

In the late Shawwāl of the sixth year of the Hijrah, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) announced that he wanted to travel to Mecca to perform ‘Umrah, and he authorized his Companions to travel with him to perform it. They rejoiced and were pleased to visit the Ka‘bah, which they had been deprived of. The Muhājirūn had a strong longing for their homes and the families they had left behind.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) traveled with one thousand five hundred of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār, carrying no weapons except swords in their sheaths. They wore the garb of iḥrām to emphasize to Quraysh that they wanted ‘Umrah and did not intend to fight. The swords they carried were only for protection from what might confront them on the way.

The caravan of the Muslims reached al-Ḥudaybiyah, near Mecca. When Quraysh learned of the arrival of our Prophet Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him) and his Companions, they refused to allow them to enter Mecca, and the month of Dhū al-Qa‘dah had arrived, which is one of the sacred months in which fighting is prohibited.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) sent ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān to negotiate with Quraysh. His return was delayed, and it was rumored that he had been killed. Here, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) resolved to enter Mecca.

The Muslims responded to what the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) had resolved and pledged allegiance to him unto death while he was sitting under a tree. Allāh praised the pledgers and was pleased with them in a verse revealed on this occasion:

{Certainly was Allāh pleased with the believers when they pledged allegiance to you, [O Muḥammad], under the tree, and He knew what was in their hearts, so He sent down tranquility upon them and rewarded them with an imminent conquest.} Hence, this pledge was called the Pledge of Riḍwān (Good Pleasure).

‘Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with him) was not killed, as was rumored, and he returned to al-Ḥudaybiyah (he had been delayed in negotiating with Quraysh and allaying their fears). The main demand of Quraysh was that the Muslims return that year and enter Mecca to perform ‘Umrah the following year, so that the Arabs would not say that Quraysh had been humiliated by the Muslims, which would bring them shame.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) agreed to Quraysh's demand, and on this basis, he concluded an agreement between him and Quraysh known as the Treaty of al-Ḥudaybiyah, according to which a truce was concluded between the two parties for a period of ten years.

The treaty included conditions such as the Muslims returning anyone who came to them from Quraysh as a Muslim without the permission of his guardian, and Quraysh not returning anyone who returned to them from the Muslims. Anyone who wanted to enter into the covenant of Quraysh could do so, and anyone who wanted to enter into the covenant of Muḥammad from other than Quraysh could do so. Entering into the covenant was an alliance that obligated supporting the ally if he sought help and assistance. Khuzā‘ah entered into the covenant of the Messenger of Allāh, and Banū Bakr entered into the covenant of Quraysh.

The Invasion of the Jewish Cities

The truce between the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) and Quraysh allowed the Prophet to devote himself to fighting the remaining Jews in the Arabian Peninsula. Besides the Jews of Medina, there were Jewish communities living in Khaybar, Wādī al-Qurā, Fadak, and Taymā’, which are cities located on the border between the north of the Arabian Peninsula and the lands of the Romans.

The Jews of those cities used to incite the Bedouins against the Muslims, so the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) prepared a campaign against those Bedouins and subdued them. He then headed to Khaybar and conquered it, and the Jews of the other cities surrendered without a fight.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) was tolerant of the Jews, so he kept them in their lands and employed them in agriculture, with the condition that he could expel them whenever he wished.

The Compensatory ‘Umrah (7 AH)

The first year of the truce passed, so the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) headed with all the Muslims to Mecca to perform the compensatory ‘Umrah. They spent three days there, then left as stipulated in the Treaty of al-Ḥudaybiyah.

The men of Quraysh closely observed the behavior of the Muslims and found them to be a different people, molded anew by Islam. Many of them began to think and ponder the principles of Islam, and soon groups of them came to Medina as Muslims. Among these were Khālīd ibn al-Walīd, ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ, and ‘Uthmān ibn Ṭalḥah, who were among the leaders and heroes of Quraysh, who had previously participated in fighting the Muslims.

The Messenger Sends Letters to the Kings and Princes of Neighboring Countries

Islam began to spread in the Arabian Peninsula after the victories achieved by the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) following the Treaty of al-Ḥudaybiyah. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) decided that his message should reach the ears of the kings and princes of neighboring countries, so he sent them letters with ambassadors calling them to Islam. Some responded to his call, such as al-Mundhir ibn Sāwá, the prince of Bahrain, while others sent the ambassadors back.

Some of them had a good response, like the king of the Romans and al-Muqawqis, the ruler of Egypt, while others had a bad response, like Khosrow Parvez, the king of Persia, who tore up the letter of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him). Similarly, Shuraḥbīl, the prince of Ghassan, mocked the call to Islam and killed the ambassador of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) al-Ḥārith ibn ‘Umayr al-Azdī, may Allāh be pleased with him.

The Messenger Prepares a Campaign to Avenge the Killing of His Ambassador al-Ḥārith ibn ‘Amr: The Battle of Mu’tah

The killing of this ambassador had a profound impact on the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), so he prepared a campaign of three thousand men to fight the Ghassanids, and he made Zayd ibn Ḥārithah its commander. When the Ghassanids learned of it, they sought help from their Roman allies, who reinforced them with a great army. The encounter took place in Mu’tah.

In that battle, Zayd ibn Ḥārithah, the commander of the army, was killed, and after him, ‘Abd Allāh ibn Rawāḥah, then Ja’far ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with them all) were killed. Then the people appointed Khālīd ibn al-Walīd to take command. He realized that continuing the battle would mean the annihilation of the Muslim army, so he withdrew with a brilliant military plan. He stirred up dust behind his retreating army, giving the Romans the impression that a huge reinforcement had come from Medina. Khālīd's ruse terrified them, and they stopped pursuing the retreating army.

With this withdrawal, Khālīd's military skill became apparent, and he rose to the ranks of the commanders who raised the banner of Islam. The Battle of Mu’tah was the opening of the struggle for the Islamic conquests outside the Arabian Peninsula, and the beginning of the conflict between the Muslims and the Romans.

The Conquest of Mecca (8 AH)

The eighth year of the Hijrah came, and the number of Muslims had increased with the entry of many tribes into Islam. Allāh willed that Quraysh break their covenant with the Muslims. The tribe of Banū Bakr attacked the tribe of Khuzā'ah. Banū Bakr had entered into the covenant of Quraysh, and Banū Khuzā'ah had entered into the covenant of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him). Quraysh supported their allies, and Khuzā'ah sought help from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him). Thus, an opportunity arose to conquer Mecca.

Quraysh had become isolated after most of the Arab tribes had embraced Islam, and Quraysh had lost many of its men in its wars with the Muslims, and a group of its valiant heroes had joined the Muslims.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) prepared a great army of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār, and the tribes that had embraced Islam joined it. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) announced that he wanted Mecca and to fight Quraysh, who had broken their covenant.

The army marched, following its great leader (peace and blessings be upon him). He camped outside Mecca, and Quraysh saw that the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) had come with a large gathering of Arabs and that they had no power to fight them, so they surrendered. Al-ʿAbbās, the uncle of the Prophet, came with Abū Sufyān, and they embraced Islam and opened the gates of the Sacred City to him. Before entering it, he reviewed the army in their presence, and its detachments passed before them, chanting: {And say, "Truth has come, and falsehood has departed. Indeed is falsehood, [by nature], ever bound to depart."}

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) entered Mecca with the army and headed to the Ka'bah, riding his she-camel with great humility. He began to destroy the idols and erase the images from the walls of the Ka'bah. Then he ordered Bilāl al-Ḥabashī to climb to the roof of the Ka'bah, and he gave the call to prayer, announcing the defeat of polytheism.

The Invasion of Thaqīf and Hawāzin (8 AH)

Quraysh joined the ranks of the Muslims and organized with them in his army to fight the tribes of Hawāzin and Thaqīf, who had refused to embrace Islam. The Muslims met Hawāzin in Wādī Ḥunayn and were victorious over them after a fierce battle, in which the Muslims were almost defeated were it not for the steadfastness of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him). Then the Muslims besieged Thaqīf in their city, al-Ṭā'if, and they were forced to surrender. Hawāzin and Thaqīf embraced Islam.

The Prophetic March to Fight the Romans: The Invasion of Tabūk and Dūmat al-Jandal (9 AH)

The Prophet returned to Medina after the conquest of Mecca, and the ninth year of the Hijrah had arrived. He prepared a large army of forty thousand men and marched with it towards Mu'tah, wanting to avenge what had befallen the Muslim army there. When he reached the city of Tabūk, he camped there. The Romans learned of his arrival but did not advance to fight him, for they were terrified by the encounter with this large army, led by men who did not know defeat. The Roman army took its position inside its lands, defending, after it had intended to attack.

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) was content with the terror he had caused in the hearts of the Romans, and he concluded some treaties with the border cities, who were Christians, in exchange for their pledge to pay the jizyah. Dūmat al-Jandal resisted, so the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) sent Khālīd ibn al-Walīd at the head of a detachment, and he subdued it and captured its ruler, Ukaydir ibn ‘Abd al-Malik. He brought him to Medina, where he embraced Islam, and the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) concluded a treaty with him and sent him back to his people. The Battle of Tabūk was the last of the battles of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him).

The Arrival of Delegations of Arab Tribes to Medina and Their Declaration of Islam

News of the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) victories in conquering Mecca, the embracing of Islam by Quraysh, the embracing of Islam by Thaqīf and Hawāzin, the subjugation of the ruler of Dūmat al-Jandal, and the entry of the northern border cities into the covenant of the Prophet and their pledge to pay him the jizyah reached the ears of the Arabs. Delegations of Arab tribes came from every direction, declaring their Islam. The Prophet would teach them about the creed and principles of Islam and send with them those of his Companions whom he chose to teach them the rituals of the religion and explain its rulings to them.

Warning to Those of the Arabs Who Remained in Polytheism (9 AH)

As for those of the Arabs who remained in polytheism, they were given a respite of four months. If the period expired and they did not embrace Islam, the Prophet was commanded to fight them until polytheism was eradicated from the Arabian Peninsula.

A Qur'ānic text was revealed with this warning at the beginning of Sūrat al-Tawbah, known as Sūrat Barā'ah: {[This is a declaration of] disassociation, from Allāh and His Messenger, to those with whom you had made a treaty among the polytheists. So travel freely, [O disbelievers], throughout the land [during] four months but know that you cannot cause failure to Allāh and that Allāh will disgrace the disbelievers.}

{And when the sacred months have passed, then kill the polytheists wherever you find them.} 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib recited this warning to the Muslims during the Hajj season of the ninth year.

That year did not pass until the Arabian Peninsula had embraced the religion of Islam and was united in one state. Zakāt was imposed on the Muslims, and the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) determined its places and amounts and sent workers to collect it.

The Farewell Pilgrimage (10 AH)

The tenth year of the Hijrah arrived, and the Arabs had entered the new religion and were organized under the banner of Islam. The Hajj season came, so the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) went out with more than one hundred thousand Muslims as pilgrims. He delivered a farewell sermon in 'Arafāt to these crowds, in which he explained the pillars of Islam, declared equality among Muslims, and made piety the criterion for preference among them. He recited the last verse of the wise revelation: {This day I have perfected for you your religion and completed My favor upon you and have approved for you Islam as religion.}

With this sermon, the great Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) concluded his mission in delivering his message and equipping the Arabs with the power of faith to be its messengers to the world.

The Emergence of the Apostasy Movement

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) had hardly finished the Farewell Pilgrimage when a movement of apostasy from Islam appeared in Yemen, led by a charlatan named ‘Ayhahah ibn Ka‘b al-‘Ansī, known as al-Aswad al-‘Ansī. He had enticed his people with the delusions of his magic, and they followed him.

The apostasy movement spread to al-Yamāmah, and a man from Banū Ḥanīfah named Musaylimah ibn Thumāmah appeared there. He sent a message to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) asking him to share his affair with him. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) called him Musaylimah the Liar.

The danger of al-Aswad al-‘Ansī increased in the eleventh year of the Hijrah, so the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) sent to those who remained in Yemen from the Muslims, urging them to kill him. They assassinated him, and the apostasy movement in Yemen was eliminated after his killing, but it remained in al-Yamāmah until the caliphate of Abū Bakr (may Allāh be pleased with him), who eliminated it during his reign.

The Illness and Death of the Messenger (11 AH)

In early Rabī‘ al-Awwal of the eleventh year of the Hijrah, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) fell ill, and Allāh took him to His side on Monday, the twelfth of that month. With his passing (peace and blessings be upon him) to the Highest Companion, the life of the Seal of the Prophets and the greatest of the greats in human history ended.

The Islamic State During the Era of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs (11-41 AH)

Duration of the Caliphate of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs and Their Ages:

- Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq (may Allāh be pleased with him): Two years and three months. He died in Jumādā al-Ākhirah in the year 13 AH at the age of 63.
- ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with him): 10 years and six months. He died in Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 23 AH at the age of 63.
- ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān (may Allāh be pleased with him): Twelve years. He died in Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 36 AH at the age of 82.
- ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with him): 4 years and nine months. He died in Ramaḍān in the year 40 AH at the age of 60.

The Caliphate of Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq (may Allāh be pleased with him) (11-13 AH)

After the death of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), consultation among the Muslims resulted in the pledge of allegiance to Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq (may Allāh be pleased with him).

Among the most important achievements of Abū Bakr (may Allāh be pleased with him) during his short period were the suppression of the apostates, the dispatch of the army of Usāmah, which the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had prepared to invade the Romans in the Levant, and the launching of the Islamic conquest movement towards Iraq.

The Caliphate of ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (May Allāh be pleased with him) (13-23 AH)

During his illness, our master Abū Bakr entrusted the caliphate to our master ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with them both). He had consulted ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf and ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān about him, and they mentioned his virtue and praised Abū Bakr's decision. Then Abū Bakr appeared to the people in the mosque and said to them: "Are you pleased with the one I appoint as my successor over you? For I have not spared any effort in giving my opinion, nor have I appointed a relative."

Imam al-Suyūṭī narrates from Ibn ‘Asākir that ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib stood up and said: "We will only be pleased if it is ‘Umar." Abū Bakr said: "It is ‘Umar, so listen to him and obey." Then Abū Bakr summoned ‘Umar and said to him: "I have appointed you as caliph over the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him)," and he advised him to fear Allāh. When Abū Bakr died, the people pledged allegiance to ‘Umar, including ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, and with him the Banū Hāshim (may Allāh be pleased with them all). ‘Alī assumed the position of judge for ‘Umar during his caliphate. He married him to his daughter, Umm Kulthūm, who was the daughter of Fāṭimah al-Zahrā’, the daughter of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him). She bore him his son Zayd and his daughter Ruqayyah. The jurists have established, based on the manner in which ‘Umar's succession took place, a principle in the fundamentals of governance: the permissibility of the caliphate being established by a covenant from the previous caliph.

‘Umar's reign lasted ten years, five months, and twenty-one nights. His life ended at the hands of Abū Lu’lu’ah al-Majūsī, who assassinated him at dawn on Wednesday, the twenty-seventh of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 23 AH. ‘Umar's assassination was carried out through a conspiracy orchestrated by al-Hurmuzān, the Persian commander, who was captured by the Muslims in the year 17 AH in the Battle of Tustar and sent to ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb at his request. ‘Umar intended to kill him, but he escaped death by declaring his conversion to Islam. When ‘Umar was killed, his son ‘Ubayd Allāh killed al-Hurmuzān.

The justice of ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) was too famous to need mentioning. Among the most important achievements during his reign were the conquests of Syria, Iraq, Egypt, and most of Persia, where the Muslim armies reached Azerbaijan.

The Caliphate of ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān (May Allāh be pleased with him) (23-36 AH)

When ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) was assassinated, he was asked to appoint his son ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar as his successor, but he replied: "I did not praise it [the caliphate], so I do not desire it for any of my family members. It is sufficient for the family of ‘Umar that one of them is held accountable."

He decided to choose six of the best companions of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), those who had been given the glad tidings of Paradise, to consult among themselves and choose one of them as caliph. They were: ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf, al-Zubayr ibn al-‘Awwām, Ṭalḥah ibn ‘Ubayd Allāh, and Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ (may Allāh be pleased with them all). He advised that his son ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar be present with them, but without having any say in the matter, rather to judge between them if they differed.

‘Umar called the members of the consultation (ash-Shūrā) and ordered them to meet after his death. He gave them a deadline of three days following his death to choose a caliph from among them. He appointed al-Miqdād ibn al-Aswad as their gatekeeper and said to him: "If five of them agree on one man and the other refuses, then strike his neck. If three agree on one and three on another, then let 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Umar judge between them. Whichever group he judges for, let them choose a caliph from among them. If they do not accept 'Abd Allāh's judgment, then let them be with those who include 'Abd al-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf." Then 'Umar explained the virtue of each one of them and praised their merits, saying: "I do not think that the caliphate will be assumed by anyone except one of two men: 'Alī or 'Uthmān."

Indeed, the consultation resulted in the selection of 'Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with him), and the companions pledged allegiance to him. The period of 'Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with him) was distinguished by the expansion of conquests, as the last of the Sasanian kings fell and was killed, and Persia entered Islam. The conquering army of the companions also penetrated North Africa and crossed into Andalusia, but they did not stay there. The region of al-Rayy and the upper reaches of al-Jazīrah around the Caspian Sea up to the borders of Anatolia were conquered. Thus, the world came to the Muslims, just as the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had foretold.

Then, Satan instigated discord and dissension crept in. The leaders of the sedition (fitnah) exploited some observations raised about the policies of the possessor of the two lights, 'Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with him), and the famous sedition occurred, which was largely carried out by ruffians, and which resulted in his siege and killing in his house (may Allāh be pleased with him and grant him satisfaction). This opened a sedition for the ummah whose effects have not been healed to this day.

To Allāh belongs the command before and after.

The Caliphate of 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (May Allāh be pleased with him) (36-40 AH)

After the killing of ‘Uthmān, the people of Medina pledged allegiance to ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with them both). The Banū Umayyah rose up demanding vengeance for the blood of ‘Uthmān, who had been wronged, accusing ‘Alī of protecting his killers. They were joined by ‘Ā’ishah bint Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, the wife of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him). The famous seditions occurred, including the Battle of the Camel. Then Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān sided with the people of Syria, while ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him) was based in Iraq, and the major sedition occurred. Then the famous arbitration incident took place between ‘Alī and Mu‘āwiyah, which failed and resulted in the birth of the Khawārij sect.

The Khawārij were determined to kill ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān, and ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ. Three men volunteered for this mission: ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Muljam, who guaranteed to kill ‘Alī; al-Ḥajjāj ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Barak al-Tamīmī, who guaranteed to kill Mu‘āwiyah; and ‘Amr ibn Bakr al-Tamīmī, who guaranteed to kill ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ. The cursed Ibn Muljam carried out what he had guaranteed and killed ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him). The other two failed, so Mu‘āwiyah and ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ survived (may Allāh be pleased with them all).

The Caliphate of al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (May Allāh be pleased with them both) (40-41 AH)

Al-Ḥasan was pledged allegiance to the caliphate after the assassination of his father. He received news that Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān had marched to fight him and overthrow his caliphate and that he had camped at Maskan. Al-Ḥasan prepared an army from the people of Kufa and headed with it to meet Mu‘āwiyah. However, they deserted him, just as they had dispersed from his brother and father before – and this has continued to be the practice of the Shī‘ah to this day. They hated fighting and dispersed from al-Ḥasan and plundered him. It is said that he was wounded by a spear thrust from them. Al-Ḥasan saw no point in continuing the war with such people, and he sent a letter to Mu‘āwiyah declaring his desire to reconcile with him and abdicate the caliphate to him in exchange for conditions. Mu‘āwiyah sent him a blank sheet of paper sealed with his seal for him to fill with whatever conditions he wished. Al-Ḥasan (may Allāh be pleased with him) dictated his conditions and presented them to Mu‘āwiyah, who accepted them and returned with al-Ḥasan to Kufa. In its mosque, al-Ḥasan announced his abdication to Mu‘āwiyah, and the people pledged allegiance to him. That year was called the Year of Unity (‘Ām al-Jamā‘ah) because of the Muslims' unity under one caliph. Al-Ḥasan then returned to Medina, and then he died (may Allāh be pleased with him) in Medina in the year 50 AH, after the prophecy of his grandfather (peace and blessings be upon him) was fulfilled when he said: “This son of mine is a leader, and perhaps Allāh will reconcile through him two large groups of Muslims.”

Islamic Conquests during the Era of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs

After Abū Bakr suppressed the apostasy of the renegades and Islam spread throughout the Arabian Peninsula, he implemented the policy decided by the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to spread Islam outside the peninsula. He directed the Islamic forces to jihād on two fronts: the Iraqi front under the leadership of Khālīd ibn al-Walīd, and the Syrian front under the leadership of Abū ‘Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrāḥ, accompanied by Yazīd ibn Abī Sufyān and his brother Mu‘āwiyah, Shuraḥbīl ibn Ḥasanah, and ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ. In Iraq, the southern part of it was conquered. Then Abū Bakr ordered Khālīd ibn al-Walīd to go to Syria with a portion of the Iraqi army to support Abū ‘Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrāḥ. Syria was conquered after the Battle of Yarmūk in the year 13 AH, shortly before the death of Abū Bakr (may Allāh be pleased with them all).

During the reign of ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with him) (13-23 AH), Mu‘āwiyah invaded the Romans until he reached ‘Amūriyyah (in present-day Turkey), and al-Jazīrah, Armenia, and Azerbaijan were conquered. The Muslims knocked on the Bāb al-Abwāb on the Khazar Sea (Caspian Sea) at the hands of ‘Iyād ibn Ghanm. Egypt was conquered at the hands of ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ. The Islamic conquest extended to the Libyan coastal regions (Tripoli and Barqa).

In Iraq, Sa’d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ took command of the Islamic army. He led the conquest of the remainder of Iraq after the Battle of al-Qādisiyyah (in the year 14 AH), in which the Persian army was defeated and its leaders were killed. The Muslims crossed the borders of Iran and conquered Khurasan, al-Ahwāz, and the province of Fars. The conquest extended south to Makran (Balochistan) to the borders of Sindh and east to Sijistan (Afghanistan).

During the caliphate of ‘Uthmān (23-35 AH), Khurasan, Armenia, and Azerbaijan were reconquered after their rebellion. Al-Rayy, Hamadan, Tabaristan, and Jurjan were conquered, and the conquest of Iran was completed. In Syria, after the Battle of Yarmūk, only Byzantine garrisons remained in some cities of Palestine and the coast. Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān completed their conquest. ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with him) had appointed him governor of Syria after the death of his brother Zayd in the plague of ‘Amwās in the year 18 AH.

On the Roman front, Mu‘āwiyah established the system of al-Ṣawā’if wa al-Shawātī (summer and winter raids) to continue the invasion of the Romans. In the year 27 AH, he reached Constantinople and besieged it. He established a shipbuilding yard in Acre, where the first Islamic fleet was built. Its first accomplishment was the capture of the islands of Cyprus and Arwad. With it, the Byzantine fleet was annihilated in the Battle of Dhāt al-Sawārī (Battle of the Masts) in the year 34 AH, and the eastern Mediterranean Sea became an Islamic sea thereafter. In Egypt, the Islamic conquest extended towards Africa under the leadership of ‘Abd Allāh ibn Sa’d ibn Abī Sarḥ, whom ‘Uthmān appointed after dismissing ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ. The Muslims were victorious over the Roman army, which was led by Gregory (Jarjīr), and Sabīṭilah, which he had taken as his capital, was captured. After this battle, the doors of the Maghreb were opened.

During the reign of ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, the conquests stopped, except for an incursion that took place on the Sindh front, due to the seditions that arose during his reign and ended with his killing (may Allāh be pleased with him).

The Islamic State during the Umayyad Caliphate (41-132 AH):

With the abdication of al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him) from the caliphate to Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān, the caliphate transferred to the Banū Umayyah. Thus, the Rightly-Guided Caliphate ended, and the era of the biting kingship (al-mulk al-‘aḏūḏ) began in the history of Islam and Muslims.

The Umayyad era encompassed two periods:

a) The Sufyanid period: This is the period in which the caliphate was held by Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān, his son Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah, and his grandson Mu‘āwiyah ibn Yazīd. It lasted 23 years (41-64 AH).

b) The Marwanid period: This is the period in which the caliphate transferred to the Marwanid branch of the Banū Umayyah with the assumption of Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam until the reign of his grandson Marwān ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥakam, the last of the Umayyad caliphs. It lasted 68 years (64-132 AH).

During these two periods, which lasted 91 years and nine months, fourteen caliphs succeeded each other. The most prominent among them were Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān (may Allāh be pleased with him) and ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz (may Allāh be pleased with him). The state expanded and its foundations were consolidated during the reign of ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān, al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, and his brother Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik. Their caliphate lasted 71 years out of 91 years, so the Umayyad state was their state. During their reign, its expanse extended from the Atlantic Ocean to the borders of China. Then the sun of the Umayyad caliphate began to set, due to the revolutions that ignited within it, fueled by the struggle for the caliphate and the seizure of power, the revolutions of the Khawārij, and civil wars stirred by tribal fanaticism between the Muḍariyyah and the Yamaniyyah.

The transfer of the caliphate to the Banū Umayyah resulted in the following consequences:

In the Political Sphere:

a) The caliphate transformed into an inherited monarchy, transferred by a covenant from the previous caliph to his son or to two or more of his sons in sequence, as ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān did when he entrusted the caliphate to his two sons al-Walīd and Sulaymān. The formula of the pledge of allegiance (bay‘ah) changed. Whereas the pledge of allegiance to the caliph during the era of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs was based on pledging allegiance to him on the basis of consultation (shūrā), acting according to the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger, and was taken from those present at the pledge from among the people of authority and decision (ahl al-ḥall wa al-‘aqd) from among the senior companions and those of sound judgment and intellect in Medina, it came to be taken from the subjects in the presence of the caliph in the capital of the state (Damascus) and in the presence of his senior officials in the provinces. The caliph would take the pledge of allegiance for those he designated as his successors from among his sons after him. If anyone refused the pledge, it was taken by force and domination.

b) The capital of the Islamic state was moved to Damascus after it had been in Iraq – Kufa – during the time of ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him), and in Medina before that.

c) The authority of governance transferred to the Banū Umayyah. Their tribal solidarity (‘aṣabiyyah) had gathered in Syria since the Islamic conquest and converged with the Kalb tribe of Yemen, which had settled there before Islam. Thus, the Kalbi tribes were linked to the Banū Umayyah by the bond of marriage and formed the political weight that supported the Umayyad state until the end of its era.

d) A period of political stability arose in the Islamic state, allowing it to absorb the conquests that took place during the era of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs, add to them, and expand the Islamic state to its peak area, which extended from the borders of China in the east to Andalusia and Morocco in the west, and from the Caucasus in the north to the Arabian Sea and the lands of Nubia in the south. All this area was organized within the framework of Islamic rule.

e) The system of the caliphate became more like a monarchical or imperial system. Consequently, the temporal aspect of the caliphate increased over the religious aspect, and what the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had foretold began, that the sultan and the Qur’ān would separate. The state also adopted the administrative and financial system that was followed in the Persian and Byzantine states.

In the Economic Sphere:

Trade routes shifted to the ports of Syria and Egypt, especially after the Battle of Dhāt al-Sawārī in the year 34 AH and the destruction of the Byzantine fleet.

The major capitals of the Islamic lands, foremost among them the cities of Syria, Egypt, Iraq, Khurasan, North Africa, and Andalusia, became the capitals and jewels of the world, foremost among them the capital of the Umayyad Caliphate, Damascus. Trade flourished, and caravans traveled safely, connecting the east of the ancient world with its west, from the borders of China and the lands of India and Sindh to the lands of the Romans and their kingdoms on the other shore of the Mediterranean Sea.

In the Scholarly Sphere:

Civilization and sciences flourished during the era of the Umayyad state and reached a high level. The companions of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) spread throughout the various conquered lands and settled in them, especially Syria, Iraq, and Egypt. The Successors (Tābi‘ūn) carried the sciences, jurisprudence, and conduct of the companions, and after that to Persia, Khurasan, and North Africa.

The Ḥadīth was compiled during the time of ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz (may Allāh be pleased with him). Outstanding scholars emerged in the generation of the Successors and the Successors of the Successors during that period, who preserved the sciences of the Sharī‘ah and laid the scientific foundation upon which its minarets later rose.

However, alongside this, and as the system of governance transformed into the monarchical Chosroan-Caesar form, the phenomenon of scholars of the sultans and jurists of the palaces appeared. We even find in the historical documents of that stage some of the prominent imams, such as Abū Ḥāzīm, al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, and al-Awzā‘ī, criticizing this phenomenon and its proponents. In other fields of civilization, such as architecture, sciences, and arts, the entry of the Arabs into the lands of ancient civilizations, such as Persia, Rome, Sindh, India, and the lands of the Turks adjacent to China, led to their absorption of the essence of those civilizations, their blending, and the production of a unique model of civilization, whose radiance remained a beacon for humanity for centuries after that.

Duration of the Caliphate of the Umayyad Caliphs and their Ages (661-750 CE):

1. Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān (may Allāh be pleased with him): 661-680 CE, nineteen years and eight months. He died in Rajab in the year 60 AH at the age of 78.
2. Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah: 680-683 CE, three years and eight months. He died in Rabī‘ al-Awwal in the year 64 AH at the age of 38.
3. Mu‘āwiyah ibn Yazīd: 683-683 CE, forty days. He died in the year 64 AH at the age of 23.
4. Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam: 683-685 CE, one year and ten months. He died in Ramaḍān in the year 65 AH at the age of 71.
5. ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān: 685-705 CE, twenty-one years. He died in the year 86 AH at the age of 60.
6. Al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik: 705-715 CE, nine years and eight months. He died in Jumādā al-Ākhirah in the year 96 AH at the age of 48.
7. Sulaymān ibn ‘Abd al-Malik: 715-718 CE, two years and eight months. He died in the year 99 AH at the age of 45.
8. ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz (may Allāh be pleased with him): 718-720 CE, two years and five months. He died in Rajab in the year 101 AH at the age of 40.
9. Yazīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān: 720-724 CE, four years and one month. He died in Sha‘bān in the year 105 AH at the age of 38.

10. Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān: 724-743 CE, nineteen years and seven months. He died in Rabī‘ al-Ākhir in the year 125 AH at the age of 54.
11. Al-Walīd ibn Yazīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik: 743-744 CE, one year and two months. He died in Jumādā al-Ākhirah in the year 126 AH at the age of 38.
12. Yazīd ibn al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik: 744-744 CE, five months. He died in Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 126 AH at the age of 40.
13. Ibrāhīm ibn al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik: 744-744 CE, seventy days. He was deposed in the year 127 AH and died in Rabī‘ al-Ākhir in the year 132 AH at the age of 60.
14. Marwān ibn Muḥammad ibn Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam: 744-750 CE, five years. He died in Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 132 AH at the age of 60.

Conquests during the Reign of the Banū Umayyah

During the reign of Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān (may Allāh be pleased with him) (41-60 AH), the conquests continued to rise. They extended east to Transoxiana, and Bukhara and the lands of Sogdia were conquered. The Muslims penetrated Africa and captured Qabis, Bizerte, and Sousse at the hands of Mu‘āwiyah ibn Ḥudayj, the governor of Africa. Then Qafṣah and Constantine were conquered at the hands of ‘Uqbah ibn Nāfi‘. In the east, Khurasan and Sijistan were conquered after their rebellion. The summer raids continued on the Roman front, and naval raids continued on the islands of Sicily and Rhodes, those raids that paved the way for their capture.

In the year 48 AH, Mu‘āwiyah sent a reconnaissance campaign to the outskirts of Constantinople to test the Byzantine defense line of the capital (Constantinople). In the year 53 AH, Mu‘āwiyah sent a campaign to invade this city under the leadership of his son Yazīd, accompanied by the naval commander Sufyān ibn ‘Awf al-Azdī, and included the great companion Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī. The campaign returned after a siege that lasted seven years, during which Abū Ayyūb died and was buried near the walls of Constantinople.

During the reign of Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah (60-64 AH), the conquests were limited to the penetration of ‘Uqbah ibn Nāfi‘ in Africa and his reaching the coast of the Atlantic Ocean. The Muslims invaded Khwarazm from the lands of Transoxiana. Most of his reign was spent in conflict with al-Ḥusayn ibn ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with them both), which ended with the killing of al-Ḥusayn, and in conflict with ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr, who demanded the caliphate after the martyrdom of al-Ḥusayn.

During the reign of ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān (64-86 AH), the conquests stopped at their previous borders, except for some expansion in the lands of Transoxiana. The reason for this was ‘Abd al-Malik's preoccupation with his struggle with Ibn al-Zubayr and his preoccupation with quelling the revolutions and seditions stirred up by the Shī‘ah and the Khawārij. These exhausted ‘Abd al-Malik and forced him to make peace with the Romans for money to stop their attack on the Islamic frontiers.

During the reign of al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik (86-96 AH), the march of conquests began to rise. His brother Maslamah ibn ‘Abd al-Malik penetrated Azerbaijan and conquered a number of castles and fortresses. The conquest expanded in Transoxiana at the hands of Qutaybah ibn Muslim, so Bukhara, Samarkand, the lands of al-Shāsh, Fergana, and Kashan were conquered. Qutaybah's conquests extended to the delta of the Oxus River.

In Africa, Mūsā ibn Nuṣayr, the governor of Africa, completed the conquest of the Maghreb. In the year 86 AH, he sent a naval campaign under the leadership of ‘Ayyāsh ibn Āshīl, who invaded Sicily and returned with spoils. Mūsā prepared an army under the leadership of his freedman Ṭāriq ibn Ziyād, who crossed the sea to Andalusia in the year 93 AH and was victorious over the Visigothic king Roderic in a battle that took place in Shadhūnah. Then Mūsā ibn Nuṣayr joined him and participated with him in the conquest of some Spanish regions. In India, Muḥammad ibn al-Qāsim al-Thaqafi penetrated it and conquered many of its castles and cities.

During the reign of Sulaymān ibn ‘Abd al-Malik (96-99 AH), Qutaybah ibn Muslim crossed the borders of China and conquered the city of Kashgar. In Andalusia, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Mūsā – who had succeeded his father as governor of Andalusia – penetrated Spain and conquered a number of its regions. Yazīd ibn al-Muhallab, the governor of Khurasan, conquered Jurjan, Qumis, Tabaristan. Sulaymān prepared a naval campaign under the leadership of ‘Umar ibn Hubayrah and another land campaign under the leadership of his brother Maslamah, and they besieged Constantinople by land and sea. They returned by order of ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz after he assumed the caliphate.

During the reign of ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz (may Allāh be pleased with him) (99-101 AH), the Muslims crossed the Pyrenees Mountains into Gaul (France) under the leadership of al-Samḥ ibn Mālik, the governor of Andalusia, and captured Narbonne and Toulouse. The conquests did not extend beyond that during the reign of ‘Umar due to the short duration of his caliphate.

During the reign of Yazīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik (101-105 AH), the Muslims penetrated Gaul (France) under the leadership of ‘Anbasah ibn Suḥaym, the governor of Andalusia, until they reached the upper Rhone River. The Islamic fleet in the Maghreb raided the island of Sicily and the island of Sardinia.

During the caliphate of Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik (105-125 AH), the march of Islamic conquests ascended to its furthest extent and reached its peak. Asad ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Qaṣrī, the governor of Khurasan, invaded Transoxiana, the lands of Sogdia and the Turks. Al-Ḥajjāj ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān invaded the lands of the Khazars, Armenia, and the lands of the Alans and imposed the jizyah on them. Al-Jarrāḥ al-Ḥakamī, the governor of Armenia, continued the invasion of the lands of the Khazars.

When he was martyred in the year 112 AH, Marwān ibn Muḥammad succeeded him as governor and invaded the regions of the Khazar Sea (Caspian Sea) and consolidated Islamic rule in them.

In the lands of Sindh, al-Junayd ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Murrī penetrated it and conquered a number of its countries. Then the conquest stopped until the days of the Ghaznavids in the late fourth and fifth centuries AH. In Gaul, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ghāfiqī, the governor of Andalusia, invaded its southwest and captured the city of Bordeaux. Then he ascended north and met with Charles Martel between the cities of Tours and Poitiers in a fierce battle that took place in the year 114 AH (732 CE), in which ‘Abd al-Raḥmān was martyred and his army was defeated due to the soldiers' preoccupation with protecting the spoils they had gained. Many Muslims were martyred with him in that battle, so that battle was called Balāṭ al-Shuhadā’ (The Court of the Martyrs).

And ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Qaṭan succeeded ‘Abd al-Raḥmān as governor of Andalusia, and he invaded the lands of the Basques (al-Bashkans). In Africa, ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn al-Ḥabḥāb, the governor of Africa, sent an army led by Ḥabīb ibn Abī ‘Ubaydah al-Fihri, who conquered the lands of al-Sūs and invaded the land of Sudan (Senegal). In the Mediterranean Sea, the Islamic fleet, led by Ḥassān ibn Muḥammad ibn Abī Bakr, invaded the islands of Sardinia and Corsica. Another fleet, led by Ḥabīb ibn Abī ‘Ubaydah al-Fihri and his son ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, invaded the island of Sicily in the year 122 AH and engaged with the Byzantine fleet in a battle in which this fleet was defeated. Ḥabīb intended to continue the conquest until he had captured the entire island, but the Berber revolt led by Maysarah al-Madgharī forced him to return. On the Roman front, the summer and winter raids continued, as was the case during the reign of the previous caliphs.

With the death of Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, the first Marwanid phase ends, during which the expanse of the Islamic state extended from Spain, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Far Maghreb to the borders of India and China, and from the Khazar Sea and Armenia to the Indian Ocean. The Umayyad caliphs considered the borders of the conquered lands as starting points for continuous conquests that did not end at any borders, as long as jihād was obligatory on Muslims to spread the message of Islam, and as long as spoils motivated the mujāhidīn to continue jihād.

After Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, the second and final phase of the Marwanid period begins, during which the conquests stopped. Four caliphs assumed power, whose caliphate lasted six years. They were: al-Walīd ibn Yazīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, Yazīd ibn al-Walīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, his brother Ibrāhīm, and Marwān ibn Muḥammad ibn Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam. The caliphate of the first three did not exceed a few months, and the caliphate of the last occupied the remaining period (127-132 AH). He spent it suppressing the internal seditions and revolutions that surrounded him from all sides. He was unable, despite his patience, courage, and boldness, to curb them. His fate ended with his killing at the hands of the Abbasids. With this, the life of the Umayyad state ended, and its banner, under which the banner of Islam had spread over that vast expanse of land, was folded.

Reasons for the Fall of the Umayyad State

Firstly: Palace struggles for power and the appointment of more than one heir apparent, and the resulting conflict over the kingship, weakened the central government and made it a target for those rebelling against it.

Secondly: The impact of tribal fanaticism in the conflict over the kingship.

The impact of this fanaticism appeared after the death of Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān and the abdication of his son Mu‘āwiyah (II) from the caliphate. The Kalb tribe of Yemen supported Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam when he nominated himself for the caliphate, and fought with him against al-Ḍaḥḥāk ibn Qays al-Fihri, the leader of the Qaysiyyah in Syria, who was calling for ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Zubayr. Marwān was victorious in the Battle of Marj Rāhiṭ in the year 64 AH with the help of the Kalbis, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk ibn Qays was killed in the battle, and the Qaysiyyah were defeated. After that, the enmity between the Yamaniyyah and the Qaysiyyah (Muḍariyyah) became entrenched, and the Yamaniyyah remained allies of the Banū Umayyah until the caliphate of al-Walīd ibn Yazīd ibn ‘Abd al-Malik when Yazīd ibn al-Muhallab ibn Abī Ṣufrah, the leader of the Yamaniyyah, revolted against him.

Tribal fanaticism between the Yamaniyyah and the Qaysiyyah spread to Andalusia and Khurasan. The Yamaniyyah eventually joined the opposition and sided with Abū Muslim al-Khurasānī against Naṣr ibn Sayyār.

Abū Muslim, the leader of the Abbasid call, benefited from this tribal conflict, which weakened the Umayyad rule in resisting the Abbasid call and was one of the reasons for its victory.

Thirdly: The extravagance and wastefulness of the caliphs and princes:

When the caliphate passed to the Banū Umayyah and transformed into an inherited monarchy, manifestations of kingship appeared in extravagance to support their rule and gain loyalty. They lavished gifts on poets, so that their tongues would be unleashed to praise them, spread their merits, and defend them, and poets at that time were the means of propaganda and media. They followed a policy of extravagance and spending, and adopted the pomp of kingship in their appearance, clothing, and gatherings. Some of them inclined to a life of amusement and debauchery, and some of them were extravagant, and stories and accounts were narrated about them that went beyond the bounds of religion and morality.

Some historians cast doubt on the authenticity of these stories, due to the exaggeration in some of them, and believe that they were fabricated in the early Abbasid era to defame the Banū Umayyah, as a continuation of the campaign of persecution against their living and their dead after the fall of their state. However, it is established that the transformation of the caliphate into kingship since that era introduced into the system of governance all the necessities of the corruption of kings and what their palaces contain.

Fourthly: The injustice and oppression of the governors:

The Umayyads faced many revolutions and seditions. These cost the state exorbitant expenses, and thousands of people were killed and martyred in them. The homeland of these seditions and revolutions was Iraq, al-Jazīrah, and Khurasan, and then it spread to Africa. The caliphs of the Banū Umayyah chose governors for these regions from among the harshest men. Among them were Ziyād ibn Abīh, his son ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn Ziyād, al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, and his nephew ‘Umar ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī.

The caliphs granted them absolute authority to suppress these revolutions and seditions and to impose obedience by force. They and those they appointed to positions in their provinces would persecute those who fell into their custody from among the rebels and disobedients. Among the forms of injustice were killing on suspicion and confiscation of property.

Fifthly: The violation of the principle of equality between Arabs and mawālī:

The principle of equality proclaimed by Islam was the strong motive for the people of the conquered lands to embrace the new religion. A mutual loyalty arose between them and the Muslims, and they became known as mawālī. The principle of equality with the Arabs guaranteed them what was stated in the Holy Qur’ān and what was narrated from the hadiths of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him). This principle was applied during the era of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) and the era of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs. There was no distinction between Ṣuhayb al-Rūmī, Salmān al-Fārisī, and Bilāl al-Ḥabashī, and any Arab Muslim, no matter how high his lineage.

When the Banū Umayyah assumed the caliphate, they violated this principle and were biased towards the Arabs, placing the mawālī in a lower rank in terms of rights and duties. They were assigned to menial jobs, while the higher positions were for the Arabs.

When the state's expenses increased due to wars and the suppression of revolutions and seditions, the governors of the provinces imposed the jizyah on those who had converted to Islam from among the mawālī, and they imposed the kharāj on their lands, contrary to the rulings of Islam, which stipulated the exemption of those who converted to Islam from among the mawālī from the jizyah, and obligated them to pay the tithe (‘ushr) instead of the kharāj.

The discrimination between Arabs and mawālī led to the mawālī joining the opposition parties of Alawites and Khawārij, and supporting their revolutions against Umayyad rule. It also led to the emergence of the idea of al-Shu‘ūbiyyah, which is the revival by the mawālī, especially the Persians, of their nationalism and traditions, boasting about them and belittling the Arabs.

These are the reasons that led to the fall of the Umayyad state, in addition to the secret call that the Banū ‘Abbās devised and directed their callers to spread in Iraq and Khurasan. The Alawites, their Shī‘ah, and the mawālī joined them, and their ranks united in resisting Umayyad rule.

Al-Mas‘ūdī mentioned what a sheikh from among the sheikhs of the Banū Umayyah said about the reasons for the fall of their state:

"We were preoccupied with our pleasures from checking what we should have checked, so we wronged our subjects, and they despaired of our fairness and wished for relief from us. Our tax collectors were burdened, so they abandoned us, and our estates were ruined, so our treasuries were emptied. We trusted our ministers, so they preferred their own interests over ours, and they carried out matters without us and concealed their knowledge from us. The payment of our soldiers was delayed, so their obedience to us ceased, and our enemies summoned them, so they joined forces with them against us. Our enemies sought us, and we were unable to resist them due to the lack of our supporters. The concealment of news from us was one of the most important reasons for the loss of our kingdom."

Al-Mas'ūdī adds to these reasons the stirring of the spirit of tribal fanaticism between the Yamaniyyah and the Qaysiyyah (Arabs of the north and south), and the boasting of each over the other and its claim to the virtues it possessed. This resulted in the Qaysiyyah's fanaticism for Marwān ibn Muḥammad and the Yamaniyyah's turning away from him to the Abbasid call, and the matter ended with the transfer of the state from the Banū Umayyah to the Banū Hāshim.

The Umayyad state was interspersed with an attempt at reform by the Commander of the Faithful, the rightly-guided 'Umar ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz. 'Umar ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz wanted to rectify in his caliphate what had gone wrong in the policies of his predecessors and what was bad in their behavior, and to follow the policy of his grandfather 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with them both). He obligated the men of the state to be austere, and he replaced the governors of the provinces with governors he chose from among the people of piety, trustworthiness, knowledge, and the Sharī'ah. He returned all the money that the governors and people of influence had usurped to the treasury if it was state money, and to its owners if it was the money of individuals.

He won the hearts of the Alawites and forbade the cursing of 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with him). He engaged the Khawārij in debate and refuted them. He reformed the tax policy, preventing the taking of the jizyah that the governors of the provinces used to take from its people after their conversion to Islam, and preventing the imposition of kharāj on the lands of those who converted to Islam.

When ‘Umar was told that this reform would harm the state's resources, he replied: "Allāh sent Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him) as a guide and did not send him as a tax collector." He also carried out other administrative and financial reforms that were not fully implemented due to the short duration of his caliphate, which was two years and a fraction. His piety and scrupulousness raised him to a high rank, and many of the Salaf considered him the fifth of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs. It was said that the Banū Umayyah poisoned him because he took away from them much of what they had usurped, and that he intended to return the matter to consultation among the Muslims.

Evaluation of the Era of the Banū Umayyah

Whatever is said about the reasons that led to the fall of the Umayyad state, it cannot be denied that it was the first global state of Islam, and that it was the one that spread it in the vast expanse of the world that extends from the coast of the Atlantic Ocean to the borders of India and China, and from the Black Sea and the Khazar Sea (Caspian Sea) to the Indian Ocean, and that it was the strongest of the Islamic states. Its era, thanks to the Arabs and Muslims, was the most capable of jihād, the strongest in struggle, and the most active and vibrant of the Islamic eras.

During its reign, the Arabs, in the conquered lands, encountered other peoples who were ahead of them in civilization and superior to them in knowledge. They were influenced by their cultures, traditions, and systems, and were able to assimilate them and imbue them with an Islamic spirit.

Scientific life was characterized by the compilation of Ḥadīth, Tafsīr, Maghāzī, and Akhbār. It was also characterized by the growth of jurisprudence and its absorption of its applications to the needs of evolving life. Cultural life was characterized by the study of philosophical and theological schools and the debate with their proponents.

Cultural life was also characterized by the adoption of Greek sciences in medicine and chemistry. Khālīd ibn Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān was the first to be interested in translating those sciences into Arabic. Economic life was characterized by the activity and expansion of trade, especially after the war fleet controlled the eastern Mediterranean Sea, following the naval battle known as Dhāt al-Sawārī in the year 34 AH, and the establishment of the sovereignty of the Islamic state over it. Trade activity expanded after the conquest of Africa and Andalusia. Merchant ships plied the sea and traveled between the ports of Byzantium, Italy, Sicily, Crete, Rhodes, and Cyprus, trading with them, despite the continuation of the naval raids that were launched against those countries.

Land trade also flourished. Caravans crossed the land routes to India and China, and traveled through the lands of Iran and Transoxiana to Samarkand, Bukhara, and the lands of the Khazars, carrying their trade from and to those countries. Agricultural life was characterized by the provision of labor brought from Africa to reclaim the lands of al-Sawād south of Iraq.

Urban life was characterized by the construction of magnificent mosques, towering palaces, and hospitals (bīmāristānāt), and by the construction of cities and shipyards prepared for the construction of merchant and war ships. During the reign of Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān, the city of Kairouan was built by ‘Uqbah ibn Nāfi‘ in the year 50 AH. During his reign, the shipyard was built in Acre.

During the reign of ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān, the Dome of the Rock was built in Jerusalem, and the construction of the Al-Aqsa Mosque began. The Kaaba and the Meccan Haram were rebuilt in the year 74 AH. The city of Kairouan – Tunisia – was built, and a shipyard was established in it, supervised by Ḥassān ibn al-Nu‘mān, the governor of Africa, in the year 82 AH. The city of Wasit was built by al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, the governor of Iraq, in the years 82-83 AH, to be a middle ground between Kufa and Basra. During the reign of al-Walīd ibn ʿAbd al-Malik, the construction of the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus was completed in the years 87-96 AH. The construction of the Prophet's Mosque was renewed with its expansion and decoration with mosaics. The desert palaces were built.

Al-Walīd was interested in public facilities, such as repairing roads, digging wells on the Hajj route, establishing bīmāristānāt (Hospitals) for the sick, and building houses dedicated to lepers, the blind, and the disabled, and the caliph provided them with sustenance.

During the reign of Sulaymān ibn ʿAbd al-Malik, the Umayyad Mosque was built in Aleppo in the year 97 AH. Sulaymān, while he was crown prince, built the city of Ramla in Palestine, and in it he built palaces and the mosque. In the year 109 AH, Hishām ibn ʿAbd al-Malik built the palace of al-Ruṣāfah near Raqqa. ʿUbayd Allāh ibn al-Ḥabḥāb, the governor of Africa, built the Zaytouna Mosque. In the year 127 AH, Marwān ibn Muḥammad built the city of Harran near Mosul to be a temporary capital for him between Syria and Iraq, so that it would be easier for him to monitor what was happening in them.

In addition to urban activity, financial and administrative reforms were carried out. ʿAbd al-Malik ibn Marwān Arabized the qarāṭīs, which were papyrus paper, which the Copts in Egypt used to make and crown with the name of Christ. ʿAbd al-Malik ordered that the name of Christ be replaced with {Say, "He is Allāh, [who is] One"}.

ʿAbd al-Malik also minted coins and struck gold dinars for the first time in Islam. Al-Ḥajjāj al-Thaqafī, the governor of Iraq, minted silver dirhams with inscriptions and set their weight. In the year 81 AH, ʿAbd al-Malik transferred the dīwān from Greek to Arabic, and al-Ḥajjāj al-Thaqafī did the same, transferring the dīwān from Persian to Arabic. Similarly, ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān, the governor of Egypt, in the year 86 AH, transferred the dīwān from Coptic to Arabic, and Ḥassān ibn al-Nu‘mān, the governor of Africa, followed suit, transferring the dīwān of Africa to Arabic. The minting of coins and the Arabization of the dīwāns are considered an affirmation of the state's financial and economic entity.

If injustice and oppression are held against the Umayyad state, perhaps that was what the critical circumstances required, especially since those who rebelled against it were strong in their struggle and fanatical in their beliefs.

We have seen that revolutions and seditions surrounded the Umayyad state and erupted on several fronts, especially in Iraq, which then became the headquarters of the Shī‘ah, and in which the Khawārij, who rebelled against the system of government, appeared.

The Phenomenon of Sultan's Scholars in the Umayyad Era

As we mentioned earlier, the transformation of the Islamic system of government from the caliphate to kingship at the hands of the Banū Umayyah entailed the emergence of the trappings and pillars of the monarchical system, such as what was known throughout history of the corruption of palaces and the establishment of the system of authority on its three foundations (the ruler, the priest, the aides). Thus, the class of sultan's scholars appeared for the first time in the history of Muslims to adorn the gatherings of princes and the doors of sultans, and to join the elite.

Due to the proximity of the era to the best of generations, some of the imams of guidance stood against this group and resisted the kings of injustice who gradually increased in corruption. The books of Islamic history from that era have preserved for us a wonderful heritage of the stances of the scholars of truth and the imams of guidance.

Among these is what Imam al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī said, rebuking those who curried favor at the doors of the princes: It came in the book Siyar Aʿlām al-Nubalāʾ: Abū Nuʿaym narrated in al-Ḥilyah that ... Fuḍayl ibn Jaʿfar said: Al-Ḥasan came out from Ibn Hubayrah's place and saw the reciters at the door. He said: "What are you sitting here for?! Do you want to enter upon these wicked people? By Allāh, their company is not the company of the righteous. Disperse... may Allāh disperse your souls and your bodies. You have flattened your sandals, shortened your clothes, and trimmed your hair. You have disgraced the reciters, may Allāh disgrace you. By Allāh, if you had abstained from what they have, they would have desired what you have. But you desired what they have. May Allāh distance those who have distanced themselves."

This was a narration of some of the reports of the Banū Umayyah and their era, and Allāh the Almighty spoke the truth:

{That is a nation which has passed on. It will have [the consequence of] what it earned, and you will have what you have earned. And you will not be asked about what they used to do.} (Al-Baqarah: 134).

The Islamic State during the Abbasid Caliphate (132-656 AH)

The Transfer of the Caliphate to the Banū ʿAbbās

The caliphate transferred to the Banū ʿAbbās after the success of the secret call that their callers launched from the beginning of the year 100 AH in Khurasan until the year 132 AH. In it, the secret of the call, which appeared to be a call to choose a caliph from the family of the Prophe(peace and blessings be upon him) who would be acceptable to the Muslims. It was called “al-riḍā min Āl Muḥammad” (the one pleasing from the family of Muḥammad) in order to conceal it. Then it became clear that it was concealing the call for the Banū ‘Abbās.

On Friday, the twelfth of Rabī‘ al-Awwal in the year 132 AH, Abū al-‘Abbās ‘Abd Allāh ibn Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Abbās entered Kufa and was pledged allegiance to in its mosque. He delivered a speech to the people of Kufa, in which he clarified the right of the Banū ‘Abbās to the caliphate and was nicknamed al-Saffāḥ (the shedder of blood).

From that day, the white banner of the Banū Umayyah was folded, and the black banner of the Banū ‘Abbās was raised. The sons of ‘Alī ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-‘Abbāsī, ‘Abd Allāh and Ṣāliḥ, began to pursue the Banū Umayyah after the defeat of Marwān ibn Muḥammad, their last caliph, and his capture in Buṣīr in Egypt and his killing. They exhumed the graves of the Banū Umayyah in Damascus and burned what remained of their remains. They inflicted a great massacre on a large group of the Banū Umayyah in Palestine, killing them on the bank of the River Fatras. Those who survived among them dispersed in the horizons. Glory be to Him who gives kingship to whom He wills and takes away kingship from whom He wills, and He honors whom He wills and humiliates whom He wills.

Consequences of the Transfer of Power to the Banū ‘Abbās

The transfer of power to the Banū ‘Abbās resulted in the following consequences:

Firstly: The transfer of the capital from Syria to Iraq.

Secondly: The transfer of commercial activity to Iraq, and the linking of land trade to Baghdad and sea trade to Basra.

Thirdly: The emergence of a struggle between the nobles of the Arabs and the nobles of the mawālī from among the Persians and then the Turks to attain positions in the state, and the favoring of the mawālī with these positions, which led to the fall of the state in its second half under their administration.

Fourthly: The intensification of the resistance of the resentful Alawites and Khawārij and the succession of their revolutions against Abbasid rule, and the state's preoccupation with suppressing them, which led to:

a) The cessation of conquests and the transformation of the Abbasid state from the position of attack – which was the position of the Umayyad state – to the position of defense, and the consideration of the borders reached by the Umayyads in their conquests as final borders and stopping at them and being content with defending them on the borders with the Romans in the west or the Turks in the east.

b) The state's inability to control governance in the African provinces, which forced it to remain silent and recognize a current situation that led to the seizure of some regions from the state's sovereignty, which brought about independent states. This was done by ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Mu‘āwiyah ibn Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik al-Umawī, nicknamed al-Dākhil, when he seized Andalusia in the year 138 AH and established in it an independent emirate that transformed into a caliphate in the year 300 AH during the reign of ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir. It was also done by Idrīs I, after his survival in the Battle of Fakhkh in the year 169 AH, and his establishment in the Maghreb of an independent Alawite state. Similarly, the disruption of affairs in the Near Maghreb (Tunisia) led to the appointment of Ibrāhīm ibn al-Aghlab over it and granting him autonomy in the year 184 AH, and his establishment of the Aghlabid state, to prevent the extension of the Idrisid state towards the east. In addition to these independent states that separated politically and administratively from the Abbasid state, independent emirates arose in Africa, such as the emirate of Banū Midrār, which was established in Sijilmasa by Abū al-Qāsim Samghū in the year 155 AH, and the Rustamid emirate, which was established by ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Rustam in Tahert in the year 160 AH. Both emirates adhered to the Kharijite school of thought.

Fifthly: The assignment of some governors to a region of the state's regions independently, as a reward for their service to the state, as al-Ma'mūn did by assigning Ṭāhir ibn al-Ḥusayn to the region of Khurasan as an independent emirate to be inherited by his sons after him, as a reward for overcoming his brother al-Amīn.

The Abbasid Caliphate phase can be divided into three periods, according to strength and weakness:

- The first period: The period of strength and the golden age: (132-247 AH / 750-861 CE).
- The second period: The period of weakness, fragmentation, and the dominance of non-Arab commanders from among the Persians and Turks: (247-487 AH / 861-1094 CE).
- The third period: The period of collapse and external invasion by the Crusaders and the Tatars: (487-656 AH / 1094-1258 CE)

The Abbasid Caliphs in Baghdad

First Period:

1. Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Saffāḥ: 750-754 CE / 132-136 AH.
2. Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr: 754-775 CE / 136-158 AH.
3. Muḥammad al-Mahdī ibn Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr: 775-785 CE / 158-169 AH.
4. Mūsā al-Hādī ibn Muḥammad al-Mahdī: 785-786 CE / 169-170 AH.
5. Hārūn al-Rashīd ibn Muḥammad al-Mahdī: 786-809 CE / 170-193 AH.
6. Al-Amīn ibn Hārūn al-Rashīd: (killed). 809-813 CE / 193-198 AH.

7. Al-Ma'mūn ibn Hārūn al-Rashīd: 813-833 CE / 198-218 AH.
8. Muḥammad al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh ibn Hārūn al-Rashīd: 833-842 CE / 218-227 AH.
9. Hārūn al-Wāthiq bi-Allāh ibn al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh: 842-847 CE / 227-232 AH.
10. Ja'far al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh ibn al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh: (killed) 847-861 CE / 232-247 AH

Second Period:

1. Al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh ibn al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh: (killed) 861-862 CE / 247-248 AH.
2. Aḥmad al-Musta'īn bi-Allāh ibn al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh: (killed) 862-866 CE / 248-252 AH.
3. Al-Mu'tazz bi-Allāh ibn al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh: (killed) 866-870 CE / 252-255 AH.
4. Muḥammad al-Muhtadī ibn al-Wāthiq bi-Allāh: (killed) 870-870 CE / 255-256 AH.
5. Aḥmad Abū al-'Abbās al-Mu'tamid 'alā Allāh ibn al-Mutawakkil: 870-892 CE / 256-279 AH.
6. Aḥmad Abū al-'Abbās al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh ibn al-Muwaffaq ibn al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh: 892-902 CE / 279-289 AH.
7. 'Alī al-Muktafī bi-Allāh ibn al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh: 902-908 CE / 289-295 AH.

8. Ja'far Abū al-Faḍl al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh ibn al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh: (deposed twice, then killed) 908-932 CE / 295-320 AH.
9. 'Abd Allāh ibn al-Mu'tazz al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh: (held the caliphate for one day!) 909 CE / 296 AH.
10. Muḥammad al-Qāhir bi-Allāh ibn al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh: 932-934 CE / 320-322 AH.
11. Aḥmad Abū al-'Abbās al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh ibn al-Muqtadir: 934-940 CE / 322-329 AH.
12. Ibrāhīm al-Muttaqī bi-Allāh ibn al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh: 940-945 CE / 329-333 AH.
13. 'Abd Allāh Abū al-Qāsim al-Mustakfī bi-Allāh ibn al-Muktafī: (his eyes were gouged out and he was imprisoned until he died!) 945-946 CE / 333-334 AH.
14. Al-Muṭṭī' li-Allāh ibn al-Muqtadir: (abdicated!) 946-974 CE / 334-363 AH.
15. 'Abd al-Karīm Abū Bakr al-Ṭā'i' li-Allāh ibn al-Muṭṭī': 974-991 CE / 363-381 AH.
16. Aḥmad Abū al-'Abbās al-Qādir bi-Allāh ibn al-Amīr Ishāq ibn al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh: 991-1031 CE / 381-422 AH.
17. 'Abd Allāh Abū Ja'far al-Qā'im bi-Amr Allāh ibn al-Qādir bi-Allāh: 1031-1075 CE / 422-467 AH.
18. 'Abd Allāh al-Muqtadī bi-Amr Allāh, grandson of al-Qā'im bi-Amr Allāh: (because his father died before him) ... 1075-1094 CE / 467-487 AH.

Third Period:

1. Aḥmad Abū al-‘Abbās al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh ibn al-Muqtadī bi-Amr Allāh: 1094-1118 CE / 487-512 AH.
2. Abū Maṣṣūr Faḍl al-Mustarshid bi-Allāh ibn al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh: (killed by the Bāṭinīs) 1118-1135 CE / 512-529 AH.
3. Abū Ja‘far al-Manṣūr al-Rāshid bi-Allāh ibn al-Mustarshid bi-Allāh: (deposed by Sultan Mas‘ūd) ... 1135-1136 CE / 529-530 AH.
4. Muḥammad al-Muqtafi li-Amr Allāh ibn al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh: 1136-1160 CE / 530-555 AH.
5. Yūsuf al-Mustanjid bi-Allāh ibn al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh: 1160-1170 CE / 555-566 AH.
6. Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan al-Mustaḍī’ bi-Amr Allāh ibn al-Mustanjid bi-Allāh: 1170-1180 CE / 566-575 AH.
7. Al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh ibn al-Mustaḍī’ bi-Amr Allāh: 1180-1225 CE / 575-622 AH.
8. Abū al-Naṣr Muḥammad al-Ẓāhir bi-Amr Allāh ibn al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh: 1225-1226 CE / 622-623 AH.
9. Abū Ja‘far al-Manṣūr al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh ibn al-Ẓāhir bi-Amr Allāh: 1226-1242 CE / 623-640 AH.
10. Abū Aḥmad ‘Abd Allāh al-Musta‘ṣim bi-Allāh ibn al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh: (killed by the Tatars) 1242-1258 CE / 640-656 AH.

Conquests during the Reign of the Abbasid State

The Abbasid state stopped at the borders reached by the Umayyad state before its fall. What happened during the reign of the Abbasid state was the subjugation of regions that had rebelled against it and were subdued, so it was as if they were conquered anew, such as the rebellion of some areas in Transoxiana in the year 134 AH, the rebellion of Tabaristan in the year 142 AH, the rebellion of Sijistan in the year 152 AH, and the rebellion of Jurjan in the year 167 AH. These rebellions were uprisings against Abbasid rule or rebellions against it that were suppressed with severity and violence.

The summer raids continued on the Roman front and were limited to protecting the Islamic frontiers, al-Jazīrah and Syria. They continued from the year 142 AH until the year 191 AH and stopped after that until the year 215, due to the civil war between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn, for the sake of the caliphate, and the events that followed. When the kingdom was established for al-Ma'mūn, he resumed the summer campaigns, the last of which was the campaign he led himself in the year 218 AH, and he stopped with it at the city of Tarsus, where he died that year, after ordering that Imam Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal be brought to him to test him on the issue of the creation of the Qur'ān. He was brought to him in heavy shackles. It is famous that the Imam prayed to his Lord on the way, that Allāh not bring him together with al-Ma'mūn. News of his death came while they were on the way, and the Imam was returned to Baghdad!

The summer campaigns stopped after that, and the Islamic frontiers became a target for Roman raids. In the year 243 AH, the Romans raided the Jazīrah frontiers and reached the city of Shamshāṭ and approached the city of Āmid (Diyarbakır). They also raided in the year 245 AH the Syrian frontiers from the direction of Antioch. The summer campaigns led by two famous commanders, 'Alī ibn Yaḥyā al-Armanī and 'Umar ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Aqṭa', did not succeed in repelling the Roman raids, and both were martyred in a battle with them.

However, we must point out three large military campaigns that were directed to the lands of the Romans and were punitive campaigns:

The first: It was directed by Caliph al-Mahdī in the year 165 AH under the leadership of his son Hārūn al-Rashīd, in which he reached Constantinople, so Queen Irene made peace with him and concluded a treaty with him with a generous annual tribute.

The second: Al-Rashīd led it himself while he was caliph in the year 187 AH when Emperor Nicephorus, who succeeded Irene, broke the truce and sent a harsh letter to al-Rashīd. Al-Rashīd wrote to him on its back, replying: "From the Commander of the Faithful, Hārūn al-Rashīd, to Nicephorus, the dog of the Romans; your letter has reached me, O son of the adulteress! And the answer is what you see, not what you hear!!"

Then he invaded him and was victorious over him, so Emperor Nicephorus made peace with him and concluded a new truce with him.

The third: The campaign led by Caliph al-Mu'tasim bi-Allāh himself in the year 223 AH in revenge for the Romans who raided the frontiers of al-Jazīrah and entered the city of Zibṭarah, where they plundered, took women captive, and destroyed the city. This Roman raid was at the request of the rebel Bābak al-Khurramī, whom the caliph's armies were pursuing. When the siege was tightened on him, he asked the Byzantine Emperor Theophilos to launch raids on the Islamic frontiers to force the caliph to withdraw his armies from him. The emperor responded to his request and marched on the frontiers, but after Bābak had fallen into the grip of the caliph's army, where he was captured by al-Afshīn, the commander of al-Mu'tasim.

History books have narrated that a Muslim woman who was captive in Amorium called out for help from al-Mu'tasim saying: "O Mu'tasim!" So the Roman said to her "Let al-Mu'tasim come to you on a piebald horse". When al-Mu'tasim heard the news, he gathered an army and mobilized eighty thousand piebald horses! Al-Mu'tasim carried out his famous campaign, which was immortalized by the poet Abū Tammām with a magnificent poem, when the astrologers claimed and said to him: that the stars and prophecies indicate the impossibility of victory at that time. Al-Mu'tasim insisted on the invasion and went out, and in his army was a large number of famous scholars and righteous people, including Muḥammad ibn Wāsi', may Allāh have mercy on him. Al-Mu'taṣim met with the emperor's army in a battle that took place in Amorium, which ended with the defeat of the Romans and the capture of the emperor. and the destruction and burning of Amorium. Abū Tammām said in that poem, the beginning of which is:

The sword is more truthful in news than books ... In its edge is the limit between seriousness and play.

If there was any conquest in this era of the Abbasid state, it was the conquest of Sicily, which was carried out by the Aghlabid princes, the governors of Africa. In the year 212 AH, Prince Ziyādah I ibn Ibrāhīm ibn al-Aghlab prepared a naval campaign under the leadership of the judge, scholar, and mujāhid: Asad ibn al-Furāt, may Allah have mercy on him.

From there, they raided the island of Malta and conquered it during the days of Muḥammad ibn al-Aghlab in the year 261 AH. They crossed the Strait of Messina and invaded Calabria, which is the region located in the far south of the Italian peninsula.

Evaluation of the First Abbasid Era

It can be said that if the Umayyad era was the era of Islamic conquests, then the Abbasid era was the era of Islamic civilization. Its impact appeared in the development of the sciences of the Sharī'ah, and various aspects of urban, literary, intellectual, scientific, and social life.

The various religious sciences developed, such as the sciences of the Qur'ān and the sciences of Ḥadīth. The four madhhabs also emerged during this stage. They are the schools of the great Imams (Imam Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān, Imam Mālik, Imam al-Shāfi‘ī, and Imam Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal), and other prominent Imams who had madhhabs and schools of jurisprudence that were less widespread, such as Imam Sufyān al-Thawrī, Imam al-Awzā‘ī, and others. The compilation of the Prophetic biography (Sīrah) appeared, and the history of the Rightly-Guided Caliphs after him and their biographies, and the events that followed. The foundations of the science of Islamic history were laid. The compilation of Ḥadīth appeared, and the verification of the authentic ones from others. Prominent Imams of Ḥadīth emerged, such as al-Bukhārī, Muslim, ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Mubārak, Ibn ‘Uyaynah, Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, and many others, may Allāh have mercy on them.

Accordingly, the sciences of Arabic developed. The sciences of grammar appeared to control its pronunciation according to the speech of the Arabs, and it was known as the science of naḥw (syntax), as well as the science of ṣarf (morphology). Men appeared who were concerned with the vocabulary of the language, its various meanings, and its uses, relying on evidence from the speech of the Arabs, their poems, and their proverbs. All of this they did was a mainstay in the interpretation of the Qur’ān and Ḥadīth, and it helped the jurists in deriving rulings from their two main sources, which are the Qur’ān and the Sunnah. And other sciences necessary for jurisprudence, whose schools were established during that period.

As for the other civilizational aspects, urban life developed, and we find the effects of this in the renewal of the city of al-Anbār by Abū al-‘Abbās al-Saffāḥ and his taking it as his capital, in his construction of the city of al-Hāshimiyyah, in al-Manṣūr's construction of the city of Baghdad and the transfer of the capital to it, in his construction of the city of al-Rāfiqah, alongside the city of Raqqa, in the construction of the city of Samarra, which was called Surra Man Ra'a (He who sees it is pleased) during the reign of al-Mu‘taṣim, in the construction of the city of al-Mutawakkiliyyah during the days of al-Mutawakkil, and in what was built in these cities of palaces, the splendor of which aroused the inspiration of poets.

Literary life was manifested in the poetry of poets. The softness of life added delicacy to poetry and innovation to new meanings, and it inspired the imagination of poets with artistic images that the poets of the Umayyad era were not familiar with. The generosity and generosity of the caliphs, and those who emulated them in generosity from among the ministers and notables, whetted the inspiration of the poets and unleashed their tongues with good poetry. Poetry was a means of praising them and singing their virtues. Alongside the poets, writers appeared, and they invented a new style based on fluency of expression, accuracy of meaning, and brilliance of eloquence. Some of them rose to the position of minister.

In intellectual life, we find the impact of foreign cultures that the mawālī brought with them, from the wisdom of India, the literature of Persia, the philosophy of Greece, and other applied sciences. Islamic thought was influenced by them, and it received them with what was translated from them into Arabic, and it reflected on it good and bad.

The Caliph al-Manṣūr was the first to focus on this transmission, followed by his grandson al-Rashīd, and then al-Ma'mūn, who established a center for translation called "Dār al-Ḥikmah" (House of Wisdom). It became famous for the ancient books it acquired, especially those written in Greek, Syriac, and Coptic. He assigned translators from all specializations: medicine, engineering, astronomy (astrology), pharmacology, and others. This phenomenon had a positive effect, evident in the flourishing of pure and applied sciences such as medicine, mathematics, engineering, astronomy, and chemistry. However, it also had a profoundly negative impact due to the introduction of philosophy and logic into Sharī'ah studies. This led to the emergence of what became known as "Ilm al-Kalām" (theology), which infiltrated the science of creed and Tawḥīd, and produced deviant and misguided theological schools such as the Jahmiyyah, the Qadariyyah, and others. At the forefront of these was the Mu'tazilah school, which summarized its approach as the prioritization of reason over the textual sources of the Sharī'ah - the Qur'ān and the Sunnah. This sparked the crisis of the "createdness of the Qur'ān" (fitnat khalq al-Qur'ān), which crushed scholars and commoners alike during the days of al-Ma'mūn, al-Mu'taṣim, and al-Wāthiq. The remnants of this deviant school persist to this day, as most of those called Islamic thinkers, and symbols of the Islamic awakening, belong to it. Some of them are unaware!

One of the hallmarks of civilization that distinguished the Abbasid era was the development of social life. The integration of Arabs with mawālī, most of whom were Persians, led to the emergence of a class of muwalladīn, which brought about a transformation in family and social life.

In the ruling family, the wives of the Caliphs, and the wives of senior ministers and princes, who were called mothers of the children – these being the concubines who were married after being freed – often took precedence over free Arab women. They gained favor with their husbands, and their sons enjoyed a status with their fathers that the sons of free women did not. The Abbasid Caliphs set an example in this regard.

If we exclude Abū al-'Abbās al-Saffāḥ, Muḥammad al-Mahdī ibn al-Manṣūr, and Muḥammad al-Amīn ibn al-Rashīd, all the Abbasid Caliphs were born of concubines and favored slave-girls!

Their Persian, Turkish, Roman, and Berber mothers had the final say in choosing the crown princes. The favored wife of the Caliph would impose her son to succeed his father and compel him to designate him as heir. This led to disputes among the sons, resulting in bloody conflicts, as happened between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn, and as occurred with al-Mutawakkil. He designated his son Muḥammad (al-Muntaṣir), who was the son of a slave-girl, as heir. Al-Muntaṣir's Mother was called Ḥabashiyyah. Al-Mu'tazz's mother, who was also a slave-girl and called Ṣabīḥah competed with her. Therefore, they nicknamed al-Mu'tazz's mother Qabīḥah (Ugly) and made al-

Mutawakkil determined to advance his son to the position of crown prince over his brother Muḥammad (al-Muntaṣir). When al-Muntasir learned of his father's plan, he conspired with the Turkish commanders to assassinate him, and they killed him.

The dominance of the Persian element since the days of al-Ma'mūn, whose maternal uncles were Persian, and then the Turkish element since the days of al-Mu'taṣim, whose maternal uncles were Turks. Likewise, Persian traditions infiltrated social life. Persian fashions appeared at court, and the protocols followed in the palaces of the Persians were established in the palaces of the Caliphs. Persian festivals such as Mihrajān, Nowrūz, Rām, and other festivals were celebrated.

Thus, the muwalladūn dominated and their control over the reins of the state became prominent, leading to the decline of the pure Arab element and its retreat to the desert from which it had emerged. The obligatory Jihād al-ṭalab (offensive Jihad) ceased, and with it, the borders of the Islamic state stopped at the limits reached by the Umayyad state. That elite was no longer as Allāh described them in His saying:

{You are the best nation produced [as an example] for mankind. You enjoin what is right and forbid what is wrong and believe in Allāh} (Āl 'Imrān: 110).

The Phenomenon of 'Ulamā' al-Sulṭān (Scholars of the Ruler) in the Early Abbasid Era

The Abbasid Caliphs – as was the practice of the Umayyad Caliphs – tried to win over the jurists and religious men to support their rule among the common people. The phenomenon of 'Ulamā' al-Sulṭān became more prominent, until Ibn Abī Du'ād appeared during the days of al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'taṣim, and one of his followers went so far as to advise al-Mu'taṣim to kill Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, saying to him, "Kill him, O Imām, and his blood is on my neck!"

But in those days, there were scholars of truth who stood up to the injustice of those rulers and refused to be mere "decorations" in their entourage, as was the case with the four Imāms and other prominent figures like Sufyān al-Thawrī, al-Awzā'ī, and many others. These scholars also stood up to the hypocrites from among the palace scholars.

Most of the scholars refrained from approaching the doors of the sultans, considering them doors of fitnah in religion and gateways to perdition in the Hereafter. Their biographies recorded the brightest examples of steadfastness during that time.

The Most Important Issues and Problems Faced by the Abbasid State in that Phase

The Abbasid state faced several issues and problems in its first half (132-250 AH), the most important of which were:

The Succession:

The method used to choose crown princes led to the division of the Abbasid house and the sowing of enmity and hatred among its members. Al-Manṣūr took the succession from his nephew 'Īsā ibn Mūsā and transferred it to his son al-Mahdī. Al-Mahdī threatened to kill his father if he appointed his brother Ja'far over him.

Al-Hādī wanted to remove his brother al-Rashīd from the succession and transfer it to his son Ja'far, but he was killed before he could do so.

Al-Amīn removed his brother al-Ma'mūn and appointed his minor son Mūsā as crown prince. Al-Ma'mūn deposed him and fought him, and al-Amīn's life ended with his death.

Al-‘Abbās ibn al-Ma’mūn conspired to kill his uncle al-Mu‘taṣim to seize the Caliphate from him, so al-Mu‘taṣim killed him.

Al-Muntaṣir conspired to kill his father al-Mutawakkil because he wanted to appoint his brother al-Mu‘tazz over him.

Thus, the succession was one of the reasons for the disintegration of the Abbasid house, as it had been before for the Umayyad house.

The Phenomenon of Shu‘ūbiyyah Bias:

Shu‘ūbiyyah is derived from "Shu‘ūb" (peoples), referring to the nations whose lands were conquered by the Muslim Arabs and who entered Islam and became known as mawālī, meaning that they were connected to the Arabs by the bond of walā’ (allegiance).

Islam abolished class and national distinctions and made them brothers, their brotherhood based on the bond of faith. In this regard, Allāh says: {The believers are but brothers}. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) equated mawālī with Arabs, saying: "There is no superiority of an Arab over a non-Arab except by piety."

When the Umayyads assumed the Caliphate, they revived the Arab tribalism that had prevailed during the Jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic era) and distinguished between Arabs and non-Arabs. The mawālā was of a lower rank than the Arab in social status, and they were below the Arabs in fay’ (booty) and ‘aṭā’ (stipends). Their governors even imposed the jizyah on their heads and the kharāj on their lands after their conversion to Islam!

This violation of the principle of equality led to their resentment, and they supported the Abbasid call and were the Abbasids' helpers in establishing their state.

The Abbasid Caliphs acknowledged their favor and rewarded them by appointing them to high positions. The Barmakid family was the first to advance in the Abbasid state, since the time of Abū al-‘Abbās al-Saffāh. They held positions as ministers, governors, and scribes.

During the reign of al-Rashīd, their star shone, and they took over the reins of power in the state. During their time, the Shu‘ūbīs became active, taking shelter under their protection, and their scribes and poets began to praise the glories of the Persians. In the era of al-Ma’mūn, the Banū Sahl and Banū Ṭāhir – who before their conversion to Islam were among the nobles and Magians of Persia – replaced the Barmakids after their downfall. Al-Faḍl ibn Sahl and then his brother al-Ḥasan ibn Sahl were al-Ma’mūn's ministers, managing his affairs and planning his policies. Ṭāhir ibn al-Ḥusayn and his sons were the commanders of his armies, and by their power, he rose to the Caliphate after they killed his brother al-Amīn. The Shu‘ūbiyyah flourished and were no longer limited to praising the Persians and glorifying their past but went beyond that to denigrate the Arabs, spread their flaws, and ridicule their traditions.

During al-Ma’mūn's reign, Shu‘ūbī writers and poets engaged in praising the Persians and denigrating the Arabs.

The Shu‘ūbīs were not content with criticizing the Arabs' nature and social life, but went beyond that to belittle their culture and status, and praised non-Arab cultures. They disregarded the great development that had occurred in the history of the Arabs in social and intellectual aspects, even interpreting some verses of the Qur’ān to imply the superiority of non-Arabs over Arabs.

Arab writers and poets responded to the Shu‘ūbīs and refuted what was said about the Arabs' flaws by highlighting their merits and virtues, such as generosity, courage, chivalry, and eloquence. They also pointed out that they were honored by God by choosing the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) from among them, revealing the Holy Qur'ān in their language, and that through their religion, people were guided and brought out of darkness into light. That conflict was one of the aspects of social structure.

Zindīq Movements

The term Zindīq – in Persian, "Zand Karay" – refers to a heretic who does not believe in the oneness of God or the Day of Judgment. Zandaqah (Zoroastrian heresy) became widespread in Persia and was applied to those who remained adherents of the teachings of Mazdak and Mani, which called for the worship of two gods: the god of light and the god of darkness. They permitted what Islam had forbidden, and were influenced by Indian beliefs that advocate reincarnation and incarnation. They then cloaked themselves in the guise of Shi'ism and began to resist Islam, aiming to achieve two goals:

1. To overthrow Arab rule.
2. To corrupt the creed of Muslims.

As for the overthrow, it took place in two ways, one of which was political, facilitated by the proximity of Persian elements and their participation in the power of the Abbasid Caliph, sometimes even independently with his delegation. These elements dreamed of restoring their lost glory and encouraged Zindīq and Shu'ūbī movements, hiding their dreams by complying with the Caliphs' desires, fulfilling their lusts, and showing loyalty to them. Among these were Abū Muslim al-Khurāsānī, then the Barmakids, then the Āl Sahl and Āl Ṭāhir.

As for the second method, it involved defying the Caliph's authority and openly revolting against him, such as the rebellions of the Rāwandiyyah, the Khurramiyyah, the Bābakiyyah, and others.

The second goal of Zandaqah was to corrupt the creed of Muslims under the banner of Shi'ism. Through this, the pre-Islamic Persian beliefs and religions infiltrated, deceiving young people with what Mani had called for: seeking pleasure by permitting the consumption of alcohol and engaging in forbidden sexual relations, including with sisters and daughters.

Caliph al-Manṣūr began pursuing the Zanādiqah and killing those against whom evidence was established. Al-Mahdī intensified the pursuit, offering them repentance. Those who repented were released, and those who refused were killed. He advised his son Mūsā (al-Hādī) to do the same. Al-Rashīd followed the example of his father and brother, pursuing the Zanādiqah and punishing those proven to be Zindīqs. As for al-Ma'mūn, if he heard of a Zindīq, he would order him brought to his assembly, where a group of mutakallimūn (theologians) – Mu'tazilites – would debate him, hoping to convince him and bring him back to Islam. Al-Ma'mūn would participate in the debate. If the Zindīq persisted in his error, he would be ordered killed.

Al-Mu'taṣim did the same and killed his commander al-Afshīn after his trial and the confirmation of his Zandaqah.

The Issue of the Createdness of the Qur'ān:

As mentioned earlier, interaction with Greek philosophy and openness to the cultures of other conquered Persian and Eastern countries led to the introduction of aberrant ideas among some who mixed them with the sciences of Sharī'ah, particularly in the field of creed. This resulted in deviant schools, the most influential of which during that period was the so-called Mu'tazilah school. They made reason – according to their flawed understanding – a judge over the definitive textual sources of Sharī'ah: the Qur'ān and the Sunnah! Some of the Imāms of that school became close to Caliph al-Ma'mūn and convinced him of their doctrine. Towards the end of his Caliphate, the Mu'tazilah, and their leader, innovated the issue of the createdness of the Qur'ān, which the Imāms of Ahl al-Sunnah, led by Imām Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, opposed as misguidance.

Towards the end of his reign, al-Ma'mūn compelled the jurists to adopt this view. In the year 218 AH, al-Ma'mūn went to war against the Romans and appointed Ishāq ibn Ibrāhīm al-Muṣ'abī, the cousin of Ṭāhir ibn al-Ḥusayn, as his deputy in Baghdad. When he reached the city of Ṭarsūs, he wrote to his deputy, ordering him to summon the jurists and ask them about their opinion on the createdness of the Qur'ān. Those who said it was created were to be released, and those who said otherwise were not to be employed in any capacity, their testimony was to be rejected, and they were to be prevented from narrating the Ḥadīth of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and from issuing fatwas. If they persisted after that, they were to be shackled in iron and sent to him in Ṭarsūs. Imām Ibn Ḥanbal was brought to him in chains, and he prayed to his Lord on the way not to be brought before al-Ma'mūn. News of al-Ma'mūn's death on the road reached them, and Ibn Ḥanbal was returned to Baghdad.

Al-Ma'mūn had designated his brother al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh as his successor and advised him to continue testing the jurists. He followed al-Ma'mūn's path and wrote to the provinces accordingly. He ordered teachers to teach children that the Qur'ān was created. The people suffered great hardship and injustice from him. He killed many scholars and had Imām Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal beaten and tortured in his presence.

Then al-Mu'taṣim advised his son al-Wāthiq to test the scholars. He followed his father and his path in testing them and killed the muḥaddith Aḥmad ibn Naṣr al-Khuzā'ī because he did not affirm the createdness of the Qur'ān and sought to rebel against al-Wāthiq. When the prisoner exchange between the Muslims and the Romans took place in the year 231 AH, he ordered that only those Muslim prisoners who affirmed the createdness of the Qur'ān be ransomed. Those who refused were left in the hands of the Romans.

Al-Wāthiq ordered the testing of the people of the frontier regions. They all affirmed its createdness except for four men. Al-Wāthiq ordered that their necks be struck if they did not affirm the createdness of the Qur'ān. They refused, and their necks were struck. When al-Mutawakkil assumed the Caliphate, he abolished the saying of the createdness of the Qur'ān. Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal emerged from his house after having remained there throughout the reigns of al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq. Al-Mutawakkil honored him, became angry with Aḥmad ibn Abī Du'ād, dismissed him, confiscated his wealth, and imprisoned him with his sons and brothers. He was afflicted with paralysis and died.

A Life of Luxury and the Beginning of the Dissolution of Religious Values

This new lifestyle led to a relaxation of Islamic morals. Entertainment, debauchery, and frivolity became characteristic of many people of that era. History books are filled with stories of what transpired in the palaces of the Caliphs and the elite, stories that almost border on fantasy, which are too long to mention and unnecessary to elaborate on here. I believe that many of these tales were fabricated by storytellers, writers, and narrators. But the truth is that all these exaggerations have a basis.

This luxury and the reasons for decline mentioned above were the undermining factor that eroded the roots of the Islamic Caliphate, transforming it in the subsequent Abbasid era into a position manipulated by commanders and Mamluks.

The Second Abbasid Era

This period extends from the Caliphate of al-Muntaṣir, who killed his father al-Mutawakkil in conspiracy with the Turkish commanders, to the Caliphate of al-Muqtadī bi-Allāh, whose Caliphate witnessed the beginning of the Crusades on the coasts of the Levant and the beginning of the Tatar movement in the east of the Caliphate on the borders of Transoxiana.

Characteristics of the Second Abbasid Era:

The Domination of Overpowering Commanders over the Caliphate:

The Turkish commanders' killing of Caliph al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh on the fifteenth of Shawwāl in the year 247 AH is considered the beginning of the second Abbasid era. In this era, the commanders usurped power, and the Caliph became subject to their will and captive to their whims. The fate of the Caliphate was in their hands. They deposed whomever they wished and killed them, and they compelled whomever they wished to abdicate, blinding them and confiscating their wealth. When Caliph Aḥmad al-Musta'īn bi-Allāh, the first Caliph to be deposed, was deposed, he was soon killed after his deposition.

When the Buyids seized power after the Turks, they followed their approach. The Buyid prince would appoint whomever he wished to the Caliphate and depose whomever he wished, and the deposition often occurred with humiliation and disgrace.

The deposition of the Caliph was a day of celebration for the soldiers, as it involved the looting of the Caliphate's palace and the soldiers demanding from the new Caliph a payment for their "pledge of allegiance" (bay'ah). The deposed Caliph would receive an allowance that might not be sufficient for him, forcing him to beg and seek charity from people, as happened to Caliph al-Qāhir bi-Allāh after his deposition, the confiscation of his wealth, and his blinding. He would go out to the Jāmi' al-Manṣūr and beg from the worshipers, saying, "Give charity to me, for I am the one you know." This was after he had dug trenches in his palace and filled them with gold and silver! Glory be to the Owner of the Kingdom [of the world]!

From the Caliphate of al-Muntaṣir bi-Allāh in the year 248 AH to the Caliphate of al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh in the year 487 AH, a period of 239 years, seventeen Caliphs succeeded to the throne. Four of them were killed: al-Mustaʿīn bi-Allāh, al-Muʿtazz bi-Allāh, al-Muhtadī bi-Allāh, and al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh. Three of them were deposed and blinded: al-Qāhir bi-Allāh, al-Muttaqī li-Allāh, and al-Mustakfī bi-Allāh. Two of them were forced to abdicate: al-Muṭṭiʿ and al-Ṭāʾiʿ. There are two Caliphs about whom some narrations say were killed by poison: al-Muʿtamid ʿalā Allāh and al-Muʿtaḍid bi-Allāh. Thus, the total number of those killed, deposed, and died by poison is ten Caliphs out of seventeen!

Dismissal and Confiscation of Ministers

The situation of the ministers was no better than that of the Caliphs. The minister would act on the orders of the dominant powers. If they became angry with him, they would dismiss him, confiscate his wealth, and perhaps even kill him, as happened to Minister Aḥmad ibn Isrāʾīl and his scribe ʿĪsā ibn Nūḥ. The Turkish commander Ṣāliḥ ibn Waṣīf confiscated their wealth and killed them by flogging. Similar, or even worse, happened to many ministers.

Often, a minister would be appointed and then dismissed, and his appointment and dismissal would be repeated several times with only a short period in between. His dismissal often ended with the confiscation of his wealth and his death. Nevertheless, many people aspired to the position of minister and spent money to attain it!

This was because the ministry was a source of immense wealth through bribes. For example, Muḥammad ibn ʿUbayd Allāh ibn Khāqān, the minister of al-Muʿtaḍid bi-Allāh, used to take bribes from every applicant for a position. He might appoint several people to the same position. It is said that he appointed nineteen supervisors for Kūfah in one day and took a bribe from each one. The most important of these were guaranteeing the kharāj and appointing governors, officials, judges, and scribes.

The minister would receive levies from those he appointed, from which he would make a substantial profit and become immensely wealthy.

For this reason, the ministry was a target for conspiracies by those who envied the minister and coveted his position. If the conspiracy against the minister succeeded, he would be dismissed and his wealth confiscated. What was confiscated was estimated to be thousands upon thousands of dinars. Nevertheless, he might retain much of what he had hidden in a pit or concealed in a remote place.

The Invention of Titles and Epithets

When the Caliphate passed to the Banū al-‘Abbās, they added to this title epithets indicating a characteristic of the Caliph. ‘Abd Allāh Abū al-‘Abbās, the first Abbasid Caliph, was known by the title "al-Saffāḥ" (the Shedder of Blood). His brother ‘Abd Allāh Abū Ja‘far was given the title "al-Manṣūr" (the Victorious). His son Muḥammad was subsequently given the title "al-Mahdī" (the Guided One). After him, his two sons, Mūsā and Hārūn, were given the titles Mūsā "al-Hādī" (the Guide) and Hārūn "al-Rashīd" (the Rightly Guided). Al-Rashīd gave his three sons, Muḥammad, ‘Abd Allāh, and al-Qāsim, the titles Muḥammad "al-Amīn" (the Trustworthy), ‘Abd Allāh "al-Ma’mūn" (the Trusted One), and al-Qāsim "al-Mu’taman" (the Entrusted One).

When Muḥammad ibn al-Rashīd succeeded his brother al-Ma’mūn to the Caliphate, he innovated a title, adding it to the name of God, and took the title Muḥammad "al-Mu’taṣim bi-Allāh" (the One Who Seeks Refuge in God). The Caliphs after him followed his example, and the Caliph became known by his title.

When the Turkish commanders usurped power, the Caliph granted the title of "Amīr al-Umarā’" (Commander of Commanders) to the one who held power among them, as well as titles such as "Mu‘izz al-Dawlah" (Strengtheners of the State), "Imād al-Dawlah" (Pillar of the State), "Rukn al-Dawlah" (Cornerstone of the State), "Aḍud al-Dawlah" (Support of the State), "Jalāl al-Dawlah" (Majesty of the State), "Bahā' al-Dawlah" (Splendor of the State), and "Fakhr al-Dawlah" (Pride of the State).

The Banū Buwayh were not content with these titles but added to them the title of "Sultān" (Sultan). Some of them took the title of "Shāhanshāh" (King of Kings), which the scholars declared forbidden. These titles then spread to the independent rulers of the provinces. Among the Ḥamdānids in Mosul and Aleppo were "Nāṣir al-Dawlah" (Helper of the State), "Sayf al-Dawlah" (Sword of the State), and "Shibl al-Dawlah" (Lion Cub of the State). They were followed by the rulers of Banū 'Uqayl in the Jazīrah, the Ikhshīdīd kings in Egypt, and the Sultans of Ghazna, among whom were "Nāṣir al-Dawlah" Sabuktigin, "Yamīn al-Dawlah" Maḥmūd, "Shihāb al-Dawlah" (Star of the State), "Jamāl al-Dawlah" (Beauty of the State), and "Kamāl al-Dawlah" (Perfection of the State). To these titles were also added epithets such as "Abū al-Faḍā'il" (Father of Virtues), "Abū al-Ma'ālī" (Father of Excellencies), and the like.

In the second Abbasid era, epithets and titles became a source of revenue for the Caliphs, especially after the funds of the Bayt al-Māl (treasury) were removed from their control during the reign of Mu'izz al-Dawlah al-Buwayhī. Some Caliphs would sell titles to those who requested them!

Injustices of the Kharāj Officials

Kharāj included the tax on the produce of the land, such as fruits and crops. It was collected, along with the collection of other state revenues, by officials called "ummāl al-kharāj" (kharāj officials). They enjoyed great power and were known for their injustice and oppression. They would collect many times what they had guaranteed to pay to the state.

Historians have narrated the injustices that took place at their hands and the types of torture inflicted upon those liable to pay.

They would do the same with those who inherited a large inheritance. They would work to seize the inheritance or share in it. If the heir refused, they would imprison him and torture him until they obtained what they wanted.

The kharāj officials amassed great wealth from what they collected. They owned estates, built houses and palaces, and held gatherings of entertainment, music, and drinking. Poets would come to them, seeking to earn a living by praising them.

The minister might, along with his ministry, guarantee the kharāj. He would then collect a large amount of money through his authority, pay some of it to the Bayt al-Māl, and keep the rest for himself.

Confiscation of Wealth:

Confiscation was not limited to the wealth of deposed Caliphs or dismissed ministers and officials but also included the wealth of the people, especially merchants. If the Abbasid Caliph or the Buyid Sultan needed money, he would order the confiscation of merchants' wealth.

Corruption of the Judiciary:

The judiciary was the tool that guaranteed the safety and security of society by spreading justice and equality among its members. The judge is required to be knowledgeable in the rulings of Sharīʿah, observant of its objectives, and diligent in its application. He must be chaste, not greedy for wealth, not impressed by prestige, and not obedient to authority in anything other than what God has commanded.

The judge would receive his sustenance from the Bayt al-Māl within the limits of his needs, and some would be scrupulous and judge without pay. Some jurists considered judging a trial and tribulation, so they refused to take it on, fearing that they might issue a judgment based on injustice or inflict harm on someone, thus incurring a loss for which God would hold them accountable. In the Ḥadīth of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him): “One judge is in Paradise, and two judges are in Hellfire.” They fear being one of the two judges.

Here was Abū Ḥanīfah, whom the Abbasid Caliph al-Manṣūr wanted to appoint as a judge, but he refused. Al-Manṣūr ordered him to be flogged and then imprisoned. It is said that he died in prison. And here is Sufyān al-Thawrī, to whom Caliph al-Mahdī wrote, appointing him as judge of Kūfah on the condition that no one interfere with his judgments. He took the covenant, threw it into the Tigris, and then went into hiding. The same was done by Ismā‘īl ibn Ibrāhīm al-Asadī, known as Ibn ‘Ulayyah, ‘Abd Allāh ibn Wahb, and many others who were wary of taking on the judiciary and refused to accept it.

This was the state of the judiciary in the past, until the second Abbasid era came. The judiciary was affected by the corruption of the era and became a means of earning a living! Those who were not qualified ascended to it. During the reign of Caliph al-Muqtadir, his minister Abū al-Ḥasan ibn al-Furāt appointed a merchant who had done him a favor as a judge.

A period followed during which judging was guaranteed in exchange for bribes and large sums of money! In the year 350 AH, Sultan Mu‘izz al-Dawlah al-Buwayhī guaranteed the judgeship of Baghdad to Abū ‘Abd Allāh ibn Abī al-Shawārib, along with the position of Chief Judge, in exchange for two hundred thousand dirhams to be paid annually to the Sultan's treasury.

Guaranteeing the judgeship was a means of bribery, and it seems that it was familiar to some of the sons of Abū al-Shawārib, most of whom held the position of judge. Ibn Kathīr narrated that Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn Abī al-Shawārib, the judge of Baghdad, was accused of taking bribes in judgments and appointments. However, most of the members of this family held the position of judge and were very knowledgeable and pious, but corruption spread to few of them. The corruption of the judiciary, as the author of al-Muntaẓim says, was the first thing to unravel from the state's administration.

Muḥammad ibn Sa'd al-Zuhri, who died in the year 230 AH, provided a comparison between the judges of early Islam and the judges of his time, saying: "Two men would argue in Medina in the early days, and one of us would say to the other, 'You are more bankrupt than the judge.' The judges of today have become governors, tyrants, kings, owners of estates, properties, businesses, and wealth!"

Internal Strife and Conflicts

a) Sectarian Strife

Strife arose between the Shiites and the Sunnis, especially the Ḥanbalīs, with Baghdad as their stage. It began in the early fourth century AH and extended to the late fifth century AH. Strife recurred year after year, often intensifying, leading to bitter fighting accompanied by fires and destruction.

The Āl Buwayh supported the Shiites because of their Shi'ism, and the Turks supported the Sunnis because of their adherence to their school of thought. Preachers from both sides would stir up feelings of animosity between the two groups and incite them against each other. The level of absurdity in one year – as mentioned in the history of Ibn Kathīr – reached the point where ignorant and rabble-rousing people attributed to the Sunnis brought out a camel, symbolizing the camel of the Battle of the Camel, and marched behind it. The Shiites raised their banners and openly cursed the Companions! People fought until the markets and life were disrupted, and evil spread in Baghdad!

Similarly, strife sometimes arose even among the Sunnis, between the Ḥanbalīs and the Ash'arites, and between the Ḥanafis and the Shāfi'īs. The followers of each madhhab were fanatical about their madhhab, and this fanaticism led them to fight each other. In the year 469 AH, Abū Naṣr al-Qushayrī came to Baghdad and preached at the Nizāmiyyah Madrasah, supporting the Ash‘arites and attacking the Ḥanbalīs. The common people and youth of Ahl al-Sunnah became agitated and headed for the Nizāmiyyah Madrasah. The fitnah escalated, and a group of them were killed. Strife broke out in the year 476 AH between the two groups, followed by other instances of strife that erupted from time to time and extended to the end of the sixth century AH.

Strife also arose between the Ḥanafīs and the Shāfi‘īs, both of whom are from Ahl al-Sunnah. In the year 468 AH, a major fitnah broke out between them due to the conversion of an Imām from the Imāms of the Ḥanafīs to the Shāfi‘ī madhhab. Al-Subkī narrated that Imām Abū al-Muẓaffar Maṣṣūr ibn Aḥmad ibn ‘Abd al-Jabbār, known as Ibn al-Sam‘ānī al-Khurāsānī, converted from the Ḥanafī madhhab, in which he had debated for thirty years, to the Shāfi‘ī madhhab. War broke out between the followers of the two madhhabs, and fitnah raged between them, almost filling the area between Khorasan and Iraq.

Yāqūt, in his Mu‘jam (Geographical Dictionary), describes the devastation that befell some cities in the aftermath of the strife that erupted between the followers of the two madhhabs. When he mentions the city of Isfahan, he says: "Devastation has spread in its surroundings due to the frequent strife and fanaticism between the Ḥanafīs and the Shāfi‘īs, and the continuous wars between the two parties. Whenever one group appeared, it plundered the other..." Similar events occurred in other cities such as Rayy and Sāwah.

Imām al-Subkī narrated that Mas‘ūd ibn ‘Alī, the minister of Khwārazm Shāh, the ruler of Khwārazm, was fanatical about the Shāfi‘īs. He built a mosque in the city of Marw. The people of the city, who were Ḥanafīs, became fanatical against him and burned the mosque. A huge fitnah erupted, in which heads almost flew off shoulders.

b) Soldiers' Strife

The army was mostly composed of Turks and Daylamites. They often rioted against the Caliph due to delays in their payments. Their riots often led to the deposition of the Caliph, hoping for the bay'ah payment from his successor. Their riots could also turn against the people, triggering a fitnah with many casualties.

In the year 421 AH, people became weary of the aggression of the Turkish soldiers, and the state was unable to deter them due to its weakness and humiliation. The Hashimites, the Alawites, and the jurists gathered and mobilized the people to repel the Turks. The Turks resorted to raising the cross on a spear!! Challenging the state thereby. The two sides exchanged arrows and bricks, and a group of people were killed.

In the year 429 AH, people complained about the aggression of the Daylamites, their breaking into homes, and their harassment of women. The Buyid Sultan did not listen to their complaints, so they engaged in bitter fighting with the Daylamites. The 'ayyārūn (vagabonds) took advantage of the people's preoccupation with the fighting and raided homes and warehouses. Thieves stormed Baghdad and took whatever horses they found.

c) Strife of the 'Ayyārūn and Shuṭṭār (Thieves, Robbers, and Vagabonds)

The 'ayyārūn and shuṭṭār played a significant role in the strife. They formed organized groups, led by a leader called "Muqaddam al-'Ayyārīn" (Leader of the Vagabonds), who provided them with weapons, training, and direction. These groups included people from various backgrounds and a mix of the poor, including Sunnis and Shiites, Hashimites and Alawites, Arabs, Kurds, and non-Arabs. Their groups would seize the opportunity when people were preoccupied with the strife that erupted and raid the homes of the wealthy. They often overpowered and defeated the police. Their power reached the point where they imposed the khuṭbah for their leader in the Friday prayer on one occasion!

In the year 424 AH, a group of them gathered in Ruṣāfah in Baghdad and forced the khaṭīb to deliver the khuṭbah for al-Barjamī (the leader of the ‘ayyārūn) along with his khuṭbah for the Caliph and the Sultan! They would impose levies on business owners and might even take over security! Their leaders took the title of commanders. Their actions had the appearance of a revolution against the corrupt rule. Al-Barjamī, and after him al-Ṭaḡṭaḡī, adhered to the meanings of revolution and the ways of the ṣa‘ālīk (outlaws) in resisting a rule characterized by chaos, rampant looting of wealth, a disrupted balance of justice, and widespread bribery.

The conduct of these robbers was marked by chivalry! None of their associates was allowed to assault a woman or take anything from her, nor to harm ordinary people and the poor.

However, groups that took the name of ‘ayyārūn were closer to thieves and robbers, and among them were immoral individuals and pimps. They would commit their aggression against people, and no one would condemn them because a commander of the Daylamite commanders named Abū Ja‘far ibn Shīrẓād allowed them to do it for twenty-five thousand dinars that they paid him every month!

Revolutions

Between the years 255 and 366 AH, during the second Abbasid era, more than fifty revolutions erupted. Some were revolutions against the rule, and some were uprisings against the rulers, the Caliph and the Sultan.

The two most dangerous revolutions in terms of their causes and consequences were: a revolution known as the Zanj Rebellion and the Qarmatian Rebellion.

a) The Zanj Rebellion:

The Zanj had previously revolted in the year 71 AH and then in the year 76 AH due to the spread of aberrant ideas among them, the presence of false leaders, and the oppression they suffered from landowners who had brought them from East Africa to reclaim their lands. Al-Ḥajjāj, the governor of Iraq, suppressed both rebellions.

Then a massive rebellion erupted during the reign of Caliph al-Muʿtazz bi-Allāh. It was led by a Persian man who called himself Muḥammad ibn ʿAlī and claimed to be of Alawite descent. Narrations say that he came from Ahwāz in the year 255 AH and settled in an area in southern Iraq where African Zanj were reclaiming the land. They were suffering bitter oppression from the landowners. This man infiltrated them, claimed to be from the family of the Prophet, and called on them to follow him to liberate them from slavery and save them from the torment of their masters. He began to show them, with his intelligence and cunning, acts that involved a lot of charlatanry and to tell them news that he claimed was from the unseen.

He based his call on the call of the Kharijites, which is equality among Muslims. The Arabs who lived in the deserts of Basra and were accustomed to raiding villages and intercepting pilgrim caravans, looting and plundering, due to the harshness of life, responded to him. He enticed them with what the poor, whose hearts had become devoid of faith and whose creed had weakened, desired. He permitted them the communism of wealth and women, which is the doctrine of Mazdak the Persian. They gathered around him, believing in his call.

The person leading this call, organizing these vast crowds, became known as Ṣāḥib al-Zanj (Master of the Zanj) because the majority of his followers were from them and because they were the first to respond to his call. He took control of Bahrain and al-Aḥsāʾ, then headed towards Basra. In Shawwāl of the year 257 AH, he raided that city while it was unaware. He attacked it with his forces, and his followers engaged in looting, plundering, killing, and burning. Only those who fled and wandered aimlessly seeking salvation survived.

Those who remained in the city took refuge in the Grand Mosque, thinking that they would be safe there. However, the rebels soon raided the mosque and killed those who had taken refuge there. Then they stormed the houses, killed children, and captured women, many of whom were women of noble lineage. The captors divided them among themselves. Whoever received a woman in his share used her, committed fornication with her, and then sold her.

Then they burned Basra, leaving its landmarks in ruins. After the destruction of Basra, Ṣāhib al-Zanj headed with his followers to Ahwāz and defeated the campaigns that Caliph al-Mu'tamid 'alā Allāh sent to fight him.

After that, he headed for Wāsiṭ and intended to go to Baghdad, but the Caliph gathered a large army led by his brother al-Muwaffaq bi-Allāh. He defeated Ṣāhib al-Zanj after bitter fighting and was able to kill him and put an end to the fitnah he had stirred up, which lasted for fifteen years (255-270 AH).

b) The Qarmatian Rebellion:

The Zanj Rebellion had barely ended when another revolution erupted, an extension of it and advocating its slogan of resisting injustice, declaring the principle of equality among people to conceal the underlying Zandaqah it contained. It became known as the Qarmatian Rebellion. This name is attributed to a Persian man known by the title "Qarmaṭ". It is said that his name was Ḥamdān al-Ash'ath. He was one of the missionaries of the Ismā'īlī Imām whom 'Abd Allāh ibn Maymūn al-Qaddāh had sent to various regions.

When the Zanj Rebellion was crushed in the year 270 AH, its remnants gathered around him. He began as Ṣāhib al-Zanj had begun, by displaying asceticism, piety, and scrupulousness, thus attracting people's hearts. He concealed a political goal behind this behavior. He called for a doctrine that was a mixture of Persian Mazdakism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. He made the prayer four rak'ahs, two rak'ahs before sunrise and two rak'ahs after sunset. He made the qiblah and pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He made fasting two days a year, the days of Mihrajān and Nowrūz. He changed the adhān. He imposed jizyah on those who opposed him and permitted killing them if possible. He began interpreting verses of the Qur'ān with interpretation, claiming that its verses and rulings had an inner interpretation that explained its apparent meaning. Hence, their doctrine became known as Bāṭiniyyah.

Qarmaṭ's followers increased in number. They established a state for themselves in al-Qaṭīf, Bahrain, and Yemen. They led wars in Iraq, aiming to seize the Caliphate. They disputed with the Fatimids for the leadership of the Shiite call. They attacked their bases in the Levant and intended to attack Cairo, but the Fatimids were able to repel them.

In the year 317 AH, they raided Mecca, removed the Black Stone, killed the pilgrims, and carried the Black Stone to al-Qaṭīf, the capital of their kingdom. They returned it in the year 239 AH in exchange for allowing them to impose a tax on the pilgrims.

By examining the causes that triggered the Zanj Rebellion, then the Qarmatian Rebellion, and contemplating their consequences, we find that they stem from two distinct and parallel reasons.

The first is the exploitation of the ignorance of the common people by the leaders of the revolution to strip them of the Islamic creed, by leaders who carry the remnants of their previous religions, which they are still influenced by.

The second reason is the exploitation of the discontent and hardship caused by the tyranny of the governors and the burden of the kharāj officials, in addition to the misery of the poor who suffer from hunger, unemployment, and deprivation. These people were with every call for liberation from the injustice they faced and the hardship they endured.

The leaders of the revolution chose southern Iraq and the adjacent areas because of their distance from Baghdad and the state's inability to track down the rebels.

The Division of the Abbasid State Between the Central Caliphate and the Overpowering Rulers

The state in the days of the Banū Umayyah was a comprehensive unit extending from its east, from Mesopotamia and the borders of China and India, to its west in the Maghreb and Andalusia. Its provinces were governed by governors appointed by the Caliph of Damascus, to whom they referred in their important matters, implementing his policy and ruling by his authority. When the Caliphate passed to the Banū al-‘Abbās, some provinces became independent with their delegation, and others became independent by overpowering them.

During the reign of Abū Ja‘far al-Manṣūr, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Mu‘āwiyah ibn Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Malik seized control of Andalusia in the year 138 AH, became independent, ended Abbasid rule, and restored rule to the Banū Umayyah.

Also during al-Manṣūr's reign, Idrīs ibn Muḥammad (al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah), a descendant of al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, established the Idrisid state in the Maghreb in the year 172 AH.

In 140 AH, the Midrarid state was established in the Maghreb. They were from the Ṣufri Kharijites.

In 162 AH, the Rustamid state was established in Tahert (Algeria). They were from the Ibāḍī Kharijites.

In the year 184 AH, Ibrāhīm ibn al-Aghlab, with the delegation of Caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd, established the Aghlabid state in the Near Maghreb (Tunisia).

In the year 205 AH, Ṭāhir ibn al-Ḥusayn, with the delegation of al-Ma'mūn, established the Tahirid state in Khorasan as a reward for his support against al-Amīn.

These four provinces separated from the Abbasid state, became independent, and ruled by inheritance. However, the separation of some of them differed from the separation of others. In the state of Banū Umayyah in Andalusia and in the Idrisid state in the Maghreb, the connection with the Abbasid Caliphate was severed. As for the Tahirid state and the Aghlabid state, the connection was not severed, but they remained loyal and subservient.

In the second Abbasid era, the phenomenon increased, and the following provinces separated from the Caliphate:

In the year 254 AH, Egypt and the Levant separated, and the Tulunid state was established there, founded by Aḥmad ibn Ṭūlūn.

In the year 254 AH, the Saffarid state was established in Sistan under the leadership of al-Layth ibn al-Ṣaffār. It took control of Khorasan and put an end to the Tahirid state.

In the year 261 AH, the Samanid state was established in Khorasan under the leadership of Naṣr ibn Aḥmad ibn Asad ibn Sāmān. It put an end to the Saffarid state.

In the year 332 AH, the Ikhshidid state was established. It ruled Egypt and the Levant and extended to Yemen.

In the year 297 AH, the Ubaydid (Fatimid) state was established in Ifriqiya under the leadership of Abū 'Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī. It put an end to the Aghlabid state, then to the Ikhshidid state, and its rule extended to Egypt, the Levant, and the Hejaz.

In the year 320 AH, the Buyid state was established in Persia, Isfahan, Hamadan, and Rayy under the leadership of the sons of Buwayh: al-Ḥasan, ‘Alī, and Aḥmad, and their sons after them.

In Mosul, the Jazira, and Aleppo, the Hamdanid state was established under the leadership of the sons of Ḥamdān ibn Ḥamdūn al-Taghlibī in 292 AH.

In the year 321 AH, the Ghaznavid state was established in Transoxiana under the leadership of Sabuktigin, the governor of Ghazna, and after him, his son Maḥmūd, known as Maḥmūd of Ghazna. He put an end to the Samanid state, and his state extended to India.

In the year 328 AH, only Baghdad and the Sawād of Iraq remained in the hands of the Caliph. He was stripped of them when Mu‘izz al-Dawlah al-Buwayhī seized control of Baghdad in the year 334 AH, leaving nothing of the Caliphate but its title.

In the year 421 AH, the state of the Seljuk Turks (ghuzz) was established.

Coming from the lands of Turkestan, it eliminated the Ghaznavid and Buyid states and the other smaller states, under the leadership of Ṭughril Beg al-Seljūqī.

When Ṭughril Beg died, he was succeeded by his nephew Alp Arslān. During his reign, the unity of the Islamic state extending from Mesopotamia to the Levant was established. However, conflict soon arose between him and his cousins. In the year 470 AH, a state known as the Seljuks of Rūm (meaning their settlement in the lands of the Romans) was established.

The schism among the Seljuks created animosity between them. They faced the Crusader invasion divided. Had they faced it united, the course of events would have taken a different direction, and the lands of Islam would have been spared an invasion whose bitterness it continues to suffer.

The Spread of Luxury, Dissolution, and Social Corruption Among Many of the Common People and the Elite:

The corruption of the palaces, and the conflicts and evils that tainted them, led to the spread of this among various classes of the common people, especially the affluent ones, as a result of the flourishing of trade and the opening up of the world to people. We observe this in many of the writings of preachers and scholars of that period, who spared no effort in enjoining good and forbidding evil to the rulers and the ruled. However, the wheel of decline was turning strongly, and the laws governing kingdoms and states were leading the Abbasid state to its inevitable end.

The Third Phase of the Abbasid Caliphate

This extends from the Caliphate of al-Mustazhir, when external forces began to lie in wait for the Islamic state and prepare to attack it, and ends with the end of the Abbasid state under the hooves of the Mongol horses.

{And that is how the seizure of your Lord is when He seizes the cities while they are committing wrong. Indeed, His seizure is painful and severe} (Hūd: 102). And the command of Allāh is a decree determined.

Distinctive Features of the Third Abbasid Era:

This era is an extension of the second Abbasid era and was characterized by all the features of the preceding era, including dissolution, causes of weakness, corrupt rule, the loss of the common people, and the luxury of the elite. Added to this was the Mongol invasion that the Islamic world faced from the east and the Crusader invasion that came from the west, which had previously been spreading in Andalusia, and the tribulations that befell Islam, under whose weight it continues to groan to this day.

The Most Important Independent States from the Rise of the Abbasid Era to the Establishment of the Ottoman State

In the East, Iraq, the Levant, and Egypt

1. The Saffarid Dynasty (254-298 AH / 868-911 CE):

Founded by Yaʿqūb ibn Layth al-Ṣaffār in Sijistan (Iran), it expanded at the expense of the Tahirid Dynasty in Khurasan, which was founded by Ṭāhir ibn al-Ḥusayn in the year (198 AH / 813 CE), and the Alawid state in Tabaristan, which was founded by al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd in the year (250 AH / 863 CE). Due to the inability of the Abbasid Caliphate, it recognized the legitimacy of al-Ṣaffār's rule, who established a strong army with which he suppressed the Kharijites and controlled the trade routes between India and Central Asia. He then considered invading Baghdad, so the Caliph sought help from Aḥmad ibn Ismāʿīl, the Emir of the Samanid Dynasty, who defeated the Saffarids and ended their state in the year (298 AH / 911 CE).

2. The Tulunid Dynasty (256-292 AH / 870-905 CE):

Founded by Aḥmad ibn Ṭūlūn in Egypt, he was a Turkish leader who benefited from the weakness of the Abbasid state, which used to send representatives to govern the provinces far from the center of the Caliphate. Aḥmad ibn Ṭūlūn came to Egypt as a deputy for Bākbāk al-Turkī, then the Caliph entrusted him with the governorship of Egypt, so he became independent and expanded his state. When the Caliph tasked him with protecting the Levantine frontiers, he annexed the Levant to Egypt, then extended his state to Libya, the Hijaz, and the lands of Nubia south of Egypt. Prosperity prevailed during his era, and he was just and firm, and he formed a strong army. Then his son (Khumārawayh) succeeded him and preserved his father's possessions, adding Mosul to them. The relationship between him and the Caliph was strengthened, so he married his daughter (Qaṭr al-Nadā) to the Caliph al-Muʿtaḍid. Then the state weakened, and the Abbasid Caliph re-annexed those lands to the central Caliphate in the year (292 AH).

3. The Samanid Dynasty (261-389 AH / 874-998 CE):

It is attributed to a Persian family that embraced Islam during the Umayyad era. It was founded by Naṣr ibn Aḥmad al-Sāmānī in Transoxiana and expanded during the reign of Ismāʿīl ibn Aḥmad, incorporating Tabaristan and the lands of Rayy. The Samanid state confronted the Chinese threat to Central Asia, benefited from trade routes, and construction flourished during their era. Most of them followed the Sunni school of thought. The Islamic capitals flourished during their reign and were filled with scientific activity, poets, and writers. Bukhara, Samarkand, and the cities of Turkestan became among the brightest civilizations of Islam.

4. The Hamdanid Dynasty (292-392 AH / 904-1002 CE):

They are from an Arab family that embraced the Twelver Imami Shia school of thought. It was established in Mosul in the year 292 AH, during the reign of Caliph al-Muktafī bi-Allāh, and supported him in confronting the Kharijites and Turkish leaders. It was famous for its Jihād against the Byzantine Romans. The Shia Buyids ended their rule in the year 368 AH, and their influence remained in Aleppo, and their kingdom extended to Damascus. They clashed with the Ikhshidids, and after the death of Sayf al-Dawla in the year 356 AH, their condition weakened, and the Shia Fatimids ended their rule in the year 392 AH. The court of Sayf al-Dawla was famous for its writers and poets, such as al-Mutanabbī, who spread their fame, and the famous poet Abū Firās al-Ḥamdānī, and al-Iṣfahānī (the heretic), the author of the famous book al-Aghānī (The Book of Songs)... which is full of lies and anecdotes.

5. The Fatimid Dynasty (298-567 AH / 909-1171 CE):

The Fatimid state was established in Ifriqiya in the year 298 AH under the leadership of ‘Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī, claiming that he had the right to the Caliphate and that he was the grandson of Muḥammad ibn Ismā‘īl ibn Ja‘far al-Ṣādiq. An Ismaili preacher named Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Shī‘ī paved the way for its establishment and mobilized the tribe of Kutāma to support it. It was known as the ‘Ubaydid State.

When its foundations were established, it eliminated the Aghlabid state in Kairouan and then eliminated the Ikhshidid state in Egypt. It built the city of Cairo there and then moved to it during the reign of al-Mu‘izz li-Dīn Allāh and was called the Fatimid state. The Abbasid Caliph al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh could not prevent its establishment.

Then political, economic, and social events occurred within it, in which its power declined and ended in demise. This decline began during the reign of al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh al-Fāṭimī, who reached a great level of disbelief and injustice. The weakness and decline increased during the reign of al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh al-Fāṭimī, as he was born to a slave girl raised in the house of a Jew named Abū Sa‘īd al-Tustarī. His mother took over the management of the state's affairs and appointed Jewish ministers, including Ṣadaqa ibn Yūsuf al-Fallāḥī and Abū Sa‘īd al-Tustarī. These ministers assigned state positions to their fellow Jews, who persecuted the Muslims.

During the reign of al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh, the Fatimid authority over the Levant receded with the Seljuks' conquest of it, and their state in Sicily ended with the Normans' conquest of it in the year 461 AH. A plague spread, which is considered the longest plague known to Egypt in the Middle Ages, as it lasted for eight years (446-454 AH). This hardship, which historians termed the years of the Great Hardship, was accompanied by the outbreak of internal civil wars. Until their minister, Badr al-Jamālī, the governor of Acre, intervened. Al-Mustanṣir summoned him in the year 466 AH, and he restored order and directed his efforts to reforming the country. Al-Mustanṣir married his daughter, and she gave birth to his son al-Musta‘lī.

When al-Mustanşir died in the year 487 AH after a reign of sixty years, his son (Nizār) claimed the Caliphate, and his father had entrusted it to him. However, al-Afḍal ibn Badr al-Jamālī, who succeeded his father in leading the army, preferred his brother (al-Mustaʿlī), who was his sister's son. This was done by killing (Nizār), and with his killing, the Ismailis split into two sects: the Mustaʿlī sect and the Nizārī sect.

During the reign of al-Mustaʿlī, the Crusades began against the Levant, and the Crusaders occupied Jerusalem in the year 493 AH. Al-Mustaʿlī was succeeded by Caliphs, some of whom were deposed and some of whom were killed, until the era of the Fatimid state ended - unregretted - in the year 567 AH at the hands of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī and the establishment of the Ayyubid state.

The Fatimids were among the esoteric Shia extremists, and the established Sunni scholars who lived during their time ruled them to be disbelievers and outside of Islam. The Fatimid state was characterized by injustice and oppression, in addition to disbelief. The senior ministers of the Fatimids corresponded with the Crusaders and the Romans repeatedly and invited them to invade Egypt, promising them support against the army of the Levant, which at that time carried the task of Jihād against the Crusaders on its shoulders.

6. The Ikhshidid Dynasty (323-358 AH / 935-969 CE):

It is attributed to Muḥammad ibn Ṭughj al-Ikhshīd, who was a Turk. He was in the service of the governor of Egypt and excelled in repelling the Fatimid raids on Egypt. The Caliph assigned him the governorship of Egypt, then annexed the Levant and Yemen to it. He organized the country and strengthened his position. Then his relationship with the Caliphate deteriorated, and war broke out between them. After al-Ikhshīd's death, his son Abū al-Qāsim Anjūr succeeded him, and he was a child. His teacher, Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdī, who was a black slave serving them, took over the guardianship. After Kāfūr's death, the Fatimids took control of Egypt under the leadership of Jawhar al-Ṣiqillī and annexed it to the Fatimids.

7. The Buyid Dynasty (334-447 AH / 945-1055 CE):

The Buyids were a Persian Shia family that resided in northern Persia near Qazvin. ‘Alī, al-Ḥasan, and Aḥmad, the sons of Abū Shujā‘, took advantage of the chaos in Persia and eliminated the political entities. The Caliph al-Mustakfī bi-Allāh tried to get rid of the authority of the Turkish leaders, so he sought the help of the Buyids, who entered Baghdad in the year 334 AH / 945 CE. The Caliph welcomed them and gave them noble titles. Aḥmad was named (Mu‘izz al-Dawla), Ḥasan (‘Imād al-Dawla), and ‘Alī (Rukn al-Dawla). Because they were Shia, they seized power from the Caliphs, adopted the title of (Sultan), and revived the Persian royal title (Shāhanshāh). The Buyids won over the populace by reducing taxes and carrying out reforms. Then conflict broke out among them. The Seljuk Turks overthrew them in the year 447 AH. The Buyids encouraged the scientific movement, especially philosophers and heretics such as al-Fārābī and Ibn Sīnā and their likes.

8. The Ghaznavid Dynasty (366-555 AH / 976-1160 CE):

This state was established under the leadership of the Turkish commander (Alp-Tegin). His master, Manṣūr ibn Nūḥ al-Sāmānī, the king of Khurasan, had appointed him in the year 351 AH as Emir of Sijistan (Afghanistan), so he became independent and established a state there, taking the city of Ghazna as its capital, so it became known as the Ghaznavid Dynasty.

Twenty-one kings ruled over it, the most famous of whom was Maḥmūd ibn Sebūktigin, known as Maḥmūd al-Ghaznawī, the well-known righteous king, who conquered India, destroyed the idols of the pagans, and introduced Islam to it. His state expanded and included the lands of Afghanistan, Transoxiana, eastern Iran, the lands of Sindh (Pakistan), and vast parts of India.

Then its era ended with the Ghurid Dynasty's conquest of it in the year 582 AH during the reign of its last king, Tāj al-Dawla Khusraw Malik.

9. The Seljuk Dynasty (431-590 AH / 1040-1194 CE):

This state is attributed to Seljūq ibn Duqāq, the leader of a large Turkish state that resided beyond the two rivers (Syr Darya and Amu Darya) in a vast area known as Turkestan, meaning the land of the Turks. In the year 429 AH, the leadership of this tribe passed to Ṭughril Beg, the grandson of Seljūq. He crossed the region between the two rivers with his tribe, heading towards the east, and took advantage of the Ghaznavids' preoccupation with wars that exhausted them. He took control of Khurasan, Rayy, and Hamadan, and removed the Ghaznavid rule from them, and established a state for his people known as the Seljuk Dynasty.

In the year 432 AH, he took control of Gurgan and Tabaristan, and his state extended to Qazvin. In the year 446 AH, the Abbasid Caliph al-Qā'im bi-Amr Allāh sought his help and invited him to Baghdad to save him from his vizier, Arslan al-Basāsīrī, who had seized power and ruled over Iraq and gave the sermon in the name of al-Mustanşir al-Fāṭimī, the ruler of Egypt. Ṭughril Beg responded to his call and marched to Baghdad, eliminated al-Basāsīrī, and ended the Buyid rule there. Then he took control of Mosul, Azerbaijan, and Sinjar, and he gained control of the Iranian lands from the banks of the Syr Darya River to the coast of the Black Sea and from the shores of Lake Khwarazm to the Sea of Oman.

In the year 455 AH, Ṭughril Beg died, and his nephew, Alp Arslān, succeeded him. He continued his uncle's path and in the year 463 AH, he sent an army under the leadership of his commander Atsiz to the Levant, where he took control of Damascus. In the year 464 AH, he headed an army to conquer Anatolia, where he took control of Armenia after a famous fierce battle with the Romans that took place in Manzikert. In it, the Roman army was defeated, and its king, Romanus IV, who had refused to make peace with Sultan Alp Arslān, was captured. That battle was one of the great scenes of Islam with the Romans. In the Sultan's army, who asked his soldiers not to go out with him if they were attached to the world with a need they were waiting to fulfill, there were only fifteen thousand fighters. It is mentioned in the narrations that the Romans numbered about two hundred thousand fighters. The Sultan's Sheikh advised him to time the battle at the time of Friday prayer, when the pulpits would be calling for the Mujahideen. At the beginning of the battle, the Sultan threw his helmet on the ground and humbled himself before Allāh, and shouted to the soldiers, saying: "There is no king here who commands and is obeyed, whoever wants to leave, let him leave", and he ordered the soldiers to be sincere in seeking victory or martyrdom, then he said "Allāhu Akbar" and attacked, so they charged like the head of a spear on the tent of Emperor Romanus, who fell captive in the hands of the Sultan, and his army was defeated, most of whom perished on the way of escape and return to Constantinople.

In the year 465 AH, an Ismaili Batini assassinated Alp Arslān, and his son Malik-Shāh succeeded him. During his reign, the Seljuk state began to shrink after its division into a state distributed among the sons of the Seljuk house, a state in Khurasan, a state in the Levant, and a state in the lands of the Romans.

As for the Seljuk state in Khurasan, it passed to Sanjar ibn Alp Arslān and ended with his death in the year 552 AH with the Khwarazmian Dynasty's conquest of it.

As for the Seljuk state in Iraq, it passed to Muḥammad ibn Malik-Shāh and then to his son Maḥmūd, and his sons inherited it after him. Then it disappeared with the Khwarazmian Dynasty's conquest of it in the year 573 AH during the reign of its last king, Rukn al-Dīn Ṭughril (II).

As for the Seljuk state in the Levant, it passed to Tutush ibn Malik-Shāh and was divided after his killing in the year 488 AH between his two sons: Duqāq and Riḍwān.

Duqāq took Damascus, and Riḍwān took Aleppo. The state of Aleppo ended after the death of its last king, Sulṭān Shāh ibn Riḍwān, with Najm al-Dīn Ilghāzī, the ruler of Mardin, taking control of it in the year 511 AH at the invitation of its people, and then with ‘Imād al-Dīn Zengi, the ruler of Mosul, taking control of it in the year 521 AH. After his assassination in the year 541 AH, his son Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd succeeded him.

The state of Damascus and its ruler, Duqāq ibn Tutush, ended in the year 497 AH with his Atabeg (deputy), the commander Ṭughtekin, taking control of power. With his death in the year 522 AH, his son, Tāj al-Dawla Būrī, succeeded him. The state was attributed to him and became known as the Burid Dynasty, and its days extended until Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd ibn ‘Imād al-Dīn Zengi took control of it in the year 549 AH and annexed it to Aleppo, making it the capital of the Atabeg state in the Levant.

As for the Seljuk state in the lands of the Romans, it was established under the leadership of Sulaymān ibn Qutalmish, one of the descendants of Seljūq and the cousins of Alp Arslān. Sulaymān led Turkish gangs in the aftermath of the Battle of Manzikert and began to chase the remnants of the Roman army and take control of the regions he invaded. When he approached the coasts of the Sea of Marmara in the year 470 AH, he settled in the city of Nicaea - present-day Iznik - and established a Seljuk state there.

In the year 477 AH, Sulaymān tried to take control of the Levant and extract it from (Tutush) ibn Malik-Shāh in a battle that took place between them. He was unable to escape and was killed in it. His son, Dāwūd, succeeded him and took the title of Qilij Arslān.

When the First Crusade arrived and stormed Constantinople in the year 490 AH and then crossed into Asia, Qilij Arslān was forced to abandon Nicaea and retreated with his people to the southeast of Anatolia and took the city of Konya as the capital of his kingdom.

In the year 500 AH, Qilij Arslān died, and the regions of his state were distributed among his sons and brothers, and it turned into a group of statelets between which wars continued. Until the Ottoman state was established on its ruins in the year 699 AH - and they are from their descendants - and it was folded under its wing.

10. The Ghurid Dynasty (439-612 AH / 1048-1215 CE):

This state was established in the lands of Ghur in the year 439 AH under the leadership of ‘Izz al-Dīn Ḥusayn ibn Ḥasan ibn Muḥammad. It began to compete with the Ghaznavid Dynasty until it eliminated it in the year 582 AH and annexed it. Its conquests extended to the lands of India, and from it emerged the Mamluk Turkic state, and Quṭb al-Dīn Aybak was their first king in India.

In the year 612 AH, the Ghurid Dynasty submitted to Khwarazmian sovereignty and disappeared with it with the Mongol invasion in the year 628 AH.

11. The Khwarazmian Dynasty (470-628 AH / 1048-1258 CE):

This state was established in the lands of Khwarazm, south of Lake Aral and the mouth of the Amu Darya River, under the leadership of the Turkish commander (Anushtegin). The Seljuk Sultan had appointed him over it in the year 470 AH.

It expanded during the reign of its king, Sulṭān Shāh Maḥmūd ibn Il-Arslān, by taking control of Khurasan and removing the Seljuk rule from it after the death of Sultan Sanjar ibn Malik-Shāh in the year 552 AH, and then by taking control of the Ghurid Dynasty in the year 612 AH.

In the year 628 AH, the Mongols conquered it and eliminated its state during the reign of its last king, Jalāl al-Dīn Mingburnu.

12. The Artuqid Dynasty (499-521 AH / 1077-1121 CE):

This state is attributed to the leader of a Turkmen clan named Artuq ibn Aksab. He had joined in the year 449 AH the service of the Seljuk Sultan Tutush ibn Alp Arslān, the ruler of the Levant, who granted him Jerusalem and its surroundings. When Artuq died, he was succeeded by his two sons: Mu‘īn al-Dīn Suqmān and Najm al-Dīn Ilghāzī.

In the year 491 AH, the Fatimids regained Jerusalem and expelled them from it. They headed with their Turkmen people to the Jazira region, where Mu‘īn al-Dīn Suqmān took Diyarbakır Amid and Najm al-Dīn Ilghāzī took Mardin, and each of them established an Artuqid state in what he owned.

In the year 511 AH, the Crusaders besieged the city of Aleppo, so its people sought the help of Najm al-Dīn Ilghāzī, who helped them and fought the Crusaders in a battle that took place in Sahl Balat in the year 513 AH. He captured their leader, Roger de Salerno, the Emir of Antioch, and took control of Aleppo and established an Artuqid state there, which his sons inherited until ‘Imād al-Dīn Zengi took control of it in the year 521 AH and established an Atabeg state there.

13. The Atabeg Dynasty (516-579 AH / 1122-1171 CE):

This state is attributed to ‘Imād al-Dīn Zengi ibn Aq Sunqur, who was the Atabeg - meaning deputy - of the Seljuk Sultan Maḥmūd ibn Muḥammad ibn Malik-Shāh, the Sultan of Iraq. In the year 516 AH, the Sultan appointed him over Mosul, where he established a state known as the Atabeg Dynasty.

In the year 521 AH, ‘Imād al-Dīn took control of Aleppo and eliminated the Artuqid Dynasty. ‘Imād al-Dīn, may Allāh have mercy on him, was famous for his Jihād against the Crusaders and for his overthrow of the first Crusader emirates on the coasts of the Levant.

In the year 541 AH, the Hashashin Batiniyya (the ancestors of the Alawite Nusayris ruling Syria and Lebanon in our time) - assassinated the Mujahid Emir ‘Imād al-Dīn Zengi, may Allāh have mercy on him. The Atabeg state was divided into two states: a state in Mosul and a state in Aleppo.

As for the state of Mosul, his son Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī I succeeded him, and his sons inherited it after him until its era ended with the Mongol conquest of it in the year 660 AH.

As for the state of Aleppo, his son, the righteous Mujahid king Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, succeeded him and carried the banner of Jihād against the Crusaders after him. In the year 549 AH, Nūr al-Dīn took control of Damascus and annexed the Levant to it.

When Nūr al-Dīn died in the year 569 AH, his son al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl, who was a young child, succeeded him. In the year 579 AH, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī took over and annexed it to the Ayyubid state that he had established in Egypt, so it became one state with it. This was done with the consultation of the scholars of the Levant and Egypt, to unite the country in the face of the Crusaders.

14. The Ayyubid State (567 - 648 AH / 1171 - 1250 CE):

This blessed state was founded by al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf ibn Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb. He had gone to Egypt as a commander in the army of his uncle, Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, the commander of the army sent by al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Nūr al-Dīn Zankī, the Mujāhid Sultan of Syria, to repel the Crusader campaign against Egypt.

The Fatimid Caliph al-ʿĀḍid sought the assistance of Asad al-Dīn and appointed him as vizier to strengthen himself against the competing Fatimid princes, the most prominent of whom was Shāwar. When Asad al-Dīn died in Egypt while preparing to repel the Crusader campaign, the Fatimid Caliph appointed Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn in his uncle's place. Shortly after the victory of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and the armies of Syria and Egypt over the Crusaders, the Fatimid Caliph died in 567 AH after the killing of his vizier Shāwar ibn Mujīr al-Saʿdī, who had been corresponding with the Crusaders. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn seized control of Egypt, discontinued the khutbah for the Fatimids, and established it for the Abbasid Caliph in Baghdad. He abolished the Fatimid ‘Ubaydi Ismaili madhhab, which was based on heresy, and restored the Sunni Shāfi‘ī madhhab to Egypt. He then confronted a number of Crusader attempts along with remnants of the Fatimids and support from the Roman fleet, defeating them and establishing his rule in Egypt. After the death of Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn came to Syria, and the scholars of Syria and Egypt pledged allegiance to him as Sultan over both Egypt and Syria. His kingdom then expanded to include the Ḥijāz, Yemen, and parts of the Arabian Peninsula. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, may Allāh have mercy on him, recorded remarkable victories against the Crusaders, leading to the recovery of Jerusalem in 583 AH, fulfilling the dream of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Nūr al-Dīn Zankī, may Allāh have mercy on him. After his death, the regions of the state were divided among his sons and brothers, and this great state, after his death in 589 AH, turned into small states embroiled in wars. Conditions stabilized for some time during the reign of al-Malik al-‘Ādil, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's brother, but then Syria came under the rule of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl, who sided with the Crusaders against his uncle Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, who had independently taken control of Egypt.

Najm al-Dīn then died while repelling the Seventh Crusader campaign, and his commander Mu‘izz al-Dīn Aybak continued it. Aybak married his wife, Shajar al-Durr, and the Sultanate passed to him, marking the end of the Ayyubid state and the establishment of the Mamluk state in Egypt. The other Ayyubid statelets in Syria gradually fell under the rule of the Mamluk Sultan al-Zāhir Baybars al-Bunduqdārī and were annexed to the Mamluk state.

15. The Mamluk State (648 - 922 AH / 1250 - 1517 CE):

This state is attributed to the Turkish Mamluk rulers who were among the Mamluks of Sultan Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb ibn al-Malik al-Kāmil al-Ayyūbī. Al-Malik al-Kāmil had built them a castle on Rawḍah Island in the Nile River – which was known as Baḥr al-

Nīl (the Sea of the Nile) – and they became known as the Baḥrī Mamluks. Their first ruler was al-Malik al-Mu‘izz ‘Izz al-Dīn Aybak, and the kingdom passed to him through Shajar al-Durr, the wife of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn, who had assumed the throne after his death. She then married ‘Izz al-Dīn Aybak and abdicated the throne in his favor, thus transferring the kingdom to the Mamluks through her.

The Mamluk state expanded during the reign of al-Malik al-Zāhir Baybars al-Bunduqdārī, who eliminated the Ayyubid statelets in Syria and annexed them to the Mamluk state in Egypt.

The Mamluks carried the banner of Jihād against the Crusaders after the Ayyubids. Sultan Baybars eliminated most of those emirates, with the last of them (the Emirate of Acre, 1291 AH) falling during the reign of Sultan Khalīl ibn Qalāwūn.

The Mamluk state lasted until the Ottomans seized control of Egypt and Syria in 922 AH after defeating the Mamluks in the Battle of Marj Dābiq.

16. The [Symbolic] Abbasid Caliphate in Egypt (656 - 922 AH / 1258 - 1517 CE):

After the killing of the Caliph al-Musta‘ṣim in 656 AH, two members of the Banū al-‘Abbās claimed the Caliphate. One was named Abū al-‘Abbās Aḥmad ibn ‘Alī (whose great-grandfather was al-Mustarshid bi-Allāh ibn al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh), and the other was named Abū al-Qāsim Aḥmad ibn al-Zāhir bi-Amr Allāh, the brother of al-Mustaṣir bi-Allāh, who shared al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh as a common ancestor with the first claimant.

The first claimant went to Aleppo and proved his lineage with the testimony of a group of the ‘Arab of Khufājah, and the Emir of Aleppo, Ḥusām al-Dīn ibn Abī al-Fawāris, pledged allegiance to him, along with a group of scholars, including Shaykh ‘Abd al-Ḥalīm ibn Taymiyyah.

The second claimant went to Cairo and proved his lineage with the testimony of a group of the 'Arab of Mahārish, and al-Malik al-Zāhir Baybars pledged allegiance to him, along with a group of notables and scholars, and he took the title of al-Mustanşir bi-Allāh in 659 AH. He asked al-Malik al-Zāhir to equip him with a force to fight the Mongols, but he was provided with a small force that was defeated by the Mongols, and the Caliph al-Mustanşir was killed in the battle. Abū al-‘Abbās Aḥmad then came to Cairo and was given the bay‘ah (oath of allegiance) as the successor to al-Mustanşir, and he took the title of al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh.

The Caliphate of the Banū al-‘Abbās continued in Egypt until the Ottomans seized control of it in 922 AH under the leadership of Sultan Selim I. The Abbasid Caliph then ceded the Caliphate to the Ottoman Sultan, who transferred it to Constantinople, and it remained in his line until it was abolished with the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire in 1342 AH / 1923 CE.

States that Became Independent in the Arabian Peninsula During the Abbasid Era

17. The Ibadi State in Oman (176 AH / 792 CE):

The Ibadiyyah are a moderate branch of the Khawārij, close to the Sunni madhhab. Their madhhab is attributed to ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ibāḍ al-Tamīmī, and they were fought by the Umayyads and Abbasids, who expelled them from Syria, the Ḥijāz, Yemen, and Africa. However, a minority of them remained in Oman to this day.

The Ibadi state in Oman was founded in 176 AH by al-Julandī ibn Mas‘ūd al-Ibādī. Among their most prominent missionaries were Ghassān ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī and al-Ṣalt ibn Mālik. They engaged in trade, and their state flourished as a result.

18. The Qarmaṭī State - Bahrain - (296 - 398 AH / 909 - 1008 CE)

A brief account of them was given when we mentioned the revolts. It began at the hands of a disguised Fatimid missionary, al-Ḥusayn al-Ahwāzī, who carried the Ismaili daʿwah to southern Iraq and Bahrain. When he died, he was succeeded by a Persian man known by the title "Qarmaṭ," said to be named Ḥamdān al-Ashʿath, who was one of the missionaries of the Ismaili Imam whom ʿAbd Allāh ibn Maymūn al-Qaddāh, the organizer of the Ismaili daʿwah, had spread throughout the regions.

He called to a madhhab that was a mixture of Persian Mazdakism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

These people established a state in 296 AH in al-Qaṭīf, Bahrain, and Yemen, and led wars in Iraq, seeking to seize the Caliphate. They contested the leadership of the daʿwah with the Fatimids, attacking their bases in Syria and attempting to attack Cairo, but the Fatimids were able to repel them.

In 317 AH, they raided Mecca, uprooted the Black Stone, and killed the pilgrims. They carried the Black Stone to al-Qaṭīf, the capital of their kingdom, and returned it in 239 AH in exchange for being allowed to impose a tax on the pilgrims.

This state remained until it was abolished in 398 AH.

19. The State of Banū Najāḥ in (Zabīd - Yemen) (421 - 554 AH / 1030 - 1160 CE):

This state was founded by an Abyssinian slave who managed to gain freedom and establish a state in Zabīd. However, members of the family quarreled, allowing the governor of Tihāmah, ʿAlī ibn Muḥammad, to eliminate them in 554 AH.

20. The Ṣulayḥī State (Sanʿāʾ - Yemen) (450 - 647 AH / 1058 - CE):

This state adhered to the Ismaili madhhab. It was founded by Muḥammad al-Ṣulayḥī, who received the daʿwah at the hands of Ismaili missionaries in Yemen. Their capital was San‘ā’, and they maintained friendly relations with the Fatimids in Egypt, who bestowed upon them high titles such as "Amīr al-Umara" (Prince of Princes) and "al-Mukarram" (the Honored One). They extended their influence to the Ḥijāz, but the state fell at the hands of Tūrān Shāh, the last of the Ayyubid Sultans. Among their most prominent figures was al-Sayyidah al-Ḥurrah (Arwā bint Aḥmad), who played an important role in spreading the Ismaili madhhab in India and Oman. A mosque in San‘ā’ remains as one of their legacies.

21. The State of Banū Rasūl (Yemen) (626 - 826 AH / 1229 - 1423 CE):

It was founded by ‘Alī ibn Rasūl, who was from the lineage of the Ghassānids (the kings of Syria before the conquest). The Ayyubids appointed him governor of Mecca in 652 AH, and then entrusted him with the rule of Yemen. He extended his influence from Ḥaḍramawt to Mecca. His state remained in his dynasty for nearly two centuries. They were merchants who prospered from maritime trade, especially with India. Industry and agriculture advanced during their reign. They adhered to the Shāfi‘ī madhhab and encouraged scholars and collected libraries.

States that Became Independent in Africa

22. The Midrārī State (140 - 297 AH / 757 - 909 CE):

This state was established in the far Maghreb. It was founded by a slave named ‘Īsā ibn Yazīd al-Aswad, who was one of the Ṣufrī Khawārij. However, the Berber tribe of Miknāsah revolted against him and seized the emirate, which was headed by Abū al-Qāsim (Simkū ibn Wāsūl). The state's capital was the city of Sijilmāsa in an oasis in the desert. They were interested in trade with Black Africa south of the Sahara and amassed great wealth. Then members of the family quarreled, until the army of Abū

23. The Rustamid State (162 - 296 AH / 779 - 908 CE):

It was founded by ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Rustam, who were from the Ibadi Khawārij hostile to the Abbasid state. It was founded in Tāhart (Algeria). His rule was characterized by justice towards the subjects, and he was famous for trading with Black Africa, bringing gold and slaves, which gave (Tāhart) a cultural and urban center. Then the Arab, Berber, and Persian elements within their state clashed over the kingdom, and sectarian conflicts arose between the Ibadiyyah, Ṣufriyyah, Mu‘tazilah, Shiites, and Sunnis. It then fell into the hands of Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Shī‘ī al-Fāṭimī in 296 AH.

24. The Idrisid Dynasty (172 - 375 AH / 788 - 985 CE):

During the reign of the Abbasid Caliph Abū Ja‘far al-Manṣūr, Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah revolted against the Abbasids in Medina. Al-Manṣūr sent an army against him, and a battle ensued, ending with the killing of Muḥammad in the year 145 AH.

In 169 AH, another ‘Alid, al-Ḥusayn b. ‘Alī b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan al-Sibt b. ‘Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, revolted against al-Manṣūr, along with his two uncles, Idrīs and Yaḥyā, the sons of ‘Abd Allāh. Al-Manṣūr sent an army to fight him, and a battle took place at a site near Medina known as Fakkh, where al-Ḥusayn was killed, and his uncle Idrīs b. Muḥammad (al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah) managed to escape. Idrīs headed to the far Maghreb and settled with a Berber tribe called Awraba, where he introduced himself. They pledged allegiance to him, and other tribes entered into his obedience. Idrīs renounced obedience to the Banū al-‘Abbās and founded the city of Fās, which he took as his capital. There, in the year 172 AH, he established an independent ‘Alid state known as the Idrisid dynasty.

Once Idrīs had established himself in his kingdom, he assembled an army from the Berber tribes and invaded the middle Maghreb, annexing it to his kingdom. This state continued until the Fatimid dynasty brought it to an end in the year 375 AH.

25 . The Aghlabid Dynasty (184 - 296 AH / 800 - 909 CE):

Hārūn al-Rashīd feared that the ambitions of the Idrisids might extend to seizing the near-Maghreb Tunisia, which was known as Ifriqiya. He wanted to establish a stable government entrusted to a man who would be independent and ward off the danger of the Idrisids. His choice fell on Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab, whom he appointed as governor of Ifriqiya in the year 184 AH, on the condition that his governorship be hereditary in exchange for a sum of money he would pay to the Caliph. Al-Qayrawān was the capital of the province. Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab built a city he called al-‘Abbāsiyya, which he took as the capital of his state, known as the Aghlabid dynasty.

During the reign of his grandson Ziyādat Allāh I, the island of Sicily was conquered under the leadership of the great jurist Asad b. al-Furāt and annexed to the Aghlabid state. The rule of the Aghlabid dynasty extended until the rise of the Fatimid dynasty, which brought it to an end.

26. The Almoravid Dynasty (453 - 541 AH / 1062 - 1147 CE):

This state was founded in the far Maghreb in the year 453 AH under the leadership of Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn al-Lamṭūnī (named after the Lamṭūna Berber tribe). Its men wore veils (niqāb) over their faces, so they were known as the Mulaththamūn (the veiled ones).

The Mujāhid king Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn answered the call of al-Mu‘tamid b. ‘Abbād, the king of Seville, to repel the aggression of Alfonso VI, the king of Castile. He crossed the sea to al-Andalus in the year 479 AH at the head of armies of Berbers and was able to defeat the Spanish king in a famous battle that took place on the plain of al-Zallāqa.

After that, the petty kingdoms of the Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if (the kings of groups) submitted to the authority of the Almoravids.

After the death of Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn in the year 500 AH, he was succeeded by kings from his sons, some of whom were preoccupied with their pleasures, some were dissolute youths, and some were minors. There was no lack of disputes among them, so the state began to decline, and the Almohads coveted it and seized it in the year 541 AH during the reign of its last king, Ishāq b. 'Alī b. Tāshufīn, the grandson of Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn.

27. The Almohads (541 - 668 AH / 1147 - 1270 CE):

This state is attributed to Muḥammad b. Tūmart, from the Zanāta Berber tribe, whose homeland was in the southeast of the far Maghreb. Ibn Tūmart had called for the doctrine of Tawhid, so his followers were known as the Almohads, and he took the title of al-Mahdī. When he died in the year 524 AH, he was succeeded in his da'wah by his close disciple 'Abd al-Mu'min b. 'Alī, who began to raid the Almoravids and was able in the year 541 AH to seize the city of Marrakesh and remove the Almoravid state in the far Maghreb and establish a state for the Almohads.

The power of the Almohads intensified during the reign of his son Abū Ya'qūb Yūsuf I. In the year 567 AH, he crossed the sea to al-Andalus and subjected those who remained loyal to the Almoravids, such as Ibn Mardaniš and Ibn Ghāniya.

When he died in the year 580 AH, he was succeeded by his son Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb al-Manṣūr, and during his reign, the Almohad state reached its peak of glory and strength. He crossed the sea to al-Andalus several times, repelling the aggression of the Spaniards, the last of which was in the year 591 AH in the battle in which he defeated Alfonso VIII in a resounding defeat, known as the Battle of al-Arak, and revived the Battle of al-Zallāqa, which had taken place before in the year 479 AH.

When Abū Yūsuf Ya‘qūb al-Manṣūr died in the year 595 AH, he was succeeded by his son al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh Muḥammad. During his reign, the Almohad state began to decline. He clashed with the Spaniards in battles in which he was defeated, the most severe of which was the one that took place in the year 609 AH, which was known as the Battle of al-‘Iqāb. The defeats of the Almohads followed after that during the reign of his successors, including the defeat of the Battle of Abī Dānis in the year 614 AH.

The era of the Almohads did not last long after that, as the Banū Marīn seized their state in the year 668 AH during the reign of their last king, Idrīs, nicknamed Abū Dabbūs.

28 . The Marinid Dynasty (668 - 875 AH / 1270 - 1470 CE):

This dynasty is attributed to its founder, ‘Abd al-Ḥaqq al-Marīnī, from the Zanāta Berber tribe, residing in the region of Sijilmāsa in the far Maghreb. In the year 610 AH, ‘Abd al-Ḥaqq moved with his tribe to the Rif region as a resort and began to raid the Almohad areas. He met them in the year 612 AH in a battle in which he defeated them. After that, the defeats of the Almohads continued until the Banū Marīn were able to remove their state in the year 668 AH. The Marinid state extended in the far Maghreb until the year 875 AH.

29. The Zayyanid Dynasty from the Banū ‘Abd al-Wād (633 - 962 AH / 1235 - 1555 CE):

This dynasty is attributed to its founder, Abū Yaḥyā Yaghmurāsīn b. Zayyān al-‘Abd al-Wādī, from the Banū Zayyān of Tlemcen. In the year 633 AH, Yaghmurāsīn became independent in Tlemcen, and his state included central Ifriqiya (Algeria) and was subject for a few years to Marinid sovereignty. Its lifespan extended until the Ottomans seized it in the year 962 AH.

30. The Hafsīd Dynasty (625 - 941 AH / 1227 - 1534 CE):

This dynasty is attributed to Abū Ḥafṣ ‘Umar b. Abī Zakariyyā Yaḥyā al-Hintātī. Abū Zakariyyā was one of the officials of the Almohad state in Tunis, then became independent from it in the year 625 AH. Disputes arose between his successors, due to which the state was divided in the year 681 AH into two states: a state in Tunis and a state in Bejaïa in the middle Maghreb. It extended until the Ottomans seized it in the year 941 AH.

The Islamic State in al-Andalus

31. The Umayyad State in al-Andalus (92 - 897 AH / 713 - 1452 CE):

The Muslims crossed the sea from the far Maghreb to al-Andalus in the year 92 AH under the leadership of Ṭāriq b. Ziyād and Mūsā b. Nuṣayr and were subject, along with what was conquered from the lands of North Africa, to the Banū Umayya state in Damascus.

1) ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Dākhil (138 - 172 AH):

When the era of the Umayyads ended with the killing of Marwān II, the last of their kings, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mu‘āwiya b. Hishām b. ‘Abd al-Malik b. Marwān was able to escape from their grasp and escape death. He headed secretly to the Maghreb, taking refuge with the Nafza tribe, where his maternal uncles were. When he was reassured, he began to write to those in al-Andalus who remained loyal to the Banū Umayya, and their support came to him for his arrival.

In the month of Dhū al-Ḥijja of the year 138 AH, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān crossed the sea, accompanied by a group of Arabs and Berbers, and landed in al-Andalus. Those who were awaiting his arrival joined him, and he headed to Córdoba and entered it after eliminating its amir, Yūsuf b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Fihri, who was appointed by the Abbasid Caliph Abū Ja‘far al-Manṣūr. From then on, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān was called by the title al-Dākhil (the Entrant).

‘Abd al-Raḥmān was able to suppress the revolts that were stirred up by the supporters of the Banū al-‘Abbās, including those who aspired to independence with the regions and cities in their hands, and some of them sought the help of Charlemagne, the king of the Franks, who came with his armies in the year (161 AH - 771 CE), but he soon returned after his campaign failed. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān's preoccupation with suppressing those revolts that continued throughout his reign did not distract him from administration and construction. He established the Great Mosque of Córdoba, which became a university that attracted famous scholars from the East.

2) Hishām b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Dākhil (172 - 180 AH):

‘Abd al-Raḥmān died in the year 172 AH, and his son Hishām I succeeded him by appointment from his father. His two brothers, Sulaymān and ‘Abd Allāh, revolted against him, contesting the emirate, and their revolt extended to the era of his son al-Ḥakam I. Hishām was able to repel the attacks of the kings of the Franks and seized some of their fortresses and strongholds. He added the minaret to the Great Mosque of Córdoba and renewed the construction of the bridge over the river of Córdoba, known as al-Wādī al-Kabīr. Al-Samḥ b. Mālīk, the amir of al-Andalus, had built it in the year 100 AH.

3) Al-Ḥakam b. Hishām (180 - 206 AH):

Hishām I died in the year 180 AH, and his son al-Ḥakam I succeeded him by appointment from his father. He suppressed the revolt of his uncles Sulaymān and ‘Abd Allāh by killing the former and the surrender of the latter. He suppressed the outbreaks of fitnahs, raided the lands of the Franks, and repelled their aggression on the borderlands.

4) ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (II) b. al-Ḥakam (206 - 238 AH):

Al-Ḥakam I died in the year 206 AH, and his son ‘Abd al-Raḥmān II succeeded him by appointment from his father. During his reign, a fitnah broke out between the Yamaniyya and the Muḍariyya over the region of Tudmīr, which al-Ḥakam suppressed. He ordered the demolition of Tudmīr and established a harbor for ships in its place, which was called Murcia. He suppressed the rebellion of the people of Toledo and continued the invasion of the Christian kingdoms.

5) Muḥammad (I) b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (238 - 273 AH):

‘Abd al-Raḥmān II died in the year 238 AH, and his son Muḥammad I succeeded him by appointment from his father. During his reign, the Muladi revolted under the leadership of ‘Umar b. Ḥafṣūn, and the people of Toledo revolted against him and allied themselves with the king of Galicia. The monk Eulogius stirred up a fitnah that ended with his killing. Wars broke out between Muḥammad and the Christian kings, ending with his victory over them and the seizure of many of their fortresses and strongholds. During his reign, the Normans (Vikings) attacked the Andalusian coasts, and the commander of the Andalusian navy (Khushkhāsh b. Sa‘īd) drove them out.

6) Al-Mundhir b. Muḥammad (273 - 275 AH):

Muḥammad I died in the year 273 AH, and his son al-Mundhir I succeeded him. His reign lasted only two years.

7) ‘Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad (275 - 300 AH):

Al-Mundhir died in the year 275 AH, and his brother ‘Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad succeeded him. The amirs of Seville revolted against him, and the revolts of the Muladi continued during his reign, which lasted twenty-five years.

8) Caliph of al-Andalus ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir (300 - 350):

‘Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad died, and his grandson ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (III) succeeded him and took the title of Caliph when the authority of the Caliph in Baghdad collapsed. He was the first to take the title of Caliph in the Umayyad state in al-Andalus, as his predecessors took the title of Amir. His reign lasted fifty years, which he spent suppressing revolts and in his wars with the Franks. The Umayyad state during his reign reached the height of its glory in power, knowledge, and construction. In terms of power, it had complete control over the borderlands adjacent to the enemy's lands. In terms of knowledge, Córdoba became a destination for scholars, and many luminaries from the East visited it, surpassing Baghdad. In terms of construction, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān built the city of al-Zahrā’ and poured into it the genius of the Arabs in engineering, construction, and wondrous decoration, making it a marvel of the age and a sign of exquisite art. He added the title al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh (the Defender of the Religion of Allāh) to the title of Caliph, so he was known by it.

‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir died in the year 350 AH, and his son al-Ḥakam (II) succeeded him by appointment from his father and took the title al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh (the One Seeking Victory from Allāh). He followed in his father's footsteps, fighting the kings of Castile, León, and Navarre, defeating them and repelling their attacks. During his reign, the Normans (Vikings) raided the Andalusian coasts for the second time and he repelled them. Scholars flocked to his door, and his majlises were filled with them. Books that were gifted to him from the emperors of Rome were translated into Arabic. He established a library that contained four hundred thousand volumes, and there was no one in al-Andalus during his reign who did not know how to read and write, while ignorance prevailed in Europe, and there were only a few who knew how to write and read.

10) Hishām b. al-Ḥakam (366 AH):

Al-Ḥakam (II) al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh died in the year 366 AH, and his son Hishām (II) succeeded him by appointment from his father and took the title al-Mu’ayyad bi-Allāh

(the One Supported by Allāh). He was not yet eleven years old. The appointment was made at the insistence of his mother (Ṣubḥ) al-Bashkunsīyya on her husband al-Ḥakam and with the support of the chamberlain of the palace, Muḥammad b. Abī ‘Āmir. This chamberlain was able to seize power from the minor Caliph, become independent of it, and establish the ‘Āmirid state under his leadership.

The ‘Āmirid State:

Ibn Abī ‘Āmir eliminated the influence of Ṣubḥ, the Caliph's mother, as well as the influence of the vizier ‘Uthmān al-Muṣḥafī. He secluded the Caliph from the people, confined him to the palace, and prepared for him what would amuse a child of his age and distract him from thinking about anything other than what was intended for him and imposed on him. Ibn Abī ‘Āmir waged wars that amounted - as the historians say - to fifty battles, in most of which he was victorious. Because of this, he took the title al-Manṣūr (the Victorious). He died affected by wounds he sustained in his last wars. He ordered that he be laid in the grave on two bricks made from what he had collected on his face from the dust of Jihād against the Christians.

Then the kings of the Franks allied to fight the Muslims after the death of Ibn Abī ‘Āmir and the rise of the party states. That was done by stirring up grudges among the kings of those states and seeking help from the kings and princes of the Franks, who imposed large sums on those who helped them, which they often failed to pay, and the matter ended with the seizure of their kingdom and their expulsion from it.

Ibn Abī ‘Āmir (al-Manṣūr) died after twenty-seven years of dominating the government. His son ‘Abd al-Malik succeeded him and took the title al-Muẓaffar bi-Allāh (the One Made Victorious by Allāh). He followed in his father's footsteps in managing the kingdom. Caliph Hishām remained secluded from the people and reached the age of thirty-seven.

‘Abd al-Malik died in the year 399 AH, and his brother ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, nicknamed Shanjūl, succeeded him in the chamberlainship. He brought Hishām out of his captivity and forced him to appoint him as Caliph after him, so he wrote him an agreement to that effect. When the people of Córdoba learned of the matter, they revolted against ‘Abd al-Raḥmān and gathered around an Umayyad named Muḥammad b. Hishām from the descendants of ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir and pledged allegiance to him. He took the title Muḥammad al-Mahdī and was able to kill Shanjūl. With that, the state of the Banū ‘Āmir ended.

Return of the Caliphate to the Banū Umayya (Muḥammad al-Mahdī and Sulaymān al-Musta‘īn):

Muḥammad al-Mahdī imprisoned Hishām al-Mu‘ayyad and claimed that he had died. He announced his death to the people and brought out the corpse of a person similar to him and prayed over it and buried it with ceremony. Soon after, a cousin of his, Sulaymān b. al-Ḥakam b. Sulaymān b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir, revolted against Muḥammad al-Mahdī and contested the Caliphate with him. The Berbers gathered around him. Each of them sought the help of a king from the kings of the Franks. In the war, victory was achieved by Sulaymān b. al-Ḥakam, and Muḥammad (al-Mahdī) was killed. Sulaymān entered Córdoba, and that was in the year (400 - 402 AH). He brought Hishām (al-Mu‘ayyad), who was alive, so he abdicated the Caliphate to Sulaymān and pledged allegiance to him. He took the title al-Musta‘īn bi-Allāh (the One Seeking Help from Allāh).

After that, al-Mu‘ayyad disappeared, and it was said that al-Musta‘īn had killed him. Al-Musta‘īn granted fiefdoms in the south and east of al-Andalus to the Berber leaders who had supported him. The rest of the governors declared their independence and separation from Córdoba. With that, the bond of the Umayyad state broke, and independent states of parties of Arabs, Berbers, and Saqāliba were established on its ruins. Each party was ruled by rulers who followed the path of kings and were known as the Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if (the kings of groups). Córdoba lost its status as a capital and became equal to the party states. Rulers from Arab origins succeeded one another, including Idrisids from the Banū Ḥammūd, some from the Banū Jahwar, and some remnants from the Banū Umayya.

The Establishment of the Banū Hammūd Dynasty in Córdoba

‘Alī ibn Hammūd al-Idrīsī, al-Qāsim ibn Hammūd, and Yaḥyā ibn ‘Alī ibn Hammūd:

The reign of al-Musta‘īn bi-llāh deteriorated, leading the people of Córdoba to revolt against him. They sought aid from the amīr ‘Alī ibn Hammūd al-Idrīsī al-Hāshimī, the amīr of Ceuta. He responded to their call and marched in the year 407 AH with an army of Berbers, entered Córdoba, killed al-Musta‘īn, and titled himself "al-Mutawakkil ‘ala Allāh, al-Nāṣir li-dīn Allāh" (The One Who Relies on Allāh, the Defender of Allāh’s Religion). He was harsh on his mamlūks, so they assassinated him in the year 408 AH. His brother, al-Qāsim ibn Hammūd, succeeded him, assuming the title "al-Ma’mūn" (The Trusted One).

In the year 413 AH, the Berbers revolted against him, deposed him, and appointed his nephew, Yaḥyā ibn ‘Alī al-Idrīsī, who took the title "al-Mu‘talī bi-llāh" (The One Exalted by Allāh). However, the Berbers soon deposed him and reinstated his uncle, al-Qāsim ibn Hammūd, pledging allegiance to him and bestowing upon him the title "Amīr al-Mu’minīn" (Commander of the Believers). Subsequently, they deposed al-Qāsim and reinstated his nephew Yaḥyā for the second time.

Return of Rule to the Banū Umayya

Al-Mustazhir, al-Mustakfī, al-Mu‘tad:

The people of Córdoba deposed Yaḥyā ibn ‘Alī and pledged allegiance to an Umayyad named ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (the Fifth), ibn Hishām ibn ‘Abd al-Jabbār ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir, as the khalīfah, who took the title "al-Mustazhir bi-llāh" (The One Who Seeks Victory with Allāh). However, he ruled for only a month and a half in the year 413 AH before being deposed. An Umayyad named Muḥammad (the Third), ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn ‘Ubayd Allāh ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir, was then appointed, assuming the title "al-Mustakfī bi-llāh" (The One Who is Content with Allāh). After four years of his rule, he was deposed, and another Umayyad, named Hishām (the Third), ibn Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir, was appointed, taking the title "al-Mu‘tad bi-llāh" (The One Who Relies on Allāh). The people of Córdoba became weary of his poor governance, so they deposed him and expelled him from Córdoba in the year 422 AH, marking the end of the Banū Umayya dynasty in al-Andalus.

Establishment of the Banū Jahwar Dynasty in Córdoba

After the deposition of al-Mu‘tad bi-llāh, the people of Córdoba appointed the wazīr Abū al-Ḥazm ibn Jahwar as their ruler. He managed affairs until his death in the year 435 AH, succeeded by his son Abū al-Walīd Muḥammad ibn Jahwar. He remained in control of Córdoba until its people deposed him in the year 462 AH, and his son ‘Abd al-Malik succeeded him. He misgoverned, leading to his expulsion from the city.

Annexation of Córdoba to Seville

After the deposition of ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Jahwar in the year 468 AH, al-Mu‘tamīd ibn ‘Abbād, the amīr of Seville, marched on Córdoba, conquered it, and brought an end to the Banū Jahwar dynasty and the state of Córdoba.

The Almoravid Dynasty in al-Andalus

In the year 477 AH, Alfonso VI, the king of León, seized Toledo and reclaimed it from the Banū Dhī al-Nūn. He formed an alliance with the Christian kings of the regions to conquer Seville. Its amīr, al-Mu‘tamid ibn ‘Abbād, sought help from Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn, the amīr of the Almoravid dynasty in the Far Maghrib (present-day Morocco). He assisted him and arrived in al-Andalus at the head of an army of Berbers. He fought Alfonso and his allies in a famous battle that took place at a site known as al-Zallāqah, near Badajoz, on the 12th of Rajab in the year 479 AH. The battle ended with the victory of the Almoravids and the crushing defeat of the Spanish army in a renowned event in the history of Islam.

Following this battle, the Almoravids began seizing the states of the Ṭawā’if (petty kingdoms) one after another, exiling their kings to the Far Maghrib. They established an Almoravid state in al-Andalus, with Córdoba as its capital. Their state lasted until the Almohads, led by ‘Abd Allāh ibn Tūmart, brought it to an end.

The Almohad Dynasty in al-Andalus

The Almoravid states in al-Andalus declined after the death of Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn, and their decline enticed the Christian kings, who allied to eliminate them. The Almohads hastened to repel them, and their armies entered al-Andalus in the year 543 AH. They clashed with the Spaniards in a fierce battle known as the Battle of al-Arak, achieving a clear victory.

Afterward, the Spaniards began preparing for another battle, gathering their forces and mobilizing their armies. They met with the Almohad army in the year 609 AH in a battle known as the Battle of al-‘Iqāb (Las Navas de Tolosa), a decisive battle in which the Spaniards emerged victorious.

The End of the Almohad Dynasty in al-Andalus

After the Battle of al-‘Iqāb, the fate of al-Andalus began to falter. The strongholds of al-Andalus began falling into the hands of the Spaniards. By the year 644 AH, the state of Córdoba, Valencia, Denia, and Murcia had fallen into their hands. Granada, however, remained steadfast behind its fortifications. Eventually, its resistance collapsed, and it fell into the hands of the Spaniards in the year 897 AH (1492 CE). With its fall, Muslim rule in Spain ended, and their state came to an end after a rule that lasted eight hundred years.

Lifespans of Islamic States

Allāh the Exalted said: {And these days [of varying conditions] We give to men and cause them to alternate, that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you; and Allāh does not like the unjust.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 140)

It was narrated from Ḥudhayfah (may Allāh be pleased with him) that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: “Prophethood will remain among you as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then Allāh will raise it when He wills to raise it. Then there will be a khilāfah on the method of prophethood, and it will remain as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then Allāh will raise it when He wills to raise it. Then there will be biting monarchy, and it will remain as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then Allāh will raise it when He wills to raise it. Then there will be oppressive monarchy, and it will remain as long as Allāh wills it to remain, then He will raise it when He wills to raise it. Then there will be a khilāfah on the method of prophethood.” Then he was silent. (Narrated by Muslim)

In a narration by Ibn Ḥammād, from the ḥadīth of Anas (may Allāh be pleased with him), he said: “Then it will be, then a biting monarchy, then an oppressive one, then ṭawāghīt!”

In a narration from Shahr ibn ‘Aṭīyyah from Anas ibn Mālīk, he said: “There will be kings, then tyrants, then ṭawāghīt.”

Reasons for the Collapse of the Islamic Khilāfah

The collapse of the Islamic Khilāfah can be attributed to several reasons. Perhaps the most important of these are:

First: The transformation of the Khilāfah system into a hereditary monarchy

When the Khilāfah passed to the Banū Umayya, they replaced the system of shūrā (consultation) with a system of inheritance within the family, thus beginning the era of "biting monarchy". Mu'āwiyah entrusted the Khilāfah after him to his son Yazīd, and he extracted allegiance for him with money from those who would submit to money, and with force from those who would submit by force. Then the Khilāfah passed to the Banū Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam from the Banū Umayya. After that, the scope of the Khalīfah expanded, and the Khalīfah would entrust his position to two or more of his sons to inherit it one after another in the order he decided, as 'Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān ibn al-Ḥakam did, who entrusted the Khilāfah after him to his sons: al-Walīd, then Sulaymān, then Yazīd, then Hishām. 'Umar ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz mediated between Sulaymān and Yazīd by appointment from Sulaymān.

The system of the Khilāfah in the Islamic state then settled on the system of inheritance, and the bay'ah (pledge of allegiance) became a formal ritual that people accepted, led by princes, dignitaries, and scholars, and solemn oaths were taken from them, including swearing by divorce and manumission so that they would not break them. In the second Abbasid era, no one cared about the bay'ah after the fate of the Khilāfah became in the hands of the dominant foreign leaders from Persians and Turks. The inheritance of the Khilāfah resulted in two fundamental corruptions:

The struggle for power, and the phenomena of tyranny and oppression.

1. The Struggle for Power:

History books are filled with numerous accounts of conflicts among various families over power, and of palace struggles within the same family over the succession to the throne.

Scholars accepted the system of inheritance in the Caliphate as a reality, in order to prevent further sedition. They permitted the Caliph to appoint his son or nephew as his successor, and further allowed him to designate a number of his sons to inherit the Caliphate in a predetermined order. They also accepted the Caliphate of one who seized power through force and the sword, even if he were a transgressor, so that the Muslims would not be without a Caliph. Thus, all Caliphs, kings, and princes who were included in the rule of inheritance or conquest fall under the category of permissibility, whether righteous or impious.

2. The Phenomenon of Tyranny and Injustice:

When the system of the Caliphate transitioned from the principle of consultation (shūrā) to the system of inheritance, and the pledge of allegiance (bay‘ah) became a mere formality, taken willingly or by force.

The power of the kings became absolute, without oversight, acting according to their whims. This resulted in a deviation from the path of Islam and the nullification of the obligation to enjoin good and forbid evil.

It was no longer as Abū Bakr said in his speech when he assumed the Caliphate: "O people, I have been appointed over you, though I am not the best among you. If you see me doing right, then help me; and if you see me doing wrong, then correct me. Obey me as long as I obey Allāh in my rule over you, but if I disobey Him, then you owe me no obedience. Verily, the strongest among you in my sight is the weak until I secure for him his right, and the weakest among you in my sight is the strong until I take from him what is due."

The Caliph's exercise of absolute power resulted in the outbreak of numerous revolutions. Thus, the phenomenon of protesting against injustice and tyranny led to the depletion of the state's resources and weakened its power.

Scholars were divided in the face of tyranny and injustice. Some sought worldly gain and entered the Caliphs' circles, enjoying their share. Some of them even embellished the Caliphs' actions, drawing closer to them. Others sought the Hereafter and strived for it, avoiding the Caliphs and remaining reluctantly silent, refusing any position of authority or judgeship, lest they work under a tyrannical ruler and be held accountable for it, considering their work as a testimony of good conduct from the scholar to the ruler before the subjects, which is among the worst kinds of false testimony. Among these were Imām Abū Ḥanīfah, Imām Aḥmad, Sufyān al-Thawrī, ‘Abd Allāh ibn Idrīs, ‘Abd Allāh ibn Wahb, Wakī‘ ibn al-Jarrāḥ, Ṭāwūs, al-Awzā‘ī, Muḥammad ibn Aslam al-Ṭūsī, Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyib, Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr, and many others. Meanwhile, some took up the resolve to enjoin good and forbid evil practically, rising up to confront tyranny, as did Imām al-Ḥusayn (may Allāh be pleased with him), the Qur’ān reciters who rose against al-Ḥajjāj, and Aḥmad ibn Naṣr al-Khuzā‘ī during the reign of the Abbasid Caliph al-Wāthiq. However, all those attempts did not lead to the removal of injustice for reasons that would take too long to explain. The righteous ultimately resorted to isolating themselves from the palaces and their rulers, speaking the truth, or withdrawing from them, preferring the safety of their religion.

This group includes those who practiced asceticism and Sufism, turning away from the world and its people, devoting themselves to the worship of Allāh and contemplation of His kingdom. Their souls were purified, and they were granted spiritual pleasure that no material pleasure could match. With this group began the era of Sufism as a phenomenon of rejecting the luxurious life and protesting against the prevalence of injustice and tyranny.

The phenomenon of injustice intensified during the second Abbasid era and multiplied with the division of power between the Caliphs and those who seized power. Methods of killing, blinding, blowing, bloodletting, mutilation, imprisonment in dungeons, torture, dying of thirst and hunger, being thrown under the feet of elephants, and being cast into the dens of lions were added. The Caliph or the conquering leader would choose one of these methods to kill someone.

The phenomenon of injustice intensified when the rule transitioned from the "biting kingship", as was the case with the Umayyads and Abbasids, to the stage of "compulsive kingship", as was the case with most of the rulers who seized power and the princes and kings of the independent states fighting for power and authority. Only a few shining exceptions of righteous kings and princes passed through the sky of the history of most kings and sultans, like gleaming stars in the sky of injustice and darkness.

The intensification of the phenomenon of injustice since the second Abbasid era led to the activity of Sufism and the rallying of the common people around the Sufis, finding solace and reassurance in them, and seeking in their company patience to bear injustice and consolation of the soul with Allāh's promise of vengeance for them. This was after the increasing separation between authority and the Qur'ān, as the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had foretold. As we enter our modern history, the era of the ṭawāghīt foretold by our Master, the Chosen One (peace and blessings be upon him), emerged, starting from the late Ottoman Empire, then the colonial governments, and then the governments of what was called "independence." We reached a stage of confrontation between authority and the Qur'ān, not merely a separation between authority and the Qur'ān. Some evidence of this will be mentioned in the following chapters of the book, if Allāh wills and facilitates. To Allāh belongs the command, before and after.

Second: Marriage to Slave Women and Their Interference in Matters of Governance and Succession

The wives and mothers of the Caliphs during the era of the Rightly Guided Caliphs were from noblewomen and of Arab lineage. The same was true of the Caliphs of the Umayyad era.

Only two Umayyad Caliphs deviated from this rule: Yazīd ibn al-Walīd ibn 'Abd al-Malik and Marwān ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥakam, the last of the Umayyad Caliphs. Yazīd's mother was a Persian named Shāh Farand, daughter of Fīrūz ibn Yazdajird ibn Kistrā, the last Persian king. Marwān's mother was a Berber from the Nafzah tribe in the far Maghreb.

As for the wives and mothers of the Abbasid Caliphs, all were freed slave women, of Persian, Roman, Turkish, Armenian, and Berber origin, except for three: Abū al-'Abbās al-Saffāḥ, al-Mahdī, and al-Amīn. The same was true of the wives and mothers of the Umayyad princes and Caliphs in Andalusia. They were Christian women captured or gifted to the princes and Caliphs, including daughters of Christian kings and princes of Spain.

Among the most famous women in the Abbasid state were al-Khayzurān, wife of al-Mahdī and mother of his two sons Mūsā (al-Hādī) and Hārūn (al-Rashīd); Ṣabīḥah (al-Qabīḥah), wife of al-Mutawakkil and mother of his son al-Mu'tazz; and Shaghab, wife of al-Mu'taḍid and mother of his son al-Muqtadir. Among the most famous women in the Andalusian state were Ṭarūb, wife of the Umayyad prince ‘Abd al-Raḥmān II and mother of his son ‘Abd Allāh; and Ṣubḥ, wife of the Umayyad Caliph al-Ḥakam al-Mustanṣir al-Andalusī and mother of his son Hishām (al-Mu‘ayyad).

This practice was followed by viziers, chamberlains, and the kings of the Ṭawā’if. Al-Manṣūr ibn Abī ‘Āmir married the daughter of Sancho II, King of Navarre, and then the daughter of Bermudo II, King of León. His marriages to them were for political purposes, intended to strengthen him through those he married against his enemies, whether other kings or Muslim princes who had rebelled against him. Al-Mu‘tamid ibn ‘Abbād, the Emir of Seville, married a slave woman from a slave trader named Ibn Rumayk, and she became known as al-Rumaykiyyah. The same was true of the Fatimid Caliphs.

Many of these slave mothers played a role in the state's politics, leading to conflict over the Caliphate and division among brothers and cousins. This was one of the reasons for the state's weakness and collapse.

An example is the influence of al-Khayzurān, wife of al-Mahdī, during her husband's reign. Ministers and dignitaries would stand at her door for their needs. When her son Mūsā (al-Hādī) became Caliph, he wanted to diminish her status and prevent her from interfering in state affairs, so she plotted to kill him, as it is said.

Qabiḥah, wife of al-Mutawakkil, incited her husband to favor her son al-Mu‘tazz over his brother al-Muntaṣir in the succession, which led to the killing of her husband, al-Mutawakkil.

As for Shaghab, she had her meddlings and the final say in the palace of al-Mu‘taḍid and his heir apparent, al-Muqtadir. It suffices to mention that her stewardess was in charge of handling grievances.

Ṭarūb attempted a conspiracy to kill her husband, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Ḥakam, to prevent her son ‘Abd Allāh from competing with his brother Muḥammad for their father's Caliphate. Her husband, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, discovered the conspiracy but overlooked his wife's actions, remaining fond of her and informing her of his discovery due to his great love for her.

Ṣubḥ, wife of al-Ḥakam al-Mustanṣir, imposed her son Hishām as heir apparent when he was not yet eleven years old.

Al-Rumaykiyyah, wife of Ibn ‘Abbād, captivated her husband with her charm and beauty, and he composed tender, lyrical poetry for her. He even spread musk and camphor mixed with rosewater for her to make mud, when she desired to knead mud like the peasant women she had seen from the palace window! She diverted him from state affairs to amusement, which tempted Alfonso VI, the Spanish king, to attack him. Were it not for Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn, leader of the Almoravids, who saved him, driving back the Spaniards and then seizing his kingdom. He exiled him to the far Maghreb with his wife and children to compose poetry in the prison of Aghmāt.

There is no doubt that the foreign mothers shaped their sons with their own morals and instilled in them the traditions they had grown up with. They raised to power sons who were not yet of age, and sons who lived in the luxury of palaces, dominated by amusement and debauchery. Rulers were aided by ministers and commanders who succumbed to their own ambitions and desires, becoming one of the reasons for the state's collapse. ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) spoke the truth.

It is reported in Muṣannaf Ibn Abī Shaybah from Kharashah ibn al-Ḥurr that ‘Umar said: "The Arabs will perish when the sons of the daughters of Persia reach [maturity]." Similarly, it is reported from ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Amr: "The affairs of the Children of Israel remained moderate until there arose among them the sons of the captives of the nations, who spoke among them with [their own] opinion, so they went astray and led others astray."

Third: The Recruitment of Mawālī (Loyalists)

When al-Mu'taṣim ibn al-Rashīd became Caliph, the Arab character of the army changed, and most of the soldiers became Turks. They were brought from Turkestan as children, where they were trained in warfare and fighting. Their status grew during the reign of Caliph al-Wāthiq and later al-Mutawakkil, and some of them rose to the rank of commanders.

From that time on, Islam was in a state of defense of the borders where the conquests of the Rightly Guided Caliphs and the Umayyads had stopped. The mawālī soldiers became mercenaries, who would band together if their provisions were delayed, threatening rebellion. They established rights for themselves upon the installation of a Caliph, known as the "custom of allegiance."

Fourth: A Life of Luxury and Extravagance

Conquests continued and expanded until they reached their peak in the Umayyad era, and the world's blessings were spread upon the Muslims. In the Abbasid era, extravagance reached its peak among the Caliphs, princes, viziers, and the elite. Palaces were built tall, and houses expanded, with beautiful slave girls like ḥūrīs roaming their halls, from every race and color.

The palaces were filled with gatherings of entertainment, frequented by poets who competed in describing the amusement and frivolity that took place, receiving rewards according to their talents and eloquence. The accounts of those gatherings and the extravagance of amusement, debauchery, and even wine that took place in them have been recorded in the collections of poets and books of literature and history.

Among the scenes of amusement, frivolity, luxury, and extravagance is what is reported about the extravagance of Caliph al-Muqtadir. He was wasteful and inclined to pleasures. He distributed the Caliphate's jewels and treasures among his favorites. One of his forms of amusement was that one day he wanted to drink over narcissus flowers in the garden of his palace. It was the time for fertilizing the plants, so he replaced the fertilizer with musk, in the amount needed by the garden, and fertilized with it. He sat drinking all day and night, and continued the next morning. When he got up, he ordered the musk to be plundered, and the servants and workers in the garden plundered it, uprooting it from the narcissus roots, resulting in a great deal of wealth.

Among the scenes of luxury and extravagance were the expenses incurred in the weddings of the Caliphs. In the wedding of al-Rashīd to Zubaydah bint Ja'far ibn al-Manṣūr, al-Rashīd presented what had never been presented to a woman before in terms of jewels, ornaments, crowns, garlands, silver and gold domes, perfume, and clothing. The cost of this wedding from the public treasury – apart from what al-Rashīd spent – reached fifty million dirhams. In the wedding of al-Ma'mūn to Būrān bint al-Ḥasan ibn Sahl, slips of paper with the names of estates, palaces, and gifts were distributed. The slips were placed in pellets of musk and scattered before the bride. Whoever picked up something was entitled to it. The cost of that wedding was estimated at forty million dirhams, excluding what the bride's father spent.

Among the scenes of luxury and extravagance were the circumcisions of the Caliphs' sons. History has preserved for us a detailed description of Caliph al-Mutawakkil's celebration of his son al-Mu'tazz's circumcision. Its expenses reached eighty-six million dirhams. It was said that people had considered the expenses of al-Ma'mūn's wedding excessive, but what was spent on the circumcision of al-Mutawakkil's son overshadowed that.

Similar was what the Andalusian Caliph ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir spent on the circumcision of his grandsons at the palace of al-Zahrā’.

Among the scenes of luxury and extravagance was gluttony in food and marriage. Delicious restaurants spread, and food was served in gold and silver vessels.

The sword of the executioner displaced the balance of justice, silencing the truth. Speaking the truth became a path to destruction, sought by those who desired martyrdom.

The gatherings of the Caliphs and those who followed their example among the sultans were not limited to scenes of luxury and extravagance, but were also filled with amusement and frivolity. Companions engaged in various forms of indecent amusement, and sometimes those present would shed the formality of royalty for more frivolity. The viziers and dignitaries followed their example, and their gatherings included various types of amusement and jokes.

Among the causes and factors of the successive collapse of Islamic states

1. The Ascension of Young Kings to Power

The Ummah was afflicted with what the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold of the "rule of young boys":

From Abū Hurayrah, he said: The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Seek refuge in Allāh from the year seventy, and from the rule of young boys."

Young kings ascended to power, some of them children and some of them adolescents. This began during the Umayyad era. As for the period we are discussing, we mention some of them below:

In the Abbasid State:

- a. Al-Muqtadir succeeded his brother al-Muktafī in the year 295 AH at the age of thirteen.
- b. Al-Muqtadī succeeded his grandfather al-Qāsim bi-Amr Allāh in the year 467 AH at the age of sixteen.
- c. Al-Mustazhir succeeded his father al-Muqtadī in the year 487 AH at the age of seventeen.

In the Seljuk State:

- a. Malik-Shāh II succeeded his father Barkiyāruq at the age of four!!
- b. Maḥmūd ibn Muḥammad ibn Malik-Shāh I succeeded his father at the age of fourteen.

In the Fatimid State:

- a. Al-Zāhir ibn al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh succeeded his father in the year 411 AH at the age of sixteen. His father, al-Ḥākim, had succeeded his father al-‘Azīz in the year 365 AH at the age of eleven!
- b. Al-Mustanṣir succeeded his father al-Zāhir in the year 427 AH at the age of seven.
- c. Al-Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh succeeded his father al-Musta‘lī in the year 495 AH at the age of five!! And I do not know by what laws such an infant would command?!
- d. Al-Zāfir succeeded his father al-Ḥāfiẓ in the year 544 AH at the age of seventeen.
- e. Al-Fā’iz succeeded his father al-Zāfir in the year 549 AH at the age of five!
- f. Al-‘Āḍid succeeded his grandfather al-Ḥāfiẓ in the year 555 AH at the age of eleven.

In the Atabeg State:

- a. ‘Izz al-Dīn Mas‘ūd II succeeded his father Mawdūd ibn ‘Imād al-Dīn Zangī in the year 572 AH at the age of ten!
- b. Nūr al-Dīn Arslān succeeded his father ‘Izz al-Dīn Mas‘ūd in the year 589 AH at the age of ten!
- c. Al-Şāliḥ Ismā‘īl succeeded his father Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd ibn ‘Imād al-Dīn Zangī in the year 569 AH at the age of 11!

In the Ayyubid State:

- a. Al-Manşūr Muḥammad, grandson of al-Nāşir Şalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī, succeeded his father al-‘Azīz ‘Uthmān in the year 595 AH at the age of ten!
- b. Al-Ashraf Mūsā, grandson of al-Malik al-Kāmil I, succeeded his cousin Tūrān Shāh ibn al-Malik al-Şāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb in the year 648 AH at the age of six!!
- c. Al-Malik al-‘Azīz Muḥammad succeeded his father al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī ibn Şalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī in the year 612 AH at the age of three!!
- d. Al-Nāşir Şalāḥ al-Dīn (II) Yūsuf ibn al-‘Azīz Muḥammad succeeded his father in the year 634 AH at the age of seven!

In the Mamluk State:

- a. Al-Malik al-‘Ādil Salāmish succeeded his father al-Malik al-Zāhir Baybars in the year 678 AH at the age of seven.
- b. Al-Malik al-Nāşir Muḥammad ibn al-Malik al-Manşūr Qalāwūn succeeded his father (in his first reign) in the year 693 AH at the age of nine. In his second reign, he was fourteen.

c. Al-Malik al-Ashraf Kujuk succeeded his father al-Nāṣir Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn at the age of seven!

d. Al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl ibn al-Nāṣir Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn succeeded his brother Shaʿbān at the age of seventeen.

e. Al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ḥasan succeeded his brother Sayf al-Dīn Ḥājjī ibn al-Nāṣir Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn at the age of eleven.

In the Umayyad State in Andalusia:

Hishām II al-Muʿayyad ibn al-Ḥakam al-Mustanṣir succeeded his father in the year 366 AH at the age of ten.

In the Almoravid State:

Ishāq ibn ʿAlī ibn Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn succeeded his nephew Ibrāhīm ibn Tāshfīn in the year 541 AH at the age of ten.

In the Almohad State:

Al-Mustanṣir Abū Yaʿqūb ibn Muḥammad al-Nāṣir succeeded his father in the year 611 AH at the age of sixteen.

The number of children, youths, and adolescents who ascended to power that we have mentioned is not exhaustive, but rather by way of example. The system of succession in the Islamic states allowed the son to succeed his father or brother even if he did not possess the qualifications for rule. This is not in accordance with the Sharīʿah of Islam, because the conditions for the Caliphate are that the selection of the Caliph should be based on the principle of shūrā and that he should be mature, of sound mind, and knowledgeable, in addition to other conditions.

The system of succession in the kingship and the ascension of young people to power led to competition among viziers and princes for guardianship over them or to act on their behalf. Because whoever attained that position would have the actual power in governance and in the disposal of the state's funds as he wished, becoming extremely wealthy. If one of them was chosen, a celebration of the Caliph's succession would be held, and he would be adorned with the regalia of kingship and clothed in its garments. If the Caliph was young, the appointed guardian would carry him and enter the place of celebration. The young one might be frightened by what he witnessed and start crying, and his distress might intensify, and something alarming might happen to him, as happened to al-Fā'iz al-Fāṭimī – who was five years old – when the vizier al-'Abbās ibn Abī al-Faraj al-Ṣanhājī carried him and entered the place of celebration. The boy was frightened by what he saw and urinated on the vizier's shoulder, showering His Excellency the Vizier with his generosity!!

If the Caliph was a youth, they would confine him to the palace after the celebration of his succession, shield him from the people, and gather young boys of his age to play with him. If the Caliph was an adolescent, they would distract him with slave girls and with all that would tempt someone of his age of various kinds of pleasures and indecent amusement, as happened to al-Zāfir ibn al-Ḥāfiẓ al-Fāṭimī when he was sworn in as Caliph after his father at the age of seventeen.

2. The Struggle for Power

The fragmentation of the Islamic world into many small states led to conflict among their kings and a bitter struggle that led to their collapse and demise. The accession of young children and youths to the throne also led to their deputies (atabegs) monopolizing power and plotting against each other to seize this power and rule independently.

a. In the Seljuk State:

Ṭughril Beg I, the founder of the Seljuk state, had appointed his nephew Sulaymān ibn Dāwūd as his successor. When Ṭughril Beg died in 455 AH, Alp Arslān ibn Dāwūd seized the Sultanate from his brother Sulaymān. Then his cousin Qutalmish ibn Arslān Bīghū rebelled against him. Alp Arslān fought him and killed him.

Malik-Shāh succeeded his father Alp Arslān after his death in 465 AH. Sulaymān ibn Qutalmish rebelled against him and managed to extend his influence over a large part of Asia Minor (Anatolia), as we have explained before. In 466 AH, Qāwurt ibn Dāwūd rebelled against his nephew Malik-Shāh. Malik-Shāh met him near Hamadān, captured him, and then killed him.

In 473 AH, Tutush ibn Alp Arslān rebelled against his nephew Malik-Shāh and seized some cities of Khorasan. Malik-Shāh made peace with him on the condition that Tutush would rule the lands of Syria. He ruled them and established a Seljuk state there, as we have previously explained.

In 486 AH, Malik-Shāh died and his son Barkiyāruq succeeded him as the supreme Sultan over the Seljuks. Tutush sought the Sultanate for himself and headed to Isfahan to fight Barkiyāruq for it. A decisive battle took place between them in 488 AH, in which Tutush was killed.

Barkiyāruq had barely finished fighting his uncle Tutush when his two brothers, Sanjar and Muḥammad, sons of Malik-Shāh, disputed the supreme Sultanate with him. Wars ensued between them, leading to weakness and decline, and ending with the Khwarazmian state seizing the Seljuk state in the East.

b. In the Fatimid State:

The Fatimid state reached its peak of prosperity and greatest extent during the reign of al-Muʿizz li-Dīn Allāh. It then began to decline and collapse during the reign of his great-grandson al-Mustanşir ibn al-Zāhir ibn al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh. This decline is due to the following factors:

a. The young age of al-Mustanşir. He was sworn in as Caliph after his father al-Zāhir in 427 AH at the age of seven. Slave girls and eunuchs took care of him and supervised him, and the affairs of state were left in the hands of his mother and his vizier Abū Manşūr Şadaqah ibn Yūsuf al-Fallāḥī.

Al-Mustanşir's mother was a black slave woman of a Jew named Abū Sa'd Ibrāhīm ibn Sahl al-Tustarī. Al-Zāhir had bought her from him and she bore his son al-Mustanşir.

When al-Mustanşir succeeded his father, Abū Manşūr Şadaqah al-Fallāḥī became his vizier. He was a Jew who then claimed to have converted to Islam. The status of Jews rose during his vizierate, and they were assigned positions in the state. Al-Mustanşir's mother appointed her master, Abū Sa'd al-Tustarī the Jew, as her advisor and entrusted him with managing her properties. The Jew began to persecute Muslims.

b. The vizier al-Fallāḥī and the advisor al-Tustarī began to dispute power. Al-Fallāḥī won over the Turkish soldiers, who killed al-Tustarī by his order. Al-Mustanşir's mother resented al-Fallāḥī and began buying black slaves, who killed al-Fallāḥī. Sedition broke out between the Turks and the slaves, and the commander Badr al-Jamālī, the Emir of Acre, was summoned. He came to Egypt in 455 AH and quelled the sedition.

c. Badr al-Jamālī died in 487 AH, and his son al-Afḍal Abū al-Qāsim Shāhanshāh succeeded him in the vizierate and as commander of the army. Al-Mustanşir had married al-Afḍal's sister and she bore him a son named Aḥmad. He had another son from another wife named Nizār, who was his eldest son and whom he had designated as his successor.

Al-Mustanşir died shortly after Badr al-Jamālī. Al-Afḍal appointed his sister's son Aḥmad as Caliph, giving him the title al-Mustaʿlī, and killed Nizār. This led to the splitting of the Fatimid Ismāʿīlīs into two factions: the Mustaʿlīs and the Nizārīs.

d. During the days of al-Mustaʿlī, the First Crusade swept through the Levant in 492 AH and seized Antioch and the coastal cities, which were independent emirates. Then they seized the city of Jerusalem in 493 AH. The Fatimid garrison was unable to defend it, so the Crusaders invaded it, and a great catastrophe befell it. The Crusaders established it as the capital of their kingdom there.

e. In 495 AH, al-Mustaʿlī died and his son ʿAlī succeeded him at the age of five. They gave him the title al-Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh, and al-Afḍal ibn Badr al-Jamālī took control of the government and ruled independently. When al-Āmir grew up, he became weary of him and decided to kill him. The killing was carried out by a man close to al-Āmir named Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Baṭāʾihī, whom al-Āmir had promised the vizierate. He killed him and succeeded him in the vizierate in 515 AH, taking the title al-Maʾmūn.

f. Al-Āmir had a brother named Jaʿfar, who coveted the kingship. He conspired with al-Baṭāʾihī to kill his brother al-Āmir. Al-Āmir sensed this and killed al-Baṭāʾihī in 519 AH. Then al-Āmir met the same fate when a group of Nizārī Ismāʿīlīs (who were adversaries of the Mustaʿlī Ismāʿīlīs) ambushed him and killed him as he was crossing the bridge to Rawḍah Island. They were then arrested and killed.

During the days of al-Āmir, the Crusaders seized Tripoli in 502 AH and then seized ʿArqa, Bāniyās, Beirut, and Sidon. They surrendered the city of Tyre in 518 AH and attempted to invade Egypt.

g. After the killing of al-Āmir, ʿAbd al-Majīd ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Mustanşir succeeded him, taking the title al-Ḥāfiẓ. He appointed Aḥmad ibn al-Afḍal ibn Badr al-Jamālī as vizier. Aḥmad was soon assassinated, and al-Ḥāfiẓ appointed his son al-Ḥasan as vizier, who was his heir apparent. He misbehaved, killing many princes, confiscating wealth, and threatening to kill those princes who had survived. His father, al-Ḥāfiẓ, killed him with poison.

h. Al-Ḥāfiẓ died in 544 AH, and his son Ismāʿīl succeeded him, taking the title al-Ẓāfir, at the age of seventeen. They appointed Sulaymān ibn Maṣār as his vizier. He remained in the vizierate for two months, and Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī ibn Sallār, the governor of Alexandria, rose against him and seized the vizierate from him, taking the title al-ʿĀdil Sayf al-Dīn.

In 548 AH, he was assassinated by his foster son, Naṣr ibn al-ʿAbbās ibn Abī al-Futūḥ al-Ṣanhājī. His father, al-ʿAbbās, assumed the vizierate. It is said that al-Ẓāfir was infatuated with his son Naṣr, so his father incited him to kill him. He killed him and threw him into a well. No one knew of his death, and al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣanhājī accused al-Ẓāfir's two brothers of killing him and killed them. He entered the palace and brought out ʿĪsā ibn al-Ẓāfir, who was five years old, carried him on his shoulder, and entered a council of dignitaries and scholars. They pledged allegiance to him, and he was given the title al-Fāʾiz. The child looked at the crowded scene and heard the noise of the people, became frightened, and urinated on the vizier's shoulder, as we mentioned before. Al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣanhājī assumed the vizierate, taking the title al-Afḍal Rukn al-Dīn. The affairs of state fell to him, and he ruled independently, violating lives and wealth. He was soon revolted against by the soldiers and the people, who sought the help of the Emir of Upper Egypt, Ṭalāʾiʿ ibn Ruzzīk. He headed to Cairo and managed to arrest al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣanhājī and his son Naṣr and kill them. He appointed Shāwar ibn Mujīr al-Saʿdī as his successor as Emir of Upper Egypt.

i. Ṭalāʾiʿ ibn Ruzzīk assumed the vizierate as successor to al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣanhājī, taking the title al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ. He became independent in state affairs, selling governorships to princes and accumulating wealth. His conduct deteriorated, and the palace officials became weary of him, and the people were fed up with his actions. Al-Fāʾiz was under the guardianship of his great-aunt, who began to prepare to kill him.

When he learned of this, he hastened to kill her and transferred the guardianship of al-Fā'iz to his younger aunt.

In 555 AH, al-Fā'iz died at the age of ten, and Ṭalā'i' brought a grandson of al-Ḥāfiẓ al-Fāṭimī named 'Abd Allāh ibn Yūsuf ibn al-Ḥāfiẓ, who was a child of eleven years old. He was sworn in as Caliph and given the title al-'Āḍid, and Ṭalā'i' ibn Ruzzīk continued in the vizierate. Al-Fā'iz's younger aunt, who had taken care of him after the killing of her sister, had resolved to kill him and managed to send a group to assassinate him. They killed him, and his son Ruzzīk ibn Ṭalā'i' succeeded him in the vizierate.

j. Shāwar ibn Mujīr al-Sa'dī, the Emir of Upper Egypt, rebelled against Ruzzīk, coveting the vizierate. He headed to Cairo with a group of Bedouins from Upper Egypt, fought Ruzzīk, killed him, and seized the vizierate. Ḍirghām ibn 'Āmir al-Lakhmī, who was one of Ruzzīk's emirs and aides, disputed the vizierate with him and seized it from him.

k. Shāwar sought help from Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd ibn 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī, the ruler of Syria, in exchange for conditions he pledged. He prepared an army for him led by the commander Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, accompanied by his nephew Yūsuf ibn Ayyūb. The army headed to Cairo and fought Ḍirghām in a battle in which Ḍirghām was killed. Shāwar was restored to the vizierate, and Asad al-Dīn returned to Damascus. When Shāwar became independent in rule, he feared the ambitions of Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, so he allied with the Crusaders and allowed them into Egyptian territory. Nūr al-Dīn sent an army to Egypt led by Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, accompanied by his nephew Yūsuf ibn Ayyūb. They expelled the Crusaders from it and arrested Shāwar and killed him.

l. The Fatimid Caliph al-'Āḍid assigned the vizierate to Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, who died six months later. The Caliph assigned the vizierate to his nephew Yūsuf, giving him the title al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn soon cut off the sermon for al-'Āḍid and gave the sermon for the Abbasid Caliph al-Mustaḍīr bi-Amr Allāh. Al-'Āḍid died, and he was the last of the Fatimid Caliphs. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn became independent in Egypt, and the Ayyubid state was established.

The Egyptian historian Ibn Taghrībirdī commented in his book al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah on the plotting and fighting that took place among those who coveted the vizierate in the Fatimid era: "... This is the way of those in positions of power. If one of them is replaced by another, he desires his destruction, even if the whole world perishes with him. This affliction has continued from those days until our present day."

c. In the Ayyubid State

a. Before his death, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī divided his state, which included Egypt, the Levant, the Hejaz, Yemen, and al-Jazīrah, among his sons, his brothers and their sons, and the sons of his uncles. He gave Damascus and the coastal cities to his son al-Aḡḡal ‘Alī, his eldest son. He gave Egypt and southern Syria to his son al-Malik al-‘Azīz ‘Uthmān. He gave Aleppo and its territories to his son al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī. He gave Jordan and al-Karak to his brother al-Malik al-‘Ādil (I). He gave Baalbek to his brother al-Malik al-Mu‘azzam Tūrān Shāh (I). He gave Yemen to his brother Sayf al-Islām Ṭughtakīn. He gave Hama to his nephew al-Malik al-Muzaḡffar Taqī al-Dīn ‘Umar ibn Nūr al-Dīn Shāhanshāh. He gave Homs to his cousin Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḡammad ibn Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh.

b. These individuals soon began to dispute and quarrel. Al-Malik al-‘Azīz ‘Uthmān tried to wrest Damascus from his brother al-Aḡḡal ‘Alī. He succeeded in doing so in 591 AH, taking control of Damascus and appointing his uncle al-Malik al-‘Ādil as its governor and his brother ‘Alī as governor of Ṣarkhad.

c. In 595 AH, al-Malik al-‘Azīz ‘Uthmān died and was succeeded by his son al-Malik al-Manṣūr Muḡammad, who was ten years old. His uncle al-Malik al-Aḡḡal became his guardian and acted on his behalf.

d. In 596 AH, al-Malik al-Afdal prepared an army and headed to Damascus to seize it from his uncle al-Malik al-‘Ādil Sayf al-Dīn. Al-Malik al-‘Ādil defeated him and headed to Egypt, entering it and deposing the minor king al-Manṣūr Muḥammad. He seized Egypt and appointed his son al-Malik Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad as its governor, giving him the title al-Malik al-Kāmil (I) and making him his heir apparent. He appointed his other son al-Malik al-Mu‘aẓẓam ‘Īsā as governor of Damascus. Thus, the Sultanate in Egypt and Syria was transferred from the sons of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to his brother al-Malik al-‘Ādil and his sons.

e. In 615 AH, al-Malik al-‘Ādil died and was succeeded by his son al-Malik al-Kāmil (I). In 624 AH, al-Malik al-Kāmil wanted to seize Damascus from his uncle al-Malik al-Mu‘aẓẓam ‘Īsā. He wrote to King Frederick II of Germany, seeking his help against his uncle and promising him that if he took Damascus, he would hand over Jerusalem to him. King Frederick was then in Cyprus with a Crusader army he had prepared to come to the Levant and reclaim Jerusalem from the Muslims. He had been delayed in preparing it and had been excommunicated by the Pope. Frederick responded to al-Malik al-Kāmil's request and came to the city of Acre in 626 AH. Al-Malik al-Mu‘aẓẓam ‘Īsā had died before his arrival and was succeeded in Damascus by his son al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd.

Al-Malik Dāwūd found that he was unable to fight his uncle with the Crusaders, so he ceded Damascus to him. Al-Malik al-Kāmil compensated him with al-Karak, Ṣarkhad, and al-Shawbak. Al-Malik al-Kāmil appointed his brother al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl as governor of Damascus. Al-Malik al-Kāmil fulfilled his promise after taking Damascus and handed over Jerusalem to Frederick. He entered it and crowned himself king there in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and returned to his country. Al-Malik al-Kāmil had concluded a peace treaty with him in Jaffa for ten years, stipulating that the Crusaders would not rebuild its ruins and would not build fortresses in it. In 637 AH, al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd managed to seize Jerusalem and expel the Crusaders from it for violating the terms of the Jaffa treaty, and the period specified in it had expired.

f. In 635 AH, al-Malik al-Kāmil died and was succeeded by his son Sayf al-Dīn Abū Bakr, who took the title al-Malik al-‘Ādil (II). The news reached his brother al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn, the Emir of Āmid, al-Ruhā, and Ḥarrān. He refused to recognize his brother and headed to Egypt, gathering his father's Mamluks and deposing his brother, then killing him. The news reached al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl, who resented his nephew Najm al-Dīn and arrested his son ‘Umar – who was in Damascus – and imprisoned him in the citadel of Damascus, where he died.

g. The conflict intensified between al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn and his uncle al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl. Each of them prepared to fight the other. Al-Ṣāliḥ sought help from the Crusaders. The Crusaders answered al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl's request in exchange for their taking over Jerusalem. He was joined by al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd and al-Malik al-Manṣūr Ibrāhīm ibn Shīrkūh II, the ruler of Homs. In the battle that took place near Gaza, something unexpected happened. The soldiers of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl, who were from the Khwarazmians who had fled from the Mongols and refused to fight with the Crusaders, joined the soldiers of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn. The battle ended in a resounding defeat for the Crusaders, and many of them were captured.

h. In 643 AH, al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn took Damascus from his uncle al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl and compensated him with Baalbek, Buṣrā, and their territories. The Khwarazmian soldiers – who had joined al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn – recaptured Jerusalem in that year and expelled the Crusaders from it. Jerusalem returned permanently to the Muslims, after being repeatedly occupied by the Crusaders four times: in 493, 627, 637, and 643 AH.

i. In 647 AH, al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb died during the Seventh Crusade, which was led by King Louis IX of France in 646 AH. The Crusaders were defeated, and the French king was captured. Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb was succeeded by his son Tūrān Shāh, who was a young man with youthful recklessness. He clashed with his father's wife, Shajarat al-Durr, and with his father's Mamluks. She conspired with four of them to kill him, and they killed him. Ibn Taghrībirdī says: "The ones who killed Tūrān Shāh are the same ones whom Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb had previously tasked with killing his brother Sayf al-Dīn Abū Bakr, so the death of his son was decreed at their hands." With the killing of Tūrān Shāh, the era of the Ayyubid state ended, and the Mamluk state (Baḥrī) was established after it.

d. In the Baḥrī Mamluk State

a. Al-Malik Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb had married a Turkish slave girl named Shajarat al-Durr, and she bore him a son named Khalīl, so she was called Umm Khalīl. She became Sultan after the killing of her husband's son, Tūrān Shāh. She then married the Mamluk commander ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak and abdicated the Sultanate to him, making him the first Mamluk Sultan to assume the Sultanate in 648 AH.

b. In 655 AH, Shajarat al-Durr killed her husband ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak because she learned that he intended to betroth the daughter of Prince Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu', the Emir of Mosul. She enlisted the help of her Mamluks to kill him, and they beat him to death with clogs. After his killing, his son ʿAlī was entrusted with his succession. He arrested her and ordered her to be beaten to death with clogs, as she had done to his father.

c. In 657 AH, the Mamluk commander Quṭuz deposed ʿAlī ibn ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak and exiled him from Egypt with his family. He appointed the commander Baybars al-Bunduqdārī as Emir of the armies. The Mongols had invaded the Levant and were heading towards Egypt. Quṭuz advanced to meet them with an army led by Baybars. The encounter took place in a place called ʿAyn Jālūt, where the great battle took place.

Victory was written for the Mamluk army due to the great courage they showed and the skill in warfare displayed by their commander, Baybars. The Mongol army was scattered, and its commander, Kitbuqa Noyan, who was the son-in-law of Hulagu, the leader of the Mongols, was killed.

d. In the aftermath of that battle, the commander Baybars assassinated Sultan Quṭuz. He had been promised that he would be appointed to the kingdom of Aleppo after the Mongols were expelled from it and that he would be entrusted with the Sultanate after him. The Sultan broke his promise, so he assassinated him with a group of Mamluk commanders.

e. Baybars assumed the Sultanate and took the title al-Malik al-Ẓāhir. His Sultanate lasted eighteen years, during which he eliminated the Ayyubid emirates in the Levant and annexed the Levant to Egypt. He expelled the Crusaders from the coastal cities and liberated Antioch in 665 AH. He invaded Cilician Armenia and subjected it to his authority. In 676 AH, he invaded the lands of the Seljuks of Rūm, which were under the protection of the Mongols, and liberated them from them after a great battle that took place in a place called Albistān, where he shattered their army.

f. Al-Ẓāhir Baybars died in 676 AH in the aftermath of the Battle of Albistān. He was succeeded by his son Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad Barakah, who took the title al-Malik al-Saʿīd, at the age of eighteen. Two years into his Sultanate, the Mamluks deposed him for his mismanagement. They appointed his brother, Prince Salāmish, who was seven years old, and gave him the title al-Malik al-ʿĀdil Badr al-Dīn, and they appointed the commander Qalāwūn as his deputy.

g. Qalāwūn soon deposed Badr al-Dīn Salāmish in 678 AH and assumed the Sultanate, taking the title al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Sayf al-Dīn. His Sultanate extended for eleven years, during which he liberated the remaining fortresses and strongholds in the Levant that were in the hands of the Crusaders, including the cities of Latakia and Tripoli. In 689 AH, Qalāwūn died and was succeeded by his son Khalīl, who took the title Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. He recovered from the Crusaders the fortress of Safed and the city of Tartus, then seized Acre after a fierce battle with the Crusaders.

h. In 693 AH, two Mamluk commanders, Baydarā and Lājīn, assassinated Sultan Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Khalīl ibn Qalāwūn, and Baydarā succeeded him. He did not remain in the Sultanate for more than one day, as the commander Kitbughā killed him and those who participated in the assassination of Sultan Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Khalīl. The Mamluks chose Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn, Khalīl's brother, as Sultan. They pledged allegiance to him, and he was given the title al-Nāṣir, at the age of nine.

i. Kitbughā soon deposed Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn, citing his young age, and assumed the Sultanate. The commander Lājīn attempted to assassinate Kitbughā. When he learned of this, he fled to Damascus and abdicated in 696 AH. Lājīn assumed the Sultanate, taking the title al-Manṣūr Ḥusām al-Dīn. Two years later, in 698 AH, he was assassinated, and Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn was restored to the Sultanate, having reached the age of fourteen.

j. In 708 AH, Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn was deposed, and a Mamluk commander named Baybars al-Jāshankīr assumed the Sultanate. He was then deposed after one year (709 AH), and Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn was restored to the Sultanate for the third time, at the age of fifteen. He died in 741 AH, having ruled for 31 years. He was the longest-reigning Mamluk Sultan, the most awe-inspiring, the most intelligent, the best in politics, the most courageous, and the best in management. The Mamluk state reached its peak during his reign, and then his sons succeeded him, and its sun began to eclipse.

k. After Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn, eight of his sons assumed the Sultanate. The first of them was Abū Bakr Sayf al-Dīn, who was given the title al-Manṣūr. He did not last more than one year and was deposed in 742 AH. He was succeeded by his brother Kujuk, who took the title al-Malik al-Ashraf ‘Alā’ al-Dīn, at the age of five. He was deposed in less than a year, and was succeeded by his brother Aḥmad, who took the title al-Malik al-Nāṣir Shihāb al-Dīn. Two months into his Sultanate, his brother Ismā‘īl deposed him and killed him. He took the title al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ ‘Imād al-Dīn. Ismā‘īl continued in the Sultanate for three years, after which he was killed in 746 AH.

His brother Sha‘bān (I) assumed the Sultanate and took the title al-Malik al-Kāmil Sayf al-Dīn. A year into his Sultanate, he was deposed, imprisoned, and killed in his prison. He was succeeded by his brother Ḥājjī (I), who took the title al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Sayf al-Dīn. In less than a year, he was deposed and killed by slaughter. His brother al-Ḥasan was appointed in 748 AH, and he took the title al-Malik al-Nāṣir Nāṣir al-Dīn. He was succeeded in 752 AH by his brother Ṣāliḥ, who took the title al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. The Sultanate of the Baḥrī Mamluks extended after him until 784 AH, then it was transferred to the Burjī Mamluks, who, like the Baḥrīs, were Turkish and Circassian Mamluks. Their Sultanate ended with the Ottoman conquest in 922 AH.

e. In the Almoravid State

The Almoravid state reached its zenith during the reign of Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn and his son ‘Alī (453-537 AH). Then the course of its events began to decline. Two kings who had not reached adulthood ruled the Almoravids in their last days: Ibrāhīm ibn Tāshfīn ibn ‘Alī ibn Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn and his cousin Ishāq ibn ‘Alī ibn Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn. The first was sworn in in 540 AH after the death of his father. The Almoravids were unable during his reign to repel the Almohads in a battle that ended in their defeat, the capture of Ibrāhīm, his killing, and the swearing of allegiance to the second after him in 541 AH. When the Almohads occupied Marrakesh, they killed him and the Almoravid princes they found with him, and they put an end to their state.

f. The Almohad State

This state reached its peak of power during the reign of its king Abū Yūsuf Ya‘qūb (580-595 AH), after his victory over Alfonso VIII, King of Castile, in the Battle of Alarcos in 591 AH. Then it began to decline during the reign of his son Muḥammad al-Nāṣir (595-611 AH) following the defeat of the Almohads before the Spaniards in the Battle of Las Navas de Tolosa in 609 AH, then their defeat in the Battle of Uclés in 614 AH during the reign of his son Yūsuf al-Mustaṣṣir (611-620 AH).

Weakness intensified in the state after the deposition of ‘Abd al-Wāḥid ibn Yūsuf I ibn Ya‘qūb in 621 AH and the appointment of Abū Muḥammad ‘Abd Allāh, the son of his brother Ya‘qūb al-Manṣūr, and his giving him the title al-Malik al-‘Ādil. Then he was deposed in 624 AH and killed, and Yaḥyā ibn Muḥammad al-Nāṣir was appointed and given the title al-Mu‘taṣim bi-Allāh. The weakness intensified when his uncle Abū al-‘Alā’ Idrīs ibn Ya‘qūb al-Manṣūr refused to recognize his pledge of allegiance, and the people of Andalusia pledged allegiance to him, and he took the title al-Ma’mūn. The Almohad state divided against itself: a state in Andalusia and a state in the Maghreb. Al-Ma’mūn headed to the Maghreb to seize the kingship from his nephew and to take revenge on those who had killed his brother al-Malik al-‘Ādil. He sought the help of an army of Spaniards, as his mother was one of them. The Spanish king Ferdinand III, King of Castile, provided him with it in exchange for conditions, including that he would give him ten fortresses adjacent to Seville, that he would build a church in Marrakesh for his Spanish soldiers if he entered it, and that if any of his soldiers converted to Islam, their conversion would not be accepted.

Al-Ma’mūn managed to storm Marrakesh, defeating his nephew Yaḥyā al-Mu‘taṣim bi-Allāh and killing the Almohad sheikhs who had pledged allegiance to him. Al-Ma’mūn fulfilled the conditions of the Spanish king, handing over the ten fortresses and building a church in Marrakesh for his Spanish soldiers. He was soon revolted against by his brother Abū Mūsā ‘Imrān ibn Ya‘qūb, the Emir of Ceuta. He headed to fight him and besieged him. In his absence during this siege, his nephew Yaḥyā returned with crowds of Arabs and Berbers and entered Marrakesh. Al-Ma'mūn returned quickly and died on the way in 630 AH. 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Rashīd was sworn in after him, and the conflict continued between the uncles and their sons until the Banū Marīn seized Marrakesh in 668 AH during the reign of the last Almohad king, Abū al-'Alā' Idrīs al-Wāthiq bi-Allāh, nicknamed Abū Dabbūs. With this, the Almohad state ended, and the Banū Marīn state was established on its ruins.

g. In the North African States

After the elimination of the Almohad state, which controlled North Africa from Tunisia to Marrakech, three states arose: the Banū Marīn state in the far Maghreb, with its capital in Marrakesh; the Banū Ziyān state of the Banū 'Abd al-Wād in the central Maghreb (Algeria), with its capital in Tlemcen; and the Banū Ḥafṣ state in the near Maghreb (Tunisia), with its capital in the city of Tunis.

They were exhausted by wars, revolutions, and seditions that arose among them, distracting them from supporting their brothers in Andalusia. They handed them over to the Spaniards, and they themselves were subject to Spanish and Norman invasions until the Ottomans conquered Algeria in 962 AH, then Tunis in 982 AH. The Banū al-Ḥasan al-'Alawī state was established in Marrakesh in 916 AH.

3. Indulgence in Amusement and Debauchery

In addition to those reasons that led to the fragmentation of the Islamic state, its division into states, then the acceleration of its collapse and its exposure to invasions that came from the East and the West, another reason is added, coming from the misconduct of some rulers and their indulgence in amusement and debauchery. These are often those who assumed the kingship as children, with deputies appointed over them who work to occupy them with amusement and divert them from the affairs of government so that they can rule independently without them. If the boy reached the age of youth, his instincts were awakened, and he began to indulge in his desires, leaving the affairs of state to his viziers and deputies. There are many examples of this, and we present some of them.

Ibn Taghrībirdī narrated in his book al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah that "al-Mustaṣir al-Fāṭimī succeeded his father al-Zāhir at the age of seven and grew up loving amusement and debauchery. When he grew up, his affairs had diminished due to his preoccupation with amusement, drinking, and entertainment. It was his custom every year to ride on nujub (excellent camels) to a place near Cairo called Jubb ‘Umayrah, which was a place of recreation. He would go out to it pretending that he was going out for Hajj, by way of mockery and jest, with wine in rawāyā (containers) instead of water, and he would give it to the people to drink as the pilgrims are given to drink on the way to Mecca."

What can we say about a Caliph whose country was struck by drought for seven years until people ate the dead and the flesh of children, who does what is narrated about him and mocks a pillar of religion? We see him during his Caliphate having succumbed to the authority of his vizier Badr al-Jamālī, with no say in anything.

Similarly, Ibn Taghrībirdī narrates: "Al-Malik al-Mas‘ūd Yūsuf Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn II, known as Atsiz, the son of al-Malik al-Kāmil al-Ayyūbī, had been appointed by his father in 611 AH. He seized Mecca in 619 AH. He would sleep in the Dār al-Mas‘ā (House of Sa‘y) drunk, and his aides would go out to prevent people from shouting and making noise in the Mas‘ā."

Then, here is what Ibn al-Athīr narrates about Jalāl al-Dīn Mingburnu, the last of the Khwarazmian kings: "This king loved a eunuch servant of his named Qalīj. It happened that the servant died, and the king showed such grief, panic, and distress over him that the like had never been heard of, not even for Majnūn Laylā. He ordered the soldiers and princes to walk in his funeral on foot. His death was in a place several farsakhs away from Tabriz – the capital of the state. He walked behind his coffin on foot, and his princes forced him to ride. When he reached Tabriz, he sent to the people of the city, ordering them to go out to receive the coffin of the servant, and they did. He rebuked them for not showing more grief and crying than they did and wanted to punish them for that. His princes interceded for them, so he left them.

Then he did not bury the servant but rather took him with him wherever he went, slapping his face and crying, and refusing to eat or drink. If food was presented to him, he would say: 'Take it to so-and-so,' meaning the servant, and no one dared to say that he was dead. If it was said that he was dead, the speaker would be killed. So they would carry the food to him and say to the king: 'He kisses the ground and says, now I am better than I was.' Then his princes abandoned him, and he remained bewildered, not knowing what to do. He sent for his vizier and won him over, but when he came to him, he killed him."

There is a report about al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn II, the son of al-ʿAzīz Muḥammad, the son of al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī, the ruler of Aleppo. He assumed the kingship at the age of seven and grew up loving amusement, leaving the affairs of state to his viziers. When the Mongols invaded Aleppo in 657 AH, he left it for Damascus.

The author of Nafḥ al-Ṭīb narrates that the Andalusian writer Mūsā al-ʿAnsī (d. 685 AH), when he traveled to the East, came to Damascus, where al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, mentioned above, was. The Mongols had wreaked havoc in Aleppo with killing, captivity, and destruction. He entered upon al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to console him for what the Mongols had done to the city of Aleppo and the calamities and tribulations that had befallen it. Al-Nāṣir ignored that and recited verses about a beloved slave of his who had been killed in that disaster. He was not weeping for the loss of his kingdom but rather weeping for the loss of his beloved. Then we see him wandering aimlessly until he took refuge with Hulagu, the king of the Mongols, accompanied by his brother al-Malik al-Zāhir Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī (II) and other princes from the Ayyubid house. Hulagu treated them well, but when he learned of the defeat of the Mongols at ‘Ayn Jālūt in 658 AH, he killed him and those who were with him of the princes.

Similarly, Ibn Ṭabāṭabā narrates in his book Tārīkh al-Duwal al-Islāmiyyah that Caliph al-Musta‘ṣim bi-Allāh, the last of the Abbasid Caliphs in Baghdad, was extremely fond of amusement and listening to songs. His gathering was rarely devoid of that for even an hour. His companions and his entourage were all immersed with him in enjoying pleasures, not caring for his well-being. Notes were written to him by the common people, containing various warnings, and poems were thrown at the doors of the Caliphate.

All this while he was devoted to listening to songs, and his kingdom had become weak in its foundations. It was famous about him that he wrote to Prince Badr al-Dīn Lu’lu’, the ruler of Mosul, asking him for a group of entertainers. At that time, Hulagu's messenger arrived, asking Badr al-Dīn for catapults and siege equipment to besiege Baghdad. Badr al-Dīn said: "Look at what is being requested and weep for Islam."

Turning to the Mamluk state, we find that some of its rulers were so infatuated with slave girls that they neglected the affairs of state, leaving them in the hands of their deputies. Among them was al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl ibn al-Nāṣir Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn. His obsession with slave girls consumed him, and they ultimately held sway over the state. Preoccupied with women and entertainment, he abandoned the responsibilities of ruling and showed a particular preference for black slave girls.

One black slave girl named Ittifāq, renowned for her skill in playing the lute and singing, captured his heart. He loved her deeply and even married her. His brother, al-Malik Sha‘bān, also fell in love with her. After al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl died in 746 AH, al-Malik Sha‘bān succeeded him—and shockingly consummated the marriage with Ittifāq on the very night of his brother's death.

When al-Malik al-Kāmil Shaʿbān was deposed and killed in 747 AH, his brother al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Ḥājī took the throne—and married Ittifāq on the night of his brother's deposition. She sang for him that night, and in return, he gifted her four gemstones and six pearls valued at four thousand dinars. Thus, Ittifāq became the wife of three successive sultans from the house of Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn. Each time, a judge would officiate the marriage contract, despite knowing that it was legally invalid due to the required waiting period following the death of a husband.

This black slave girl attained a level of power and favor with the three brothers that no other woman of her time could match.

Why not? After all, the poet Majnūn Laylā once said of his black beloved:

*"They say you are black, Abyssinian...
And were it not for the blackness of musk, it would not be sold dearly."*

It seems fitting for such a libertine to compose his own verse:
"Were it not for the blackness of tar..."

To Allāh belong the affairs of His creation.

The Impact of the Foregoing Reasons on the Life of Islamic Society

It was natural that these reasons would be reflected in the political, economic, and social life of Islamic society.

In Political Life: Division of the Word and the Enmity of Enemies

The Islamic state lost its unity and began to disintegrate from the beginning of the first Abbasid era. Its disintegration increased in the second Abbasid era. In the East, the Buyid, Samanid, Ghaznavid, and Seljuk states arose. In Africa, the Idrisid state arose in the far Maghreb, and the Fatimid state in the near Maghreb, Egypt, and the Levant. In Andalusia, the Umayyad state arose. The Caliphate was divided among these states: an Abbasid Caliph in Baghdad, an Idrisid Caliph in the far Maghreb, a Fatimid Caliph in Egypt, and an Umayyad Caliph in Cordoba, and princes who overpowered some regions and became independent in them. There was no lasting peace between those states and emirates. Rather, wars often erupted between them, in addition to the revolutions and uprisings that punctuated them. This ended in a state of weakness and frailty, unable to repel the Christian aggression that was watching them, encircling them from the East and the West. With the division of Muslims into warring states and their dispersal into hostile factions, they were unable to unite to face the aggression that befell them.

In the period between 477 and 493 AH, Alfonso VI, King of Spain, seized Toledo, and El Cid, the leader of the Spanish mercenaries, seized Valencia in 487 AH. Alfonso VI intended to seize Seville, but the Almoravids saved it, overthrew the rule of the Ṭawāʾif princes, and established a state for themselves in Andalusia.

In the period between 487 and 498 AH, Pope Urban II called upon the feudal lords of Europe to seize the Levant and save Jerusalem from the hands of the Muslims. One of the reasons for this was the Fatimid Caliph al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh's demolition of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

The Pope's call united their ranks, which had been divided by the wars that had broken out among them. They led the First Crusade. The conflict between the Seljuk kings, as we noted before, allowed them to cross the lands of Anatolia, to occupy the city of Nicaea and then the city of Konya, and to invade the Levant. There, they seized Maʿarrat al-Nuʿmān and Antioch. Then they followed the coast and seized Tripoli, then Haifa, Jaffa, Caesarea, and Ramla. Then they turned to the city of Jerusalem and seized it on April 23, 493 AH, the year in which the city of Toledo fell to the Spaniards.

In Jerusalem, the leader of the Crusader army, Godfrey of Bouillon, permitted the Crusaders to kill, plunder, and violate honor. They did not fall short in what was permitted to them. They installed their leader as king over Jerusalem. Then they headed to Damascus and besieged it. A delegation of the city's residents, headed by the judge of Damascus, Zayn al-Dīn Abū Sa'd al-Harawī, went to Baghdad to seek the help of Caliph al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh. The Caliph showed his helplessness and wept, and the delegation wept for his helplessness. The people of Damascus managed to repel the Crusaders.

The Crusaders then headed to Acre and Byblos and seized them. The Crusader campaigns continued, and they seized many sites in the Levant, where they built castles and fortresses. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī united the Muslim forces after his elimination of the Fatimid state, and the expulsion of the Crusaders was achieved at his hands.

In Economic Life

The well-being of the economy depends on a fundamental factor: security. Without it, work, production, exchange, and trade cannot continue. The most hindering factor to security is revolutions. Many revolutions broke out in the Umayyad era and in the first Abbasid era, occupying the two states. However, they did not detract from the activity of economic life due to the availability of power to suppress them, and because people were enjoying a comfortable life from the bounties of the conquests. Those revolutions were not revolutions of the poor or the weak, but rather mostly political revolutions, with the conflict revolving around the Caliphate, or seditions stirred up by tribal fanaticism.

Nevertheless, the Islamic lands were afflicted in some of their regions by calamities, including drought and crop failure due to natural disasters, which led to famines and the spread of epidemics. However, this did not last long. As for the second Abbasid era, the poor and the weak revolted against the injustice of the governors and tax collectors. There was the Zanj Rebellion, which lasted fifteen years, during which it killed many people, destroyed many cities, and deprived the land of the hands of the workers, who turned into rebels and destroyers.

This revolution was followed by the Qarmatian Rebellion, which lasted about seventy years. During it, security was disrupted, and thieves wreaked havoc in cities and villages, looting, plundering, and killing. The Bedouins of the deserts were active in attacking trade caravans and raiding pilgrim caravans. Trade stopped, and the pilgrimage was prevented for several years. All of this led to the disruption of economic life, compounded by successive natural disasters, including earthquakes, floods of rivers, and their overflowing onto agricultural lands, and the resulting droughts and famines, followed by epidemics that devastated the people and reaped them.

In Social Life

What Islamic society suffered in its political and economic life from chaos and disorder was reflected in its social life. Political events humiliated it, economic events impoverished it, and its unity was shattered into small states. The life of Islamic society was thus reduced to an upper, luxurious class, gathered around overpowering kings and princes, who embellished their injustice for them to enjoy their gifts, and followed their behavior in what religion and morality deny. And a lower class in which poverty, misery, and deprivation prevailed, driving the humiliated needy to behave in ways that religion also does not permit.

In both classes, among the lower of them, the consumption of wine and the accompanying amusement and debauchery became widespread. It took place in the upper class with manifestations of luxury, and it took place in the lower class in manifestations of degradation and misery. Between the upper and lower classes was the khāṣṣah class, the middle class. It included scholars of jurisprudence, ḥadīth, and interpretation, and the righteous from among the people of asceticism and piety. These, unlike their predecessors, had no position that brought them close to kings and princes, nor a listening ear for a blaming or advising word, nor any authority that enabled them to deter by force what was happening of indecencies. Many people openly drank wine, consuming it in taverns and in parks, and seeking its aged form in monasteries.

These are the general characteristics that marked Islamic society in the second Abbasid era and what followed it. The first Abbasid era paved the way for it, with the prevalence of manifestations of luxury, turning to pleasures, and openly displaying them with much amusement, debauchery, and defiance of religion and morality. This is what we see spread out in the poems of Abū Nuwās and his accounts with Muṭīʿ ibn Iyās, Ḥammād ʿAjrad, and Wālibah ibn al-Ḥubāb, and in the poems of Ibn Harmah, Muslim ibn al-Walīd, and other poets of that era from among the debauchees.

We also see it spread out in books of literature and history, such as al-Aghānī, al-ʿIqd al-Farīd, Nihāyat al-Arab, al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah, ʿUyūn al-Akḥbār, and other books of literature. We also see it scattered in books of history and accounts, such as al-Ṭabarī, Ibn al-Athīr, Murūj al-Dhahab by al-Masʿūdī, Tārīkh Baghdād, Tārīkh Ibn Kathīr, and other history books. All of them are witnesses – although they contain much interpolation and fabrication – to the laxity in implementing the teachings of Islam among the ruling class and those who gathered around it.

The first of the teachings of Islam to recede was justice. It was disrupted by the desires in which the struggle for kingship intensified, and the accompanying injustice and tyranny, practiced by the ruler according to his whim, whether Caliph, king, sultan, or prince. He would take people on suspicion, killing and confiscating wealth, with no one to counter his will. In this atmosphere saturated with injustice, the phenomenon of fear emerged, along with the phenomenon of hypocrisy.

Both are among the factors that disabled the mind from growing, so its giving dried up, its resolutions weakened, and the fearful became isolated from public life for fear of a denunciation by an informer, or exposure to what he feared. He followed the path of asceticism and Sufism in search of safety. Hypocrisy became widespread among the weak of soul, with which the hypocrites embellished the actions of the Sultan, increasing his tyranny, to gain his bounty. In what they do, they are his aides in injustice.

Reliable narrators documented what they witnessed of the phenomenon of injustice and oppression in the era in which they lived. Here is what the traveler Ibn Ḥawqal, who died in 367 AH, recorded in the introduction to his book Ṣūrat al-Arḍ (The Face of the Earth), in which he describes what he witnessed in Baghdad before his journey: "... And what helped me to write this book was the continuation of travel and my displacement from my homeland, with what fate had previously decreed, especially sustenance and impact, and the desire to achieve my goal, with the injustice of the Sultan, the evil of the time, the continuation of hardships and aggression on the people of the East, the familiarity of its sultans with injustice and tyranny, the abundance of calamities and misfortunes, the succession of burdens and disasters, the disruption of blessings, and the drought of rains."

Here is what the philosopher and historian Miskawayh recorded in his book Tajārib al-Umam (The Experiences of Nations), in which he explains the reasons for the weakness of authority and the collapse of rule in the Abbasid era:

"Let the observer consider, were these kings afflicted except by their poor self-preservation, their preoccupation with their pleasures and desires instead of controlling and inspecting their affairs, their neglect of the matter of the news bearers and their failure to know the intentions of their viziers, commanders, and the affairs of their armies, their reliance on coincidences and states that cannot be trusted, and their lack of examining the conditions of the kings before them whose affairs were straightened, how their conduct was, how they controlled their kingdoms and the intentions of their companions with various controls, firstly with the religion that preserves their order and possesses their innermost thoughts, then with trustworthy news bearers and vigilant eyes over those who manage their affairs, and inspecting them day by day and moment by moment, and avoiding antagonizing them as much as possible, and being diplomatic with those who must be treated diplomatically, and striking those who cannot be reformed and whose conduct has no remedy."

Then here is what Imam al-Suyūṭī recorded in his history:

"In the state of the Banū ‘Abbās, the word of Islam was divided, the name of the Arabs was dropped from the dīwān, the Turks were entered into the dīwān, and the Daylamites and then the Turks took control, and they had a great state. The kingdoms were divided into several parts, and in every region there was a ruler who took people by force and ruled them by power."

The princes and Caliphs of Andalusia were no better off than the people of the East. They matched them in luxury, which distracted them from their enemy, who attacked them and expelled them from their homes. In 456 AH, a battle took place between the Muslims and the Spaniards in the village of Paterna, belonging to Valencia. The Spaniards overcame the Muslims, and from there they headed to occupy Valencia.

Ibn Bassām describes to us what happened to the people of Valencia when the Spaniards raided them:

"The Franks descended upon Valencia while its people were unprepared for war. They had grown complacent, indulging in the pleasures of food and drink, and neglected the arts of combat and defense. The Franks initially showed signs of hesitation and weakness, which deceived the people of Valencia into a false sense of security. The Franks manipulated them, tempting them with feigned vulnerability—and the people took the bait. A group of Franks lay in ambush at strategic points around the city.

Unaware of the danger, the people of Valencia went out dressed in their finest clothes, accompanied by their prince, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn ‘Āmir. Just as the people felt at ease, the Franks sprang their trap. They turned on them with ruthless efficiency, slaughtering many and taking others captive. Only those whose fate had spared them managed to escape the carnage. The prince himself narrowly survived.”

Thus it happened to the people of Toledo – as Ibn Bassām says – for Alfonso VI prevailed over them, killed their masses, and among the spoils the Franks took from them, when they went out to them in finery, were a thousand ghifārah (head covering), apart from other things.

There is nothing more concise or eloquent in describing the state of Andalusia at that time, and the state of most of the Muslim kingdoms and emirates that were raided by the Crusaders and the Tatars shortly after that, than what the great Imam Ibn Ḥazm al-Andalusī described of the conditions of Andalusia in the fifth century AH, what the Ṭawā’if kings had brought about. He said, may Allāh have mercy on him, words that you feel the sorrow radiating from between their letters. The most amazing thing about them is that they are suitable for describing our conditions these days under our rulers and their cooperation with the Crusaders against each other and against their peoples.

Ibn Ḥazm said about the rulers of Andalusia in his time, in his book "Al-Talkhīs Fī Wujūh Al-Takhlīs":

*"This is a trial we have been tested with; we ask Allāh for safety. It is a tribulation of evil that has destroyed religions except for those whom Allāh has protected, due to many reasons that would take too long to discuss. The main point is that every governor of a city or fortress in any part of our Andalusia, from beginning to end, is warring against Allāh and His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), and spreading corruption on earth. This is evident in their launching of raids on the wealth of the Muslim subjects who are under the rule of those who oppose them, and their permitting their soldiers to engage in highway robbery. They impose jizyah, taxes, and levies on the necks of Muslims. They empower Jews and Christians over the main roads of the Muslims. They excuse themselves with a necessity that does not permit what Allāh has forbidden. Their aim is to maintain the execution of their commands and prohibitions.

So do not deceive yourselves, and do not be fooled by the evildoers and those who claim to be jurists, who wear the skins of sheep over the hearts of wolves, who beautify evil for the people of evil, and support them in their immorality.

The way out for us is to restrain our tongues completely and in detail, except for enjoining good or forbidding evil and condemning all of them. By Allāh, if they knew that worshipping crosses would facilitate their affairs, they would hasten to it. We see them seeking help from the Christians, enabling them to control the sacred places of the Muslims, and sometimes they willingly give them cities and fortresses, emptying them of Islam and filling them with church bells.

May Allāh curse all of them and send upon them a sword from His swords. As for the one who is unable to do that, I hope that dissimulation (taqiyyah) will suffice him, and that he denies it in his heart. This is despite the fact that if all those who deny it in their hearts were to unite, they would not be overpowered."*

The Weakening of Religious Deterrent and its Effect on the Collapse of the Islamic State

The faith of the early Muslims was pure, untainted by desires, and strong in its sense of justice and all noble morals. This led them to the great conquests, and people entered their religion in droves when they saw the sincerity of their call. They were an example to be followed. But when their successors indulged in the blessings of this world and were excessive in it, they clung to its tails and turned to it with the eagerness of a lover whose guardian is absent.

It can be inferred from the foregoing that the weakening of the religious deterrent in the ruler and the majority of the subjects deviated the Muslims from the path of Islam. Islam established faith as a guardian over the actions of man and provided him with a keen sense in distinguishing between good and evil, between virtue and vice, and between justice and injustice. When desires overwhelm faith, the sense of good, justice, and virtue is lost.

When the oversight of faith over their actions diminished, injustice replaced justice, silencing the voice of truth. The sword of injustice suppressed its power, and strength became the ultimate ruler and the irrevocable judge. Falsehood emerged, strutting in the palaces of caliphs, princes, ministers, and the wealthy, cloaked in all forms of frivolity and debauchery. This distracted them from the interests of the ummah, and corruption spread in governance, judiciary, and administration. Hypocrites leaped to positions of power, some of whom used religion as a ladder to reach them. They contributed to the corruption, aided in injustice, and chaos prevailed, becoming prey for thieves and rogues. A state was established for them in Baghdad, protected by army commanders in exchange for a tribute they collected from what they plundered.

The common people lived in poverty, fear, oppression, and humiliation. Their strength waned, and they lost their ability to fight. Their spirit died down, and they became in a state of servitude, losing their ability to innovate. Time stopped them from progressing, and they watched other nations advance while they were tongue-tied and with shackled hands, unable to move. This was the state of the Muslims in all the countries where their state was fragmented, due to the similarity of the cause.

The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) knew what they would become when he said to them: "The nations are about to call each other [to attack] you as diners call one another to a dish.” They said: “Will that be because of our small number at that time, O Messenger of Allāh?” He said: “No, rather, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like scum, like the scum of the torrent. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and cast weakness (al-wahn) into your hearts.” They said: “What is al-wahn, O Messenger of Allāh?” He said: “Love of the world and hatred of death.”

The Spread of the Phenomenon of Scholars of the Ruler During the Abbasid Period

The corruption of religion and morals is fundamentally based on the corruption of two groups of people: scholars and rulers, as Ibn al-Mubārak (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

“Who corrupted the religion but kings, Evil scholars, and their monks?”

The corruption of rulers is caused by the corruption of scholars, and the corruption of scholars is caused by clinging to the earth and the love of wealth and status. The Proof of Islam, Imām Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī (may Allāh have mercy on him), describing the state of the scholars of his time, after mentioning the stances of the Salaf scholars and their sacrifices for the sake of truth and their disregard for the power of sultans. He lived in the fifth century and witnessed the Seljuk state and the independent kingdoms that existed alongside it, after the bonds of the Abbasid Caliphate had weakened:

“As for now, greed has restrained the tongues of scholars, so they have remained silent. And if they speak, their actions do not support their words, so they do not succeed. If they were truthful and sought the truth of knowledge, they would have been successful. The corruption of the subjects is due to the corruption of the kings, the corruption of the kings is due to the corruption of the scholars, and the corruption of the scholars is due to the dominance of the love of wealth and status. Whoever is dominated by the love of this world cannot hold the common people accountable, let alone the kings and the elite. Allāh is the One sought for help in every situation." (Iḥyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn, 7/92)

As for the great Imām Ibn Taymiyyah, he spent his life in conflict with those who were corrupted among the scholars of the sultans and the Imams of innovation. He was a contemporary of the Mamluk state in the eighth century during the reign of Muḥammad ibn Qalāwūn, while the attacks of the Tatars were ravaging the lands of the Levant. He reached the point of saying, due to what he saw of the hypocrisy of the scholars of the sultans and their compliance with the rulers in their injustice and the corruption of their conditions:

"Whenever a scholar abandons what he knows of the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) and follows the ruling of a ruler that contradicts the ruling of Allāh and His Messenger, he is an apostate, a disbeliever who deserves punishment in this world and the Hereafter!" (Al-Fatāwā, 35/372-373)

As for Ibn Ḥazm, who lived during the time of the kings of the ṭawā'if (petty kingdoms), his statement has already been mentioned, exposing the jurists of the palaces and the scholars of the sultan in his time:

"...they empower Jews and Christians over the main roads of the Muslims. They excuse themselves with a necessity that does not permit what Allāh has forbidden. Their aim is to maintain the execution of their commands and prohibitions.

So do not deceive yourselves, and do not be fooled by the evildoers and those who claim to be jurists, who wear the skins of sheep over the hearts of wolves, who beautify evil for the people of evil, and support them in their immorality..."* The books of history are replete with what the scholars of truth and the Imams of guidance recorded, who distanced themselves from the train of injustice and misguidance, from what they suffered and witnessed of the corruption of the class of scholars of the sultans and their compliance with the rulers.

This was one of the causes of the corruption of conditions that paved the way for the successive divinely ordained punishments, with the raids of the enemies sweeping through the heart of the Muslim lands. Allāh the Exalted said:

{And when We intend to destroy a city, We command its affluent people, but they defiantly disobey therein; so the word comes into effect upon it, and We destroy it with [complete] destruction.} (Al-Isrā': 16)

Thus, the divine laws were carried out on those kingdoms and those who lived in them, rulers and subjects alike.

{And thus is the seizure of your Lord when He seizes the cities while they are committing wrong. Indeed, His seizure is painful and severe.} (Hūd: 102)

Thus, nations passed away, and states vanished, but the bitter lesson remains, and the divine laws continue. Allāh the Exalted said:

{And We had already sent [messengers] to nations before you, [O Muḥammad], and We seized them with poverty and hardship that perhaps they might humble themselves. So when they forgot that by which they had been reminded, We opened to them the doors of every [good] thing until, when they rejoiced in that which they were given, We seized them suddenly, and they were [then] in despair. So the people that committed wrong were eliminated. And praise to Allāh, Lord of the worlds.} (Al-An'ām: 42-45)

Thus, the Romans and the Crusaders attacked the Muslim lands from the west, and the Mongols swept through them from the east. The lands of Islam and the Muslims fell under the hooves of the enemy's horses. History records for us horrors that make children's hair turn white and make bodies shiver, because of what people's hands earned, rulers and subjects alike. And to Allāh belongs the command before and after.

{Indeed in that is a reminder for whoever has a heart or who listens while he is present [in mind].} (Qāf: 37)

Foreign Invasion of the Islamic World

In the midst of those events that prevailed in the Islamic world, from the division of its states and the acceleration of their collapse, the conflict between its kings, sultans, princes, and leaders, and their elimination of each other through wars in the struggle for power and its monopoly.

Amidst these events, the Islamic world was the target of aggression that poured upon it from the west and the east.

- From the west, Christian Europe launched seven Crusades against the Levant and Egypt over two centuries.

In Andalusia, the Spanish Crusades continued, and the Papacy was the instigator of these wars.

- From the east, the Mongol (Tatar) armies invaded the Islamic countries in Mesopotamia and beyond to Iran, Iraq, Asia Minor, and finally the Levant, heading towards Egypt.

The Ayyubid state, and later the Mamluk state, were able to repel these campaigns in two famous battles: Ḥiṭṭīn against the Crusaders and ‘Ayn Jālūt against the Tatars.

As for Andalusia, the conflict for the throne between the kings and their preoccupation with it, rather than the affairs of the conflicting statelets, was the inevitable fate of the end that sealed the Islamic state after a rule that lasted eight hundred years.

The Normans Expel the Muslims from Southern Italy and Sicily

In the year 212 AH, the Arabs conquered the island of Sicily under the leadership of the judge of Qayrawān, Asad ibn al-Furāt, during the reign of Ziyādat Allāh I al-Aghlabī, the Emir of Ifriqiya (Tunisia). Its conquest was completed in the year 248 AH, and the city of Palermo was established as its capital and annexed to the Aghlabid state in Tunisia.

In the year 226 AH, the Arabs crossed the sea from northern Sicily to southern Italy and conquered the city of Bari, annexing it to their state in Sicily.

In the year 297 AH, the Aghlabid state fell with the seizure of it by the Ubaydids under the leadership of Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī, and they annexed it to their state, which they established in Tunisia until the year 336 AH, when the Kalbids in Sicily revolted against the rule of the Ubaydids and became independent under the leadership of al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī al-Kalbī.

In the year 432 AH, the Normans conquered southern Italy under the leadership of Tancred de Hauteville and established a Norman state there, expelling the Arabs from the city of Bari.

In the year 464 AH, the Normans crossed the sea to Sicily under the leadership of Robert Guiscard I and began to expel the Arabs from it. They completed the conquest in the year 480 AH, removing Arab rule and folding its banner, which had been flying for 270 years.

The Crusades: Their Causes and Factors

These wars trace back to three combined factors: religious, political, and economic.

Following a speech delivered by Pope Urban II in the city of Clermont-Ferrand in France on November 26, 488 AH / 1095 AD, in which he responded to a call from the Byzantine Emperor Alexios Komnenos asking for help against the Seljuk Turks and declaring war on them. He wore the garb of an ascetic and became known as Peter the Hermit, and in it, he called for war against the Muslims and the recovery of Jerusalem from their hands.

Three groups responded to the Pope's call and the monk's cry: the poor and the serfs (slaves of the land), the feudal lords, and the merchants. The poor, who were the largest class, lived in poverty and deprivation, ravaged by epidemics that swept through Europe. The same was true of the serfs, who were slaves tied to the lands of the feudal lords, owned by the feudal lord along with the land. These people dreamed of a land with all the blessings and desired the Church's forgiveness for their sins, and this was the spiritual driving force for the war.

As for the feudal lords, they were of two types: a group that possessed the title and wealth, and a poor group that possessed the title but not the wealth. This was because the inheritance law in the feudal system stipulated that the eldest son inherit the title and wealth, while the other sons received the title without the wealth. They were called sans avoir (those who do not possess anything) or sans terre (those who do not possess land).

The feudal lords who owned the fiefdoms were in conflict with each other, and the call for the Crusade was a reason for them to make peace and turn the conflict into fighting the Muslims. As for the lords who did not possess anything, they earned their living by killing and fighting, resenting a society that deprived them. The call to fight the Muslims was a release for them and a turning point in their behavior, so their regiments joined it, hoping for land to own and spoils to enjoy. As for the merchants, they were the owners of the coastal cities who owned ships and dreamed of reaching the shores of the Levant to establish trade relations with its cities. The Italian cities of Genoa, Pisa, and Venice achieved their dreams and reaped great profits in transporting the Crusades and trading with the lands of Egypt and the Levant. The Crusades occurred in seven campaigns over two hundred years:

The First Crusade (491 AH / 1097 AD)

It is divided into two parts:

The People's Crusade: It was led by Peter the Hermit and Bishop Monte, and it consisted of large, unorganized, and uncooperative crowds. Most of them were French, because the call to fight the Muslims came from a French Pope, issued from a French town, and proclaimed by a French monk. Therefore, the Muslims called the Crusaders the Franks, which was the old name for the French at that time, of commoners and rabble, who moved without preparation or arrangement, and relied on looting and plundering along their way. So people fought them along their path in the countries of Eastern Europe, then they passed through Constantinople and crossed from there to Asia Minor, where the Seljuks easily eliminated them.

The Princes' Crusade: It moved in its wake, and this campaign was composed of a mixture of European princes. French princes took charge of leading those crowds, heading with them by land and crossing the city of Constantinople. The campaign managed to cut its way to the border between eastern Anatolia and the Levant, where it split into three divisions. One division headed east and occupied the city of Edessa in 491 AH and established a Crusader emirate there under the leadership of Baldwin I.

Another division headed south and entered the Levant towards the Mediterranean coast, occupying the city of Antioch in 492 AH and establishing another Crusader emirate there under the leadership of Bohemond II the Norman. Then it headed towards Jerusalem, reaching it in 493 AH / 1099 AD and laying siege to it. The Fatimid garrison was unable to defend it, so it surrendered, and the Crusaders entered it on July 15, 1099 AD. They committed massacres against its inhabitants, including Muslims, Jews, and Orthodox Christians. European historians acknowledge the horror of what the Crusaders did. The German historian Zoe Oldenburg says in her book on the Crusades: "The massacre that the Crusaders committed in their invasion of Jerusalem is considered one of the greatest crimes in history."

The Crusaders established a Crusader kingdom in Jerusalem under the leadership of the Duke of Lorraine, Godfrey de Bouillon. In 1100 AD, he headed to besiege Acre, where he was struck by an arrow and killed. He was succeeded by his brother, Baldwin.

The Second Crusade (539 AH / 1145 AD)

In 539 AH / 1144 AD, the Emir of Mosul, 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī, recaptured the city of Edessa from the Crusaders and overthrew its emirate. As a result, a second Crusade was formed under the leadership of Conrad III, King of Germany, and Louis IX, King of France. However, 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī defeated them. After the Assassins assassinated 'Imād al-Dīn Zangī, his son, Nūr al-Dīn Zangī, carried the banner of Jihād against the Crusaders and managed to recapture the city of Antioch in 559 AH / 1163 AD. Thus, the Second Crusade returned after failing to besiege Damascus. Nūr al-Dīn continued his Jihād against them tirelessly throughout his life.

When Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī inherited Nūr al-Dīn's kingdom and established the Ayyubid state, he carried the trust with zeal and dedication. His victories continued until he crowned them with the Battle of Ḥiṭṭīn (583 AH / 1187 AD), where he captured the Crusader King of Jerusalem, Guy de Lusignan, and the leading Crusader princes, and killed Raynald of Châtillon, who had blocked the pilgrimage route and was the cause of the breakdown of the truce between him and them. After Ḥiṭṭīn, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn continued, recapturing Tiberias, Acre, Caesarea, Haifa, Jaffa, and Sidon, which caused the arrival of the Third Crusade.

The Third Crusade (583 AH / 1187 AD)

As a result of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's victories, a third Crusade was formed under the leadership of Frederick Barbarossa I, King of Germany, Philip Augustus, King of France, and Richard the Lionheart, King of England.

Frederick took the land route and crossed Constantinople to the Anatolian mainland and drowned while crossing a river in Cilicia, and his campaign was dispersed. Philip Augustus returned to France after his disagreement with Richard the Lionheart, and they claimed that it was due to his illness. As for Richard the Lionheart, he continued his way, but Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn managed to conquer Jerusalem (583 AH / 1187 AD) and then made peace with Richard the Lionheart, called the Treaty of Ramla in 588 AH / 1192 AD. Richard returned to his country after that.

The Fourth Crusade (595 AH / 1198 AD)

After the recapture of Jerusalem, Pope Innocent III called on the kings of Europe to recover Jerusalem. In 598 AH / 1202 AD, a Crusade was formed, prepared by French princes, including Baldwin IX, Count of Flanders, Theobald III, Count of Champagne, Louis, Count of Blois, and others. Egypt was their target. They agreed with the sailors of Venice to transport them to Alexandria. When King al-ʿĀdil al-Ayyūbī learned of this agreement, he granted the Venetians commercial privileges, and the leaders of the campaign turned to Constantinople, invaded it, and established a Latin state there in 600 AH / 1204 AD. They appointed Baldwin IX as king and declared the Catholic faith. This state continued to exist until 658 AH / 1260 AD. However, some of the campaign's soldiers continued their way and were joined by some Crusaders from the coasts of the Levant, and they attacked the city of Rosetta in the Nile Delta. They failed to enter it and returned disappointed, not achieving their goal as a Crusade.

The Children's Crusade (608 AH / 1212 AD)

After the news of the fall of Jerusalem and the failure of the Fourth Crusade spread, discontent prevailed in the European middle class, and religious enthusiasm increased, even among children. One of them claimed that divine providence had entrusted him with leading the campaign, and some priests joined in promoting it. He headed with the children who led them to the ports of Italy, where ships carried them to the ports of the Levant, where it is said that slave traders betrayed them and sold them in the slave markets in the East.

The Fifth Crusade (614 AH / 1212 AD)

This campaign was formed in 615 AH / 1219 AD under the leadership of John of Brienne, King of Jerusalem, who wanted to protect his possessions in the Levant. The campaign headed to Egypt and captured the city of Damietta due to the illness of King al-Kāmil. Then they headed to the city of Faraskur, during the Nile flood, and the farmers opened the floodwaters on them. Then al-Kāmil's armies attacked them and seized most of their ships and weapons. The Egyptians then recaptured Damietta and expelled the campaign from Egypt.

The Sixth Crusade (625 AH / 1228 AD)

This campaign was prepared by King Frederick II of Germany, at the instigation of the Papacy. He headed with his campaign in 625 AH / 1228 AD to the Levant by sea. King al-Kāmil, the ruler of Egypt, had sought his help to support him against his brother, King al-Mu‘azzam ‘Īsā, in order to wrest Damascus from him according to agreed-upon conditions, including handing over Jerusalem. Frederick arrived with his campaign to Acre. King al-Mu‘azzam ‘Īsā had died and was succeeded by his son, King al-Manṣūr Dāwūd, who made peace with his uncle, King al-Kāmil, and handed over Damascus to him, where he gave him the cities of Salkhad, Shawbak, and Karak instead.

With King al-Kāmil taking control of Damascus, he fulfilled the terms of the agreement and handed over Jerusalem to Frederick, who entered it, crowned himself king, and returned to his country, thus ending the mission of the Crusade he led without a fight.

The Seventh Crusade (647 AH / 1249 AD)

This campaign was prepared by the French King Louis IX, nicknamed - for his piety - Saint Louis, and directed towards Egypt. He saw that recovering Jerusalem through Egypt was easier than recovering it through the Levant. He headed with a naval campaign to Egypt in 646 AH / 1249 AD and captured the city of Damietta due to the illness of King al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb. Then he headed to besiege Mansoura. During the battle that took place there between him and the Muslims, King al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb died, and his wife, Shajar al-Durr, concealed the news. Her son, Tūrān Shāh, and his father's commander and Mamluk, al-Mu'izz Aybak, led the battle, in which victory was written, and the French king was captured along with a number of the campaign's princes. They were imprisoned in the house of Ibn Luqmān and then released for a large ransom.

A Crusader Attempt to Invade Egypt from Ifriqiya

King Louis IX never ceased thinking about invading Egypt and was determined to implement his idea by invading it through Ifriqiya (Tunisia). He led a campaign to it in 669 AH / 1270 AD, but fate was stronger than him. His steed stumbled, and he perished. It is said that his death was due to the plague. Thus, his plan failed and was lost.

After this campaign, the Crusades on the Levant and Egypt stopped, and the princes of Europe turned to their internal wars there. However, the Crusaders' occupation of some of its cities and fortresses remained until the Mamluk state came. King al-Zāhir Baybars al-Bunduqdārī, and after him, King Qalāwūn, mobilized their armies against them and expelled them from the Levant. It was liberated from them after more than two hundred years they spent in some of its regions. The year 648 AH / 1291 AD, the year of the fall of Acre, the last stronghold of the Crusaders in our lands, was the date of cleansing the coasts of the Levant from their defilement.

The Tatar (Mongol) Invasion of the Islamic World

The Mongol state arose under the leadership of a Mongol named Temüjin. He managed to gather the remnants of his tribe and conquer China and Tibet and subdue the peoples surrounding his state. His tribe's elders called him Genghis Khan, meaning the conquering king, and he became known by this title.

He wanted to establish good neighborly relations with the Khwarazmian state, which was the largest Islamic state in the East, and its king at that time was 'Alā' al-Dīn Muḥammad, to secure trade exchange with his country and protect trade caravans with Islamic countries. He sent messengers to him carrying a letter from him requesting that he pledge to secure trade exchange and protect trade caravans. The Khwarazm Shah did not find in the wording of the letter what befits his status. He found that Genghis Khan was addressing him as he would address his son. He reluctantly agreed to his request and suppressed his anger until the incident occurred.

A large caravan carrying valuable goods headed out. When it crossed the borders of Khwarazm and entered the city of Utrar, its governor seized its members, killed them, and confiscated the caravan's goods. It is said that what he did was by order of the Shah of Khwarazm, 'Alā' al-Dīn. When Genghis Khan learned of the matter, he resolved to take revenge. In 614 AH, he headed at the head of a large army, invaded Khwarazm, destroyed its cities, including Samarkand and Bukhara, and killed the inhabitants. 'Alā' al-Dīn Khwarazm Shah could not resist this invasion, so he fled from the Mongols. They followed him and chased him until he reached the Caspian Sea, where he took refuge on an island, where he died in 617 AH, banished and forgotten.

He was succeeded by his son, Jalāl al-Dīn Mingburnu, who was more unfortunate than his father. He spent the period of his reign with the remnants of his soldiers, fleeing from one region to another, until he ended up in 629 AH in Mayyafariqin in the Jazira of Umar. He sought refuge in a nearby village, where someone who assassinated him entered upon him and killed him as a stray. With him, the Khwarazmian state ended.

Genghis Khan returned to his country, and his grandson, Hulagu, took command of the Mongol hordes, heading towards the East, raiding its cities and indulging in killing, captivity, and looting, until his armies surrounded Baghdad in the month of Safar in 656 AH. They invaded it, and his soldiers began destroying it and shedding the blood of its people. Caliph al-Mustaʿsim bi-llāh did not escape the Mongols' wrath, and they killed him with his family on the fourth day of the month of Safar of that year. With his killing, the Abbasid state in Baghdad ended.

Summary of the Conditions of Muslims During the Tatar Invasion According to the Narration of Ibn Kathīr

I will provide a summary of it with some elaboration, due to the lessons, morals, and similarities with our conditions these days. And Allāh is the one sought for help.

Ibn Kathīr (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

In the year 616 AH, the Tatars crossed the Oxus River, accompanied by their king, Genghis Khan, from their lands. They used to dwell in the Tamghaj Mountains of China. The reason for their entry into the Oxus River was that Genghis Khan sent his merchants with a lot of money to the lands of the Khwarazm Shah to purchase clothes for clothing. The deputy of Khwarazm wrote to the Khwarazm Shah, mentioning the large amount of money they had. He sent to him to kill them and take what they had, and he did so. When Genghis Khan learned of their news, he sent threatening the Khwarazm Shah. When he threatened him, those who advised the Khwarazm Shah to march towards them advised him, so he marched towards them while they were preoccupied with fighting Kūshlū Khān. Khwarazm Shah plundered their wealth and captured their offspring and children. They advanced towards him, having been robbed. They fought him for four days, a battle the likes of which had never been heard. Those fought for their families, and the Muslims for themselves, knowing that if they turned away, they would be eradicated. Many were killed from both sides, to the extent that the horses would slip in the blood.

Among those killed from the Muslims were about twenty thousand, and from the Tatars, many times more. Then the two sides separated, and each of them turned to his country. Khwarazm Shah and his companions took refuge in Bukhara and Samarkand, fortified them, and exaggerated the number of fighters he left in them. He returned to his country to prepare.

large armies. The Tatars headed for Bukhara, where there were twenty thousand fighters. Genghis Khan besieged it for three days. Its people asked him for safety, and he granted them safety and entered it. He treated them well out of deception and trickery, but the fortress resisted him. They opened it, and he killed those who were in it. Then he returned to the city and chose the wealth of its merchants and permitted it to his soldiers. They killed a number of its people that only Allāh the Almighty knows, and they captured the offspring and women and committed fornication with them in the presence of their families. Some people fought for their families until they were killed, and some were captured and tortured with various types of torment. Weeping and wailing increased in the city from women, children, and men. Then the Tatars threw fire into the houses, schools, and mosques of Bukhara, and they burned until they became desolate ruins. Then they turned back, heading for.

In the year 617 AH: Calamity spread with Genghis Khan, called Temüjin, may Allāh curse him, and those with him from the Tatars, may Allāh disgrace them all. Their evil became widespread, and their corruption intensified from the furthest reaches of China until they reached the lands of Iraq and its surroundings, until they reached Erbil and its territories. In one year, which is this year, they conquered all the kingdoms except Iraq, the Jazira, the Levant, and Egypt. They subdued all the groups in those regions, the Khwarazmians, the Qipchaqs, the Georgians, the Alans, the Khazars, and others. In this year, they killed people from various groups of Muslims and others in various countries, in large numbers that cannot be counted or described. In general, they did not enter a country except that they killed all those in it of fighters and men and many women and children. They destroyed what was in it by looting if they needed it and by burning if they did not need it. Most of what they burned were mosques and grand mosques.

The invaders would capture Muslim prisoners and force them to fight alongside them and participate in their sieges. If the prisoners did not fight with full sincerity, they would be executed. Ibn al-Athīr, in his book al-Kāmil, provides a detailed and comprehensive account of these events. He writes:

"We say that this is a chapter recounting a momentous calamity—an unprecedented disaster the likes of which have never been witnessed by day or night. It engulfed all creation but struck the Muslims with particular severity. If someone were to claim that the world, from the time Allāh created Adam until now, has never faced a trial of this magnitude, they would not be wrong. History contains nothing comparable to it or even close to it.

Among the most catastrophic events recorded in history is what Nebuchadnezzar inflicted upon the Children of Israel—the slaughter and destruction of Jerusalem. But what is Jerusalem compared to the countless cities these cursed ones have laid waste to, each larger and more populous than Jerusalem? And what are the casualties among the Children of Israel compared to the multitudes they have slain? The inhabitants of a single city they annihilated outnumbered the entire population of the Children of Israel. Perhaps no event of this scale will ever be seen again until the end of the world—except for the coming of Gog and Magog."

As for the Antichrist, he will spare those who follow him and destroy those who oppose him. These did not spare anyone, but rather killed men, women, and children, and they ripped open the bellies of pregnant women and killed fetuses. We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return. There is no power nor strength except with Allāh, the Most High, the Great, for this event whose sparks spread, whose harm became widespread, and which traveled through the lands like clouds driven by the wind. A people emerged from the edges of China and headed for the lands of Turkestan, such as Kashgar and Balasaghun, then from there to the lands beyond the river, such as Samarkand, Bukhara, and others. They conquered them and did to their people what we have mentioned. Then a group of them crossed to Khorasan, emptying it by conquest, destruction, killing, and looting. Then they went beyond it to Rayy, Hamadan, and the mountain region and what is in it of countries to the border of Iraq. Then they headed for the countries of Azerbaijan and Arran, destroying them and killing most of their people. Only the rare straggler survived in less than a year. This is something the likes of which has never been heard.

Then they marched to Darband Shirwan, conquered its cities, and only its fortress, in which their king was, survived. They crossed beyond it to the country of the Alans and the Lezgins and the various peoples in that region, inflicting on them killing, looting, and destruction. Then they headed for the lands of Qipchaq, who are the most numerous of the Turks. They killed all those who stood against them, and the rest fled to the thickets. They conquered their lands. Another group marched to Ghazna and its territories and what is adjacent to it of the lands of India, Sijistan, and Kerman, and they did in them deeds like these and worse.

This is an event the likes of which has never been heard before. Even Alexander the Great—whom historians agree ruled the world—did not achieve his conquests in a single year. It took him nearly ten years to subdue the world, and he did so without widespread slaughter, being content with the people's obedience. But these invaders conquered most of the inhabited world—the finest, most prosperous lands, home to the most just and civilized people—in about a year. No one in the lands they had not yet reached felt secure; all lived in constant fear, anticipating their arrival. Despite their conquests, these people prostrate to the sun when it rises, forbidding nothing. They consume whatever they find—animals, carcasses, anything—without regard for purity or law. May Allāh curse them.

He said: This matter was established for them due to the lack of any deterrent, because Sultan Khwarazm Shah Muhammad had killed the kings from all the kingdoms and settled in affairs. When he was defeated by them last year and weakened against them, and they pursued him, he fled and did not know where he went and perished in some of the islands of the sea. The lands were empty and had no one to protect them:

“That Allāh might accomplish a matter already destined. And to Allāh [all] matters will be returned”

Then the Tatars turned toward Samarkand and besieged it at the beginning of Muharram of this year. There were fifty thousand soldiers stationed there, but they were intimidated. Seventy thousand civilians came out to confront the Tatars, but they were all killed in a single hour. The fifty thousand soldiers then surrendered, handing over their weapons and whatever means of resistance they had. The Tatars killed them that same day, plundered the city, killed all its inhabitants, seized their wealth, enslaved their women and children, burned the city, and left it in ruins. Indeed, we belong to Allah and to Him we shall return.

The accursed (Tatar leader) remained there and sent raiding parties to other lands. He sent one detachment to the lands of Khorasan, which the Tatars call Al-Maghriba

(the western lands), and sent another detachment in pursuit of Khwarazm Shah. The latter detachment numbered twenty thousand men, and they were instructed to capture him no matter where he fled, even if he clung to the sky. They pursued him and found him near the Jayhun River (Amu Darya). He felt secure because of the river's protection. However, the Tatars, finding no boats, constructed rafts to carry their weapons. Each warrior would send his horse into the water, hold onto its tail, and let the horse drag him and his weapon-laden raft across the river. They all crossed to the other side without detection. Khwarazm Shah only realized their presence when they were already among his ranks. He fled to Nishapur and then to other places, but they pursued him relentlessly, not giving him time to regroup his forces. Every time he attempted to gather his troops in a city, they would catch up with him, forcing him to flee once more. Eventually, he boarded a ship in the Caspian Sea and sailed to a fortress on an island where he later died.

It is said that after he boarded the ship, no one knew what became of him. He vanished, and his fate remained unknown. The Tatars seized his treasury and found within it ten thousand thousand dinars (ten million dinars). Then they marched toward Mazandaran and its fortresses — some of the strongest fortresses, which the Muslims themselves had only conquered in the year 90 AH during the reign of Sulayman ibn Abd al-Malik. Yet, the Tatars seized them in no time, plundered them, massacred their inhabitants, enslaved their women and children, and set the cities ablaze. Afterward, they marched toward Ray, where they encountered the mother of Khwarazm Shah, who had with her vast amounts of wealth, including rare and precious treasures the likes of which had never been seen. They seized it all.

Next, they attacked Ray, taking its inhabitants by surprise, killing them, and enslaving many others. From there, they advanced toward Hamadan, which they seized, then to Zanjan, where they killed and enslaved, and then toward Qazvin, where they plundered the city and killed approximately forty thousand of its inhabitants. They then advanced toward Azerbaijan. The ruler of Azerbaijan, Uzbek ibn al-Bahlawan, sought peace with them by offering a tribute, as he was distracted by indulgence in drinking and sinful pleasures. The Tatars accepted the tribute and left him alone.

They then marched toward Mughan, where they encountered ten thousand Georgian fighters. The Georgians stood no chance before the Tatars and quickly fled. The Tatars pursued them and inflicted upon them a crushing and shameful defeat — the most disgraceful defeat imaginable.

Here, Ibn al-Athir remarked: "What has befallen at the hands of these Tatars is unprecedented in both ancient and modern times. A group that emerged from the borders of China managed, within a single year, to reach the borders of Armenia on one side and pass through Iraq from the side of Hamadan. By God, I have no doubt that those who come after us, when time has passed and they read about this event, will dismiss it as incredible and impossible. But the truth is clear — we have recorded it here, and all those who have compiled histories in our time have done the same. Everyone, whether learned or ignorant, knows about this catastrophe because of its sheer notoriety. May Allah grant the Muslims and Islam someone who will protect and defend them, for they have fallen from the rule of Muslim kings to those whose ambitions extend no further than their own bellies and private desires. The Muslim Sultan, Khwarazm Shah, is gone."

He said: This year ended, and they were in the lands of the Georgians. When they saw from them resistance and fighting that would prolong the matter for them, they turned to others, and this was their custom. They marched to Tabriz, and its people made peace with them in exchange for wealth. Then they marched to Maragheh, besieged it, and set up catapults against it, and they shielded themselves with prisoners from the Muslims. Over the city was a woman ("A people who entrust their affairs to a woman will never succeed"). They conquered the city after days and killed a number of its people that only Allāh the Almighty knows their number, and they plundered a great deal from it and captured and enslaved according to their custom, may Allāh curse them with a curse that will enter them into the fire of Hell. The people used to fear them with a very great fear, to the extent that one of them entered an alley of this city, and in it were one hundred men. Not one of them was able to advance towards him, and he kept killing them one after another until he killed them all, and not one of them raised his hand against him. He looted that alley alone. A woman of theirs, dressed as a man, entered a house and killed everyone in that house alone. Then a prisoner with her realized that she was a woman, so he killed her, may Allāh curse her.

Then they headed for the city of Erbil, and the Muslims were distressed by that. The people of those regions said, "This is a difficult matter." The Caliph wrote to the people of Mosul and King al-Ashraf, the ruler of the Jazira, saying, "I have prepared an army, so be with it to fight these Tatars." Al-Ashraf sent apologizing to the Caliph, saying that he was heading towards his brother, al-Kāmil, to the Egyptian lands because of what had befallen the Muslims there from the Franks and their taking of Damietta, which, by their taking it, they had almost taken the entire Egyptian lands. His brother, al-Mu‘azzam, had come to him to Harran to seek his help for their brother, al-Kāmil, so that they could hold back the Franks at Damietta, and he was on the verge of marching to the Egyptian lands. The Caliph wrote to Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the ruler of Erbil, to be the commander of the armies that the Caliph would send, which were ten thousand fighters. Only eight hundred horsemen of them came to him, then they dispersed before they could gather. We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return. But Allāh granted safety by diverting the Tatars' attention to the side of Hamadan, and its people made peace with them. The Tatars left a governor with them, then they agreed on their governor and returned to them, besieged them until they conquered them by force, and killed their inhabitants to the last of them.

Then they marched to Azerbaijan and conquered Ardabil, then Tabriz, then to Baylaqan, where they killed many of its inhabitants, a great number, and burned it. They used to fornicate with the women, then kill them and rip open their bellies to get the fetuses. Then they returned to the lands of the Georgians, and the Georgians had prepared for them. They fought with them, and they also broke them in a terrible defeat. Then they conquered many cities, killing their inhabitants, capturing their women, and taking as prisoners the men they would make fight the fortresses, making them a shield in front of them to protect them from arrows and other things. Whoever of them survived, they would kill him after the war ended.

Then they marched to the lands of the Alans and the Qipchaqs and fought with them a great battle. They broke them and headed for the largest of the Qipchaq cities, which is the city of Sudak, and in it were a great deal of goods, clothes, and merchandise of bartāsī, qunduz, and squirrel. The Qipchaqs took refuge in the lands of the Russians, who were Christians. They agreed with them to fight the Tatars. They met with them, and the Tatars broke them in a very terrible defeat. Then they marched towards Bulgar around the year 620. They finished all of that and returned towards their king, Genghis Khan, may Allāh curse him and them. This is what this western raiding party did.

Genghis Khan had sent a raiding party in this year to Termez, and they took it, and another to Fergana, and they conquered it. He prepared another army towards Khorasan and besieged Balkh, and its people made peace with him. Likewise, they made peace with many other cities until they reached Ṭālaqān, and its fortress, which was fortified, made them unable. They besieged it for six months until they were unable. They wrote to Genghis Khan, and he came himself and besieged it for another four months until he conquered it by force. Then he killed everyone in it and everyone in the entire city, private and public.

Then they headed for the city of Merv with Genghis Khan. He encamped outside it with about two hundred thousand fighters from the Arabs and others. They fought with him a great battle until the Muslims were broken! We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return. Then they besieged the city for five days and tricked its deputy into surrendering, then they betrayed him and the people of the city. They killed them, plundered them, looted them, and punished them with various types of torment, to the extent that they killed in one day seven hundred thousand people.

Then they marched to Nishapur and did in it something similar to what they did to the people of Merv. Then to Tus, where they killed and destroyed the shrine of Ali ibn Musa and al-Rashid and left it in ruins. Then they marched to Herat, where they killed people and appointed a deputy over it. Then they marched to Ghazna, where Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah fought them and broke them. They returned to Herat, and its people had revolted, so they killed them to the last of them. Then they returned to their king, Genghis Khan - may Allāh curse him and them. Genghis Khan sent another group to the city of Khwarazm and besieged it until they conquered the city by force. They killed in it in a brutal manner, looted it, and captured its people. They broke the bridge that prevented the water of the Oxus River from reaching it, so its houses were flooded, and all its inhabitants perished.

Then they returned to their king, Genghis Khan, who was encamped on Ṭālaqān. He prepared a group of them for Ghazna, and Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah fought with them. Jalāl al-Dīn broke them in a great defeat and rescued from them a number of Muslim prisoners. Then he wrote to Genghis Khan, asking him to come out himself to fight him. Genghis Khan headed for him, and they faced each other - and some of Jalāl al-Dīn's army had dispersed from him - and there was no avoiding the fight. They fought for three days, the likes of which had never been seen before in their fighting. Then the companions of Sultan Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah weakened and went away. They rode in the Indian Sea. The Tatars marched to Ghazna and took it without effort or resistance. All of this or most of it occurred in this year.

In the year 618:

The Tatars conquered many cities, such as Maragheh, Hamadan, Ardabil, Tabriz, and Ganja, killing their inhabitants, looting what was in them, and capturing their offspring. They approached Baghdad, and the Caliph was disturbed by that. He fortified Baghdad and employed soldiers, and the people prayed in supplications and litanies.

In it, they subdued the Georgians and the Alans, then they fought the Qipchaqs and broke them, as well as the Russians, and they looted what they could. Then they fought them and captured their women and offspring.

In the year 621 AH:

A raiding party from Genghis Khan, other than the first two, arrived at Rayy, which had been rebuilt a little. They killed its inhabitants as well. Then they marched to Saveh, then to Qom and Kashan, which had not been reached except this time. They did in them as before, of killing and captivity. Then they marched to Hamadan, where they also killed and captured. Then they marched to the remnants of the Khwarazmians to Azerbaijan and broke them and killed many of them. They fled from them to Tabriz, and they caught up with them. They wrote to Ibn al-Pahlawan, "If you are making peace with us, then send us the Khwarazmians, otherwise you are like them." He killed many of them and sent their heads to them with many gifts and presents. All of this, and this raiding party was only three thousand, and the Khwarazmians and the companions of al-Pahlawan were many times more than them, but Allāh the Almighty cast upon them abandonment and failure. We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return.

In the year 622: The Khwarazmians wreaked havoc when they came with Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah from the lands of Ghazna, defeated by the Tatars, to the lands of Khuzestan and the regions of Iraq. They corrupted it, besieged its cities, and looted its villages.

In it, Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah took control of the lands of Azerbaijan and many of the lands of the Georgians. He broke the Georgians, who were seventy thousand fighters, and killed twenty thousand of the fighters. His affair became very great, and his status magnified. He conquered Tbilisi and killed thirty thousand of it. Abu Shama claimed that he killed seventy thousand of the Georgians in the battle and killed from Tbilisi a full one hundred thousand. He was preoccupied with this battle instead of heading for Baghdad, because when he besieged Daquqa, its people insulted him. He conquered it by force, killed many of its people, destroyed its wall, and resolved to head for the Caliph in Baghdad, because he, he claimed, had plotted against his father until he perished and the Tatars conquered the lands. He wrote to al-Mu‘azzam ibn al-‘Ādil, calling him to fight the Caliph and inciting him to do so. Al-Mu‘azzam refused to do so. When the Caliph learned of Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah's intention to head for Baghdad, he was disturbed by that, fortified Baghdad, employed armies and soldiers, and spent on the people one million dinars. Jalāl al-Dīn had sent an army to the Georgians, and they wrote to him, "Reach us before we perish to the last of us, and Baghdad will not escape." He marched to them, and his affair was as we have mentioned.

In the year 623:

King Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah al-Khwarazmi met with the Georgians and broke them in a great defeat. He headed for their largest stronghold, Tbilisi, and conquered it by force. He killed the infidels in it and captured their offspring, and he did not harm any of the Muslims who were there.

His rule over it was established, and the Georgians had taken it from the Muslims in the year 515, and it had been in their hands until now, until Jalāl al-Dīn rescued it from them. It was a great conquest, and praise be to Allāh.

In it, he marched to Khilat to take it from the deputy of King al-Ashraf, but he was unable to take it, and its people fought him a great battle. He returned from them because of his preoccupation with the rebellion of his deputy in the city of Kerman and his opposition to him, so he marched to them and left them.

In the year 624:

In it, most of the people of Tbilisi corresponded with the Georgians, and they came to them and entered it. They killed the common people and the elite, looted, captured, destroyed, burned, and went out with zeal. This reached Jalāl al-Dīn, and he marched quickly to catch up with them, but he did not catch up with them.

In it, the Ismailis killed a great emir from the deputies of Jalāl al-Dīn ibn Khwarazm Shah. He marched to their lands, killed many of them, destroyed their city, captured their offspring, and looted their wealth. They, may Allāh disgrace them, had been one of the greatest aids against the Muslims when the Tatars came to the people, and they were more harmful to the people than them.

In it, Jalāl al-Dīn and a large group of Tatars clashed, and he defeated them and inflicted on them killing and captivity. He pursued them for days, killing them until he reached Rayy. He learned that a group had come to target him, so he stayed waiting for them.

And among those who died in this year:

Genghis Khan

The greatest sultan among the Tatars, and the father of their kings today. They trace their lineage to him, and say. He is the one who established for them the Yasaq that they judge by and rule by, and most of it contradicts the laws of Allāh the Almighty and His books. It is something he suggested from himself, and they followed him in that. His mother claimed that she conceived him from a ray of the sun, so he does not have a known father, and he is of unknown lineage.

I have seen a volume compiled by the minister in Baghdad, ‘Alā’ al-Dīn al-Juwaynī, in his biography. He mentioned in it his life and what it contained of political intellect, generosity, courage, and good management of the kingdom, the subjects, and wars. He mentioned that in the beginning of his affair, he was a favorite of King Uzbek Khan, and he was a handsome young man at that time. His name was first Temüjin, then when he became great, he called himself Genghis Khan. This king had brought him close and favored him. The great men of the kingdom envied him and slandered him to him until they turned him against him, but he did not kill him and did not find a way to harm him because of a fault. He was in that situation when the king became angry with two young slaves, and they fled from him and took refuge with Genghis Khan. He honored them and treated them well. They informed him of what King Uzbek Khan was harboring of killing him. He took his precautions and moved to a state, and tribes of the Tatars followed him. Many of Uzbek Khan's companions began to defect to him and come to him, and he would honor them and give them, until his power became strong and his soldiers multiplied. Then after that, he fought Uzbek Khan, conquered him, killed him, and took control of his kingdom and his dominion, and his numbers and his numbers were added to him. His affair became great, and his reputation spread far and wide. The Turkish tribes in the lands of Tamghaj all submitted to him, until he rode in about eight hundred thousand fighters, and most of the tribes were his tribe, which he was from, called Qiyan. Then the closest tribes to him after them were two large tribes, Azan and Qunquran. He used to hunt for three months of the year and the rest for war and ruling.

Then war broke out between him and King ‘Alā’ al-Dīn Khwarazm Shah, the ruler of the lands of Khorasan, Iraq, Azerbaijan, and other regions and kingdoms. Genghis Khan subdued him, broke him, defeated him, plundered him, and took control of all his lands himself and with his children in the easiest time, as we have mentioned that in the events.

The beginning of Genghis Khan's reign was in the year 599, and his fighting with Khwarazm Shah was around the year 616, and Khwarazm Shah died in the year 617, as we have mentioned. At that time, he took control of the kingdoms without a rival or opponent.

His death was in the year 624. They placed him in a coffin of iron, tied it with chains, and hung it between two mountains there. As for his book, the Yasaq, it is written in two volumes in thick script and carried on a camel, and it is greatly revered by them.

Some of them have mentioned that he used to ascend a mountain, then descend, then ascend, then descend repeatedly until he became weary and fell unconscious, and he would order those with him to write what was cast on his tongue at that time. If this is the case, then it is apparent that Satan was speaking on his tongue with what was in it.

Al-Juwaynī mentioned that some of their worshippers used to climb the mountains in the severe cold for worship, and he heard someone saying to him, "We have given Genghis Khan and his descendants dominion over the face of the earth." Al-Juwaynī said, "The Mongol sheikhs believe in this and accept it as certain."

Then al-Juwaynī mentioned snippets from the Yasaq, from that: Whoever commits adultery is killed, whether he is married or not. Likewise, whoever commits sodomy is killed. Whoever intentionally lies is killed. Whoever practices magic is killed. Whoever spies is killed. Whoever enters between two disputing parties and helps one of them is killed. Whoever urinates in standing water is killed. Whoever immerses himself in it is killed. Whoever feeds a prisoner, gives him drink, or clothes him without the permission of his people is killed. Whoever finds a runaway and does not return him is killed. Whoever feeds a prisoner or throws something edible to someone is killed, but rather he hands it to him from his hand to his hand. Whoever feeds someone something, let him eat from it first, even if the one being fed is a prince, not a prisoner. Whoever eats and does not feed those with him is killed. Whoever slaughters an animal, let him be slaughtered like it, but rather let him split open its belly and take its heart in his hand and extract it from its belly first!!

In all of that is a contradiction of the laws of Allāh revealed to His servants the prophets, peace and blessings be upon them. Whoever abandons the established law revealed to Muhammad ibn Abdullah, the Seal of the Prophets, and judges by other than it, from the abrogated laws, has disbelieved. So how about someone who judges by the Yasaq and gives it precedence over it? Whoever does that has disbelieved by the consensus of the Muslims. Allāh the Almighty said:

{Do they then seek the judgement of [the time of] ignorance? But who is better than Allāh in judgement for a people who are certain [in faith]?} And Allāh the Almighty said: {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe until they make you, [O Muhammad], judge concerning that over which they dispute among themselves and then find within themselves no discomfort from what you have judged and submit in [full, willing] submission.}

Among their manners is obedience to their sultan with the utmost ability, and that they present to him their beautiful virgins so that he may choose for himself and for whomever he wishes of his entourage whomever he wishes of them. It is their custom to address the king by his name, and whoever passes by people eating, he has the right to eat with them without asking permission, and he does not step over the fire pit or the food plate, and he does not stand on the threshold. They do not wash their clothes until their dirt appears, and they do not burden the scholars with anything of the crimes mentioned, and they do not touch the wealth of the deceased.

‘Alā’ al-Dīn al-Juwaynī mentioned a large part of the news of Genghis Khan and the noble deeds he used to do out of his nature and what his mind led him to - even though he was a polytheist who worshipped others with Allāh. He killed a number of creatures whose number is not known except by the One who created them. But the beginning was from Khwarazm Shah, for when Genghis Khan sent merchants from his side with a lot of merchandise from his country, they reached Iran, and its deputy from the side of Khwarazm Shah, who was the father of his wife's Kūshlū Khān, killed them and took all that was with them. Genghis Khan sent to Khwarazm Shah, employing him, did this matter occur with his consent or did he not know about it? He denied it and said to him in what he sent to him of the custom of kings, that merchants are not killed because they are the builders of the regions, and they are the ones who bring to the kings what contains gifts and precious things. Moreover, these merchants were of your religion, and your deputy killed them. If it was a command you commanded, we seek their blood. Otherwise, you deny it and take retribution from your deputy. When Khwarazm Shah heard that from Genghis Khan's messenger, he had no answer except that he ordered his neck to be struck, so he mismanaged.

He had become senile and old. The hadith has come, "Leave the Turks alone as long as they leave you alone." When that reached Genghis Khan, he prepared to fight him and take his country. By the decree of Allāh the Almighty, what happened of matters the strangest and most heinous of which has never been heard.

He said: When Genghis Khan was dying, he advised his children to be united and not to be divided. He gave them examples in that, and he brought before him arrows. He took an arrow and gave it to one of them, and he broke it. Then he brought a bundle and gave it to them together, and they were unable to break it. He said, "This is like you if you are united and agree, and that is like you if you are alone and disagree."

In the year 625:

There were many wars between Jalāl al-Dīn and the Tatars. They broke him several times, then after all that, he broke them in a great defeat and killed a number of them and nations that cannot be counted. These Tatars had separated and rebelled against Genghis Khan. Genghis Khan wrote to Jalāl al-Dīn, saying to him, "These are not from us, and we have distanced them, but you will see from us what you cannot withstand."

In the year 628:

This year began with King al-Ashraf Musa ibn al-ʿĀdil residing in the Jazira, preoccupied with repairing what Jalāl al-Dīn al-Khwarazmi had corrupted of his lands. The Tatars came in this year to the Jazira and Diyar Bakr, wreaking havoc to the right and left. They killed, looted, and captured according to their custom - may Allāh abandon them.

In the year 629:

In it, a group of Tatars came and reached Shahrazur. The Caliph appointed the ruler of Erbil, Muḏaffar al-Dīn Kōkburi ibn Zayn al-Dīn, and added to him armies from his side. They marched towards them, and the Tatars fled from them. They stayed facing them for months, then Muḏaffar al-Dīn fell ill and returned to his country, Erbil, and the armies retreated to their countries.

In the year 634:

In it, the Tatars besieged Erbil with catapults and dug under the walls until they conquered it by force. They killed its inhabitants and captured their offspring.

In the year 638:

In it, a messenger came from the king of the Tatars, Tului ibn Genghis Khan, to the kings of Islam, calling them to obey him and ordering them to destroy the walls of their countries. The title of the letter:

From the Deputy of the Lord of the Sky, the Eraser of the Face of the Earth, the King of the East and the West, Khaqan. The letter was with a Muslim man from the people of Isfahan.

In the year 642 AH:

{And look at the state of the Muslim kings and the Tatars at the gates of their lands and their capital!!}:

In it, Caliph al-Mustaʿsim bi-llāh appointed as vizier Muʿayyid al-Dīn Abū Ṭālib Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad ibn ʿAlī ibn Muḥammad al-ʿAlqamī, the ill-omened for himself and for the people of Baghdad, who did not protect al-Mustaʿsim in his vizierate. He was not a truthful vizier, nor was his way pleasing. He is the one who helped against the Muslims in the matter of Hulagu and his soldiers - may Allāh disgrace him and them.

In it, there was a great battle between the Khwarazmians, whom al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb, the ruler of Egypt, had brought to seek their help against al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl Abū al-Ḥasan, the ruler of Damascus. They encamped on Gaza, and al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb sent to them robes of honor, wealth, fabrics, and armies. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl, al-Nāṣir Dāwūd, the ruler of Karak, and al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Homs, agreed with the Franks and fought with the Khwarazmians a severe battle. The Khwarazmians defeated them in a terrible and heinous defeat. The Franks were defeated with their crosses and their banners high above the heads of the Muslim students. Cups of wine were circulating among the armies, and cups of death took the place of cups of zarjun. More than thirty thousand of the Franks were killed in one day, and a group of their kings, priests, and bishops were captured, and a number of Muslim princes. They sent the prisoners to al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb in Egypt. It was a witnessed day and a commendable matter, and praise be to Allāh.

One of the Muslim princes said, "I knew that when we stood under the crosses of the Franks, we would not succeed." The Khwarazmians plundered from the Franks and those with them a great deal. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb sent to Damascus to besiege it. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl fortified it and destroyed many quarters around it. He broke the bridge of Bab Tuma, and the river flowed, and the water receded until it became a lake from Bab Tuma and Bab al-Salama. Everything that was between them of buildings was flooded, and many people became poor - We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return.

In the year 642 AH:

It is the year of the Khwarazmians, and that is because al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb ibn al-Kāmil, the ruler of Egypt, sent the Khwarazmians, and with them their king, Barakat Khan, in the company of Muʿīn al-Dīn Ibn al-Sheikh. They surrounded Damascus, besieging his uncle, al-Ṣāliḥ Abū al-Jaysh, the ruler of Damascus. He burned the palace of Hajjaj, the orchard of al-Summaq, the mosque of Jarrah outside Bab al-Saghir, and many mosques. He set up a catapult at Bab al-Saghir and at Bab al-Jabiya, and two catapults were set up inside the city as well. The two sides faced each other. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl sent to Emir Muʿīn al-Dīn ibn al-Sheikh a prayer rug, a crutch, and a jug. He sent saying, "Your occupation with this is better than your occupation with besieging kings." Al-Muʿīn sent to him a zumr, a jank, and a red and yellow silk garment. He sent saying, "As for the prayer rug, it is suitable for me, but as for you, this is more appropriate for you." Then Ibn al-Sheikh woke up, and the siege of Damascus intensified. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl sent and burned the palace of his father, al-ʿĀdil, and the fire spread in the alley of al-Rumman to al-Aqabiya, and it was burned in its entirety. The rivers were cut off, prices soared, roads were feared, and very ugly things happened in Damascus that had never happened before. The siege lasted for months from this year until Jumada al-Ula.

Then the situation was agreed upon that al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl would go out to Baalbek and hand over Damascus to al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb. The people rejoiced at that, and al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl went out to Baalbek.

As for the Khwarazmians, they were not present at the time of the peace. When they learned of the peace, they became angry and marched towards Dariya, looted it, and headed towards the lands of the East. They corresponded with al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl and allied with him against al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb. He rejoiced at that and broke the peace that had occurred from him. The Khwarazmians returned and besieged Damascus, and al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl came to them from Baalbek. The situation became difficult for the Damascenes. Wealth was lacking, and prices soared greatly, to the extent that the price of a ghirarah reached one thousand six hundred, and a qintar of flour nine hundred, and bread, every two uqiyyas less a quarter, for a dirham, and a ratl of meat for seven. Properties were sold for flour, and cats, dogs, carcasses, and carrion were eaten. People died in the streets, and they were unable to wash, shroud, and bury them. They would throw their dead in wells until the city stank, and the people were distressed - We belong to Allāh and to Him we shall return.

Ibn al-Subt said: Despite this, wine was circulating, immorality was apparent, and taxes were as they were. Sheikh Shihab al-Din mentioned that prices soared greatly in this year, and the poor perished in the streets. They used to ask for a morsel, then they started asking for a lubaba (the soft part of bread), then they descended to a fiṣ to buy bran to wet and eat like chickens. He said, "I witnessed that." He mentioned the details of prices and their high cost in food and other things.

When al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb learned that the Khwarazmians had sided with him and made peace with his uncle, al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl, he wrote to King al-Manṣūr Ibrāhīm ibn Asad al-Dīn Shirkuh, the ruler of Homs, and won him over to his side. The side of the deputy of Damascus, Muʿīn al-Dīn Husayn Ibn al-Sheikh, became strong, but he died in Ramadan of this year. When al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Homs, returned from his allegiance to al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl, he began to gather armies from the Aleppans, the Turkmens, and the Arabs to rescue Damascus from the Khwarazmians and their siege of it. This reached the Khwarazmians, and they feared the consequences of that. They said, "Damascus will not escape, and the solution is to fight him at his country." They marched to the lake of Homs, and al-Nāṣir Dāwūd sent his army to al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl with the Khwarazmians. The army of Damascus marched and joined the ruler of Homs. They met with the Khwarazmians at the lake of Homs. It was a witnessed day in which most of the Khwarazmians were killed, and their king, Barakat Khan, was killed, and his head was brought on a spear. Their ranks were dispersed, and they were scattered. Al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Homs, marched to Baalbek and al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb took control of it. He came to Damascus and encamped in the garden of Sama in service of al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb. Then he had the idea of taking it, and he fell ill and died - may Allāh have mercy on him - in the following year. The deputies of al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb took control of Baalbek and Bosra, and al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl had no country to take refuge in, no family, no children, no wealth. Rather, all his wealth was taken, and his family was transported under guard to the Egyptian lands. He went and sought refuge with King al-Nāṣir ibn al-ʿAzīz ibn al-Zāhir Ghāzī, the ruler of Aleppo, who sheltered him, honored him, and respected him. The Atabeg Luʿluʾ al-Halabi said to Ibn Ustadh, al-Nāṣir, who was a young man, "Look at the consequence of injustice."

In this year, there was a great battle between the Caliph's army and the Tatars, may Allāh curse them. The Muslims inflicted a crushing defeat upon them, scattered their ranks, and routed them before them. However, they did not pursue or follow them, fearing their cunning treachery and acting upon the saying of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "Leave the Turks as long as they leave you."

Then the year six hundred and forty-eight began.

In the year 648 AH:

On the third of Muharram, a Wednesday, the Magnificent Tūrānshāh achieved a major victory against the Franks at the fort of Damiāt, killing thirty thousand of them, and it is said: one hundred thousand. They seized a vast amount of spoils, praise be to Allāh. Then, a group of the emirs who had been imprisoned were killed. Among those captured was the King of the French and his brother. The king of the French's armor was sent to Damascus, and its governor wore it on the day of the procession. It was made of red saqrlāt with a squirrel fur lining underneath. However, before the month of Muharram was over, the emirs killed their master's son, Tūrānshāh, and buried him beside the Nile on the other side, may Allāh have mercy on him and on his ancestors, by His grace and generosity.

The Magnificent King Tūrānshāh bin al-Ṣāliḥ Ayyūb bin al-Kāmil bin al-ʿĀdil:

He was initially the ruler of Ḥiṣn Kayfā during his father's lifetime, and his father used to summon him to him during his days, but he would not respond. When his father passed away, as we mentioned, the emirs summoned him, and he responded to them and came to them, and they made him their king, then they killed him as we mentioned. That was on Monday, the twenty-seventh of Muharram. It has been said that he was dissolute and unfit for kingship.

In the year 650 AH:

In this year, the Tatars reached the Jazīrah, Surūj, Ra's al-ʿAyn, and the regions adjacent to these lands. They killed, captured, plundered, and destroyed. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return. They attacked merchants traveling between Ḥarrān and Ra's al-ʿAyn, seizing from them six hundred loads of sugar and maʿmūl from Egyptian lands and six hundred thousand dinars. The number of those killed in this year from the people of the Jazīrah was about ten thousand, and they captured a similar number of children and women. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

In the year 651 AH:

In this year, Shaykh Najm al-Dīn al-Bādhārā'ī, the messenger of the Caliph, intervened between the ruler of Egypt and the ruler of Syria and reconciled the two armies. War had intensified between them and broken out, and the Egyptian army had allied with the Franks, promising to hand over Jerusalem to them if they helped them against the Syrians. Many serious events occurred, but he reconciled them and freed a group of royal households from Egyptian lands, including the children of al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā'īl and the daughter of al-Ashraf and others from the children of the ruler of Ḥimṣ and others. May Allāh reward him with good.

In the year 655 AH:

In this year, the Magnificent King of Egypt, 'Izz al-Dīn Aybak al-Turkmānī, was found dead in his house. He had assumed kingship after his master al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb for a few months, during which the reign of Tūrānshāh the Magnificent bin al-Ṣāliḥ occurred. Then, Shajar al-Durr, Umm Khalīl, succeeded him for a period of three months, after which he was established as king, along with al-Malik al-Ashraf Mūsā bin al-Nāṣir Yūsuf bin Aqsīs bin al-Kāmil for a period. Then, he became independent in kingship without contest and defeated al-Nāṣir when he intended to seize the Egyptian lands and killed the knight Aqtāy in the year six hundred and fifty-two. After that, he deposed al-Ashraf and became the sole ruler. Then he married Shajar al-Durr, Umm Khalīl. He was generous, brave, wise, and religious. His death occurred on Tuesday, the twenty-third of Rabī' al-Awwal, while he was at the al-Mu'izziyyah School in Egypt, and its majāz (courtyard or passage) is among the finest things, though it is internal and not exceptionally grand.

Some said about it: "This is a majāz with no reality to it." When he was killed, may Allāh have mercy on him, his mamālīk accused his wife, Umm Khalīl, known as Shajar al-Durr, of killing him. He had resolved to marry the daughter of the ruler of Mosul, Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu', so she ordered her female servants to seize him for her. She continued to beat him with her qabāqīb (wooden clogs), and the servants scraped at his exposed parts until he died in that state. When his mamālīk heard of this, they came, accompanied by his senior mamlūk, Sayf al-Dīn Quṭuz, and killed her. They threw her onto a garbage dump, her ʿawrah (private parts) not covered, after her imposing veil and high status. She had her name mentioned on decrees and signatures, and the khuṭbah (sermon) of the khaṭībs (preachers) was in her name, and currency was minted with her emblem. Then she was gone, and no one knew her traces or features after that.

{Say, "O Allāh, Owner of Sovereignty, You give sovereignty to whom You will and You take sovereignty away from whom You will. You honor whom You will and You humiliate whom You will. In Your hand is [all] good. Indeed, You are over all things competent."}

In this year, there was a great fitnah (strife) in Baghdad between the Rāfiḍah (Shīʿa) and the Ahl al-Sunnah (Sunnis). Al-Karkh and the houses of the Rāfiḍah were plundered, even the houses of the relatives of the vizier Ibn al-ʿAlqamī. This was one of the strongest reasons for his colluding with the Tatars.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year, a few days after the death of al-Bādharāʾī, the Tatars descended upon Baghdad as the vanguard for their king Hūlākū bin Tūlī bin Genghis Khan, may the curses of al-Raḥmān be upon them. Their conquest of it and their atrocities against it began at the beginning of the following year.

In the year 656 AH:

In this year, the Tatars seized Baghdad and killed most of its inhabitants, even the Caliph, and the state of Banū al-ʿAbbās ended in it.

This year began with the Tatar armies besieging Baghdad, accompanied by the two commanders at the forefront of the army of the Tatar Sultan Hūlākū Khān. Reinforcements from the ruler of Mosul came to them, assisting them against the people of Baghdad with provisions, gifts, and treasures, all out of fear for himself from the Tatars and to appease them, may Allāh disgrace them. Baghdad was fortified, and majānīq (siege engines), ‘arrādāt (catapults), and other instruments of defense were installed in it, which cannot repel anything from the decree of Allāh the Glorified and Exalted.

Reflect! Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return:

The Tatars surrounded the House of the Caliphate, showering it with arrows from every direction, until a slave girl who was playing and entertaining the Caliph was struck. She was among his concubines, a muwalladah (born in captivity), named ‘Arfah. An arrow came through one of the windows and killed her while she was dancing before the Caliph. The Caliph was disturbed by that and became extremely frightened. He brought the arrow that struck her before him, and it was written on it: "When Allāh wills to execute His judgment and decree, He takes away the minds of the wise." Thereupon, the Caliph ordered increased precautions and more curtains for the House of the Caliphate.

The arrival of Hūlākū Khān with his entire army—estimated to be around two hundred thousand fighters—to Baghdad was on the twelfth of Muharram of this year. He was fiercely angry with the Caliph because of what had preceded of the matter that Allāh decreed, ordained, executed, and carried out. When Hūlākū Khān first set out from Hamadhān, heading towards Iraq, the vizier Mu’ayyad al-Dīn Muḥammad bin al-‘Alqamī suggested to the Caliph that he send him lavish gifts as a means of appeasing him concerning his intention to invade their land. However, the Caliph was dissuaded from this by Duwaydār al-Ṣaghīr Aybak and others, who said: "The vizier only intends by this to appease the King of the Tatars with the wealth he sends to him." They suggested sending something insignificant, so he sent some gifts, which Hūlākū Khān scorned. He sent to the Caliph requesting Duwaydār and Sulaymān Shāh, but he did not send them to him and paid him no heed, until his arrival drew near and he reached Baghdad with his vast, infidel, wicked, unjust, and treacherous armies, those who do not believe in Allāh or the Last Day.

They surrounded Baghdad from its western and eastern sides. The army of Baghdad was extremely small and utterly humiliated, not even reaching ten thousand horsemen, and they were in extreme weakness. The rest of the army had been dismissed from their iqṭā'āt (land grants), to the extent that many of them were begging in the markets and at the doors of mosques. Poets recited poems about them, lamenting them and mourning for Islam and its people.

All of this was due to the opinions of the vizier Ibn al-'Alqamī al-Rāfiḍī. In the previous year, there had been a fierce war between the Ahl al-Sunnah and the Rāfiḍah, during which al-Karkh and the Rāfiḍah quarter were plundered, even the houses of the vizier's relatives. This intensified his anger, which incited him to plot against Islam and its people, leading to the horrific event, the likes of which had not been recorded as more atrocious since Baghdad was built until these times. Therefore, he was the first to go out to the Tatars. He went out with his family, companions, servants, and retinue, and met with Sultan Hūlākū Khān, may Allāh curse him. Then he returned and advised the Caliph to go out to him and appear before him so that reconciliation could be reached, with the agreement that half of the revenue of Iraq would be for them and half for the Caliph. So, the Caliph was compelled to go out in a procession of seven hundred riders, including judges, fuqahā', Sufis, heads of emirs, state officials, and notables. When they approached the residence of Sultan Hūlākū Khān, they were prevented from seeing the Caliph except for seventeen people. The Caliph proceeded with these mentioned individuals, and the rest were dismounted, their mounts were plundered, and they were killed to the last man. The Caliph was brought before Hūlākū, who questioned him about many things. It is said that the Caliph's speech faltered due to the horror of what he saw of humiliation and tyranny.

Then he returned to Baghdad, accompanied by Khwāja Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī, may Allāh curse him, the vizier Ibn al-ʿAlqamī, and others, while the Caliph was under guard and being subjected to confiscation. A vast amount of gold, jewelry, ornaments, gems, and precious items were brought from the House of the Caliphate. Those Rāfiḍah assembly, may Allāh curse them, and other hypocrites advised Hūlākū Khān not to reconcile with the Caliph. The vizier said: "If a peace agreement is made based on equal division, this will not last for more than a year or two, and then the situation will revert to what it was before." They persuaded him to kill the Caliph. When the Caliph returned to Sultan Hūlākū, he ordered his killing. It is said that those who advised his killing were the vizier Ibn al-ʿAlqamī and Naṣīr al-Ṭūsī. Naṣīr had been in Hūlākū's service ever since he accompanied him in the conquest of the fortresses of Alamūt and their seizure from the hands of the Ismāʿīliyyah. Naṣīr had been a vizier to Shams al-Shumūs and to his father before him, ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn bin Jalāl al-Dīn, and they claimed lineage to Nizār bin al-Mustanṣir al-ʿUbaydī. Hūlākū Khān chose Naṣīr to be in his service as a vizier and advisor. When Hūlākū Khān arrived and hesitated to kill the Caliph, the two viziers made it seem easy to him. So, they killed him by kicking and stamping on him while he was in a burlap sack, lest any of his blood fall to the ground, fearing that revenge would be taken for him, as was said to them. It is also said that he was strangled, and it is also said that he was drowned. Allāh knows best. Thus, they incurred his sin and the sin of those who were with him from the eminent scholars, judges, dignitaries, leaders, emirs, and those in authority in Baghdad.

He (the Caliph), may Allāh have mercy on him, was a Sunni, following the way of the Salaf and the belief of the Jamāʿah, just as his father and grandfather were. However, he had leniency, a lack of vigilance, and a love for wealth and its accumulation. Among his faults was that he embezzled a deposit that al-Nāṣir Dāwūd bin al-Muʿaẓẓam had entrusted to him, which was worth about a hundred thousand dinars. This was reprehensible for someone like the Caliph, and it is reprehensible for anyone far lesser than him. Indeed, among the People of the Book, " some of whom, if you entrust them with a quintal of gold, they will pay it back to you," as Allāh the Exalted said:

{And among them are those who, if you entrust them with a dinar, will not pay it back to you unless you are constantly standing over them.}

I say: And I do not know how it can be true that someone who embezzles a deposit and amuses himself with a dancer while the state of Islam is collapsing, can be following the way of the Salaf!! What Salaf are these whose way such a fallen Caliph followed?!

Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, continues:

The Tatars killed him unjustly and oppressively on Wednesday, the fourteenth of Ṣafar of that year. He was forty-six years and four months old, and his caliphate lasted fifteen years, eight months, and some days. May Allāh have mercy on him, honor his resting place, and moisten his soil with mercy. After him, his two sons were killed, and the third was captured along with three daughters from his lineage.

{And I do not know who oppressed this oppressed man as well? Were they the Tatars, or was he oppressing himself and his subjects?! And glory be to our Lord who said: "So We seized each of them for their sin; and among them were those upon whom We sent a storm of stones, and among them were those who were seized by the blast [of the trumpet], and among them were those whom We caused the earth to swallow, and among them were those whom We drowned. And Allāh would not have wronged them, but it was they who were wronging themselves."} (Al-ʿAnkabūt: 40).

They turned to the city and killed everyone they could find of men, women, children, elderly, adults, and youth.

Many people went into wells, latrines, and sewage canals and hid there for days without appearing. Groups of people gathered in khānāt (inns) and locked the doors on themselves, but the Tatars would open them, either by breaking them or by fire. Then they would enter upon them, and people would flee from them to the upper levels, and they would kill them on the rooftops until the gutters ran with blood in the alleys. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return. The same happened in mosques, congregational mosques, and ribāṭs (hospices). No one was spared except the Ahl al-Dhimma (protected non-Muslims) from the Jews and Christians and those who sought refuge with them and in the house of the vizier Ibn al-‘Alqamī al-Rāfiḍī, and a group of merchants who obtained amān (safe conduct) for a large sum of money until they and their wealth were safe. Baghdad, after being the most vibrant of all cities, became like ruins, with only a few people in it, and they were in fear, hunger, humiliation, and scarcity.

The vizier Ibn al-‘Alqamī had, before this incident, been striving to dismiss the armies and remove their stipends from the dīwān (registry). The armies at the end of al-Mustanṣir's days were close to a hundred thousand fighters, among them emirs who were like great kings. He continued to strive to reduce them until only ten thousand remained. Then he corresponded with the Tatars and tempted them to seize the lands, making it easy for them, and revealing to them the reality of the situation and exposing the weakness of the men. All of this was out of his desire to completely eliminate the Sunnah, to make the Rāfiḍī bid‘ah (innovation) prevail, to establish a Caliph from the Fāṭimids, and to exterminate the scholars and muftīs (jurisconsults). But Allāh is dominant over His affair, and He turned his plot back against him, humiliated him after his utmost might, and made him a doorkeeper for the Tatars after he had been a vizier to the Caliphs. He earned the sin of those killed in the city of Baghdad, men, women, and children. Judgment belongs to Allāh, the Most High, the Great, Lord of the earth and the heavens.

People have differed on the number of Muslims killed in Baghdad. It is said: eight hundred thousand. It is said: one million and eight hundred thousand. It is said: the number of dead reached two million souls. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return. And there is no power nor might except with Allāh, the Most High, the Magnificent.

Their entry into Baghdad was at the end of Muharram, and the sword continued to kill its inhabitants for forty mornings. The killing of Caliph al-Musta‘ṣim bi-’llāh, Commander of the Believers, was on Wednesday, the fourteenth of Ṣafar. May his grave be pardoned. He was forty-six years and four months old at the time, and his caliphate lasted fifteen years, eight months, and some days. His eldest son Abū al-‘Abbās Aḥmad, who was twenty-five years old, was killed with him. Then his middle son Abū al-Faḍl ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, who was twenty-three years old, was killed. His youngest son Mubārak was captured, and his three sisters Fāṭimah, Khadījah, and Maryam were captured. It is said that nearly a thousand virgins were captured from the House of the Caliphate, and Allāh knows best. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

The ustāddār (chamberlain) of the Caliphate, Shaykh Muḥyī al-Dīn Yūsuf bin Shaykh Abī al-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī, who was an enemy of the vizier, was killed, as well as his three sons, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, ‘Abd Allāh, and ‘Abd al-Karīm. And the dignitaries of the state, one after another, including Duwaydār al-Ṣaghīr Mujāhid al-Dīn Aybak, Shihāb al-Dīn Sulaymān Shāh, and a group of Sunni emirs and notables of the city.

A man from the House of the Caliphate, from Banū al-‘Abbās, would be summoned, and he would come out with his children and women. He would be taken to the al-Khallāl cemetery facing al-Manẓarah and slaughtered like a sheep. Those whom they chose from his daughters and slave girls would be captured.

Shaykh al-Shuyūkh Mu'addib al-Khalīfah Ṣadr al-Dīn 'Alī bin al-Nayyār, the preachers, imams, and bearers of the Qur'ān were killed. Mosques and congregational prayers and Friday prayers were suspended for months in Baghdad. The vizier Ibn al-'Alqamī, may Allāh disgrace him and curse him, wanted to close down the mosques, schools, and ribāṭs in Baghdad and to maintain the mashāhid (shrines) and Rāfiḍī sites and to build a massive school for the Rāfiḍah to propagate their knowledge and 'ilm (knowledge) in it and upon it. But Allāh the Exalted did not enable him to do that. Rather, He removed His favor from him and cut short his life a few months after this incident, and followed him with his son. They gathered—Allāh knows best—in the lowest depths of Hellfire.

When the allotted time and the forty days ended, Baghdad remained desolate on its foundations, with no one in it except a few scattered people. The dead lay in the streets like mounds. Rain fell upon them, changing their appearances, and the city reeked from their corpses, and the air changed, causing a severe epidemic. It spread through the air to the lands of the Levant, and many creatures died from the change of climate and the corruption of the air. Famine, epidemic, annihilation, stabbing, and plague gathered upon the people. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

When the amān (safe conduct) was proclaimed in Baghdad, those who were in underground cellars, canals, and caves emerged as if they were the dead when they are resurrected from their graves. Some of them did not recognize each other. A father did not recognize his son, nor a brother his brother. The severe epidemic seized them, and they perished and joined those who preceded them of the killed, and they gathered in decay under the soil by the command of the One who knows the secret and what is more hidden. Allāh, there is no deity except Him; to Him belong the best names.

Sultan al-Musaltaṭ (the dominant Sultan) Hūlākū Khān departed from Baghdad in Jumādā al-Ūlā of that year to his royal residence, entrusting the affairs of Baghdad to Emir ‘Alī Bahādur, entrusting him with the shiḥnakiyyah (military governorship) there, and to the vizier Mu’ayyad al-Dīn bin al-‘Alqamī. But Allāh did not delay him or neglect him. Rather, He seized him with the seizure of the Mighty, the Powerful, at the beginning of Jumādā al-Ākhirah, at the age of sixty-three. He possessed excellence in composition and had literary merit, but he was a staunch, malicious, Rāfiḍī Shī‘ī. He died of grief, sorrow, sadness, and regret, "to where Umm Qash‘am cast her saddle." After him, his son ‘Izz al-Dīn Abū al-Faḍl Muḥammad assumed the vizierate, but Allāh caused him to join his father in the remainder of that year, praise and favor be to Allāh.

Abū Shāmah, our Shaykh Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Dhahabī, and Quṭb al-Dīn al-Yūnīnī mentioned that a severe epidemic afflicted the people in the Levant in that year, and they mentioned that the cause of that was the corruption of the air and the climate, which became corrupted from the large number of dead in the lands of Iraq and spread until it reached the lands of the Levant. And Allāh knows best.

{Reflect on the state of the neighbors of the disaster from the emirs..!}

In this year, the Egyptians fought with the ruler of al-Karak, al-Malik al-Mughīth ‘Umar bin al-‘Ādil bin Abī Bakr bin al-‘Ādil al-Kabīr. In his army was a group of the Baḥriyyah emirs, including Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī. The Egyptians defeated them, plundered what they had of baggage and wealth, and captured a group of leading emirs, who were executed by crucifixion. They returned to al-Karak in the worst and most shameful state and began to spread corruption in the land and wreak havoc in the regions. Allāh sent al-Nāṣir, the ruler of Damascus, who dispatched an army to restrain them from that, but the Baḥriyyah defeated them and sought help. Al-Nāṣir himself went out to them, but they paid him no attention and cut the ropes of his tent in which he was in, at the instigation of Rukn al-Dīn Baybars mentioned. Wars and serious events occurred, the details of which are lengthy, and Allāh is the One whose help is sought.

In the year 657 AH:

This year began with no Caliph for the Muslims. The Sultan of Damascus and Aleppo was al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf bin al-‘Azīz Muḥammad bin Abī al-Zāhir Ghāzī bin al-Nāṣir, the conqueror of Jerusalem. A conflict existed between him and the Egyptians, who had made Nūr al-Dīn ‘Alī bin al-Mu‘izz Aybak al-Turkmānī their king and given him the title al-Manṣūr. The oppressive king Hūlākū Khān sent to al-Malik al-Nāṣir in Damascus summoning him to him. He sent to him his son al-‘Azīz, who was young, accompanied by many gifts and treasures, but Hūlākū did not pay him much attention and became angry with his father for not coming to him and said: "I am the one who will march to his lands myself." Al-Nāṣir was disturbed by this and sent his womenfolk and family to al-Karak to fortify them there. The people of Damascus were in great fear when they heard that the Tatars had crossed the Euphrates. Many of them went to the Egyptian lands during the winter, and many of them died, and others were plundered. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

Hūlākū advanced, heading towards the Levant with his armies and forces. Mayyāfāriqīn had resisted the Tatars for a year and a half, so he sent his son Ashmūṭ to it, who conquered it by force and brought down its ruler al-Kāmil bin al-Shihāb Ghāzī bin al-‘Ādil and sent him to his father while he was besieging Aleppo, and he killed him before his eyes. He appointed some of al-Ashraf's mamālīk as governor over it, and the head of al-Kāmil was paraded in the lands and brought into Damascus and placed on the Bāb al-Farādīs (Paradise Gate).

And reflect on the relief of Allāh and its causes, and on the revival and its beginnings and how it might be!

In this year, the judge and vizier Kamāl al-Dīn ‘Umar bin Abī Jarādah, known as Ibn al-‘Adīm, arrived in the Egyptian lands as a messenger from the ruler of Damascus al-Nāṣir bin al-‘Azīz, seeking aid from the Egyptians in fighting the Tatars, stating that their arrival in the Levant was imminent and that they had seized the lands of the Jazīrah, Ḥarrān, and others, and that Ashmūṭ bin Hūlākū had crossed the Euphrates and was approaching the city of Aleppo. Thereupon, a council was convened before al-Manṣūr bin al-Mu‘izz al-Turkmānī, and the judge of Egypt Badr al-Dīn al-Sinjārī and Shaykh ‘Izz al-Dīn bin ‘Abd al-Salām were present. They elaborated on the matter of taking some of the public funds to assist the soldiers, and the main reliance was on what {the Sultan of Scholars} ‘Izz al-Dīn bin ‘Abd al-Salām said. His conclusion was:

"If nothing remains in the bayt al-māl (treasury) and you have spent the savings of gold and other ornaments and you have become equal to the common people in clothing except for war instruments, and nothing remains for the soldier except his horse that he rides, then it is permissible to take something from people's wealth to repel the enemies, because if the enemy attacks, it is obligatory upon all people to repel them with their wealth and lives."

The Reign of al-Malik al-Muṣaffar Quṭuz:

In this year, Emir Sayf al-Dīn Quṭuz seized ‘Alī, the son of his master Nūr al-Dīn ‘Alī, titled al-Manṣūr. This occurred during the absence of most of the emirs from his father's mamālīk and others on a hunting expedition. He apprehended him and sent him with his mother, his two sons, and his brothers to the lands of al-Ashkarī, and he seized power himself and named himself al-Malik al-Muṣaffar. This was from the mercy of Allāh upon the Muslims, for he was the one through whom the defeat of the Tatars was facilitated, as will be explained, Allāh willing. This is what he justified his action with, saying: "The people must have a strong sultan who fights the Tatars, and this is a young boy who does not know how to manage the kingdom."

In this year, al-Malik al-Nāṣir, the ruler of Damascus, marched to Waṭ'ah Barzah with vast armies of soldiers, volunteers, Bedouins, and others. When he realized their weakness to resist the Mongols, that gathering dispersed and neither he nor they persevered. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

In the year 658 AH:

This year began on Thursday, with no Caliph for the people. The King of Iraq and Khurasan and other lands of the East was Sultan Hūlākū Khān, the King of the Tatars, son of Tūlī bin Genghis Khan. The Sultan of Egypt was al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Sayf al-Dīn Quṭuz, mamlūk of al-Mu'izz Aybak al-Turkmānī. The Sultan of Damascus and Aleppo was al-Malik al-Nāṣir bin al-ʿAzīz bin al-Zāhir Ghāzī bin al-Nāṣir, the conqueror of Jerusalem. The lands of al-Karak and al-Shawbak belonged to al-Malik al-Mughīth bin al-ʿĀdil Abī Bakr bin al-Kāmil Muḥammad bin al-ʿĀdil Abī Bakr bin Ayyūb, and he was allied with al-Nāṣir, the ruler of Damascus, against the Egyptians, and with them was Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī. They had resolved to fight the Egyptians and seize the country from them!!

The Tatars Seize Aleppo and Damascus:

While the people were in this state, and news of the Tatars' intention to invade the Levant was widespread, the Mongol army entered accompanied by their king Hūlākū. They crossed the Euphrates on bridges they had built and reached Aleppo on the second of Ṣafar of this year. They besieged it for seven days, then conquered it by amān (safe conduct), but they betrayed them and killed a multitude that only Allāh the Exalted knows, and plundered wealth and captured women and children. What happened to them was similar to what happened to the people of Baghdad. They roamed through the houses and made the honorable people of the city despicable. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

Their citadel resisted them for a month, then they took it by amān and destroyed the walls of the city and the walls of the citadel. Aleppo remained as if it were a mangy donkey. Its governor was al-Malik al-Mu‘azzam Tūrān Shāh bin Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and he was wise and resolute, but the army did not agree with him on reconciliation, but they rushed into action, and Allāh's command was a decree destined. Sultan Hūlākū had sent to the people of the city, saying to them when he arrived with his forces: "We have only come to fight al-Malik al-Nāṣir in Damascus, and we want you to place a garrison in the citadel. If victory is ours, then all the lands will be under our rule, and if it is against us, then if you wish, you can accept the garrison, and if you wish, you can release them." They replied: "You will get nothing from us but the sword." He was astonished by their weakness and their response in this way, so he then advanced towards them and surrounded the city, and what happened happened by the decree and predestination of Allāh. When Aleppo was conquered, the ruler of Ḥamāh sent its keys to him, and he appointed a man from the Persians as governor over it, claiming to be from the descendants of Khālīd bin al-Walīd, named Khusrawshāh. He destroyed its walls as he had done to the city of Aleppo.

While Hūlākū was encamped on Aleppo, he sent an army with an emir from the senior ranks of his state named Kitbughā Nūyān. They reached Damascus at the end of Ṣafar and seized it quickly without resistance or defense. Rather, its notables welcomed them with open arms. Sultan Hūlākū had written with them a firmān (decree) of amān for the people of the city, which was read in al-Maydān al-Akhḍar (Green Square) and proclaimed in the city, so people felt safe, wary of betrayal as had happened to the people of Aleppo. This occurred while the citadel was resisting and fortified, and majānīq were erected on its high points. They set up majānīq against the citadel from its west side and destroyed many walls. Its governor responded to them at the end of that day for reconciliation, so they opened it and destroyed every building in it, and killed its governor and handed it over to one of their emirs named ʿĪl Sabān.

He, may Allāh curse him, greatly honored the Christian religion, and their bishops and priests gathered with him, and he greatly honored them and visited their churches. So, they had power, influence, and authority because of him, may Allāh curse them the Exalted. A group of Christians went to Hūlakū with gifts and treasures and returned from him with a firmān of amān from his side and entered the city from Bāb Tūmā (Thomas Gate), carrying a erected cross, carrying it on people's heads, and they were proclaiming their slogans and saying, "The true religion has appeared, the religion of Christ."

They were denouncing the religion of Islam and its people, and with them were vessels containing wine. They did not pass by the door of a mosque without sprinkling wine at it. Jugs full of wine they sprinkled on people's faces and ordered everyone they passed by in the markets and streets to stand for their cross. They entered from Darb al-Ḥajar and stopped at the ribāṭ of Shaykh Abī al-Bayān and sprinkled wine at it, and likewise at the door of Masjid Darb al-Ḥajar al-Ṣaghīr and al-Kabīr. They passed through the market until they reached Darb al-Rayḥān or close to it. The Muslims gathered against them in large numbers, and they pushed them back to the market of the Church of Mary. Their preacher stood at the platform of a shop in a corner of the market there and mentioned in his sermon praise for the Christian religion and denigration of the religion of Islam and its people. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return. Then they entered the Church of Mary, which was still thriving then, but this was the cause of its ruin, praise be to Allāh.

He said: And it was mentioned that they entered the congregational mosque with wine, and they intended, if the Tatar rule lasted long, to destroy many of the mosques and others, but Allāh sufficed their evil. When this occurred in the city, the judges of the Muslims, witnesses, and fuqahā' gathered and entered the citadel, complaining about this situation to its governor ʿĪl Sabān. They were insulted and driven away, and the words of the Christian leaders were given precedence over them. Truly, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return.

At the beginning of this year, the Sultan of Syria, al-Nāṣir bin al-‘Azīz, had stayed in Waṭ’ah Barzah with a large number of armies, emirs, and sons of kings to engage the Tatars if they advanced upon them. Among those with him was Emir Baybars al-Bunduqdārī with a group of the Baḥriyyah, and the word among the armies was divided and not unified, due to what Allāh the Exalted willed.

A group of emirs resolved to depose al-Malik al-Nāṣir and imprison him and pledge allegiance to his full brother al-Malik al-Zāhir ‘Alī. When al-Nāṣir sensed that, he fled to the al-Manṣūrah Citadel, and the armies scattered in disarray. Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī and his companions proceeded towards the area of Gaza. Al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Quṭuz summoned him to him and brought him to his presence and granted him Qalyūb as an iqṭā‘ and housed him in the vizierate's residence and elevated his status with him, but his demise was in fact at his hands.

Battle of ‘Ayn Jālūt, 27 Ramaḍān 658 AH:

It so happened that all of this occurred in the last ten days of Ramaḍān of this year. Only three days had passed when the glad tidings of the Muslims' victory over the Tatars at ‘Ayn Jālūt came, praise be to Allāh. This was because al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Quṭuz, the ruler of Egypt, when news reached him of what the Tatars had done in the Levant, as mentioned, and that they had plundered all the lands until they reached Gaza and had resolved to enter the Egyptian lands, and al-Malik al-Nāṣir, the ruler of Damascus, had resolved to travel to Egypt—if only he had done so. With him was al-Malik al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Ḥamāh, and a multitude of emirs and sons of kings. He had reached Quṭayyah, and al-Malik al-Muẓaffar prepared to meet him and sent to him and to al-Manṣūr urging them on and sent to him saying: "Advance so that we may be shoulder to shoulder against the Tatars."

But he imagined something from that and feared that he would prevail over him, so he turned back... and the Tatars pursued al-Nāṣir until they captured and imprisoned him at Birkat Zayzā' and sent him with his son al-ʿAzīz, who was young, and his brother to their king Hūlākū, who was encamped on Aleppo, and they remained in his captivity until he killed them in the following year, as we will mention.

The point is that when al-Muẓaffar received news of what had occurred regarding the Tatars in the guarded Levant and that they were determined to enter the Egyptian lands after consolidating their kingdom in the Levant, he preempted them before they preempted him and advanced towards them, may Allāh support him, and marched upon them before they marched upon him. He set out with the Egyptian armies, and the word was united upon him, until he reached with his army al-Manṣūrah to the Levant, and the Mongol army awoke to him, and their commander was Kitbughā Nūyān, who was then in al-Biqā'. He consulted al-Ashraf, the ruler of Ḥimṣ, and Judge Muġīr al-Dīn bin al-Zakī about meeting al-Muẓaffar. Some of them advised that he was no match for al-Muẓaffar until he received reinforcements from Hūlākū, but he refused except to engage him quickly. They clashed, and their meeting was at ʿAyn Jālūt on Friday, the twenty-fifth of Ramaḍān. They fought a mighty and fierce battle, and victory, praise be to Allāh, was for Islam and its people. The Muslims inflicted a devastating defeat upon them, and Kitbughā Nūyān and a group from his household were killed. It is said that the one who killed Kitbughā Nūyān was Emir Jamāl al-Dīn Āqūsh al-Shamsī. The Islamic army pursued them, killing them in every place and in every tight spot. Al-Malik al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Ḥamāh, fought alongside al-Malik al-Muẓaffar in this battle a great fight, and likewise Emir Fāris al-Dīn Aqtāy al-Mustaʿrib, who was the atābak of the army. Among those captured from Kitbughā Nūyān's group was al-Malik al-Saʿīd bin al-ʿAzīz bin al-ʿĀdil, and al-Muẓaffar ordered his beheading. Al-Ashraf, the ruler of Ḥimṣ, who had been with the Tatars and whom Hūlākū had made governor over the entire Levant, sought amān and al-Muẓaffar granted him amān and returned Ḥimṣ to him, and likewise returned Ḥamāh to al-Manṣūr and added al-Ma‘arrāh and other areas, and released Salamiyyah to Emir Sharaf al-Dīn ‘Īsā bin Muhannā bin Mānī‘, the emir of the Arabs. Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī and a group of brave men pursued the Tatars, killing them in every place, until they reached their rearguard to Aleppo. Those in Damascus fled from them, and their flight from it was on Sunday, the twenty-seventh of Ramaḍān, on the morning of the victory when the glad tidings of victory at ‘Ayn Jālūt arrived. The Muslims pursued them from Damascus, killing, capturing, and plundering wealth from them, and forcibly rescuing the captives from their hands, praise and favors be to Allāh for His restoration of Islam and His treatment of them with His gracious kindness.

The joyful tidings came, and they were answered by joyful tidings from the al-Manṣūrah Citadel. The believers rejoiced on that day at Allāh's victory, a great joy, and Allāh supported Islam and its people with support, and suppressed the enemies of Allāh, the Christians, Jews, and hypocrites, and the religion of Allāh prevailed, even though they disliked it, and Allāh aided His religion and His Prophet, even if the disbelievers disliked it. Thereupon, the Muslims rushed to the Christian church from which the cross had been taken out, and they plundered what was in it and burned it and set fire to what was around it, and many houses of Christians burned, and may Allāh fill their houses and graves with fire. Part of a Jacobite church burned, and a group intended to plunder the Jews, but it was said to them: "They did not exhibit the same outward tyranny as those who worship the crosses." The common people killed in the middle of the congregational mosque a Rāfiḍī shaykh who had been colluding with the Tatars regarding people's wealth, named al-Fakhr Muḥammad bin Yūsuf al-Kunjī. He was of malicious intent, an orientalist, colluding with them against the wealth of the Muslims, may Allāh disgrace him. And they killed a group like him from the hypocrites who were colluding against the Muslims.

{So the people of injustice were eliminated. And praise to Allāh, Lord of the worlds.} (Al-An‘ām: 45).

When al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Quṭuz defeated the Tatar armies at ‘Ayn Jālūt, he pursued them and entered Damascus in magnificent splendor. The people rejoiced greatly at his arrival and prayed for him extensively. He confirmed al-Malik al-Ashraf, the ruler of Ḥimṣ, in his city, and likewise al-Manṣūr, the ruler of Ḥamāh. He also recovered Aleppo from the hands of the Tatars, restoring justice and establishing order. He had sent ahead of him Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī to expel the Tatars and take possession of the city of Aleppo, promising him its governorship. However, when he drove them out of it, expelled them from it, and the Muslims took possession of it, he appointed someone else as governor over it, namely ‘Alā’ al-Dīn, the son of the ruler of Mosul. This was the cause of the estrangement that occurred between them and led to the swift assassination of al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Quṭuz. To Allāh belongs the command.

Mention of the Sultanate of al-Malik al-Ẓāhir, who is the Fierce Lion, Baybars al-Bunduqdārī

When Sultan al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Quṭuz returned with the armies, heading towards the Egyptian lands, and reached the area between al-Ghurābī and al-Ṣāliḥiyyah, the emirs attacked him and killed him there. He was a righteous man, who frequently prayed in congregation and did not indulge in alcohol or anything that kings typically indulge in. His reign lasted from the time he deposed the son of his master, al-Manṣūr ‘Alī bin al-Mu‘izz al-Turkmānī, until this time, which was the end of Dhū al-Qa‘dah, about a year, may Allāh have mercy on him and reward him for Islam and its people.

Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī had conspired with a group of emirs to kill him. They threw him from his horse and showered him with arrows until they finished him off. They unanimously agreed to pledge allegiance to Emir Rukn al-Dīn Baybars al-Bunduqdārī. He was not among the senior leaders among them, but they wanted to test him and gave him the title al-Malik al-Ẓāhir. He ascended the throne of kingship and sat on its seat, and he ruled justly, deciding matters decisively and fairly.

He was courageous and brave, and Allāh established him for the people due to their dire need for him in this difficult and arduous time. He then proceeded to apprehend those he perceived as aspiring to leadership among the senior emirs until he consolidated the kingdom as he desired, and Allāh is witness over all things.

When Sultan Hūlākū Khān received news of what had befallen his army at ‘Ayn Jālūt, he sent a large contingent of his army to the Levant to reclaim it from the hands of the army of Islam. However, they were prevented from achieving what they desired and returned to him disappointed and defeated. This was because the Lion, the Breaker, and the Sharp Sword, Sultan al-Malik al-Mu’ayyad al-Ẓāhir, rose to confront them. He arrived in Damascus and dispatched armies from every side to guard the frontiers and strongholds with complete armaments and forces. The Tatars were unable to approach him or advance upon him. At that point, their devils retreated on their heels and turned back in utter defeat, praise be to Allāh, by whose grace good deeds are accomplished and joys are perfected in this worldly life and after death.

In the year 660 AH:

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, numerous delegations of Tatars came to al-Malik al-Ẓāhir seeking amān (safe conduct). He honored them, treated them well, and granted them good iqṭā‘āt (land grants). He did likewise with the children of the ruler of Mosul and arranged sufficient stipends for their brothers.

In this year, Hūlākū sent a detachment of his soldiers, about ten thousand, who besieged Mosul and set up twenty-four manjānīq (siege engines) against it, and provisions became scarce in it.

In this year, discord occurred between Hūlākū and Sultan Barakah, his cousin. Barakah sent to him demanding a share of what he had conquered of lands, as was their custom. He killed his messengers, so Barakah’s anger intensified, and he corresponded with al-Ẓāhir to agree on a plan against Hūlākū.

In the year 661 AH:

In this year, Barakah Khān and Hūlākū met, each with vast armies, and they fought. Hūlākū was inflicted with a terrible defeat, and most of his companions were killed, and most of those who remained drowned. He fled with a small remnant of his companions, praise be to Allāh. When Barakah Khān observed the large number of dead, he said: "It grieves me that the Mongols kill each other, but what is the remedy for one who changes the sunnah (tradition) of Genghis Khan?!" Then Barakah Khān raided the lands of Constantinople, and its ruler made peace with him. Al-Zāhir sent great gifts and numerous magnificent treasures to Barakah.

In the year 662 AH:

In this year, messengers of King Barakah Khān arrived to al-Malik al-Zāhir, accompanied by al-Ashraf bin Shihāb Ghāzī bin al-‘Ādil, and they brought letters and verbal messages that brought joy to Islam and its people regarding what had befallen Hūlākū and his people.

In this year, Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī came to Baghdad from Sultan Hūlākū Khān. He inspected the awqāf (endowments) and the state of the city and took many books from various schools, transferring them to the observatory he built in Marāghah. Then he descended to Wāsiṭ and Basra.

In this year, King Hūlākū Khān, the King of the Tatars, summoned al-Zayn al-Ḥāfiẓī, who was Sulaymān ibn al-Mu’ayyad bin ‘Āmir al-‘Aqrabānī, known as al-Zayn al-Ḥāfiẓī, and said to him: "Your treachery has been proven to me." This deceived man, when the Tatars came with Hūlākū to Damascus and elsewhere, sided with them against the Muslims and harmed them, and pointed out their vulnerabilities, until Allāh subjected him to various punishments and exemplary retributions; {And thus do We give power to some wrongdoers over others}. In general, whoever aids an oppressor is subjected to him, for Allāh takes revenge on the oppressor by means of another oppressor, then He takes revenge on all the oppressors. We ask Allāh for safety from His vengeance, His wrath, His punishment, and the evil of His servants.

In the year 663 AH:

In this year, Sultan al-Malik al-Zāhir equipped a large and dense army to the region of the Euphrates to expel the Tatars stationed at al-Bīrah. When they heard that the Zāhirī armies were approaching, they turned on their heels in defeat, praise be to Allāh, Lord of the worlds. That region became pleasant and that trade route became secure. Before that, it was uninhabitable due to the prevalence of corruption and fear in it, but it was repopulated and became safe, praise be to Allāh.

In this year, Hūlākū Khān bin Tūlī Khān bin Genghis Khan perished:

The king of the Tatars, son of the king of the Tatars, son of the king of the Tatars, and he was the father of their kings. He was a tyrannical and stubborn king who killed Muslims in the east and west in numbers known only to their Creator, and He will recompense him for that with the worst of punishments. He, may Allāh curse him, was not bound by any religion. However, his wife Zafar Khātūn had converted to Christianity and favored the Christians. He, may Allāh curse him, pretended to love rationality, but did not grasp anything from it. His people from the offspring of philosophers had prestige and status with him. His ambition was only in managing his kingdom and gradually conquering lands until Allāh destroyed him in this year, or it is said: in the year six hundred and sixty-three. He was buried in the city of Tila, may Allāh not have mercy on him, and He is sufficient for us, and the best disposer of affairs.

Among those who died in it from the notables:

Sultan Barakah Khān bin Tūlī bin Genghis Khan bin Khāqān

He was the cousin of Hūlākū. This Barakah Khān had embraced Islam and loved scholars and righteous people. Among his greatest good deeds was his defeat of Hūlākū and the scattering of his armies. He was sincere in advising al-Malik al-Zāhir and revered him, honored his messengers to him, and released much wealth to them. Some of his household succeeded him in kingship, namely Mankūtimur bin Ṭaghān bin Batu bin Tūlī bin Genghis Khan, and he followed his path and manner, praise be to Allāh. End quote.

The calamity of the Tatars did not entirely end with that, as their raids continued, and the affliction upon them intensified in the east of the Muslim lands and into the Levant during the time of Timur Lenk and his descendants, until the Muslims triumphed over them, and they retreated to their lands. Islam had spread widely among them, and they established Tatar kingdoms in Central Asia, and their conquests extended until they encompassed most of North and East Asia. Thus, they conquered lands with Islam after the religion of Allāh conquered them and invaded their hearts, in a unique historical phenomenon where the victors followed the religion of the vanquished.

Comments and Quick Notes on the Course of Islamic History from the Banū Umayyah to the Rise of the Ottoman State

One who follows the course of the history of Islamic states and kingdoms, of which we have presented a brief overview, arrives at a clear conclusion. Such a course, and such a path, from the rulers first, and from their scholars second, and from the subjects third... according to the sunan (established patterns/ways) of Sharīʿah and divine decree, as well as rationally and logically and by the rules of politics and the struggle for survival between powers... could only lead to the outcome that it did.

However, there is concern that whoever reads history, especially brief summaries of it, and particularly those contemporary ones written by modern secularists and students of orientalist, might emerge with a distorted picture of our glorious Islamic history. He might think that all Muslim kings and emirs were tyrannical oppressors, devoid of goodness, wicked libertines, preoccupied with singing girls and slave women, devoted to debauchery and indulgence in both what Allāh has permitted and what He has forbidden!

And that all or most Muslim scholars were negligent in fulfilling their trust, sitting idly by from enjoining good and forbidding evil and Jihād, lining up at the doors of emirs waiting for grants and gifts!

And he might think that most of the subjects were immersed in straying and depravity, wicked people following the religion of their kings, not recognizing good nor denouncing evil nor striving in the way of Allāh.

Such a conclusion is contrary to the reality of the detailed facts, even though what we have narrated, summarized from history books, is generally true. The greatest evidence for its truth is the dark outcome to which the affairs of the ummah deteriorated at the end of that decline and these are the historical roots of what we suffer from today of shameful calamities.

One who reads Islamic history in contemporary books, or in the textbooks approved in most or all Muslim countries, must be aware that most of these writings have been penned by secular pens from students of orientalist or those who were raised and studied under them. These books have adopted an approach that relies on forgery and fabrication in order to undermine our glorious history, to weaken our connection to our heritage, to distort the history of Jihād of our great ancestors from various components of the ethnic fabric of the nations of Islam, Arabs and non-Arabs, and to sow the seeds of fitnah between those components.

I recall from what we studied in various educational stages, from what was written by Arab nationalist writers, enormous amounts of that fabrication and forgery, which is too extensive to enumerate its examples here. I also recall, as an example of that, that when I studied in the Department of History at Beirut Arab University, we studied many strange things in our curricula, including that those who set the curricula had divided our Islamic history into what they called The Arab State – which includes the Prophetic State and the Banū Umayyah State then The Persian State – which includes the early Abbasid era then The Turkish State – which includes the rest of the Abbasid era then the history of some independent kingdoms. They also classified the Ottoman State as “The Ottoman Occupation of the Arab Lands”. They also presented the Islamic conquests since the Prophetic State and thereafter as political enticement and not as its true nature, a methodology of religion and a Sharī‘ah obligation to spread the global religion and the final message to the worlds. We also studied European history as much as or more than we studied our own history, not to mention highlighting the history of heretics and renegades from kings, revolutionaries, philosophers, misguided scholars, and famous poets of debauchery, wine, and depravity, and making them famous figures like the Qarāmiṭah and the Zanj and their leaders, and from notable figures like al-Fārābī, Ibn Sīnā, Abū al-‘Alā’ al-Ma‘arrī, Bashshār, and Abū Nuwās (before his repentance) and al-Iṣfahānī, the heretic author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī (Book of Songs) filled with lies and fabrications against the biographies of the Caliphs and what it contains of fabricated stories of debauchery... and much else besides. As for the deliberate forgery due to the national identity of the university and its secularism. There is no limit to the cheap tampering with the history of Muslims and their civilization and the evaluation of their curricula and men. This is a well-thought-out plan for intellectual invasion, and this is not the place to discuss it.

As for today, in the shadows of the war of ideas waged against us by the American crusader campaigns led by Bush, Rumsfeld, and Condoleezza Rice etc, and implemented by UNESCO and the United Nations, the calamity has gone to extremes in re-forging the forged from the history of Muslims into areas aimed at completely removing Muslims from their religion and stripping them completely of their history... Therefore, one must pay attention to the sources of history and scrutinize the identity of its writers and those behind them.

However, in order for the picture to be complete, correct, and comprehensive regarding what I summarized earlier from our Islamic history, we must also mention the bright aspects of Islamic civilization and history, whose virtues have left their mark on the forehead of humanity.

With this, we understand the logic of sunan summarized in fixed rules and patterns that explain to us the reasons for strength and numerous victories, and the reasons for weakness, enemy dominance, and the undeniable defeats that have befallen and continue to befall us. Such as what Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, if you support Allāh, He will support you and make your feet firm} (Muḥammad: 7). And as the Almighty said: {And when a disaster struck you, although you had struck [the enemy in a battle like] twice as much, you said, "From where is this?" Say, "It is from yourselves." Indeed, Allāh is over all things competent} (Āl ‘Imrān: 165).

And His saying, the Exalted: {And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life, and We will gather him on the Day of Resurrection blind." He will say, "My Lord, why have you gathered me blind, while I was seeing?" [Allāh] will say, "Thus did Our signs come to you, and you forgot them; and thus will you be forgotten today."} (Ṭāhā: 124-126).

And other than that in the Book of Allāh from the numerous divine sunan and laws... explained and detailed in the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), and from that is his saying:

{O company of Muhājirīn, five traits, I seek refuge with Allāh lest you reach them:

- Immorality never appears in people to the point that they openly declare it, except that they are afflicted with plagues and pains that were not in their ancestors who passed before them.

- And no people cheat in measures except that they are afflicted with years of scarcity, severity of livelihood, and the injustice of the ruler.

- And no people withhold the Zakāh of their wealth except that they are withheld rain from the sky, and were it not for the animals, they would not be rained upon.

- And no people break their covenant except that Allāh empowers an enemy over them from other than themselves, who takes some of what is in their hands.

- And as long as their leaders do not rule according to what Allāh has revealed in His Book, Allāh will cause them to fight among themselves).

This is not the place to exhaustively detail those evidences and the abundance of principles and sunan in understanding the course of history and the rise and fall of kingdoms.

So, it is upon us to understand these sunan in order to respect them and act upon the best of them and move with insight from the guidance of our Lord.

And in conclusion, everyone who turns away from the Sharī'ah of Allāh and takes His commands behind his back must understand His saying to Banū Isrā'īl when they disobeyed Allāh and His messengers and punishment befell them: {If you do good, you do good for yourselves; and if you do evil, [it is] for yourselves...} until His saying, the Exalted: {Perhaps your Lord will have mercy upon you. But if you return [to sin], We will return [to punishment]. And We have made Hell for the disbelievers a prison-mat} (Al-Isrā': 8). For there is no lineage or affinity between Allāh and any of His creation, and Allāh the Great has spoken truthfully: {And the retribution for an evil act is an evil one like it} (Al-Shūrā: 40).

The most important observations that we must mention and take into consideration as we study our glorious history are the following points:

Firstly: That the Sharīʿah of Allāh the Blessed and Exalted was the respected reference for all classes of rulers and ruled in all those kingdoms and societies. It was the ruler over them all. It was the supreme constitution of the state and the source of all its detailed laws. If a ruler or ruled deviated from it, it was out of wickedness, disobedience, slip, and deficiency, and those who committed them—rulers and ruled—knew that they were deficient and sinful. Alteration and change did not enter into the Sharīʿah of Allāh in terms of legislation and ruling by other than what Allāh revealed, out of disdain for the Sharīʿah of Allāh or preferring something else over it, or finding its rulings tedious, or feeling that it is possible to compare it favorably with something else, except belatedly, in the last quarter of the Ottoman State, as we will see in reviewing its history. Or what happened from some independent kingdoms that were originally established on apostasy from the religion of Allāh, as was the case with the ʿUbaydiyyah Fāṭimid State that arose in the Maghreb, Egypt, then the Levant, and was fundamentally established on heresy, magic, philosophy, sorcery, and false doctrines. Our scholars from the imams of its era ruled on its disbelief and apostasy from the religion. Likewise, what happened from some Tatar kings who claimed Islam and judged according to the Sharīʿah of their leader Genghis Khan, which he left for them codified in what was known as al-Yāsā or al-Yāsaq, and the definition of them has passed, such as Timur Lenk and his descendants... They are not evidence for what we are concerned with from the kingdoms that were afflicted by deviation, but they did not depart from the principle of referring to the Sharīʿah of Allāh, so the deviation did not exceed injustice and wickedness to apostasy and disbelief as happened later. Even though those kingdoms and states—with their rulers and ruled—received their inevitable divine punishment by the rule of sunan, in proportion to their injustice, wickedness, and disobedience.

Secondly: The vast majority of those wayward kings and princes, even the most corrupt, immoral, and those who fought for power, were engaged in Jihād against the enemies of Islām, the disbelievers, both defensively and offensively. This was especially true in defending the lands, lives, and sanctities of the Muslims, as we have seen in the many examples mentioned. We saw this from the corrupt tyrants of the Umayyads, as well as from the Abbasids, down to the kings of the independent kingdoms. The Hamdanids—despite being Shiites, and despite the innovations and injustices they were afflicted with—were among those who fought the Romans and performed admirably. The Seljuk Turks, despite their oppression, tyranny, and aggression against the caliphs and the subjects, stood as a strong barrier against the Romans, and they had great battles. The Zangid Atabegs and their righteous king Nūr al-Dīn, may Allāh have mercy on him, followed. Then the Ayyubids and the founder of their state, the mujāhid al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and others, even Baybars the Mamluk, who killed the Amīr of the Muslims after the great victory at ‘Ayn Jālūt for the sake of kingship and leadership. He was subsequently oppressive, cruel, and tyrannical, yet he did not dismount from his horse for twenty-seven years, during which he fought the Romans and the Tatars, who were his cousins, and he fought the Crusaders until he expelled them from most of the lands. Then the Mamluks who succeeded him took over the task until they completed it. Similar things can be said about the rest of the kingdoms, from the Ghaznavids and their righteous king Maḥmūd Sabuktakin, the Seljuks and their mujāhid Sultan Alp Arslān, the Ghurids and the Muslim Mongols in Asia and India, and about the kingdoms of North Africa, from the Aghlabid conquerors and mujāhids in Tunisia, to the Almoravids and Almohads in Morocco, and everywhere else where an Islamic kingdom was established.

Only individuals from the later generations of those kingdoms defected to the trench of inaction, treachery, and collaboration with the enemy, such as the wicked King al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl al-Ayyūbī, who allied with the Crusaders, and some of the "Kings of the Ṭawā’if in Andalusia," and others, upon whom history has recorded its curses. Most of them were overthrown by their families or by neighboring kingdoms. Their actions were considered reprehensible by the rulers, scholars, and subjects of that time.

Thirdly: Most of the prominent and famous Muslim scholars were either people of determination, so they held the kings and princes accountable, enjoining good and forbidding evil. History has recorded magnificent stories, written in gold and letters of light, from the time kingship appeared among the Umayyads until recently. The list of names of these righteous predecessors (Salaf) is long and filled with achievements. Or, if they were not people of determination, they isolated themselves from the palaces and their inhabitants, staying away from the rulers' affairs and dedicating themselves to knowledge and asceticism. They did not wallow in the mire of hypocrisy towards the sultans. Only a few stragglers among the prominent scholars, those who had fallen into the mire of the world, or scoundrels among those who were counted as scholars, deviated from this. We were not afflicted by the general corruption of scholars, except for a very few, whom Allāh protected, as is the case in our time, except in later periods of our long history. The scholars were also exemplary in Jihād, especially during crises and major calamities. They would go out for conquests, both defensively and offensively, with the Imāms of the Muslims, both the righteous and the immoral, against the enemies of the Muslims from among the disbelievers. This was before the time of dish-dashes overshadowed us, bellies drooped, and the honors of turbans and beards sought after money and hashish.

Fourthly: The majority of the immoral princes and their tyrants, even the most oppressive among them, who were known for their might and cruelty, would take heed and humble themselves when admonished by the scholars, the people of accountability, and those who enjoyed good and forbade evil. They might even be affected, weep, and retract an injustice or a mistake, even if they later returned to their evil deeds. Religion had authority over their souls, and the sincere scholars—even those who stood against them—were respected and revered. Despite their tyranny, immorality, struggle for power, and injustices, they combined this good trait with a love for goodness, charity, benevolence, and various forms of righteousness and kindness, to atone for their transgressions and due to the nobility of their character. They built mosques and hospices, and established endowments for various charitable purposes, in addition to their Jihād and their rule, fundamentally based on the Shari‘ah of Allāh.

Fifthly: The majority of the Muslim subjects were originally righteous and respectful of religion. They followed the righteous scholars, supporting them in their positions, which encouraged the scholars to rise up on many occasions. They would go out for Jihād, mobilization, and to the frontier outposts. Good and evil were mixed in those times, but things did not reach the level of the widespread manifestation of disbelief, immorality, and disobedience that has become prevalent in later times. We ask Allāh for safety.

Sixthly: Goodness was never cut off throughout our history, and the banner of Islām, righteousness, and glory continued to be passed between different hands and the various components of the Ummah's fabric, including Arabs, non-Arabs, Turks, Persians, Berbers, Mongols, Africans, and others. Whenever Islām weakened in one place, it would rise in another. The last example was the establishment of the Ottoman state, which preserved the symbolic Caliphate that united the Muslims, after those who preceded them had passed, and Allāh replaced them with others.

Seventhly: The enduring miracle of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) in his informing us that a group fighting in the way of Allāh has always existed and will continue to exist:

From Jābir ibn Samurah (may Allāh be pleased with him), who attributed it to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), that he said:

"This religion will continue to stand, with a group of Muslims fighting for it until the Hour is established." (Narrated by Muslim) And from Mu'āwiyah, who also attributed it to him: "Whomever Allāh intends good for, He gives him understanding in the religion, and a group of Muslims will continue to fight for the truth, victorious over those who oppose them, until the Day of Judgment." (Narrated by Muslim)

And in another narration from him: "The Hour will not be established except that a group from my Ummah will be victorious over the people, not caring who betrays them or who supports them." (Narrated by Ibn Mājah)

Thus, the victorious group, this group of Jihād and defense, remained and continues to exist, fighting throughout the ages, and even to this day, praise and thanks be to Allāh.

The evidence for the observations I have mentioned is abundant in the history books. Perhaps Allāh will enable us to mention some of it in a separate book about our glorious history and its magnificent anecdotes. I had intended to quote some of what I have collected here, but I refrained from doing so, fearing that it would take us too long from the purpose of this historical overview in the context of this book.

In summary:

The "elements of righteousness inherent in the Ummah" in the rulers, scholars, and the ruled throughout those eras led to the continuation of goodness contending with the faces of evil and corruption in the Ummah. This extended the life of its civilization for more than thirteen centuries. All the fierce attacks that crashed against the steadfast rocks of Islamic states were shattered, and Islām remained towering, and the Muslims remained mighty. Every state, kingdom, and nation met its destiny according to the divine laws, in accordance with the amount of righteousness and corruption it possessed.

Until the last decades of the twentieth century began, and the majority of the masses of the Ummah, rulers and ruled alike, began to shed the Sharī'ah of their Lord. The enemy's plots succeeded in separating them from their religion, in belief and practice, except for the minority whom Allāh had mercy on. Thus began to befall us what we see today of the collapse, unprecedented in our history, where the invaders are fighting the Ummah with its own sons and those who (nominally) belong to it. We will detail the causes and evidence of this in the following chapters, Allāh willing. And we will search for solutions for it, hoping that they will benefit the victorious group, and hoping that we will be among them, Allāh willing.

Back to the beginning

We resume from where we left off in a brief overview of our history, after having reviewed the most important raids that our Islamic world was subjected to in our ancient history, namely the Crusades and the Mongol raids. We had presented the independent states, after mentioning a brief account of the history of the Prophetic state, the Rightly-Guided Caliphate, the Umayyad state, and the Abbasid state.

In the early tenth century AH (Hijri), and the beginning of the sixteenth century CE (Gregorian). The "House of Uthmān" (Ottomans), the descendants of the Seljuks in the Anatolian plateau, had risen and established a kingdom, which expanded gradually from western Anatolia, and transformed into a powerful sultanate. They managed to conquer Constantinople, the capital of the Byzantine Romans, in the year 1453 CE, which caused a global historical shift, as that event was considered by Western historians as the end of the Middle Ages and the beginning of the modern era.

After the Ottomans conquered Constantinople, they moved north and west in Europe, and conquered the lands of Crimea and the Black Sea region, the Caucasus, Eastern Europe, and the Balkans, reaching central Austria and northern Italy. They also moved south, extending their control over the Levant, Iraq, Egypt, the Hijaz, Yemen, then the central part of North Africa, and most of the Mediterranean islands. After conquering Egypt, they transferred the Caliphate to themselves, taking it from the last symbolic Abbasid caliphs who were in Cairo under the protection of the Mamluk state in the year 922 AH. Since that time, the Ottoman Caliphate was established, which reunited the dispersed Muslims under its banner and authority, and carried the banner of Jihād, defensively and offensively, in the face of the European states and kingdoms that inherited the banner of the Romans after the fall of Constantinople. Whatever the opinions of historians may be about that Caliphate and the Ottoman state, there is no doubt that it was an extension of the state of Islām, its banner, and its civilization. And an extension of the name of the Islamic Caliphate, which disappeared with the demise of the Ottoman state and its fall at the hands of the European states in 1924 CE.

Because of the importance of this period of modern Muslim history, indeed the history of the intense conflict between Muslims and the contemporary Romans (European states), we also present a brief account of the history of the Ottoman state. We will expand on it somewhat (approximately 80 pages), summarizing hundreds of pages from its sources, because it represents the early stages of the modern conflict between Muslims and European states. It also constitutes the beginnings of the emergence of the modern international system based on the system of conflict of interests and international alliances.

The reader will see that what we are experiencing today from the intrigues of the various modern Roman states: (Europe, Russia, and America) is nothing but a repetition of what happened during the past two centuries. The mention of that history—which is repeating itself now—is full of many extremely important lessons for the leading vanguard that will lead our current and future Jihād, with Allāh's help.

The Islamic State During the Reign of the Ottoman Caliphate

A Brief History of the Ottoman State (1300 - 1924 CE)

As I mentioned at the beginning of the history chapter, I relied on the book "History of the Ottoman State" – with summarization, adaptation, and additions – by the author "Farid Bey, the Lawyer". He appears to be an Egyptian of Turkish origin who wrote his book in 1910. His Masonic tendencies, his hatred for Sultan Abdul Hamid (may Allāh have mercy on him), his Turkish nationalist sentiment, and his support for the Jewish-Masonic Committee of Union and Progress are evident. His book is published in the well-known Alfiya program. The author's bias did not significantly affect his objectivity, except in his account of Sultan Abdul Hamid's era and his conflict with the Masons, and his account of the later stages since the Masons began their activities. As for the earlier stages, the author's sentiment is relatively objective, acceptable, and rich in information on the history of the Ottomans, to whose state the author showed great loyalty.

I apologize for not having had the time to correct the non-native accent in the author's writing style, taken from the CD-ROM – except for a little – but I may do so in a subsequent edition, God willing.

The founder of this state was Ertuğrul bin Süleyman Şah, the Turkmen leader of one of the Turkish tribes migrating from the plains of Western Asia to the lands of Asia Minor.

In the middle of the seventh century AH, Ertuğrul supported King Alaeddin, the Sultan of Konya, against his enemies. Konya was one of the Seljuk emirates established after the dissolution of the Seljuk state upon the death of Sultan Melik Şah on the 15th of Shawwal, 485 AH / 1092 CE.

King Alaeddin rewarded him for his assistance by granting him several regions and cities. He then titled his tribe "the Sultan's Vanguard" because they were always at the forefront of the armies.

Sultan Osman, Founder of the Ottoman State (1300 - 1317 CE)

When Ertuğrul died in 687 AH, corresponding to 1288 CE, King Alaeddin appointed his eldest son, Osman, the founder of the Ottoman state, in his place.

In approximately 1300 CE, corresponding to 699 AH, Tatar hordes attacked the lands of Asia Minor. This coincided with the death of Alaeddin, the last of the Seljuks in Konya, opening the way for Osman. He took possession of the lands granted to him and titled himself Padişah-ı Âl-i Osman. Then he began to expand his domain.

He then sent to all the Roman princes in Asia Minor, giving them the choice of three things: Islam, jizyah, or war. Some of them embraced Islam and joined him, some accepted paying tribute, and the rest sought the help of the Tatars against Sultan Osman. After defeating the Tatars, he returned quickly to besiege the city of Bursa in 717 AH, corresponding to 1317 CE. Its ruler, Evrenos, embraced Islam, was given the title Bey, and became one of the famous Ottoman commanders. Shortly after that, Osman died, having bequeathed the kingdom to his second son, Orhan.

Sultan Ghazi Orhan I (1317 - 1360 CE)

His first act was to move the seat of government to Bursa.

In 1355, the Roman king in Constantinople sent a delegation requesting his help in repelling the raids of Dušan, the king of Serbia. When the Ottomans landed on the coast of Europe, they realized the weakness of the Roman kingdom and its state of disintegration. Sultan Orhan began to secretly prepare battalions to cross the sea and occupy some points on the European shore to serve as centers for Ottoman operations in Europe. Fate aided them when a section of the walls of Gallipoli collapsed following a severe earthquake. The Ottomans entered it without much difficulty and occupied several other cities, including Ipsala and Rodosto.

Establishment of the Professional Ottoman Army: The Janissaries

Orhan was assisted by his brother, Alaeddin, in internal administration. One of Alaeddin's most important acts was to order the minting of silver and gold coins and to establish a system for the victorious armies, making them permanent. Previously, they were only assembled during wartime and disbanded afterward. He then feared that each faction of the soldiers would align with its respective tribe, breaking the bonds of Ottoman unity, which they had striven to create. One of the prominent figures of that time, named Kara Halil, who later became the first vizier under the name Hayreddin Pasha, suggested taking young men from the prisoners of war, separating them from anything that reminded them of their ethnicity and origin, and raising them with an Islamic Ottoman upbringing so that they would know no father but the Sultan and no profession but jihād in the way of Allāh. Since they had no relatives among the populace, there was no fear of them aligning with them. Sultan Orhan was impressed by this idea and ordered its implementation. When he had a considerable number of them, he took them to Hacı Bektaş, the sheikh of the Bektaşî order in Amasya, to pray for their well-being. This sheikh prayed for their victory over their enemies and said, "Let their name be Yeni Çeri," which is written in Turkish as Yeniçeri, meaning "new army," and was later dubbed in Arabic to İnkışari (Janissary). This army then advanced in organization and increased in number until it became the sole reliance in wars. It was one of the greatest and most important factors in the expansion of the Ottoman state's authority. However, they later overstepped their boundaries, transgressed, and became despotic, causing unrest in the state until Sultan Mahmud II abolished the Janissaries after killing most of them in 1241 AH because they resisted the reforms of the sultans, rebelled against them, and infringed upon their rights.

In 761 AH (1360 CE), Sultan Orhan Ghazi died at the age of 81, after a reign of 35 years, having strengthened the state with his new conquests and numerous reforms. He was buried in the city of Bursa.

Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan I (1360 - 1389 CE)

His reign lasted 35 years. His first act was the occupation of Ankara, the seat of the Karaman Sultanate. In Europe, he conquered Edirne in 1361 CE, which remained the capital of the Ottomans until the conquest of Constantinople in 1453 CE. He also conquered Philippopolis (modern Plovdiv), the capital of Eastern Rumelia. Evrenos Bey conquered the cities of Vardar and Kolgjumina in the name of the Ottoman Sultan. Thus, Constantinople became surrounded from the European side by Ottoman possessions and was separated from the remaining small Christian emirates that the Balkan Peninsula was divided among. The Sublime State became adjacent to the emirates of Serbia, Bulgaria, and Albania.

The Romans sought help from the Pope, who answered their plea and wrote to all the kings to prepare for war against the Muslims, inciting them to a religious war to protect Christianity from Islamic conquests.

Ourok V, who appointed the Grand Master of the Knights of Hungary, did not wait and marched with them to attack Edirne, the capital of the Ottoman territories. They did not last long before retreating, which occurred in 866 AH, 1363 CE.

When the state grew in stature, its neighbors, especially the weaker ones, feared it. In 1365, the Republic of Ragusa sent envoys to Sultan Murad, who concluded a treaty of friendship and trade with them. They pledged to pay an annual jizyah of 500 gold ducats. This was the first treaty concluded between the Ottomans and Christian states.

In 1379 CE, Lazar Grbljanovic, who ascended to the throne of the Serbian kingdom, allied with Sisman, the prince of Bulgaria, to fight the Ottomans. They then realized their inability and made peace with the Sultan on the condition that the Sultan marry the daughter of the Bulgarian prince and that the two princes pay him a fixed annual tribute. At the beginning of 1381 CE, conquests began again and resumed their previous course. The Sultan forced the prince of the Hamid region to cede his lands to him and conquered the cities of Monastir, Prilep, and Štip. The city of Sofia fell into Ottoman hands after a siege that lasted three years, from 1381 CE to 1383 CE. Following this, Grand Vizier Hayreddin Pasha conquered the famous city of Thessaloniki. In 1389 CE, fighting broke out between the Serbs and the Ottomans. In this important battle, the Ottomans prevailed, and Serbian independence was lost, as Bulgaria, Rumelia, and Anatolia had lost their independence before. While Sultan Murad was passing among the dead, a Serbian soldier arose from among them and stabbed the Sultan with a dagger, a fatal blow.

Sultan Ghazi Bayezid Khan I (1389 - 1402 CE)

The pillars of the state agreed on his succession. He had a slightly younger brother named Yaqub, characterized by courage, boldness, and high ambition. There was fear for the kingdom that he might claim the throne, so he was killed by the agreement of the state's princes and army commanders. European historians claim that his killing was based on a legal fatwā issued by the scholars of that time to prevent the occurrence of sedition (fitnah), based on Allāh's saying: { "And fitnah is worse than killing." } This heinous act was the first precedent set by the Ottoman Sultans for themselves, killing the Sultan's brothers upon his succession, to ward off sedition according to their flawed reasoning – according to historians, if the widespread claim about them is true.

Sultan Bayezid I began his actions by appointing Prince Stefan, son of Lazar, King of Serbia, as ruler over it, marrying his sister (Olivera), and allowing him to govern his country according to their laws, on the condition of paying a fixed jizyah and providing a certain number of soldiers to join the royal armies in wartime. When security prevailed in Europe, he turned to Asia and conquered the city of Alāşehir, known to Europeans as Philadelphia, in 1391 CE. It was the last remaining city of the Romans in Asia. Thus, the eastern part of the Sea of Marmara became purely Ottoman.

When Sigismund, King of Hungary, learned of what had befallen the lands of Bulgaria, he feared for his kingdom, as it had become adjacent to the Sublime State at several points. He sought help from Europe, and the Pope assisted him, declaring a religious war among the peoples of Western Europe. The Duke of Burgundy answered the call and sent his son, Count de Nevers, with six thousand warriors, most of whom were French nobles, including many relatives of the King of France himself. As he marched to Hungary, he was joined by the princes of Bavaria, Styria, the Knights Hospitaller, and Saint John of Jerusalem, and many Germans. This army then crossed the Danube River.

Sultan Bayezid marched towards them with two hundred thousand fighters, including many Serbs under the leadership of their prince, Stefan, son of Lazar, and others from the Christian nations subject to Ottoman rule. He fought them fiercely. On the 23rd of Dhū al-Qa‘dah, 798 AH / September 27, 1396 CE, the battle resulted in the victory of the Ottomans over the allied armies. Many French nobles were captured, including Count de Nevers himself, and most of them were killed. The rest and Count de Nevers were released after paying an agreed-upon ransom.

He then tightened the siege on Constantinople. Had it not been for the Mongol raids on Asia Minor, he might have been able to conquer it, but matters are contingent upon their times. He settled for concluding a peace treaty with its king this time, on the condition of paying ten thousand gold coins annually in the currency of that time, allowing Muslims to build a mosque there to perform the rituals of the true religion, and establishing a Sharī'ah court to adjudicate the cases of Muslims residing there.

Timur's Raid on Asia Minor

Timur raided Asia Minor with his vast armies and conquered the city of Sivas in Armenia. Therefore, Sultan Bayezid gathered his armies and marched to fight Timur the Lame. The two armies met on the plain of Ankara. He fell captive to the Mongols, along with his son Musa, on the 19th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 804 AH / July 20, 1402 CE. He died in captivity.

After the death of Sultan Bayezid, the state fragmented into several small emirates, as happened after the fall of the Seljuk state, because Timur restored to the princes of Kastamonu, Saruhan, Germiyan, Aydin, Menteşe, and Karaman the lands they had lost. During this period, Bulgaria, Serbia, and Wallachia became independent, and only a few countries remained under Ottoman rule. What added to the danger to this state was the disagreement of Bayezid's sons on appointing one of them. Each of them claimed the right for himself, so some of them allied with the Romans, and some with Timur. Eventually, the matter came to one of them, named Mehmed, and he took sole control of what remained of the Ottoman lands.

Sultan Mehmed Çelebi Ghazi (1410 - 1421 CE)

The reign of Sultan Mehmed was entirely consumed by internal wars to restore the emirates that had become independent during the period of chaos that followed the death of Sultan Bayezid in captivity. He maintained the alliance with the Roman king, without whose assistance the bonds of the Sublime State might have been broken. It is noteworthy about this Sultan that he used firmness with gentleness in dealing with those he conquered. He was occupied with suppressing sedition and arranging the affairs of the state until death suddenly came upon him in 824 AH, 1421 CE, in the city of Edirne. He passed away at the age of 43, having bequeathed the kingdom to his son Murad. Sultan Mehmed was known for his love of science and the arts. He was the first Ottoman king to send the annual gift to the Emir of Mecca, called the surra. It consisted of a specific amount of money sent to the Emir to distribute to the poor of Mecca and Medina.

Sultan Murad Khan II (1421 - 1451 CE)

He took over at the age of eighteen and began his actions by concluding peace with the Emir of Karaman and agreeing with the King of Hungary on a five-year truce so that he could devote himself to restoring those who had broken the bond of obedience from the provinces of Asia. However, something happened that distracted him from this, as some of his relatives allied with the Roman king.

In 1430, the Sultan reconquered Thessaloniki. After that, Sultan Murad wanted to conquer the remaining lands of Serbia, Albania (Arnavutluk), and Wallachia before turning again on Constantinople, so that it would have no supporter from these provinces. Sultan Murad fought many wars with the Serbs, Bulgarians, and Albanians. He abdicated the Sultanate to his son Mehmed, to devote himself to seclusion. He died on February 7, 1451, at the age of 49, after a reign of 30 years. He was succeeded by his son, Sultan Abu al-Fath Mehmed II.

Sultan Ghazi Mehmed II, Conqueror of Constantinople (1451 - 1481 CE)

He was the seventh Sultan. When he took over the kingdom after his father, there was no territory in Asia Minor outside his control except for part of the Karaman lands, the city of Sinop, and the Empire of Trebizond. The Eastern Roman Empire was limited to the city of Constantinople and its environs. The region of Morea was divided between the Venetians and several small emirates ruled by some Roman or European notables who had remained after the end of the Crusades, and the lands of the Arnavut (Bosnia). Historians claim that he ordered the killing of his infant brother named Ahmed and the return of Princess Mara of Serbia – his father's concubine – to her father. He then began to prepare to complete the conquest of the remaining Balkan lands and Constantinople so that all his possessions would be connected.

Conquest of Constantinople (857 AH - 1453 CE)

The Sultan besieged the city in early April 1453 from the land side with an army of two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers and from the sea side with a fleet of one hundred and eighty ships. He set up fourteen artillery batteries around the city, placing in them huge cannons made for him by a famous Hungarian craftsman named Orban. They could throw stone balls weighing twelve qintars each to a distance of one mile. During the siege, the tomb of Abu Ayyub al-Ansari, who was martyred during the siege of Constantinople in 52 AH during the caliphate of Muawiyah ibn Abi Sufyan (may Allāh be pleased with him), was discovered. After the conquest, he built a mosque for him, and it became customary after that for every Sultan who took over to be girded with the sword of Osman Ghazi I in this mosque.

When Constantine, the last of the Roman kings, saw these preparations, he sought help from Europe. The people of Genoa answered his request and sent him a fleet. Ottoman ships confronted it, and a huge battle erupted between them. It ended with the victory of the Genoese fleet and its entry into the harbor after the besieged raised the iron chains that had been placed to prevent Ottoman ships from reaching it. They were then lowered again after its passage, so the Ottoman ships could not pursue it. It delivered supplies to the city. After that, the Sultan began to think of a way for his ships to enter the harbor to complete the siege by land and sea. He came up with an ingenious idea: to transport the ships over land to bypass the chains placed to prevent him. This surprising feat was accomplished by paving a road on land for a distance of two farsakhs, or six miles (10 km), and placing wooden planks on it, onto which oil and grease were poured to facilitate the sliding of the ships. In this way, about seventy ships with their loads and cannons were transported to the other side of the gulf in one night! When morning came and the besieged saw them, they were certain that there was no escape from the victory of the Ottomans over them. The Sultan then ordered his armies to prepare for the attack on the 20th of Jumada al-Awwal, 857 AH / May 29, 1453 CE. On the night before the appointed day, the Ottoman soldiers lit lights in front of their tents to celebrate their imminent victory and spent the whole night chanting "There is no god but Allāh" and "Allāh is the greatest". When dawn broke, orders were issued to them to attack. One hundred and fifty thousand soldiers attacked, climbed the walls, and entered the city from every crevice. They put the sword to those who opposed them and entered the Hagia Sophia Church, where the patriarch was praying with a large number of people. The Romans believe to this day that the wall of the church split open and the patriarch and the holy images entered it. They believe that the wall will split again on the day the Turks leave Constantinople, and the patriarch will emerge from it and complete his prayer, which was interrupted when the Ottomans entered upon him during the conquest!

The city was named Islambol, meaning the City of Islam, and was made the capital of the state. We mention here that the Muslims besieged Constantinople eleven times before this last time, seven of which were in the first two centuries of Islam:

Muawiyah besieged it during the caliphate of our master Ali (may Allāh be pleased with him) in 34 AH / 654 CE.

Yazid ibn Muawiyah besieged it in 47 AH / 667 CE during the caliphate of our master Ali as well.

Sufyan ibn Awf besieged it during the caliphate of Muawiyah in 52 AH / 672 CE and in 97 AH / 715 CE.

Maslama ibn Abd al-Malik besieged it during the time of Caliph Umar ibn Abd al-Aziz (may Allāh be pleased with him).

It was also besieged during the caliphate of Hisham ibn Abd al-Malik in 121 AH / 739 CE.

In the seventh time, Caliph Harun al-Rashid besieged it in 182 AH / 798 CE.

Then the Sultan entered the city and found the soldiers engaged in looting and plundering. He issued orders to prevent all aggression, and security prevailed immediately. He then visited the Hagia Sophia Church and ordered that the call to prayer be made in it, declaring it a mosque for Muslims. After the conquest was completed in this manner, he announced in all areas that he did not oppose the practice of the Christian religion, but rather guaranteed them freedom of religion and the preservation of their property. Those Christians who had migrated returned. He imposed the payment of tribute on them, exempting only the religious leaders.

After completing these arrangements and rebuilding the destroyed city walls and fortifying them, he traveled with his armies to conquer new lands:

He headed for Morea, but its two princes, Demetrius and Thomas, brothers of Constantine, did not await his arrival but sent to him, informing him of their acceptance to pay an annual jizyah of twelve thousand ducats. The Sultan accepted this.

He changed his direction towards Serbia. The Serbian prince made peace with Sultan Mehmed II on the condition that he pay him eighty thousand ducats annually in 1454.

In the following year, he reached the city of Belgrade, located on the Danube River, and besieged it from the land and river sides. He then sent Grand Vizier Mahmud Pasha to complete the conquest of Serbia, which he completed from 1458 to 1460.

During this time, Morea was conquered. In 1458, the Sultan conquered the city of Corinth and the surrounding Greek lands until he stripped Thomas Palaiologos, brother of Constantine, of all his lands, leaving the region of Morea to his brother Demetrius only on the condition of paying jizyah.

At that time, the islands of Thasos, Lemnos, and others of the Aegean Sea were conquered.

Then the Sultan raided and reached the city of Bucharest in the shortest time.

In 1462, the Sultan fought the lands of Bosnia because its prince refused to pay tribute. He captured him after a fierce battle, along with his son, and ordered their execution. Thus, all the lands of the Bosniaks and the people of Bosnia submitted to him.

In 1463, they captured the city of Argos and others. Then, after a truce that lasted one year, wars resumed between the Ottomans and the Venetians. The result was that the Ottomans conquered the island of Negroponte, called Euboea in Turkish books, the center of Venetian colonies in the Aegean Islands. Its conquest was completed in 1470. After security prevailed throughout Europe, the Sultan turned his attention to the Karaman lands in Asia Minor.

The Venetians then preferred to conclude a new peace treaty with the Sultan and cede Shkodër in exchange for some trade privileges. Peace was concluded between the two parties on this basis, and a treaty was signed between them in January 1479. This was the first step taken by the Ottoman state to intervene in the affairs of Europe, as the Republic of Venice was then the most important European state in maritime trade, matched only by the Republic of Genoa.

Conquest of the Greek Islands and the City of Otranto

After peace was concluded with the Venetians, the armies were directed to Hungary. In 1480, the Greek islands located between Greece and Italy were conquered. After that, the commander Gedik Ahmed Pasha sailed with his ships to conquer the city of Otranto in Italy, which the Sultan intended to conquer entirely. It is said that he swore to tie his horse in the Church of Saint Peter in Rome, the seat of the Pope. The city of Otranto was conquered by force in August 1480 CE.

In 1481 CE, Abu al-Fath Sultan Mehmed II Ghazi died at the age of fifty-three. His reign lasted 31 years, during which he fulfilled the aims of his ancestors. He conquered Constantinople and added to it the conquest of the Empire of Trebizond, Serbia, Bosnia, Albania (Arnavutluk), and all the regions of Asia Minor. Only the city of Belgrade, belonging to Hungary, and some islands belonging to the Venetians remained in the Balkans. He was buried in the special burial ground he established in one of the mosques he founded in Istanbul. May Allāh have mercy on him and reward him well on behalf of Islam.

It is narrated that he made many administrative arrangements, including: establishing the first principles of civil law and penal law, replacing physical punishments, i.e., a tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye, with monetary fines in a clear manner, which Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent completed, who expanded on secular legislation, consequently – if the report is true – this would be the first step on the path of disbelief, ruin, and the causes of this nation's defeat. May Allāh curse – those who alter His laws – Allāh the Exalted said:

{And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the disbelievers.} (Al-Mā'idah: 44).

Sultan Ghazi Bayezid Khan II (1481 - 1512 CE)

Sultan Abu al-Fath Mehmed II died, leaving behind two sons, the eldest being Bayezid, who was governor of Amasya, and the second being Cem, famous in European books as Prince Zizim, who was governor of Karaman. Many disturbances occurred between the two brothers, in which the Pope and Christian kings intervened. They ended with the death of Prince Cem, poisoned while in the care of the King of France.

No significant conquests took place during the reign of Bayezid II, but relations expanded during his time between the Sultanate and Russia and the kingdoms of Europe.

The Sultan had three sons who rushed to dispute the Sultanate. The Janissaries were able to impose Sultan Selim during his father's lifetime. They brought him to Constantinople with excessive celebration and took him to the Sultan's palace, demanding that he abdicate the throne to his aforementioned son. He accepted and resigned on the 8th of Safar, 918 AH / April 25, 1512 CE. The lands of the Sublime Ottoman State did not increase much during the time of Sultan Bayezid II due to his love of peace and the prevention of bloodshed. His foreign wars were necessary to defend the borders so that his enemies would not underestimate them. He was of a peaceful disposition and averse to killing.

Sultan Selim I, the Resolute (1512 - 1520 CE)

Selim I, who was nicknamed Yavuz, meaning "the Resolute," appointed his son Suleiman as governor of Constantinople and traveled with his armies to Asia to fight his brothers and their sons until no one remained to dispute the kingdom with him, after he had killed those he found of his brothers and their offspring!

He then returned to Edirne, where he was awaiting ambassadors from Venice, Hungary, Moscow, and the Sultanate of Egypt. He concluded truces with all of them for long periods, as his ambitions were directed towards Persia, which had begun to grow and rise during the era of its king, Shah Ismail al-Safavi, the Shiite, whose state began to develop east of the Sultanate. Ismail had conquered the province of Shirvan and made Tabriz his capital in 1501. He then conquered Iraq, Khorasan, and Diyarbakir in 1508. He sent one of his commanders, who occupied Baghdad. In 1510, he added to his possessions the lands of Fars and Azerbaijan, thus extending his kingdom from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian Sea and from the sources of the Euphrates to Transoxiana. Thus, the Safavid state bordered the Ottoman state, and Sultan Selim wanted to push it away.

Fighting broke out between the two armies in August 1514. The Ottoman armies won a clear victory due to their superiority in artillery. The Shah fled with the remainder of his armies, and many of his commanders were captured. One of his wives was also captured, and the Sultan refused to return her to her husband, but married her to one of his scribes as revenge against the Shah! The city opened its gates, and the Sultan entered it victorious on September 4, 1514. He seized the Shah's treasures and sent them to Constantinople. The Ottoman armies then conquered the cities of Mardin, Urfa, Raqqa, Mosul, and Diyarbakir. The Kurdish tribes submitted without much difficulty, on the condition that they remain under the rule of their tribal chiefs.

Conquest of Egypt and Transfer of the Caliphate to the Ottomans

Sultan Selim had not finished fighting the Shiites and conquering the lands of Diyarbakir and Mosul when he began preparations to conquer the Sultanate of Egypt, since its Sultan, Qansuh al-Ghuri, had allied with Shah Ismail to fight the Ottoman state. He marched with his army to the Levant, and the two armies met near the city of Aleppo (may Allāh protect it and return us to it victorious). They met in a valley called Marj Dabiq, and al-Ghuri was killed during the defeat of the Mamluk army. This took place in August 1516.

After this battle, the Sultan entered Aleppo, and it is narrated that he killed all the Shiites who were in it, said to be thirty thousand! Sultan Selim then occupied the cities of Hama, Homs, and Damascus with ease, appointing governors from his side. He met with the scholars there, treated them well, distributed gifts to the mosques, and ordered the restoration of the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus. When the Sultan prayed Jumu'ah there, the preacher added to his title the epithet: "Servant of the Two Holy Sanctuaries," which remained a title for the Ottoman Caliphs (and was then usurped in our cursed time by the servant of the Jews, Christians, and Zoroastrians, the King of the House of Saud, Fahd bin Abdul Aziz).

The Ottomans then occupied Gaza and then Cairo, despite the resistance of the Mamluks, who fought them from street to street and from house to house until about fifty thousand people were killed from them and from the inhabitants of the city! Tuman Bay soon fell into the hands of the Ottomans due to the betrayal of some of those with him, and he was hanged by order of Sultan Selim in April 1517 CE at Bab Zuweila.

What gave the conquest of the Nile Valley great historical significance was that Muhammad al-Mutawakkil 'ala Allah, the last descendant of the Abbasid dynasty, whose ancestors had come to Egypt after the fall of Baghdad, the seat of the Abbasid Caliphate, to Hulagu Khan the Tatar in 656 AH / 1258 CE, and who had the nominal Caliphate in Egypt, relinquished his right to the Islamic Caliphate to Sultan Selim the Ottoman. Allāh the Almighty spoke the truth:

{And if you turn away, He will replace you with another people.} He handed over the noble Prophetic relics: the banner (flag), the sword, and the cloak, and also handed him the keys to the Two Holy Sanctuaries. From that date, every Ottoman Sultan became the Commander of the Faithful and the Caliph of the Muslims.

In early September 1517, Sultan Selim traveled from Cairo back to Constantinople. On the 20th of Ramadan, 923 AH, the Sultan arrived in Damascus and stayed there until the 22nd of Safar, 924 AH. He attended the celebration of the first prayer held in the mosque he established in Damascus over the tomb of Muhyiddin ibn Arabi. He then traveled to Aleppo and from there to Edirne. On the way, an ambassador from the Kingdom of Spain arrived to discuss the freedom of Christian visits to Jerusalem, which had previously been under the Sultanate of Egypt and followed it in coming under the Ottoman state. In exchange for paying the amount that was paid annually to the Mamluks, the Sultan received him well and declared his acceptance. The Spanish concluded a treaty with the Sublime Porte. An ambassador also came from the Republic of Venice to pay him two years' arrears of the tribute owed for its continued presence in Cyprus.

Glory be to Him who honors whom He wills and humiliates whom He wills. The Ottoman state had become, since the time of the Conqueror, a great power that the kings of Europe took into account.

During this time, Sultan Selim was busy preparing a fleet to resume the attack on the island of Rhodes by sea. He was also preparing to fight the Shah of Persia again, but death did not give him time to complete the project of conquering Rhodes. It overtook him on his journey from Constantinople to Edirne, and he died in September 1520 CE.

His presence – as historians recorded – was that of a bloodthirsty man, eager to sever necks. He killed seven of his viziers for flimsy reasons. Every vizier was threatened with death for the slightest mistake, so much so that it was said to curse someone's death that he would become a vizier to him. Sultan Selim built many mosques and converted the most beautiful churches of Constantinople into mosques, despite the prior promise of Sultan Mehmed II the Conqueror to the Patriarch of the Romans not to touch the half of the churches that he left to them after the conquest of the city.

Sultan Ghazi Suleiman Khan I, the Lawgiver (1520 - 1566 CE)

He is the tenth of the Ottoman kings and the most glorious. His reign represents the peak of their state's splendor. It was his custom to send letters to all governors and the nobles of Mecca and Medina, filled with advice and explanatory Quranic verses, mentioning the virtue of justice and fairness in rulings, and the gravity of the consequences of injustice. He would begin his letters with the noble verse:

{Indeed, it is from Solomon, and indeed, it is [in the name of Allāh], the Entirely Merciful, the Especially Merciful.} The most important events of his reign were:

Conquest of Belgrade in 1521 CE

After news arrived of the killing of the ambassador he sent to the King of Hungary, demanding the payment of jizyah or war, the Sultan became enraged and marched himself at the head of the army to Belgrade. He entered it and prayed Jumu'ah in one of its churches, which had been converted into a mosque. This city, which had been the strongest fortress of the Hungarians, became its greatest aid in conquering the regions and countries beyond the Danube River.

Conquest of Rhodes in 1523 CE

After that, the Sultan began to prepare by land and sea to conquer the island of Rhodes, which Sultan Mehmed the Conqueror had been unable to conquer, to be a link between Constantinople and Egypt by sea, and so that the Christians would not have a strong center in the middle of his lands to which the fleets of the countries hostile to the state could resort in wartime.

Conquest of Hungary and its Capital in 1526 CE

The war between Hungary and the Ottomans on the borders was continuous. After the army opened several fortresses of military importance on the Danube River, he arrived with his army at the Mohács Valley in August 1526. Most of the Hungarian knights were killed there, and their king was killed, and his body was not found. This battle was the reason for the conquest of all of Hungary. Therefore, the people of Buda, the capital of Hungary, sent the keys of the city to the Sultan. He received them, emphasizing orders to the soldiers not to harm the people and to maintain order, but his warnings were of no avail.

Beginning of Wars with Austria and the Siege of its Capital (Vienna)

The Sultan then marched with his armies towards Vienna. Sultan Suleiman arrived with his armies in front of the capital of Austria, laid siege to it, and directed his cannons at its walls, demolishing part of them and opening a breach in them so that the armies could attack through it. He then ordered the soldiers to attack, but he was unable to enter the city. When the ammunition ran out and winter approached, he issued orders to retreat from Vienna that year and to prepare the armies to resume the attack later. On the 19th of Ramadan, 938 AH / April 25, 1532 CE, Sultan Suleiman marched towards Vienna again to conquer it. When he reached the city of Niš in Serbia, he found ambassadors from the Archduke of Austria waiting for him. In Belgrade, he found a new ambassador from the King of France. After the meeting and the exchange of greetings between the French ambassador and the Caliph, the ambassador returned to his king, carrying a letter in which the Sultan confirmed their alliance to fight Charles V (who was King of Austria, the Netherlands, and Spain, Emperor of Germany, and whose possessions included most of southern Italy, Genoa, the island of Menorca, and Oran on the coast of Algeria). Thus, he surrounded France from all sides. The Sultan promised to supply France with the Ottoman fleet if needed. Then the Sultan marched with his armies, which numbered two hundred thousand fighters, and after they passed Belgrade, they were joined by fifteen thousand horsemen from the Crimean Tatars. During the march towards Vienna, the army conquered several fortresses and castles without significant resistance. Due to the lack of siege cannons with him and the approaching winter with its bitter cold, he also retreated from it.

When the Sultan reached Philippopolis on his return, he appointed the Crimean Tatar Sahib Giray as Khan of the Crimea instead of his brother, in reward for his services during the army's passage through Austrian lands. While these wars were raging on land, a group of Charles V's warships and several papal ships arrived to fight the Ottomans from the sea. They occupied the ports of Coron and Patras in Morea after killing the Janissary soldiers there and destroying the two fortresses that Sultan Bayezid II had established on the shores of the Gulf of Lepanto in Greece. In early 1523, the Archduke of Austria sent an ambassador to Istanbul to offer peace to His Majesty the Sultan. The Sultan did not accept peace but accepted a temporary truce until the keys of the city of Gran were handed over to him. Afterwards, the truce turned into peace. The ambassador was sent to present these conditions to the dignitaries and notables of the state, who accepted them. After that, a peace treaty was concluded between the two parties in June 1533. The most important of its provisions were that the Austrians return the city of Coron to the Ottoman state and not return anything they had conquered from Hungary, and that whatever Austria agreed upon with Zápolya, the ruler of Hungary, would not be implemented unless approved by His Majesty the Ottoman Sultan. This was the first peace treaty between Austria and the Sublime Porte.

Consular Privileges

In early February 1536, an agreement was reached between the French ambassador and the Sublime Porte, and a noble decree was issued granting some privileges to the subjects of the King of France residing in the Ottoman territories. The text of the treaty indicates the great extent of the Ottoman state's power, strength, and prestige at that time. Thus, France became the only European state with privileges for its subjects. However, it is criticized for opening the door to consular privileges, which gave foreigners the right to interfere in the internal affairs of the Ottoman state, especially in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, under the pretext of Christian minorities and communities, as will be discussed later.

Hayreddin Pasha Barbarossa and the Conquest of Algeria and Tunisia

The captain Hayreddin was known in European books as Barbarossa, meaning "the one with the red beard." Hayreddin Pasha originated from the island of Mytilene, one of the Aegean Islands. He and his brother, named Oruç, were engaged in piracy in the Aegean Sea (Mediterranean Sea). They then embraced Islam and entered the service of Sultan Muhammad al-Hafsi, the ruler of Tunis. They continued in their profession, which was to capture Christian merchant ships, seize all the goods on board, and sell their passengers and sailors as slaves. One day, they sent one of the captured ships to Sultan Selim I as a show of their submission to his rule. He accepted it from them and sent them robes of honor and ten ships to help them attack European ships. Their power grew, and they were able to conquer Algeria in the name of the Ottoman Sultan in 1533. They tried to conquer Tunis in 1535. They made great efforts to help the Muslims fleeing from the oppression of the Christians after the fall of Granada (1492 CE), and they helped to transport them by sea to Morocco.

Alliance Between France and the Ottoman State to Fight Austria

One of the results of France's alliance with the Ottoman state was that their agreement stipulated that the Sublime State would direct its wars towards Naples, Sicily, and Spain instead of attacking Austria, which would unite with all the German emirates and kingdoms to defend it, as it was, despite its independence, part of the German alliance. The French armies would enter Italy from the Piedmont region in northwestern Italy when the Ottoman armies entered it from the Kingdom of Naples. However, the failure of the Republic of Venice to join this alliance and its display of aggression towards them was the reason for the failure of all these measures. Sultan Suleiman wanted to take revenge on the Republic of Venice for not siding with his alliance, even though he had respected its proximity and had not invaded their lands. He sent Hayreddin Pasha, who had been promoted to the rank of Kapudan Pasha (Admiral of all Ottoman Fleets), with about a thousand ships to besiege the island of Corfu! He besieged it in September 1537, and the Sultan himself came to observe the siege. However, he ordered its lifting due to the strong defense of its people and not to waste time around this island. He returned to Constantinople and sent Hayreddin Pasha to conquer the remaining Aegean Islands. He conquered most of them and raided the island of Crete. On his return, he encountered a fleet of about one hundred and seventy ships led by Andrea Doria, Charles V's admiral. He fought it and defeated it on September 25, 1538. In May 1538, Sultan Suleiman gathered a large army of one hundred thousand fighters in the land of the Arnavut (Albania) to raid Italy.

At the same time, Hayreddin Pasha landed at the port of Otranto in southern Italy in preparation for attacking it from the south while Sultan Suleiman attacked it from the east and the King of France from the west. However, France's reluctance to advance, in obedience to public opinion as we mentioned, was the reason for the failure of this project, which, if it had been completed, would have resulted in the entry of all of Italy under Ottoman rule. The matter ended with the King of France making a truce with Charles V and concluding the Truce of Nice in 1538. As for Venice, the war between it and the Ottoman state continued back and forth and ended with peace in late 1538, with Venice ceding Monemvasia and Nafplion in Morea. As for Hungary, wars began again in 1537 and ended with the defeat of a German army sent by Charles V under the leadership of his most famous commanders in December 1537. Confrontations continued between the Ottomans and Austria regarding influence in Hungary and the appointment of its rulers until 1541. The previous (brief) details demonstrate the extent of Ottoman power during the reign of Suleiman and the efforts of the largest European countries to seek its friendship and alliance.

The Ottoman Fleet's Voyage to France and the Conquest of Nice

Francis I sent to Sultan Suleiman requesting his assistance in fighting Charles V with his ships and their commander, Hayreddin Pasha. The Sultan initially hesitated due to the instability of the King of France and his weak resolve. He finally agreed, based on the insistence of the ambassador and the support of Hayreddin Pasha, especially since he had received news of Charles V's attack on Algiers with his armies and his repulse from it, defeated, in October 1541. In the spring of 1543, the Sultan traveled with his armies to Hungary to resume fighting. At the same time, Hayreddin Pasha sailed from Istanbul with his ships, accompanied by the French ambassador, Paulin, heading for Marseille, one of the southern French ports. He reached it after raiding the coasts of Sicily along the way. He was received by the French with all respect and honor. His ships joined theirs, and from there they sailed to Nice, besieging it from the sea and conquering it by force in August 1543. Due to disagreements between the two armies, its occupation was not completed. Hayreddin Pasha and his ships were then authorized to spend the winter in the port of Toulon in France, and he was given eight hundred thousand French reals to spend on his soldiers. In the spring of the following year, 1544, Francis I refused to assist the Ottoman fleet due to the uproar of all Christians against him and their accusation of him apostatizing from his religion for seeking help from Muslims. He concluded the Treaty of Cr py with Charles V in March 1544, providing for peace. Hayreddin Pasha returned to Constantinople and died in 1546 CE, and was buried on the shore of the Bosphorus in Istanbul.

Conclusion of Peace with Austria

As for Austria, fighting continued between it and the Ottomans for some time, with victory often on the Ottoman side. Finally, the two parties reached a mutually satisfactory peace agreement, despite the efforts of the French ambassador to prevent reaching an agreement, hoping to renew friendly relations between his country and the Ottoman state. Peace was concluded between them in 1547 CE, with a five-year truce on the condition that Ferdinand, King of Austria, pay an annual jizyah of thirty thousand ducats for what remained under his control in Hungary, and that Hungary remain subject to the son of Z polya, its last prince, under the guardianship of his mother, Isabella, and the patronage of the Ottoman state.

Asian Regions

In 1537, an ambassador arrived at the Sublime Porte from the ruler of Delhi in India, seeking help against Humayun, son of Zahir-ud-din Muhammad, known as Babur, the ruler of Delhi. Another arrived from the ruler of Gujarat in India, also requesting assistance against the Portuguese, who had raided his country and occupied its most important ports.

Conquest of Aden

The Sultan sent orders to the governor of Egypt at that time to prepare a fleet at the port of Suez on the Red Sea to fight the Portuguese and conquer Aden and Yemen, so that Portugal or any other European country would not seize it, and it would become a stumbling block in the path of the Ottoman state's advance in the East and a base for the occupying state's actions against Egypt. He complied with his order and quickly built a huge fleet of seventy ships, armed them with huge cannons, and sailed with them in June 1538, accompanied by twenty thousand soldiers. He conquered the cities of Aden and Muscat and besieged the island of Hormuz at the entrance to Persia. He then headed for the coasts of Gujarat and conquered most of the fortresses that the Portuguese had established there. He then returned with the spoils. During his time, most of Yemen was conquered and made an Ottoman province.

In 1547, a brother of the Shah of Persia named Alqas Mirza came to the Sublime Porte and requested the Sultan's help against his brother, who had usurped his rights. The Sultan seized this opportunity to renew the raid on Persia and waited until peace was concluded in Europe.

In early 1548, he marched with his armies towards Tabriz. He entered it and conquered along the way the Persian part of Kurdistan and the famous Wan Fortress.

Peace did not last in Hungary. He sent an army of eighty thousand soldiers to Hungary in September 1551. This army did not encounter any significant resistance along the way, but rather easily conquered the fortresses and castles that the Austrian armies had occupied, as the Austrians evacuated them upon the approach and proximity of the Ottoman soldiers.

In 1552, the Ottomans defeated the Austrians in several battles, and the Second Vizier, Ahmed Pasha, conquered the city of Timișoara. The armies then besieged the fortified city of Eger in Austria. Meanwhile, the captain Turgut, who succeeded Hayreddin Pasha in raiding European ships and the coasts of their countries, had gained great fame in naval wars. All the European countries hostile to the Ottoman state feared his name, and he preserved the name of the Ottoman navy from decline upon the death of its leader and greatest founder, Hayreddin Pasha.

Treaty of 1553 Between the Ottoman State and France

After the death of Sultan Francis I, King of France, his son Henry II followed in his footsteps and maintained his loyalty to the Ottoman state, preserving its friendship and strengthening the bonds of affection and alliance with it to seek the help of its navy when needed. He kept Monsieur Gabriel d'Aramon as his ambassador in Istanbul and ordered him to accompany the Sultan on his last campaign against Persia, which he did. On his return, he visited Jerusalem, where the monks and priests received him with all celebration to confirm the previous treaties stipulating that all Catholics residing in the Ottoman territories were under French protection. He then returned to France and found that the fires of war had ignited again between it and Austria. He returned to Istanbul and agreed with the Sublime Porte that the Ottoman fleet would unite with the French fleet to conquer Corsica, in retaliation for the people of Genoa occupying it for their assistance to Charles V, and to be a center for the operations of the two fleets in raiding the coasts of Spain and Italy.

A treaty was concluded on this basis on the 16th of Safar, 960 AH / February 1, 1553 CE. We quote some of what was stated in it to demonstrate the glory of the Ottoman state, which carried the banner of Islam at that time:

"An alliance has been concluded between His Majesty Sultan Suleiman and Henry II, King of the Franks, including the following provisions concerning their impending naval campaign—may Allah grant it a victorious outcome—against Emperor Charles V:

Clause 1: Since His Majesty Sultan Suleiman, Sultan of the Turks, has dispatched a fleet into the Tuscan Sea in support of King Henry's cause against Emperor Charles V, and in response to Henry's persistent and urgent appeals over the past two years, it has been agreed that King Henry shall pay three hundred thousand gold pieces in arrears for the fleet's services.

Clause 4: Any ship belonging to the Emperor or his allies—whether a transport vessel, a small craft, or a large warship—shall become the property of Sultan Suleiman immediately upon its capture by the Ottoman fleet.

Clause 5: All cities, towns, villages, and hamlets conquered by the Ottoman navy shall be considered lawful spoils for the Turks. Their inhabitants—regardless of age, gender, or Christian faith—even if they surrender voluntarily, are to be taken as prisoners and slaves by the Ottoman forces.

Clause 6: Should King Henry direct Sultan Suleiman's fleet to conduct operations not westward but along the eastern and southern coasts—from the mouth of the Tronto River to Crotona—the fleet will act on these orders without compensation. In return, the weapons and supplies found in any captured city or town shall be ceded to King Henry. However, the cities, villages, and hamlets themselves remain the spoils of the Turks, and all inhabitants, regardless of age, sex, or religion—even if they surrender freely—are to be enslaved.

Clause 7: The Admiral of His Majesty Sultan Suleiman is empowered to seize, in his sovereign's name, any location reached by the victorious Ottoman navy—from the Tronto River to Otranto and Crotona, and onward to Sicily and Naples. This includes all territories under the rule of Emperor Charles V, whether cities, towns, villages, ports, or coastal regions. The Admiral may capture any ships encountered, and has full authority to raid, plunder, and enslave men, women, and children. All such captures— whether of people, property, or places—shall be kept and used at his discretion, even over the objections of the Franks.

Clause 9: In addition, His Majesty Sultan Suleiman shall provide thirty warships, fully manned and equipped—with the exception of his personal soldiers and sailors—without demanding any ransom. He shall also promptly pay thirty thousand gold pieces to the Prince of Salerno, who sacrificed his position and homeland in support of this cause and generously contributed from his own wealth." End quote.

Skirmishes continued between the Sultanate and Austria in Hungary, and no important events occurred.

Then the Ottoman admiral Turgut conquered Tripoli (Libya) during the year 1551 CE:

Sultan Suleiman directed his attention to strengthening his warships to protect Algeria and Tripoli, due to their distance from the seat of the Great Caliphate and the ambitions of Spain to restore them, as the Ottoman presence there threatened the coasts of Spain and Naples, which were subject to Spain at that time.

Siege of Malta

In early 1565, naval units consisting of about two hundred ships were sent to conquer the island of Malta, the seat of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, due to the importance of this island located between Tunisia and southern Italy, and the necessity of its occupation by any country that wanted to have the upper hand over the Mediterranean Sea. Its siege extended to September 1565, and the ships returned with their armies to Istanbul.

Strife Within Sultan Suleiman's Household

A heinous incident occurred, which was the Sultan's killing of his eldest son Mustafa, based on a plot by one of his wives, called Roxelana (the Russian) in European books, but in Turkish books her name is Hurrem, meaning "the smiling one," so that her son Selim would succeed him, with the help of Grand Vizier Rustem Pasha. This heinous act was a black spot in the history of Sultan Suleiman, during whose time the Sultanate expanded. This incident was not the end of the atrocities, but was followed by strife and conspiracies that led to the Sultan killing other sons and grandsons of his.

Death of Sultan Suleiman

The Sultan's illness intensified, and he died in September 1566 CE, at the age of seventy-four lunar years. His reign lasted forty-eight years, which he spent expanding the state and raising its status until it reached its highest degree of perfection during his time.

Sultan Suleiman was known as "the Lawgiver" for the internal regulations he established in all branches of government. He introduced some changes in the system of scholars and teachers established by Sultan Mehmed the Conqueror. The death of Sultan Suleiman is considered the end of the era of strength in the Ottoman state and the beginning of the march towards decline, then collapse, and finally, the end.

Reasons for the Beginning of the Ottoman State's Decline

This was due to a number of reasons, including:

1. Transgression against Allāh's sovereignty through secular legislation, which began earlier but expanded during Suleiman's reign, so much so that he was nicknamed "the Lawgiver."

2. Granting consular privileges to ambassadors of foreign countries, as we saw with the French ambassador, which turned into a right to interfere in the affairs of the state, and then to conspire against it.
3. The extravagance of the Sultans, and their entry into a stage of turning to worldly matters and increasing the number of concubines, most of whom were from neighboring Christian countries.
4. Increased wealth due to numerous conquests and abundant spoils. It is well known that wealth often leads to boasting in spending, excessive pride, and luxury, and any nation in which these traits prevail is bound to collapse.
5. The Janissaries would not go to war unless the Sultan was with them. Therefore, the most important wars and raids were under the Sultan's command and leadership. Sultan Suleiman changed this good practice and allowed the Janissaries to fight under the command of their commander-in-chief, even if the Sultan was not present. This change was a reason for the reluctance of most of the Sultans who succeeded him to leave their lavish palaces, preferring to stay among their slaves and concubines of different races rather than going out to fight and endure its hardships.
6. All important matters of state were considered in the council of ministers under the Sultan's chairmanship. Sultan Suleiman abolished this custom, and the council began to convene under the chairmanship of the chief minister, the Grand Vizier, and the Sultan was distracted from this, ignoring the plots of the ministers and those they used from his concubines and wives. As a result, matters became in the hands of ministers who were foreign to the Ottoman race in origin and lineage, as most of them were those who had embraced Islam or pretended to embrace Islam from Christians or from slaves and servants.

7. Allowing the Janissaries to marry and reside outside their barracks, while granting them some privileges and accepting mixtures within their ranks, made them one of the biggest causes of the state's decline after they had been one of the greatest factors in its progress, in addition to other reasons that we will list successively according to their requirements.

Sultan Ghazi Selim Khan II (1566 - 1577 CE)

He was the son of Roxelana the Russian, mentioned earlier, and took over the kingdom after his father's death. The Sultan was not qualified to maintain his father's conquests, let alone add anything to them. If it were not for the presence of the long-serving minister, Mehmed Pasha Sokollu, trained in military and political affairs, the state would have failed. However, the good policy of this minister and the great name of the state and its prestige in the hearts of its enemies preserved it from falling at once. The most important events that took place during the reign of this Sultan were:

Peace was concluded between it and Austria in 1568 with a treaty whose conditions included Austria preserving its possessions in Hungary, paying the annual jizyah stipulated in previous covenants, and recognizing the subordination of the princes of Transylvania, Wallachia, and Moldavia to the Ottoman state. The truce with the King of Poland was also renewed, with the Sublime Porte recognizing the alliance that had taken place between the King of Poland and the Prince of Moldavia. Likewise, the agreements that had taken place between the two countries during the era of Sultan Suleiman were renewed with Charles IX, King of France, in 1569.

Sultan Selim (son of the Russian) confirmed the consular privileges and added other privileges to them, the most important of which were exempting every Frenchman from paying personal tribute, that consuls had the right to search for Frenchmen who were in a state of slavery among the Ottomans and to release them, and to search for those who took them as slaves to punish them, that the Sultan return all the things that sea pirates took from French ships and punish those who took them, that Ottoman ships be obligated to help French ships that ran aground on the state's shores and to preserve the men and goods on board, and that France have all the privileges granted to the Republic of Venice.

To further strengthen the bonds of alliance between the state and France and increase the influence of their alliance, the two countries agreed to nominate Henry de Valois, brother of the King of France, for the throne of Poland, to be their supporter against Austria on the one hand and against Russia on the other. This was actually done, and Poland came under the actual, if not nominal, protection of the Ottoman state.

Thus, France became the queen of trade in the Mediterranean Sea and all the countries subject to the state. Under the shadow of these treaties, it sent several Catholic religious missions to all the countries of the state where Christians were present, especially in the Levant, to educate their children and raise them to love France. These privileges were a cause of the state's weakness due to the consuls' interference in internal procedures under the pretext of lifting injustices from Christians and using them as a means to extend their influence among the Christian subjects of the state. The most important and harmful consequences of this interference were the use of these religious missions to preserve the nationality and language of each Christian people, so that when the state weakened, these peoples could become independent with the help of Christian countries or join one of these countries, as was seen in the last century of its existence, which will be detailed later.

One of the actions of Minister Mehmed Pasha Sokollu was to send a large army to Yemen in 976 AH / 1569 CE under the command of Osman Pasha, who was appointed governor over it, to quell the revolt of its people who had revolted against the Ottoman state with their Sultan, Sharif Mutahhar bin Sharaf al-Din Yahya. Osman Pasha defeated them with the help of Sinan Pasha, the governor of Egypt, and the victorious armies entered Sana'a.

Conquest of Cyprus

Another of his accomplishments was the conquest of Cyprus, which was subject to Venice. Warships were sent to it, and it was conquered in August 1570 CE. From that time on, it became subject to the Ottoman state until the British occupied it in 1878.

During this time, Ottoman ships raided Crete, Dodecanese, and others without conquering them, and occupied the cities of Ulcinj and Bar on the Adriatic Sea. When Venice saw the Ottomans prevailing over it and conquering many of its lands, it sought help from Spain and the Pope. An agreement was reached between them to fight the state by sea, fearing the extension of its authority over Italy. The Christian ships sailed to the coasts of the state, and that was the mixed campaign. The matter ended with the victory of the Christian fleet, which took 130 Ottoman ships, burned and sank 94, and seized 300 cannons and 30,000 prisoners. This was the first battle that took place between the state on the one hand and more than two Christian states on the other. The Pope's participation in it indicates that the motive for these alliances against the Islamic state at that time was religion, as events and wars later proved, and not matters of politics and interests as they claim. This leaves no doubt in the mind of the reader that the "Eastern Question," as it was later called, was fundamentally a religious issue.

As for Spain, Don Juan headed for Tunis in late 1572. However, the Ottomans did not last but about 8 months, as it was restored to the state's possessions by Sinan Pasha in August 1575.

On the side of Moldavia, the Ottomans won a huge battle on June 9, 1574, against Prince Ioan, who rebelled against the state seeking independence, and was crucified as a punishment for his disobedience.

In December 1574, Sultan Selim II died at the age of fifty-two lunar years, and his reign lasted eight years and 5 months. He was succeeded by his son, Sultan Murad III.

Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan III (1574 - 1595 CE)

His first act was to issue an order prohibiting the drinking of wine, which had become widespread during the days of the previous Sultan (son of the Russian) and was indulged in excessively by the soldiers, especially the Janissaries. The Janissaries revolted against this and forced him to allow it for them in a quantity that would not result in mental stupor and disturbance of public peace.

He ordered the killing of his brothers, who were five, to secure the kingdom from dispute, as killing brothers had become almost a custom.

This Sultan's relations with France were very good, as well as with the Republic of Venice, so he renewed their consular and commercial privileges, with some additional clauses in their favor. The most important of these was that the French ambassador would be given precedence over all other ambassadors in official meetings and celebrations, as the arrival of ambassadors at his Sublime Porte increased, seeking to conclude trade agreements that would be a pretext for actual interference in the future.

During his time, Queen Elizabeth of England obtained a special privilege for the merchants of her country, which was that their ships could carry the English flag. This was not allowed for them before, but rather ships of all races, except for Venetian ships, could not enter the ports of the Ottoman state except under the shadow of the French flag!

Ottoman Influence Reaches Morocco

In 1578, an internal strife occurred in the Kingdom of Morocco in the far west, and its leader disputed the Sultan of Morocco's rule. Several important battles took place between them. Finally, its Sultan sought help from the Ottomans, and the claimant to the throne sought help from the Portuguese. The state instructed the governor of Tripoli to support its legitimate Sultan, so he hastened to assist him. The Turks and the Portuguese met near a place called Alcácer Quibir, and it was a momentous day in which the tide turned against the Portuguese, and the leader of the rebels seeking their help was killed. After the victory was complete and security and peace were restored to Morocco, the Ottoman armies returned, carrying the gifts that had been lavished upon them. Thus, the Kingdom of Morocco entered the sphere of influence of the state, and all of North Africa became completely subject to it or under its influence.

In this year, peace was reached between the state and Spain, but this did not prevent pirates from both sides from plundering merchant ships and capturing and enslaving the women and men on board. Anyone preparing to travel in the Mediterranean Sea at that time would prepare as if for a war journey due to the lack of security and the abundance of pirates, unlike anything seen before, because both sides considered raiding the ships of the other side to be one of the religious duties and legitimate acts of worship.

In 1579, Grand Vizier Mehmed Pasha Sokollu, who had preserved the state's influence after the death of Sultan Suleiman, was killed by the intrigues of the Sultan's court, which led to his treacherous death due to the plots of foreigners who did not like the presence of such a minister managing the wheel of affairs on the axis of righteousness. They plotted to have him killed to get rid of his sincere service to the state. His death was a severe blow and a great ordeal, especially since the appointment and dismissal of Grand Viziers increased after him, and chaos spread in the army.

The Sultan then contracted a debilitating disease and died in 1595, at the age of fifty. His reign lasted approximately twenty-one years. It was said that he was an excellent poet, intelligent and clever, but he was very inclined to acquire beautiful concubines, acting on their advice at all times. Among his concubines was a Venetian girl of noble origins, named Baffo, who had been captured by pirates. She was sold in the royal harem and named Safiye. The Sultan favored her and she intervened extensively in the State's external affairs, greatly helping her home country. She was also the mother of the Sultan's heir apparent.

Sultan Ghazi Mehmed Khan III (1595 - 1603 CE)

He took over after the death of his father, Murad III, son of Safiye, of Italian origin. He had nineteen brothers, besides sisters. Historians claimed that he ordered the strangulation of all of them before his father's burial, and they were buried together opposite Hagia Sophia! At the beginning of his reign, he followed in the footsteps of his predecessor in not going out to war and leaving internal affairs in the hands of his ministers, including Sinan Pasha and Cigalazade, who was the son of the commander Cicala Pasha, of Genoese origin, who was killed in the last war against Persia, and another named Hasan Pasha. They spread corruption in the land, sold royal and military positions, and debased the currency until the outcry rose from all sides. The Ottoman armies were repeatedly defeated by Michael the Wallachian, who, with the help of the Austrian armies, added the region of Moldavia and a large part of Transylvania to his rule, due to the lack of competent commanders to repel them.

What immortalizes Sultan Ghazi Mehmed III and makes him a peer of his early ancestors is that when he realized that this disintegration was caused by his seclusion from affairs and his failure to lead the armies, he emerged himself and took the position that Murad III and Selim II had abandoned, which was one of the reasons for the state's retreat before its enemies. He marched to Belgrade and from there to the field of war and battle. Soon, religious zeal and military fervor spread among the armies. He conquered the fortified city of Eger, which Sultan Suleiman had been unable to conquer in 1556, and utterly destroyed the armies of Hungary and Austria on the plain of Keresztes near this fortress on October 26, 1596. This battle was likened to the Battle of Mohács, in which Sultan Suleiman had triumphed in 1526.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century AD, an internal revolt took place in Anatolia that almost had dire consequences for the state, especially since the fires of war were raging on the borders of Hungary and Austria.

From that time on, the disorder of the military system and its unsuitability for preserving the state's name and honor among its enemies began to appear clearly. The Sultan then died in 1603, at the age of 37, and his reign lasted 9 years. He was succeeded by his son, Ahmed I.

Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan I (1603 - 1617 CE)

He took over the kingdom when he was not yet fourteen years old, and he did not order the killing of his brother Mustafa, but merely confined him among the servants and concubines. The pillars of the state were unstable in all parts of Asia, and the fire of war was raging on the borders of Persia in the east and Austria in the west. The war with Persia was particularly severe this time because the famous Shah Abbas took its command. What made it even more important than all previous wars was the turmoil in the eastern provinces in general and the efforts of each of the different nations residing there to gain independence. However, Allāh provided the state with Minister Murad Pasha, nicknamed "Kuyucu," who was appointed Grand Vizier and was over eighty years old, to be a helper and supporter for the young Sultan. Despite his old age and weak strength, he took command of the armies and fought the rebels with excessive energy and activity, and he was victorious.

Between 1611 and 1614, some naval skirmishes took place between the ships of the Ottoman state and the ships of the Knights of Malta, the King of Spain, and the Italian states. Victory often favored the enemy's ships. Some Cossack mixed groups took advantage of the withdrawal of warships from the Black Sea and raided the port of Sinop, plundering what was in it. When the Sultan learned of this, he became angry with the Grand Vizier, and some of his enemies sought to obtain his position and did not cease to incite his master against him until he ordered his killing on October 14, 1614. He was strangled in his palace.

During the days of Sultan Ahmed I, political relations with European countries increased, and their influence increased accordingly.

In November 1617 CE, Sultan Ahmed I died at the age of 28, and his reign lasted approximately 14 years. Due to the young age of his son Osman, who was not yet thirteen years old, he deviated from the custom followed since the beginning of Ghazi Sultan Osman I, which was to appoint the eldest son or one of them in his father's place, and bequeathed the kingdom after him to his brother.

Sultan Mustafa Khan I (1617 - 1618 CE)

He had spent his life inside the harem and had never engaged in political affairs at all, nor did he know anything about the affairs of the kingdom. This Sultan did not remain on the throne for more than three months. The Mufti and the Agha of the Palace deposed him, and the Janissaries helped them in this. He was deposed in February 1618 CE, and Sultan Osman II was placed in his place.

Sultan Osman Khan II (1618 - 1622 CE)

This Sultan declared war on the Kingdom of Poland and fulfilled his ambition, which was to conquer this kingdom and make it a buffer between the state's possessions and the Kingdom of Russia, which had begun to emerge. Before starting the war, he ordered the killing of his brother Mehmed, according to their customary practice! He then issued an order to reduce the powers of the Mufti and remove his authority to appoint and dismiss officials, making his function limited to issuing fatwās, so that he would be safe from the risk of being a cause for his deposition, as it had been the cause of his predecessor's deposition. However, the matter turned out contrary to what was hoped for. After completing these internal preparations, he sent armies and battalions to fight the Kingdom of Poland, but he was unable to do so due to the reluctance of the Janissaries. Peace was then concluded in October 1620. The Sultan was enraged with the Janissaries for their seeking rest, their clinging to laziness, and their forcing him to make peace with Poland without fulfilling his intention, and he resolved to abolish them. To implement this dangerous matter, he ordered the mobilization of new armies in the provinces of Asia, their organization, and their training in combat, so that when they were complete in number and equipment, he could use them to exterminate the Janissaries. He actually began to implement this project, but the Janissaries sensed this, so they revolted and agreed to depose the Sultan, and they succeeded in this in May 1622. They reinstated Sultan Mustafa I in his place. They did not stop at deposing him, but rather attacked him in his palace, violated its sanctity, arrested him among his concubines and wives, and led him by force to their barracks, abusing him with insults, curses, and humiliation, which was unprecedented in the history of the Ottoman state. In addition to that, they executed him. He was killed when he was not yet eighteen years old, and his reign lasted four years and four months.

After that, the government became a plaything in the hands of the Janissaries. They appointed ministers and dismissed them according to their whims. They dismissed Davud Pasha, the killer of the Sultan, after a few days, and they began to grant positions to those who gave them generous gifts, so that positions were sold openly, and they committed all kinds of injustices in Istanbul. Internal unrest continued in the very seat of the Great Caliphate, with no security or peace for eighteen consecutive months, until the general public sensed the destruction and ruin behind this chaos. They appointed Kemankeş Ali Pasha as Grand Vizier, as they perceived in him experience and readiness. He advised them to depose Sultan Mustafa again due to his weak resolve and weak mental powers. They deposed him in September 1623 and appointed Sultan Murad IV in his place. He remained in seclusion until he died in 1639 CE.

Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan IV (1623 - 1640 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Ahmed I, son of Sultan Mehmed III. The Janissaries appointed him after deposing his uncle, Sultan Mustafa I, son of Sultan Mehmed III, despite his young age, so that he would not oppose their autocratic actions or weaken their influence, which they had gained by killing one Sultan and deposing another. They continued for the first ten years of his reign in their error and tyranny.

Shah Abbas, King of Persia, seized this disorder as an opportunity to expand his possessions on the borders of the Ottoman state. The Shah marched with his soldiers to occupy it.

Shah Abbas then died, and the Sultan recaptured Baghdad from the Persians in 1638 CE. It was hoped that Sultan Murad IV would emulate Sultan Ghazi Suleiman I, the Lawgiver, in conquests and widespread fame, but he died in the prime of his youth, without offspring, in February 1640 CE, at the age of 31, and his reign lasted 16 years and 11 months. He was succeeded by his brother, Ibrahim.

Sultan Ghazi Ibrahim Khan I (1640 - 1648 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Ahmed I and was not inclined to fight Austria, so it was reassured. He opened his external wars by sending a large army to Crimea to fight the Cossacks who had occupied the city of Azov. The Ottomans fought them and inflicted a great defeat on them, recapturing the city from them after they had burned it, in 1642.

Among his actions was also the conquest of Crete, which was subject to the Republic of Venice.

Then Sultan Ibrahim wanted to strike the heads of the Janissaries on the night of one of his daughters' wedding to the son of the Grand Vizier, due to their grumbling, their criticism of his actions, their desire to interfere in the affairs of the state, and their overstepping their boundaries. They learned of the Sultan's intention and conspired to depose him. Some scholars and Mufti Abdurrahim Efendi joined them, and they incited the Janissary troops, and everyone decided to depose him and appoint his son Mehmed IV in 1642 CE, who was not yet seven years old. This revolution took place in August 1648. Ten days later, the soldiers showed their dissatisfaction with the young king and demanded the reinstatement of Sultan Ibrahim to the throne of the Caliphate. The leaders of the gang that had deposed him feared that they would prevail by reinstating him against their will, and they decided to kill him. They went to the palace with the executioner and killed him by strangulation, as they had killed Sultan Osman II before him. His reign lasted 8 years and 9 months, and his age was 34 years.

Sultan Ghazi Mehmed Khan IV (1648 - 1687 CE)

Due to his young age, the kingdom fell into chaos, and the soldiers showed no mercy to the young and no respect for the old, and they spread corruption in the land. The situation returned to what it had reached before the reign of Sultan Murad IV, or even worse. This disorder spread to the soldiers besieging Candia, and they forced their commander, Serasker Hussein Pasha, to lift the siege. This same debilitating disease also spread to the naval soldiers and caused the defeat of the Ottoman fleet in front of the enemy in front of the city of Foça in 1649. Then rebels revolted in Asia Minor, and chaos continued.

Until Allāh Almighty provided the governor, Minister Mehmed Pasha, known as Köprülü, who took over the position of Grand Vizier in 1067 AH / 1656 CE. He treated the Janissaries as one who wanted to be obeyed blindly and killed many of them. Shortly after his appointment, he ordered the hanging of the Patriarch of the Romans for what was proven to him of his involvement in internal conspiracies and sedition.

Difficulties did not deter Köprülü Mehmed Pasha, but rather he continued to resist the enemies of the state inside and outside until he restored its former glory and made it respected in the eyes of the states. After his death in 1661, he was succeeded by his son, Köprülüzade Ahmed Pasha.

He was the best successor to his father, as he was characterized by courage, boldness, good judgment, and planning. He continued to fight the enemies of the state without weariness or boredom, until he removed from their minds what had crept into them about the weakening of the state's conditions and the imminence of its demise. He led the armies himself and crossed the Danube River to fight Austria and laid siege to the fortress of Nové Zámky, even though this fortress was famous throughout Europe for its impregnability. Köprülü Ahmed Pasha forced its garrison to surrender on the condition that those in it would leave without being harmed, leaving behind their weapons and ammunition. They actually evacuated it in September 1663. Therefore, all of Europe was disturbed by the horror of this. The Pope exerted his efforts with the King of France until he agreed to send six thousand French soldiers and twenty-four thousand of his German allies under the command of Count de Coligny. The Janissaries could not stand firm against the enemy's soldiers, who were more numerous than them. This battle was called the Battle of Saint Gotthard, after an old church near which the battle took place. Peace was then concluded. Ten days later, a treaty was concluded between the two parties, the most important of which was that the army evacuate the region of Transylvania under the sovereignty of the Ottoman state and that Hungary be divided between the two states, with Austria having three provinces and the Sublime Porte having four, with the fortresses of Novigrad and Nové Zámky remaining subject to the Ottoman state.

Relations with France then deteriorated. It wanted to declare war on the Ottoman state, were it not for the advice of Minister Colbert, with his wisdom and policy, and the Ottoman state's treatment with leniency and submission, by renewing the old treaties in 1673. France was again authorized to protect Jerusalem, as it had done since the days of Sultan Suleiman. Thus, relations returned to their previous purity between the two countries.

What further increased the state's borders and strength from the north was the submission of all the Cossacks living in the southern part of Russia to Sultan Mehmed IV without war, but rather out of a desire to enter the protection of the protector of the Islamic state. Therefore, Poland raided the province of Ukraine, and its governor sought help from the Ottomans, and the Sultan helped him. The war between the two countries continued back and forth until 1167 AH.

Russia was taking at that time an internal organization and progress and was eager to join the European community, so the war between the Cossacks and the Russians on the one hand and the Ottomans on the other continued between give and take until 1681, when peace was concluded between them.

Siege of Vienna Again

After the Ottoman armies triumphed in several locations over the Austrians, they headed for the capital of Austria and besieged it in 1683 for two months. The Ottomans captured all its forward fortresses and demolished its walls with cannons. When nothing remained but the attack to complete the conquest, Sobieski, King of Poland, and the electors of Saxony and Bavaria came with their armies, based on the Pope's urging and his arousing their determination to fight the Muslims, until he ignited the fire of religious fanaticism in them. In September 1683, the Christians won the victory, and the army of Grand Vizier Mustafa Pasha was defeated. Sultan Mehmed IV ordered the killing of Grand Vizier Kara Mustafa Pasha, and he sent one of his courtiers, who killed him and sent his head to Constantinople!

After the rescue of Vienna, which was not besieged after that, Austria, Poland, Venice, the Knights of Malta, the Pope, and the Kingdom of Russia allied to fight the Islamic state to erase it from the political world. What indicates that this alliance was purely religious is that its members called it the "Holy Alliance." What further complicated the situation of this state, standing alone against all the Christian states, was the severing of relations between it and France due to the ongoing naval skirmishes between its ships and the pirates of Morocco. The armies of King Sobieski were threatening Moldavia, and Venetian ships were threatening the coasts of Greece and Morea. Due to the lack of sufficient ships to repel the attacks of Venetian ships, which were reinforced by papal ships and the Knights of Malta, Venetian armies occupied most of the cities of Greece, including Corinth and Athens, in 1686. As for Austria, its armies raided Hungary and occupied the city of Buda. In 1685, the Austrians occupied several famous fortresses and castles, the most important of which was the fortress of Nové Zámky. The state reached a degree of decline in front of these allied forces that made salvation difficult.

The defeats of the Ottomans continued, so the armies present in Istanbul revolted and sent the remaining armies with Grand Vizier Suleiman Pasha. They declared rebellion against him, and if he had not fled to Belgrade, they would have executed him. The Janissaries and the Sipahi (a name for Ottoman cavalry units) then sent a delegation to Istanbul demanding that the Sultan order the killing of the Grand Vizier. He saw no choice but to do so and ordered his killing to quell the soldiers' wrath. When this was of no avail and peace did not return among the armies, and there was fear for the Ottoman kingdom from within, the Second Minister, acting in place of Kara Mustafa, in alliance with the scholars, decided to depose Sultan Mehmed IV. They deposed him in 1687 CE, after he had ruled for forty years and five months. He remained in seclusion until he died in December 1692 CE. They appointed his brother after his deposition.

Sultan Ghazi Suleiman Khan II (1687 - 1691 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Ibrahim. He took over, and Istanbul was in chaos. The enemies took advantage of these ongoing disturbances to conquer Ottoman fortresses. The Austrians occupied the fortresses of Eger, Lippa, and others, and Morosini the Venetian occupied the city of Lepanto in Greece and all the coasts of Dalmatia in 1687. In the following year, i.e., 1688, the cities of Smederevo, Golubac, and Belgrade fell into the hands of the Austrians. Then, in 1689, the Ottoman state lost the cities of Niš and Vidin in Serbia.

Grand Vizier Köprülü Mustafa Pasha then managed to achieve order in the army, and security prevailed within the country. He marched himself to fight the enemies and recaptured in a short time the cities of Niš, Vidin, Smederevo, and Belgrade in 1690, while Selim Giray, Khan of Crimea, subdued the rebellious Serbs, and Imre Thököly of Hungary returned the region of Transylvania to the state's possessions. Thus, Köprülü Mustafa Pasha restored some of what the state had lost of glory and prestige due to the weakness of the ministers and the disobedience of the Janissaries. In June 1691, Sultan Suleiman II died without offspring, at the age of 50, after ruling for three years and eight months. He was succeeded by his brother.

Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan II (1691 - 1695 CE)

No significant events occurred during the days of this Sultan, but rather the war was limited to some skirmishes that have no importance worth mentioning, except that the Venetians occupied the island of Chios in 1694. He then died in February 1695, at the age of approximately 54 lunar years, after ruling for 4 years and 8 months. He was succeeded by Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan II.

Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan II (1695 - 1703 CE)

Son of Sultan Mehmed IV. He was characterized by courage and steadfastness. Therefore, three days after his accession, he declared his desire to lead the armies himself. He marched to Poland, aided by Cossack horsemen, and defeated the Poles several times. On the other hand, he fought the Russians in 1695 and after that. In 1696, the Sultan won a clear victory over the Saxon army at the Battle of Ulaş. After that, the Sultan's army was defeated by the Austrians. This was in September 1697. While the Sultan was busy in Hungary, the Russian Emperor Peter the Great returned to conquer the port of Azov, due to its importance to his kingdom. He entered it within a year, so the state was in great danger from both Russia and Austria. Communications then began to reach peace, so King Louis XIV of France intervened. After long discussions, the Treaty of Karlowitz was concluded in January 1699 between the Ottoman state, Austria, Russia, Venice, and Poland. The state left all of Hungary and the region of Transylvania to Austria. It ceded the city of Azov and its fortresses to Russia, so that it thus had a hand on the Black Sea and the importance of its proximity to the Ottoman state increased many times over what it had been before. It returned the city of Kamianets and the regions of Podolia and Ukraine to the Kingdom of Poland. It ceded the island of Morea and the region of Dalmatia on the Adriatic Sea almost entirely to Venice. It agreed with Austria on a truce of twenty-five years, and that neither it nor any other would pay anything to the Ottoman state, either as jizyah or as a mere gift.

With this treaty, the state lost a not inconsiderable part of its possessions in Europe, and the ambitions of the states in its lands increased, as will be seen later.

We can say that the agreement was reached from that date between all European countries, if not explicitly, then implicitly, to stand against the advance of the Ottoman state first, and then to divide its lands among themselves little by little. This is what they call in the language of politics the "Eastern Question," based on the fear of the spread of the Islamic religion and its replacement of the Christian religion, nothing else.

As for what they used to conceal behind their aims of defending the rights of the weak Christian nations subject to the state, it was nothing but a pretext.

The Sultan then appointed Rami Mehmed Pasha. He proceeded to eliminate corruption, punish bribe-takers, and prevent injustices. This incited those with agendas against him, and their numbers were great. They stirred up the Janissaries against him, due to their natural inclination to revolt for looting, plundering, and violating honor. They demanded his dismissal from the Sultan, but he refused and sent a detachment of soldiers to suppress them. They joined the rebels, and they deposed Sultan Mustafa II in August 1703, after he had ruled for 8 years and 8 months. He remained deposed until he died. They placed his brother in his place after his deposition.

Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan III (1703 - 1730 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Mehmed IV. At that time, Peter the Great, King of Russia, was working to weaken the strong among his neighbors, namely Sweden, Poland, and the Ottoman state. When (Baltacı Mehmed Pasha) took over the Grand Vizierate, he was inclined to incite war against Russia. He declared war on it and led the armies himself. After important maneuvers, the Ottoman armies, numbering two hundred thousand soldiers, besieged the Tsar of Russia and his mistress, Catherine. If the siege had continued a little longer, he might have been taken prisoner, along with those with him, and the Russian state would have been completely erased from the political world. However, Catherine seduced Baltacı Mehmed Pasha and gave him all the precious jewels and valuable ornaments she had with her. He betrayed the state and lifted the siege on the Tsar and his army, settling for the Tsar's signing of the Treaty of Pruth in July 1711, according to which he evacuated the city of Azov and pledged not to interfere in the affairs of the Cossacks at all.

However, not a few months passed after this treaty when war broke out again between the two countries due to Peter the Great's failure to fulfill one of the conditions of the Treaty of Pruth. England and the Netherlands intervened to prevent the war because it harmed their trade. After long discussions, a new treaty was concluded between them, called the Treaty of Edirne, in June 1713. According to it, Russia ceded what it had of lands on the Black Sea, so that it no longer had ports or harbors on it.

Skirmishes continued between the Ottoman state, Venice, Austria, and Russia, and the Ottoman state was forced to accept new treaties that were in favor of Russia, whose presence in European politics had grown stronger. Then a conflict arose between Russia and the Ottoman state over influence in the Caucasus, Armenia, Georgia, and the western shores of the Caspian Sea. War almost broke out between the state and the Russians, and when Peter the Great realized his inability to confront the Ottoman armies, he asked the French ambassador in Istanbul to mediate between them. He accepted and reconciled the two parties by having each of them possess what it had occupied of the lands. The two states accepted this and concluded a treaty on these terms in June 1724. As for the Persians, they did not accept this division, which was detrimental to their honor and led to the loss of a not inconsiderable part of their country. They rose up to fight the foreigners, but they were unable to repel the attacks of the Ottomans, who conquered several cities and fortresses in 1725, the most important of which were the cities of Hamadan and Tabriz. This was aided by the spread of chaos in Iran. This war ended with peace with Shah Ashraf in October 1727. However, when Shah Ashraf died and Tahmasp took sole control of the kingdom, he asked the Sublime State to return to him everything it had taken from the lands of his ancestors. The state did not respond to him, so he raided its lands. Due to the Sultan's disinclination for war and his desire for peace, the Janissaries revolted. They declared his deposition in 1730 CE and proclaimed his nephew, Sultan Mahmud I, as Caliph of the Muslims. Sultan Ahmed III yielded and abdicated without opposition. His reign lasted 27 years and 11 months.

Sultan Ghazi Mahmud Khan I (1730 - 1754 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Mustafa II. When he took over, he had only the name, and the influence was with the Grand Vizier, Patrona Halil, who appointed whomever he wished and dismissed whomever he wished according to whims and agendas, until the Sultan's patience with his autocracy ran out. The leaders of the Janissaries gathered around him due to this leader's transgression against their rights, and they agreed to betray him to get rid of his evil, so they killed him. After security was established, the state resumed war with the Kingdom of Persia, and the Ottoman armies prevailed over the soldiers of Shah Tahmasp in several battles.

During this time, there were many wars between the European countries themselves. War also broke out between the state and Russia over the Kingdom of Poland. Russia and Austria declared war on Poland. On the other hand, France declared war on Austria in defense of Poland. It sought the help of the Sublime Porte, through Monsieur de Bonneval, who served the state after embracing Islam and became famous in it as Ahmed Pasha, commander of the artillery, to win it over to defend the independence of Poland, the strong barrier between it and Russia. Russia prevailed, and its soldiers occupied the Kingdom of Poland. When Austria sensed that France was seeking an alliance with the state, it feared that this agreement would result in the failure of its efforts with Russia in Poland. It hastened to appease France and concluded the Treaty of Vienna with it in 1735. It began to prepare and get ready to join Russia in fighting the state. It incited Russia to open the fighting. The latter took the passage of some Crimean Cossacks through its lands in March 1736, heading to Georgia to help the state against the Persians, as a pretext to declare war. It raided Crimea with all its forces and occupied a number of naval ports. This led the state to conclude peace with Nader Shah to devote itself to repelling the Russian attacks. Fortunately for the state, a seasoned man known for his good policy, Hacı Mehmed Pasha, had taken over the position of Grand Vizier. He did not neglect for a moment to gather armies and prepare equipment, so that he was able in the shortest time to stop the advance of the Russians, who had occupied Moldavia and entered the capital of the region. On the other hand, the Ottoman armies defeated the Austrian armies that had raided Bosnia, Serbia, and Wallachia. The Muslims triumphed in Serbia and forced the Austrians to evacuate it, leaving the corpses of their men in every foothold, and they retreated to beyond the Danube River in 1737. The situation continued in this way, with victory and triumph over the enemies, until Austria requested peace through the French ambassador.

This last victory was the greatest aid in reaching peace, which was concluded between them and Russia in September 1739 CE, on the condition that Austria cede Belgrade and what it had been given of Serbia and Wallachia according to the Treaty of Passarowitz to the Ottoman state. As for Russia, its Tsarina (Anna) pledged to demolish the fortresses of the port of Azov and not to rebuild them in the future, and not to build warships or merchant ships in the Black Sea or the Sea of Azov, but rather its trade would be on foreign ships, and to return to the state everything it had conquered of regions and countries. This treaty was called the Treaty of Belgrade. Thus, this war ended with the recovery of a large part of what the state had lost of its kingdoms according to the Treaty of Karlowitz.

After that, the French ambassador exerted his efforts in convincing the Sublime Porte of the necessity of an alliance with Sweden to fight Russia if it attacked either of them, fearing that what had befallen Poland and made it actually subject to Russia's orders would befall them in turn. The state was convinced and concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with Sweden against Russia in 1740.

In this year, the French ambassador obtained a renewal of the consular privileges and all the advantages granted to French merchants, and the two parties signed these new agreements in September 1740. They are عبارة عن معاهدة سنة 1673 with some new facilities for France and its trade. The Sultan sent an ambassador from his side named Said to present a copy of the treaty to King Louis XV of France with many valuable gifts. The king received him with the celebration and honor befitting the rank of his lofty sender.

When he returned, he was escorted with reverence and respect, and he sent with him two warships and a number of French artillery as a gift from him to the Great Caliph, to be instructors in the Ottoman armies, to train the victorious soldiers in the new systems that L'Hôpital the famous had introduced in the French armies. This was one of the beginnings of the affliction that followed later, with German officers taking over the training of the army in the late period of the state, which enabled foreign trainers, French and German, to instill ideas of revolution and rebellion against the Caliphate, and to plant nationalist ideas and Masonic organizations in the Ottoman army later on.

Shortly thereafter, Charles VI, Emperor of Austria, died on October 20, 1740. His daughter, Maria Theresa, succeeded him, prompting France to unite with some countries to fight this queen and divide her possessions, due to the old grudges between France and the ruling family in Austria. France always sought to humiliate Austria and undermine its power. The death of this king led to the famous war between France and Austria, known in history as the "War of the Austrian Succession," which lasted for several years and ended with Maria Theresa's victory over France. When this war began, France, through its ambassador to the Sublime Porte, showed the ‘Âlî Dawla (Ottoman State) the benefits it would gain if it united with it to fight Austria. It offered to occupy Hungary and restore it to its possessions, so that the state would return to its former extent during the days of Suleiman I the Magnificent, and could then resist Russia and stand in the way of its advancement. It pointed out that if it did not do so, Russia would advance little by little and its power would gradually increase, so much so that the state's existence would be feared.

Events later proved that these observations were correct, even though they were issued by France out of greed to achieve its goal of humiliating Austria.

In December 1754, Sultan Mahmud I died at the age of sixty, after a reign of 25 years. During his reign, the state expanded in Asia and Europe.

Sultan Ghazi Osman Khan II (1754 - 1757 CE)

After taking up the sword in the Mosque of Abu Ayyub al-Ansari, according to ancient custom, he appointed Nişancı Ali Pasha to the position of Grand Vizier, replacing Mehmed Said Pasha, who had been appointed Sadr (Grand Vizier) after returning from his mission in France. He followed an unfavorable path, stirring up the people against him. Because the Sultan used to pass through the streets and alleys at night in disguise to inspect the conditions of the people and to ascertain the truth of their affairs, he heard during his travels about the types of injustices and extortions committed by his vizier. After verifying what was attributed to him himself, he ordered his execution as punishment and had his head placed on a silver platter at the gate of the Seraglio as a lesson to others.

Then Sultan Osman III died in October 1757, without anything noteworthy occurring during his short reign. His reign lasted 3 years and 11 months, and he was succeeded by Mustafa III.

Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan III (1757 - 1774 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Ahmed III and was inclined to reform and loved the progress of his country, especially his first vizier, Raghib Pasha, who was mentioned earlier. This vizier began to reform some affairs with the help and support of the Sultan. After the death of this great vizier, war broke out between the Ottoman State and Russia. Russia had adopted an imperial direction since the time of its Tsar, Peter the Great, and had developed an ambitious expansionist program towards the east, west, and south.

It is useful in this context to present excerpts from the will of the Tsar of Russia, taken verbatim from the first volume of the history of Cevdet Pasha, which gives us two important ideas:

- The first is about the conflict between the European powers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.
- The second is about the Russian ambitions that have not changed since the Tsars and continue to this day.

The Will of Peter the Great, Tsar of Russia, to His Successors

- Article 1: The armies must always be led to war. The Russian nation must be continually in a state of struggle to become accustomed to war... In this way, Russia should take the time of peace and security as a strong means for war, and the time of war for days of peace, in order to increase its power and expand its benefits.
- Article 2: In times of war, all possible means should be taken to attract officers for the soldiers from among the nations and peoples who are more developed in Europe. Likewise, in times of peace, men of science and knowledge should also be brought in. Care must be taken to ensure that the Russian nation benefits from the advantages and merits of other kingdoms...
- Article 3: Whenever the opportunity arises, intervention should be made in all matters and interests taking place in Europe, and in its differences and disputes, especially in the disputes of the kingdoms of Germany...
- Article 4: Bribery should be used to instill corruption, hatred, and envy in the interior of the kingdoms of Poland and to divide their word. To win over the notables of the nation by spending money and gaining influence in the government council, so that we can intervene in the election of the king. After obtaining the election of one who is from the party of Russia from that nation, Russian troops should then enter the country to protect them and support them by stationing the mentioned troops there for a long time, until the opportunity arises to take a means that enables us to stay. When opposition to this appears from neighboring countries, in order to extinguish the fire of sedition temporarily, we should divide the kingdoms of Poland with the opponents, then wait for opportunities to recover the shares that have been given to them.

- Article 5: Some regions should be seized from the kingdoms of Sweden as much as possible, then we should seek to seize a means to complete the rest of them, and we cannot reach that except in a way in which that state is forced to declare war on the state of Russia and attack it. What is necessary first is that we should spend the efforts and concern to instill corruption and aversion always between Sweden and Denmark, so that the difference and anticipation between them are permanent and remaining.
- Article 6: The Russian imperial family must always marry daughters of the German royal family, in order to increase the bonds of marriage and unity between them and their participation in benefits. In this way, their influence can be exercised within Germany, and in this way, the mentioned kingdoms are also linked to the benefit of our interests.
- Article 7: The state of England is the state that needs us most in its maritime affairs, and this state has a very great benefit in increasing our naval power. Therefore, it is necessary to prefer agreement with it in the matter of trade over all other states, and to sell the produce of our kingdoms, such as timber and other things, to England, and to bring gold from them to our kingdoms, and to complete the means of ties and occasions between the merchants and sailors of both sides. In this way, the matter of trade and the movement of ships expands in our kingdoms.

- Article 8: The Russians should spread day by day northward on the coasts of the Baltic Sea and southward on the coasts of the Black Sea.
- Article 9: It is necessary to get as close as possible to Istanbul and India, and since it is a Muslim issue that whoever rules over Istanbul can truly rule over the whole world. Therefore, it is necessary to wage successive wars sometimes with the Ottoman State and sometimes with the Iranian State. The Black Sea should be gradually controlled in order to establish a naval industry house in it. And to seize the Baltic Sea as well, because it is the most important location for obtaining the goal. To hasten the weakening, but rather the demise, of the state of Iran so that we can reach the Gulf of Basra, and perhaps we can restore the trade of the ancient Eastern kingdoms to the Levant, and from there to the land of India, which is like a storehouse of the world. In this way, we can do without the gold of England.
- Article 10: Attention must be paid to obtaining agreement and unity with the state of Austria, and maintaining that. It is necessary to pretend to accept the ideas of the mentioned state in terms of what it aspires to in the future in the land of Germany. But inwardly, we should seek to stir up envy and animosity of all the rulers of Germany for it, and to stir each of them to seek help and support from the state of Russia against it. It is necessary to carry out a kind of protection for the mentioned countries in a way that enables us to rule over those countries in the future.
- Article 11: The royal family in Austria should be incited to expel the Turks and remove them from the territory of Rumelia (the Ottoman lands on the coasts west of the Sea of Marmara). When we seize Istanbul, we must incite the old countries of Europe to war against the state of Austria, or appease its envy and surveillance of us by giving it a small share of the places that we have taken before. Afterwards, we seek to take this share from its hand.

- Article 12: We should win over to our side all the Christians who are of the Roman sect who deny the spiritual leadership of the Pope and who are spread in the lands of Hungary and the Ottoman kingdoms in the south of the kingdoms of Poland (followers of the Orthodox sect) and make them take the state of Russia as a reference and helper for them. It is necessary before everything to create a religious leadership so that we can carry out a kind of influence and monastic rule over them. In this way, we seek to gain many zealous friends who help us in the rule of each of our enemies.
- Article 13: When the Swedes become scattered, the Iranians defeated, the Poles ruled, and the Ottoman kingdoms controlled, then we gather our camps in one place while maintaining the Black Sea and the Baltic Sea with our naval power. At that time, we first show the state of France how to divide the governments of the whole world between us, then to the state of Austria. This is presented to each of the two mentioned countries, each separately, in a very secretive way to accept that. Since one of them must accept, then it is necessary to be careful and respectful of each of them, and to make the one who accepts what we have presented to them a means to punish the other. Russia will then have controlled all the Eastern kingdoms. At that time, it will be easy for us to subdue and punish later any state that remains in the field of the two mentioned countries.
- Article 14: Assuming the impossible that neither of the two mentioned countries accepts what Russia has presented to them, then Russia should turn to monitoring what happens from the dispute and disagreement between them. If that happens, then both sides must get tired. At that time, Russia must wait for the great opportunity and immediately drive its gathered army first and foremost to Germany. It attacks in those areas. Then it sends out two fleets of ships, one from the Sea of Azov, where our soldiers gather, from the various Anatolian peoples, and the other from the port of Arkhangelsk, which is located in the Arctic Ocean. These ships travel and pass in the White Sea and the North Polar Sea with the fleet arranged in the Black Sea and the Baltic Sea. And it attacks the coasts of France. As for Germany, it will then be busy with its own affairs. With what we have mentioned, the two mentioned kingdoms become defeated. The piece that remains of Europe comes under submission easily and without fighting, and the entire piece of Europe becomes open to conquest and subjugation. End quote.

After the battles between the Russians and the Ottomans intensified, in June 1772, the two sides made a truce based on the mediation of Austria. Then Catherine's delegate requested recognition of the independence of the Crimean Tatars and freedom of navigation for Russian merchant ships in the Black Sea and all the seas of the Ottoman State. When the state did not accept these conditions, the assembly ended without success. Then the truce was extended for seven months, and the conference met again, and Catherine, through her delegate, made demands that were more detrimental to the rights of the state and sent a final notification on November 15, 1773. Among those conditions were:

“Seventh: That Russia has the right to protect all Orthodox Christians in the lands of the Ottoman State..”

It appears to the informed that Catherine did not expect the state to accept them, but rather made them a way to continue the war. Therefore, the Ottoman State rejected them and issued orders to the armies to resume fighting with all severity, especially in the lands of the Danube, and the Russians were defeated in several defeats.

Then Sultan Mustafa III died in January 1774, after a reign of sixteen years and eight months. He was described as just and loving of good, and he had several charitable works, such as schools and takayas (Sufi lodges).

Sultan Ghazi Abdul Hamid Khan I (1774 - 1789 CE)

He was the son of Sultan Ahmed III and had spent the reign of his brother Mustafa III confined to his palace, as was customary.

At the beginning of his reign, Russia was preparing immensely to restore what it had lost in terms of name and honor in the late days of Mustafa III. Before the month of June 1774 had arrived, its armies had marched to the camp of the Grand Vizier. After several victories, the Sadr (Grand Vizier) asked Romanzov for a truce and cessation of fighting, and sent him delegates to agree on concluding a peace treaty and accepting the conditions that the state had rejected at the meeting of the Bucharest Conference. After lengthy talks between the two sides, the Sadr (Grand Vizier) accepted the treaty that was agreed upon in July 1774, which consisted of twenty-eight articles, and is considered the beginning of the signs of the collapse of the Ottoman State:

The most important of these are the independence of the Crimean Tatars, Bessarabia, and Kuban - while preserving the sovereignty of the Ottoman State over them in religious matters - and the surrender of all the countries and regions occupied by Russia to the Khan of Crimea, except for the two fortresses of Kerch and Yeni-Kale. Returning what was taken from the state's possessions in Wallachia, Moldavia, the lands of Georgia and Mingrelia, and the islands of Rome, except for some areas - and that the Emperor of Russia be given the title Padişah in treaties and official documents - and that Russian ships have freedom of navigation in the Black Sea and the Mediterranean Sea.

And that Russia built a church in the Pera section of Istanbul and had the right to protect all Christians of the Orthodox faith among the subjects of the state - and that all previous treaties are null and void – and so on.

It is strange that nothing was mentioned in it about the kingdom of Poland, which was the cause of this war that had the worst consequences for the state.

Two secret clauses were added to this treaty, one of which stated that the state would pay Russia the amount of fifteen thousand kises (purses) as a war indemnity in three equal installments in the first of January 1775, 1776, and 1777. The second was that it provide Russia with the necessary assistance to evacuate what it had occupied of the islands of Rome and withdraw its fleet from them.

This was the first time that the Ottoman State paid jizyah to another state!.

It is useful to review some of the clauses of the text of that treaty, called the Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca, taken from the translation of the first volume of the history of Cevdet Pasha:

Article 1: A Clean Slate

All past enmity and hostility between the Ottoman Empire and the Russian State are hereby completely erased and abolished, now and forever. All damages and transgressions committed by both sides, whether through the use of weapons or other means, are to be eternally forgotten. Henceforth, there shall be no acts of vengeance at any time. Instead of aggression, peace shall reign on land and sea, unwavering and unchanging. This peace shall be observed and protected by the Imperial Majesty and my noble successors. Likewise, the agreement and sincere, perpetual, and immutable alliance established with the aforementioned Empress of Russia and her allies shall be preserved and upheld. These articles shall remain in full force and effect, with utmost precision and attention. The spirit of this alliance shall be observed between the two states, within their territories, and among their subjects, ensuring that no future hostility arises between the two parties, whether secretly or openly, nor any form of animosity or harm.

Article 8: Freedom of Religious Pilgrimage

The monks of the Russian State and all its subjects are granted full permission to visit the Holy City of Jerusalem and all other worthy pilgrimage sites. Travelers and pilgrims shall not be required to pay any form of tribute, tax, or "virko" whatsoever. This shall not be demanded of them along the way, neither in Jerusalem nor in any other place. They shall be granted appropriate travel documents, along with the customary safe passage orders given to subjects of other nations. Those residing within the territories of my Sublime State shall not be subjected to any interference or harassment. Their protection and safety shall be fully ensured in accordance with the strong provisions of the Sharia law.

Article 14: Construction of a Russian Church

The Russian State is permitted to build a church on the public road in the Beyoğlu district of Galata, in addition to the designated church, similar to the practice of other nations. This church, intended for the common people and known as the "Dosogorne" Church, shall remain under the perpetual protection of the Russian ambassador and shall be safeguarded from all harm.

Article 16: Religious Freedom and Restitution

- Secondly: The Christian religion shall be completely free in all aspects, as before. Its practice shall not be hindered in any way. The construction of new churches and the restoration of old churches shall not be prohibited.

- Thirdly: All lands and properties located within the districts of Ibrail and Khotyn, as well as in other places unjustly seized, which formerly belonged to monasteries and other individuals, shall be returned to the aforementioned subjects.
- Fourthly: The monastic community shall be accorded due respect and privileges.
- Eighthly: After the expiration of this period, our Sublime State pledges to treat them with utmost generosity in the matter of tax assessment and shall maintain its magnanimous generosity to the fullest extent possible. Their taxes shall be paid through their representatives once every two years. After the full payment of these taxes, no one, whether Pasha or governor, shall harass them in any way, nor shall they be subjected to any additional tax demands under any name. They shall enjoy the same privileges they enjoyed during the prosperous times of my grandfather, Sultan Mehmed Khan IV.
- Ninthly: The rulers of these territories are permitted to appoint an agent to reside in my Sublime State on their behalf. These agents shall be Christians of the Rum Orthodox faith, replacing the "kapukethudays" who previously managed their affairs. They shall be treated with utmost respect by my Sublime State and shall receive what is due to them according to established customs, meaning they shall be respected, safe, and protected from all harm.
- Tenthly: The ambassadors of the Russian Empire are granted permission and approval by my Sublime State to discuss, when necessary, matters concerning the protection and assistance of the aforementioned territories. The Sublime State pledges to consider the proposals presented by the Russian ambassadors in accordance with the friendly relations befitting the two states.

Article 20: Territorial Concession - Azov

In accordance with the agreements concluded between Governor Tolstoy and Hasan Pasha, Governor of Azov, in the year 1700 AD (1100 AH), the fortress of Azov, within its original boundaries, is permanently ceded to the Russian State.

Article 23: Amnesty and Non-Interference

Our Sublime State also pledges, in accordance with the previous article, to grant amnesty to all those who acted against the Sublime State during the war. It shall permanently cease the collection of "virko" from boys and girls and the demand for any form of tribute. Except for those who have long-standing ties to it, it shall not claim any individual from the aforementioned communities as its subjects. It shall relinquish all lands and fortifications seized by the Georgians and Circassians to their government and absolute control. It shall not interfere with or restrict the monasteries and churches of their faith in any way, nor shall it prevent the restoration of old ones or the construction of new ones. It shall prevent the Pasha of Gilder and all military commanders and officers from interfering with or damaging the properties of the aforementioned monasteries and churches under any pretext. The Russian State shall not interfere with the aforementioned communities or their affairs, as they are subjects of the Sublime State.

Article 25: Release of Prisoners of War

All prisoners of war, male and female, of any rank or status, shall be released and returned to their homelands, except for Christians who voluntarily converted to Islam in the Sublime State and Muslims who voluntarily converted to Christianity while in Russian territory. This shall occur immediately after the exchange of ratifications of this blessed treaty, without any excuse, compensation, or ransom. Likewise, all enslaved Christians, including Poles, Baghdadians, Wallachians, inhabitants of Morea and Algiers, and all Georgians without exception, shall be freed without payment or compensation. Those subjects of Russia who were enslaved and found within the protected realms shall be handed over and returned to their homeland after the conclusion of this blessed peace. These same procedures shall apply to the subjects of the Sublime State.

Article 28: Ratification and Implementation

Since the Grand Vizier and Field Marshal of the Russian State, Count Romanzov, have been authorized by the Imperial Majesty and the aforementioned Empress of Russia to prepare the agreements and clauses of this blessed peace treaty, all articles of the perpetual peace outlined in the said treaty shall be signed by the Grand Vizier and the Field Marshal and sealed with their seals for ratification, as if they had been present. The agreed upon articles that have been prepared and promised shall be strongly observed without any alteration or modification and shall be implemented precisely as written. Nothing contrary to them shall be done. Separate documents shall be prepared for the aforementioned articles, which have been approved and ratified by the Grand Vizier and the Field Marshal, bearing their signatures and seals.

Conclusion:

The peace and reconciliation established by the aforementioned articles, putting an end to war and conflict, shall be binding and effective henceforth... Likewise, the conditions of the two appended articles...

Two articles are mentioned in the conclusion of the treaty:

First: Regarding war expenses, as the Ottoman State had pledged to pay fifteen thousand purses to Russia over three years, with an annual installment of five thousand purses.

Second: Concerning the swift evacuation of the islands in the White Sea, as mentioned in Article 17 of the said treaty. Although the aforementioned article stipulated a three- month period for the withdrawal of the Russian fleet from the White Sea, the Russian State has pledged to withdraw it before the specified period if possible. End quote.

Thus, this war concluded, and Russia achieved its greatest aspirations after humiliating the Kingdom of Sweden and virtually erasing it from the political map by confining it within its natural borders. It also effectively erased the Kingdom of Poland from existence, dividing most of it between itself, Austria, and Prussia under a treaty between Russia and Prussia on February 7, 1772, which Austria accepted in April and declared to the King of Poland on September 18, 1772. With this, the first two of the three obstacles hindering Russia's advance towards Europe fell, allowing it to focus all its forces on confronting the Ottoman Empire.

Russia's Seizure of Crimea:

Russia began to spread its agents in Crimea to create internal disturbances and, consequently, to annex it. It persisted in sowing discord and spreading sedition among the people until they deposed their leader, Devlet Giray, whom the people had elected according to the provisions of the Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca. Russia occupied the region with 70,000 soldiers who were waiting on the border for this purpose. Thus, Russia achieved its long-sought goal of controlling all the northern coasts of the Black Sea in 1773. The Ottoman State was enraged and wanted to declare war on Russia. However, it turned its attention away from war due to France's efforts, as the State was not prepared and able to resist Russia at that time. So, it accepted France's advice and recognized the annexation of Crimea to Russia in 1774. However, Russia and its allies only intended to ignite the fighting, and they sent their spies to Greece and the two provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia to incite the Christians against the State.

In 1787, Catherine II toured the southern regions and Crimea with great pomp and ceremony. The commander Potemkin erected triumphal arches for her, inscribed with: "The Road to Byzantium." From all these events, the State realized that she intended to wage war against it again. Therefore, it wanted to take the initiative by declaring war before its enemies were fully prepared. Meanwhile, Austria declared war on the State in support of Russia. Its emperor, Joseph II, tried to seize the city of Belgrade but was driven back to the city of Timișoara, where the Ottoman army pursued him and won a clear victory. Shortly after that, Sultan Abdülhamid I died on the 12th of Rajab, 1203 AH (April 8, 1789), at the age of 66, after ruling for 15 years and eight months. He was succeeded by Selim III.

Sultan Ghazi Selim Khan III (1789-1807)

He was the son of Sultan Mustafa III. He took over while the political atmosphere was grim, and the war was raging. He exerted his efforts to strengthen the armies and send supplies and ammunition. However, despair had taken hold of the soldiers, and many of them deserted their posts. In this year, the Russian commander united with the Austrian army commander in military operations, and they combined their armies. They prevailed over the Ottomans in September 1789. The Russians seized the fortified city of Bender and occupied most of Wallachia, Moldavia, and Bessarabia. The Austrians entered Belgrade and conquered Serbia. The State was in great danger. If the alliance between Austria and Russia had continued, it would have lost most of its possessions. Fortunately, Emperor Joseph died in 1790 and was succeeded by Leopold II, who was preoccupied with the French Revolution that had risen against King Louis XVI, fearing its spread. Austria sought to reconcile with the Ottoman State and returned Serbia, Belgrade, and almost all its conquests.

However, Russia did not follow its ally Austria in the path of peace but continued to fight the State alone. Then England, Prussia, and the Netherlands mediated between the State and Russia, and peace was concluded between the two parties in 1792. Russia would permanently own Crimea, part of Kuban and Bessarabia, and the regions between the Bug and Dniester rivers, with the latter serving as a border between the two kingdoms. The Ottoman State would cede the city of Özi (Ochakiv) to Russia. A treaty was signed in the city of Iași and was named after it.

After making peace with Austria and Russia, the State began internal reforms, especially in the military and navy. One of the Sultan's close associates, named Küçük Hüseyin Pasha, was appointed as Grand Admiral. He was one of the young men who had studied in Europe. The Sultan married him to one of his sisters. He brought in a large number of skilled engineers from Sweden and France to cast cannons in the Tophane factories. He reformed the Naval School and the Artillery School, which had been founded by the Hungarian Baron de Tott, and translated the works of the French teacher Vauban on fortifications for the students. He added a library to the Artillery School, collecting the most important writings on modern military arts and mathematics to keep the students fully informed of contemporary sciences. He established a system for the infantry and began to organize new units and train them on the European system. He established the first regular unit in 1796, with 1,600 soldiers under the command of an English officer who had converted to Islam and was named "İngiliz Mustafa." The purpose of arranging the regular troops was to replace the Janissaries.

In 1798, the French Republic ordered the famous commander Bonaparte to go to Egypt to conquer it without declaring war on the Ottoman State. He was instructed to keep this matter secret so that England would not know and try to thwart it. The aim was to prevent the passage of English trade from Egypt to India. The Battle of the Pyramids took place between him and the Mamluk princes, where the Mamluks displayed courage that astonished the French. After exerting their utmost efforts in defending Egypt, they retreated before the French cannons. Bonaparte and his armies entered Cairo after declaring that he had not come to conquer Egypt but was an ally of the Sublime Porte. He claimed he had come to consolidate its authority and fight the Mamluks who disobeyed its orders, just as the English later claimed when they entered Egypt in 1882.

However, he soon received news of the naval Battle of Abukir, in which the famous English admiral Nelson destroyed all the French warships in August 1798. The English gained control of the Mediterranean Sea and cut off communications between him and France. When the Ottoman State learned of the French occupation of Egypt, it began preparing to fight them, especially since it was reassured about Austria and Russia, which were preoccupied with fighting the French Republic, fearing the spread of the principles of the French Revolution to their countries and the overthrow of their thrones, as happened to Louis XVI, King of France.

On the other hand, the English State offered its assistance to expel the French from Egypt, not out of a desire to preserve the State's possessions, but out of fear for the route to India being in the hands of a powerful state that could oppose it. The Ottoman State accepted its assistance with great relief. Russia also offered to supply it with its warships and join them with the Ottoman and English ships, which it also accepted. It officially declared war on France in September 1798.

The State began to gather armies in Damascus and the island of Rhodes to send them to Egypt. The Russian ships came from the Black Sea to the Bosphorus and went out to the Mediterranean with the Ottoman ships, according to a treaty concluded between these three countries, which agreed for the first time on military action despite the long-standing enmity between the Sublime Porte and Russia.

When Bonaparte sensed the gathering of armies to fight him, he realized that whoever occupied Egypt would not be safe unless he also occupied Syria. For these reasons, Bonaparte decided to conquer Syria. He entered Ramla, then Jaffa. Then he besieged Acre from the land side but did not enter it due to the vigilance of Ahmad Pasha al-Jazzar, the commander of its garrison.

In early April, he was informed of the movement of the Ottoman army from Damascus to relieve Acre, so he sent Commander Kléber to fight it and prevent it from reaching it. Kléber met the Ottomans at Mount Tabor. Bonaparte reinforced him, and the gathered army dispersed. Napoleon, realizing his lack of success, returned with the remainder of his armies to Cairo.

In August, Bonaparte secretly traveled from Alexandria to France with some of his commanders to avoid being captured by the English, who were blocking the Mediterranean Sea routes for the French with their ships. The English admiral had sent him several copies of French newspapers reporting the news of the Austrians' victory over France and the chaos within it, so Bonaparte wanted to return to win over hearts. He left, leaving Commander Kléber as his deputy. The French army remained in Egypt without ships to protect it from the English and Ottomans landing on the coasts or to bring reinforcements or even news from France. Its number decreased to 15,000 after those who died in Syria from plague and war. It became clear that this number was not enough to protect the coasts, maintain the route, and keep the peace internally.

Therefore, Commander Kléber despaired of preserving Egypt and agreed with the Sublime Porte and Admiral Sidney Smith on January 24, 1800, that the French troops would withdraw with their weapons and cannons and return to France on English ships. He then marched to fight the Turkish army that had come to Egypt in March 1800. After a fierce battle, Kléber won and returned to Cairo, only to find it in the hands of Ibrahim Bey, one of the Egyptian princes.

He launched bombs at it and destroyed a large part of it, and the fighting continued in its streets for about ten days. On June 14, 1800, a Mujāhid and Fidā'ī (one who sacrifices himself) from the city of Aleppo (may God protect it), named Sulaymān al-Ḥalabī, assassinated Commander Kléber in the garden of the Saraya and fled. They captured and killed him, along with three of his companions who were accused with him of the murder, including the sheikh who had given him the fatwā for it in Jerusalem, may God have mercy on them.

Then General Menou was appointed in his place. He had claimed that he had embraced Islam and called himself Abdullah Menou.

When the English and Ottomans learned of Kléber's death and Bonaparte's departure from Egypt, they were certain of victory over them. They landed 30,000 fighters at Abukir under the command of General Abercromby in early 1801. Commander Menou marched to fight them but was defeated. Then the English and Turks marched to Cairo and besieged the remaining French there. As for Commander Menou, he remained besieged in Alexandria and did not accept surrender until September 1801, after a great battle between him and the Ottomans and English, in which many from both sides were killed. He left with those who remained with him and traveled to his country on English ships, thus ending the war and returning the country to the Ottomans.

After that, Bonaparte, who had been appointed President of the French Republic, contacted the Ottoman ambassador and showed him the harm of the State's alliance with Russia and England, especially since Russia had occupied the Greek islands located between southern Italy and the island of Morea, and English soldiers remained in Egypt, delaying their evacuation, and what it had occupied of the Syrian coasts. Finally, he convinced him of the necessity of renewing friendly relations with France. The Ottoman ambassador wrote to his State about this. After obtaining permission from it, he signed a draft treaty with Bonaparte in 1801, the basis of which was the evacuation of Egypt and the confirmation of France's previous privileges in the East.

Meanwhile, some disturbances occurred within the State due to Sultan Selim III's initiation of organizing the armies on the new system, as the Janissaries did not view these military reforms favorably. When General de Bayet, the Frenchman who had been brought in to train the system in 1797, died, the Janissaries conspired with some scholars who were resentful of the Sultan's Western leanings. The Sultan had issued a supreme order separating the artillery from the Janissaries, organizing them, making their headquarters in Istanbul, and having military music and an Imām for each of them to teach religion and lead prayer.

Internal strife due to the Sultan's Western leanings

This strife spread while the Ottoman State was preoccupied with the war in Egypt, and many revolts broke out by the inhabitants of Greece, the Balkans, Serbia, and other Ottoman provinces in Europe, instigated by European powers and the inhabitants' ambition for independence. The Janissaries were unable to curb them; rather, the insurgents prevailed over them in several encounters, and the country was in great distress and severe tribulation. These rebels threatened the city of Edirne itself, despite its fortifications. The author of the book "History of the Ottoman State" (Farid Bey) claims that Sultan Selim wanted to test the new regular units that he had established and trained by European military personnel, who had introduced European systems to them. These soldiers performed their duties well. Calm returned to its regions, and the regular soldiers returned to Istanbul crowned with victory. The Sultan was pleased with the success of this new system. He showered them with gifts and favors. Then, in March 1805, he issued a supreme order to all provinces in Turkey and Europe to gather all young men from the Janissaries and the population aged 25 and to enlist them in the military and train them on the new system under the supervision of foreign officers and trainers. The Janissaries did not accept this order and showed rebellion.

Some scholars and students united against the new system, so the Sultan yielded to the Janissaries' demand, returned the regular troops to the Asian provinces, dismissed the ministers, and appointed the head of the Janissaries as Grand Vizier.

However, this matter did not end peacefully but soon led to the Sultan's deposition. This was the beginning of the scholars and Janissary leaders' stand against the process of Westernization and the European invasion of the Ottoman army, which was spearheaded by Sultan Selim III.

The unrest in Serbia led to war between the Sublime Porte and Russia, the causes of which will be explained later.

Relations of the Sublime Porte with France, Russia, and England after the French withdrawal from Egypt

Bonaparte sent General Sebastiani to the East to renew the bonds of alliance and friendship with the Ottoman State. During his stay in Istanbul, he managed, through his efforts, to dismiss the princes of Wallachia and Moldavia, who were aligned with Russia. This displeased Russia, which feared the spread of French influence in the East, so it sent its armies to occupy these two provinces without declaring war, claiming that changing their princes was detrimental to its neighborly rights. Fighting broke out between it and the State, and England allied with Russia in this war. It sent one of its naval divisions in front of the Dardanelles, and its ambassador sent a message to the Sublime Porte demanding: an alliance between the Ottoman State and England, the handing over of the Ottoman fleets and the Dardanelles forts to England, the ceding of Wallachia and Moldavia to Russia, the expulsion of General Sebastiani from Istanbul, and a declaration of war on France. Otherwise, England would be forced to cross the Dardanelles and fire its cannons on Istanbul.

In February 1807, the English put their words into action, and the English admiral crossed the Dardanelles and destroyed all the Ottoman warships stationed there. He stayed outside the Bosphorus, waiting for the implementation of his list, which was mentioned earlier. When the news reached the State, fear struck the hearts of the inhabitants of Istanbul, fearing the arrival of the English ships to the Bosphorus, where the greatest disaster would be, as most of the royal palaces and government offices were on its banks. The State almost surrendered to the conditions. However, the French encouraged it to stand firm and promised assistance. They began to fortify the capital, build forts around it, and arm them with huge cannons. The French residing in Istanbul formed a unit of 200 fighters!! Most of them were from the artillery, as were the Spanish, to oppose their ambassador's policy in the East. Everyone in Istanbul, even the elderly, children, and women, took part in this work, and the Janissaries exerted great effort despite their disagreement with the Sultan. Within a few days, the city was safe. When the English admiral saw the impossibility of entering the Bosphorus and the near completion of the Dardanelles fortifications, he feared his ships being trapped between the two straits and returned in March 1807, escaping with his ships after 600 of his men were killed and two of his ships were sunk by projectiles from the Dardanelles forts. He met with the Russian ships at the entrance of the strait. Then the English admiral wanted to do something to erase the shame he had suffered due to his failure in this mission, so he headed for Alexandria and occupied it in March 1807. Then he sent a division to Rosetta to occupy it, but it was defeated, and he besieged the city in April, but he could not conquer it due to Muhammad Pasha sending reinforcements to it. Finally, they left Egypt, after an attempt at occupation.

Deposition of Sultan Selim III: During this time, when the war between the Ottomans and Russians was raging, the governor of Bosnia entered Serbia with his armies to prevent the rebels from joining the Russian army. Meanwhile, the Mufti who had supported the Sultan in introducing military reforms died, and his place was taken by the military judge of Rumelia, who was opposed to his predecessor. He united with Mustafa Pasha, the deputy of the Grand Vizier who was absent fighting the Russians, and a group of scholars to seek the abolition of the new military system, considering it a bid'ah contrary to the Shari'ah. They began to convince the irregular troops who had been added to the regular units of the invalidity of forcing them to wear Western clothes and dress like Christians, as this was contrary to the Holy Qur'ān and the noble Shari'ah. A battle ensued between them, in which blood was shed. Then this sedition spread and its flames extended to all the forts, and several battles took place between the two sides, the result of which was that the group rebelling against the Sultan arrived. When the Sultan heard the news of this revolution, he immediately issued an order abolishing the new system and dismissing the regular troops. However, the rebels were not satisfied but decided to depose the Sultan, fearing that he would return to implement his project. The Mufti, who was the instigator of this revolution, helped them by issuing a fatwā that any Sultan who introduces the systems and customs of the Europeans and forces the subjects to follow them is not fit to rule.

This revolution continued for two days, then it was announced in June 1807 that Sultan Selim III was deposed. He was deposed after ruling for 19 years, and Mustafa IV was appointed in his place.

Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan IV (1807-1808)

Following this, peace was concluded between France and Russia according to the Treaty of Tilsit in July 1807, the 22nd and subsequent articles of which stated that Russia would cease fighting the Ottoman State until Napoleon mediated between the two parties. Once the preliminary truce was signed, the Russian armies would evacuate Wallachia and Moldavia without the Ottoman armies entering them until peace was finalized. The secret treaty agreed upon by Napoleon and Alexander I, Tsar of Russia, stated that if the Sublime Porte did not accept France's mediation due to the recent events in Istanbul, or if the desired outcome was not achieved in a satisfactory manner within 35 days of accepting this mediation, France would unite with Russia to annex all the Ottoman provinces in Europe except Istanbul and its surroundings and divide them among themselves, with Austria being appeased with a small part. This shows the hidden intentions of all the allied adversaries and demonstrates that there was no European state that wished well or sought the good of any Islamic state or nation whatsoever.

Sultan Mustafa IV's reign did not last long. He was confined in the same palace where Sultan Selim had been confined. He was deposed after ruling for 13 months and was killed in his palace shortly after. Mahmud II was appointed in his place.

Sultan Ghazi Mahmud Khan II (1808-1839)

He was the son of Sultan Abdülhamid I. He began his reign by appointing Mustafa Pasha Bayraktar to the position of Grand Vizier and entrusted him with the task of organizing the Janissaries. However, they resisted him, and a great sedition occurred, which led to the killing of the former Sultan who was confined in the palace (Mustafa IV).

Then the new Sultan turned his attention to reforming internal affairs and preparing to eliminate the Janissary corps. To dedicate himself to this, he made peace with the English in July 1809. He opened communications with Russia without reaching a satisfactory agreement for both parties, so the war resumed, with victories alternating between the two armies. Meanwhile, relations between Russia and Napoleon deteriorated due to the non-implementation of the terms of the Treaty of Tilsit, and war between them was imminent. Russia sought to reconcile with the Ottoman State, and the two parties reached the Treaty of Bucharest in May 1812.

France considered this treaty a betrayal by the State of the old ties existing between the two countries. By concluding it, Russia was able to use the armies that were engaged in fighting the Ottomans to repel France's raids on its lands and force Napoleon to retreat after burning Moscow and the death of most of his armies when they crossed the Berezina River, returning to their country broken and defeated.

When the leaders of the Serbian revolution received news of the Treaty of Bucharest, which stipulated their return to the absolute authority of the Sublime Porte after they had spent their wealth and lives to gain a kind of administrative independence, and the Tsar of Russia promised to help them, they did not accept and preferred to die defending their independence. The State sent armies to them and subdued them by force. Strict instructions were given to treat the Serbs with kindness and gentleness so that they would maintain their loyalty to the State. Serbia became almost independent, and its leader Miloš ruled as an absolute king with no authority over him by the Ottoman governor.

Then the Wahhabi movement arose in Najd in the Arabian Peninsula. The Ottoman State suppressed it using Muhammad Ali Pasha, the governor of Egypt, his son Ibrahim Pasha, and his French advisors. The story is well-known, making it unnecessary to detail it here.

Greece revolted, and the European powers and Russia supported it. The Ottomans used Muhammad Ali Pasha to suppress the revolution and conquer Greece, and he succeeded in doing so in 1826. In June of the following year, the Ottomans conquered Athens and its famous fortress, the Acropolis, despite the defense of it.

Intervention of European powers in the affairs of the Ottoman State

While Ibrahim Pasha was preparing to conquer the remaining parts of Greece in the hands of the rebels, the powers intervened between the Sublime Porte and its subjects under the pretext of protecting the Greeks in appearance, but in reality to open what they called the "Eastern Question," which practically meant preparing to divide the lands of the Ottoman State among themselves.

The Ottoman State had rebuked Russia more than once for its assistance to the rebels and its protection of those who sought refuge in its lands. Russia continued to assist them, hoping to achieve its original goal, which was to occupy Istanbul and make it the center of the Orthodox religion, similar to Rome, which is considered the center of the Catholic religion. Then the talks between the two countries continued for a period without benefit due to Russia's desire and the Sublime Porte's refusal to accept any foreign interference in its internal affairs. In 1825, Nicholas I took over and became interested in the Greek issue, following his predecessor's political plan. By uniting with England, he forced the Sublime Porte to ratify the Treaty of Akkerman in 1826. Its summary was that Russia would have the right to navigate in the Black Sea and pass through the two straits without the State having the right to inspect its ships, that the rulers of Wallachia and Moldavia would be elected by the notables for seven years, with their dismissal not being permissible except with Russia's approval, that Serbia would be almost independent, and that Turkish troops would only occupy the Belgrade fortress and three other fortresses. Nothing was mentioned in this treaty about Greece to create a reason for future disputes. Rather, Russia and England agreed to use all their influence to put an end to the ongoing wars there, even if the Sublime Porte disliked it, and the states of Austria, Prussia, and France agreed with them.

The Navarino Incident

On February 5, 1827, England officially offered the Ottoman State the mediation of all the powers between it and its subjects, but it did not accept this. Rather, it answered the English ambassador, after consideration and reflection on the consequences of this intervention, that it had not allowed and would never allow it. The powers were enraged by this answer. France, England, and Russia agreed to force the Sublime Porte to grant Greece administrative independence, provided that the Greeks would pay a certain tribute to be agreed upon later, as would the borders of the two parties. The Sublime Porte was given a month to stop aggressive actions against Greece, otherwise the powers would be forced to take other measures to implement their desire. When a copy of this treaty reached the Sublime Porte, it did not pay attention to it. After the month had passed, the three states issued orders to the commanders of their fleets to head to the coasts of Greece. They then demanded that Ibrahim Pasha immediately cease fighting, and he agreed to stop the war for twenty days until he received new instructions. The ships of the three allied powers gathered in the port of Navarino to prevent the Turkish and Egyptian fleet from leaving. In October 1827, the gathering of the ships of the united powers was completed. The ships facing each other did not delay until the fires of war broke out between the two sides for a trivial reason. All the European ships directed their cannons at the Turkish and Egyptian ships after the fighting continued for several hours. It ended with the victory of the united powers. When the news of this incident, which occurred without a declaration of war as is customary between states, reached the Sublime Porte, it sent a message to the ambassadors of these three countries, in which it argued against this act, which was contrary to international law, and demanded that the powers completely refrain from interfering in the affairs of the Ottoman kingdoms and that they pay compensation for the losses resulting from the destruction of the Ottoman ships. The ambassadors did not respond to this message but severed relations with the Sublime Porte and went down to their ships in a hurry.

The Sultan published a general decree (Khatt-ı Şerîf) in all the provinces, explaining the evil intentions of the powers in general and Russia in particular towards the Sublime Porte, the only Islamic state, proving to the people that the motive for this aggression was religion, not politics. He concluded it by urging Muslims to fight in defense of religion, nation, and homeland. Russia was enraged by this and declared war on the State in April 1828.

Then Ibrahim Pasha received his father's orders and agreed with the united powers in August 1828 to return to Egypt on what remained of the Egyptian ships. The withdrawal of the Egyptian soldiers began, and whenever they evacuated a place, the French, who had landed in Greece, entered it. In November 1828, the three powers held a conference in London to determine the affairs of Greece and invited the Ottoman State to it, but it refused to send a representative. Its representatives met on the appointed day and agreed on the independence of Morea and the Cyclades Islands and their gathering in the form of an independent government ruled by a Christian prince elected by the powers and under their protection, provided that the Greek government would pay the Sublime Porte an annual tribute of 500,000 qirsh. The Sublime Porte did not accept this decision issued by unqualified powers in what occurs between it and its subjects and was busy fighting Russia, which had declared war on it after destroying its fleet.

Finally, in 1830, the Sublime Porte declared its ratification of the terms written in the agreement signed between the State in London in November 1828, which stipulated the independence of Greece.

Abolition of the Janissary Corps

The historian claimed that when Sultan Mahmud realized the superiority of the military systems used in European armies, heard of the outstanding deeds of the regular Egyptian soldiers in the war of Morea, and learned that Ibrahim Pasha's victories over the Greeks were only a result of the military system, his attachment to reforming the military systems increased. He wanted to complete the project that Sultan Selim III could not complete, so he gathered all the notables and dignitaries of the kingdom and the senior Janissary officers in the house of the Mufti in early 1826. He read to them a project containing 46 articles, in which he clearly stated the nature of the regulations to be introduced. After the assembly approved it, he prepared a record that was signed by all present, even the Janissary officers, and the Mufti issued a fatwā permitting its implementation and the punishment of those who opposed it. Then he read the project to all the Janissary officers, and they approved it, but their approval was only superficial. When the training of the officers began under the supervision of appointed European officers as instructors, the Janissaries became alert and began preparing for revolt and rebellion to stop its implementation, as they had done before. It was not long before the Janissaries were disbanded, pursued, and those who resisted were annihilated.

Then the Sultan proceeded with the plan of internal reforms based on the legal fatwā! The historian (whose source we have relied upon) praised the Sultan's actions, saying: "... On the other hand, he began to change the old customs and follow the good customs of Europe. He replaced the turban with the Rūmī fez, ordered European dress, and decreed that it be the official dress in the military and civil service. He established a medal called the Medal of Honor. Finally, he traveled in person to European kingdoms to explore their conditions and learn the facts of matters... In short, he proceeded like one who wants to keep pace with Europe in its systems and not stand still while other countries advance rapidly, knowing that standing still in such circumstances is the essence of backwardness..." as claimed by the officers whose minds had been corrupted and who had become widespread with Freemasonry and infatuation with the West. In addition, he revived the artillery schools established by Sultan Mustafa III and established a military school to graduate officers similar to the French Saint-Cyr school, which Napoleon I had established in France to train the sons of officers and supervise Western military systems.

France's Occupation of Western Algeria

In mid-1830, France carried out what it had been intending for a long time against the province of Algeria, under the pretext of preventing the attacks of Muslim sea pirates on its commercial ships. The truth was its desire to have a military base in North Africa so that England would not be the sole sovereign of the Mediterranean Sea by occupying the strongholds of Gibraltar and the island of Malta. It took as a pretext the occurrence of a dispute between it and the Ottoman State's representative there. France decided in the Council of Ministers meeting held under the chairmanship of the king himself on February 7, 1830, the necessity of seizing this region. Then it sent to Algeria an army of about 28,000 fighters and a naval fleet of 100 ships and three ships carrying 27,000 marines. When England learned of this, it feared for its influence from France's participation and protested against this project, but its protest was futile.

On the 20th of Dhu al-Hijjah, 1245 AH / June 12, 1830, French troops landed near the city of Algiers, and fighting broke out between the two sides in June. After a fierce battle, the French prevailed. The armies entered the city of Algiers itself. France declared its ownership of it and then began sending armies successively to conquer it.

During this period, Muhammad Ali Pasha rebelled in Egypt and marched on Syria. Mediations and deliberations led to the intervention of foreign powers and the granting of hereditary rule of Egypt to his sons, with support from France, in the historically famous story.

Then Sultan Mahmud II died in July 1839, and his reign lasted 31 years and ten months. He was succeeded by his son, Abdülmecid.

Sultan Ghazi Abdülmecid Khan (1839-1861)

He assumed the caliphate before reaching the age of eighteen. The government was in great turmoil due to the victory of Muhammad Ali Pasha's armies, the governor of Egypt, over the Ottoman armies, and the occupation of the cities of Aintab, Kayseri, and Malatya by his armies. What further complicated the State's affairs was that Ahmed Pasha, the Grand Admiral of the Turkish fleet, went out with all his warships and brought them to the port of Alexandria, handing them over to Muhammad Ali Pasha. When the consuls of the powers in Istanbul learned of the handing over of the fleet to Muhammad Ali Pasha, they feared Ibrahim Pasha's advance on Constantinople. They sent a letter to the Sublime Porte in 1839, signed by the ambassadors of France, England, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, asking it not to decide anything regarding the Egyptian issue without informing them and that they were ready to mediate between it and Muhammad Ali Pasha to resolve this important issue. The Sublime Porte accepted this letter, and the ambassadors met with the Grand Vizier and discussed what should be given to Muhammad Ali Pasha. Many deliberations took place, and Russia did not accept authorizing an international conference to determine its relations with the Sublime Porte. Rather, it declared that it insisted on adhering to the provisions of the Treaty of Hünkâr İskelesi, which was to protect the State with its troops and ships and, consequently, occupy most of its possessions without war if Ibrahim Pasha crossed the borders of Syria. Thereupon, both France and England requested the Sublime Porte to authorize their ships to pass through the Dardanelles Strait to protect it when necessary from Russia and the Egyptian troops. When the other ambassadors learned of this request, they were disturbed and feared a split between the mediating powers. The Russian ambassador declared that if the French and English ships entered the strait, he would sever his political relations with the Sublime Porte and leave immediately. His government had sent him a warship to travel on if necessary. Austria wrote to London and Paris that this request was detrimental to the peace of Europe and that if they insisted on it, it would withdraw from the alliance and reserve its freedom of action.

When the Sublime Porte learned of this, it feared the escalation of the matter and rejected the request of the governments of France and England and asked them to keep their ships away from the entrance of the strait. For these reasons and the lack of agreement between the ministers of the powers, the talks were suspended until September 1839, until the English ambassador offered the Sublime Porte that his State was ready to force Muhammad Ali Pasha to return the Turkish ships, provided that it had the right to bring its ships into the Gulf of Istanbul to repel Russia when necessary. When the French government learned of this, it sent an order to its fleet commander in Turkish waters in December 1839 not to participate with English ships in any aggressive action against the government of Muhammad Ali Pasha (there is much historical evidence of Muhammad Ali's collaboration with France against the Ottomans, and many Christians and those infatuated with France held positions with him).

Everyone realized that a dispute between France and England regarding the Egyptian issue was inevitable. The powers took precautions against what might result from this dispute. Austria declared that it did not wish to intervene due to the failure of its request for an international conference in Vienna or Berlin. Prussia and Russia declared that they would accept whatever the powers decided in this regard, provided that it was in accordance with the desire of the Sublime Porte and that its acceptance of this decision was made with complete freedom.

It seemed that the powers accepted what France and England had agreed upon in alliance with the Sublime Porte, but agreement between these two countries was not reached due to England's efforts to return the Egyptians to their original borders and France's refusal to accept this and its desire to help Muhammad Ali Pasha. France wanted the provinces of Egypt and Syria to be his and his descendants' and the regions of Adana and Tarsus to be his for life. As for England, it did not want to give him anything but the province of Egypt, but in order to please France, it accepted that he be given the southern half of Syria for his lifetime, provided that the city of Acre was not part of this half. France rejected this proposal in support of its agent, Muhammad Ali Pasha.

On July 15, 1840, the powers agreed on a treaty ratified by the representative of the Sublime Porte, the terms of which were:

- First: Muhammad Ali Pasha is to be obliged to return what he had conquered to the Sublime Porte and to keep for himself the southern part of Syria, with the city of Acre not included in this section.
- Second: England has the right, in agreement with Austria, to besiege Syria and help anyone from the inhabitants of Syria who wishes to renounce obedience to the Egyptians and return to the Ottoman State.
- Third: The ships of Russia, Austria, and England together have the right to enter the Bosphorus to protect Constantinople if the Egyptian armies advance towards it.
- Fourth: No one has the right to enter the waters of the Bosphorus as long as Constantinople is not threatened.
- Fifth: The powers whose representatives signed this agreement must ratify it within a period not exceeding two months, with the ratification taking place in London.

This treaty was accompanied by an annex ratified by the representative of the Sublime Porte, specifying the rights and privileges that could be granted to Muhammad Ali Pasha.

Before this treaty was signed, England began to incite the inhabitants of Lebanon, including Druze, Maronites, and Nusayris, to disobey.

Then the powers returned to disagreement, and war almost broke out with Muhammad Ali Pasha. Then the consuls of the four united powers (contrary to France, which supported him) sent to Muhammad Ali Pasha, and offered him on behalf of their countries that the province of Egypt would be his and his heirs' and the province of Acre would be his for his lifetime, and they gave him ten days to give his answer. He asked them to write this down, and they fulfilled his request. Then on the following day, they informed him that France could not help him at all and that the powers were determined to implement what they had agreed upon, even if it led to a European war, but he insisted on not accepting and defending his right. On August 24, 1840, the consuls came to him with the representative of the State and informed him that he now had no right to the province of Acre and that the powers would only allow him the province of Egypt for him and his descendants. He became angry and expelled them. They left and gave him another ten days to give his answer, so that if he did not answer, the powers would not be responsible for any harm that might befall him. After this period had passed without him giving them his answer, the consuls wrote to the ambassadors of the powers in Istanbul, who met with the Grand Vizier and decided by their union to take Egypt and Syria from Muhammad Ali Pasha. During this period, France was unable to help Muhammad Ali Pasha and sent orders to its ships, first to withdraw to Greek waters, then to return to France, leaving Egypt and Syria to the English ships to burn their ports with their projectiles.

On September 11, troops were landed on the shore at a point about six miles north of Beirut, and Ibrahim Pasha was unable to prevent them because this point was under the protection of the English cannons. Then Suleiman Pasha received a message from the English and Austrian admirals to evacuate Beirut immediately. He asked them for a distance of 24 hours to consult with Ibrahim Pasha, but his request was not accepted, and they began firing cannons at the city for two days, until most of the city was destroyed or burned. The Syrian ports were also burned in order to extract them from Muhammad Ali Pasha and return them to the Ottoman State.

During this period, Commodore Napier offered Muhammad Ali Pasha that the English government would intercede with the Sublime Porte to give Egypt to him and his heirs if he ceded Syria and returned the Turkish ships to the Sublime Porte. He complied with this matter and accepted these conditions to save Egypt for his descendants, and an agreement was reached between them in November 1840. The Sublime Porte did not accept this agreement except after hesitation and reluctance.

The Lebanon Issue

As soon as the Egyptian armies evacuated Syria and Mount Lebanon, the old underlying religious motives stirred in its inhabitants, and foreign intrigues increased to ignite the fire of discord and sow internal sedition in order to achieve their goals. France was helping the Maronite Catholics, and England was supporting the Druze against them to force them to abandon the Catholic sect and embrace the Protestant sect, so that they would come under its actual protection, and France would no longer have a pretext to protect them for a sectarian reason. Each of these wretched groups thought that the state that was deceiving it wanted its good and advancement and did not pay attention to the secrets of this malicious policy, whose owners do not hesitate to shed the blood of the innocent to achieve their goals. With these intrigues, turmoil prevailed throughout Lebanon, and the hatred, both national and religious, that its inhabitants harbored in their hearts appeared, until the Druze attacked the Maronites in 1841, entered Deir al-Qamar, and committed atrocities of looting and plundering that make the flesh creep. Then the Druze rose again in 1845, killed the Christians, and burned their bodies. Then they set fire to the monastery after looting all the movables and belongings in it, without the slightest harm to the Protestant missionaries from the Americans and the English!! This clearly indicates that these massacres were not without their influence.

Because of these successive disturbances, the Sublime Porte saw no alternative but to intervene in the administration of the mountain to prevent these seditions. It deposed Emir Bashir Shihab after the Egyptian troops left Syria and appointed an Ottoman governor in his place, thereby abolishing all the privileges of the inhabitants of the mountain granted to them in the past. The foreign powers, whose intervention had become familiar, did not accept this. The Ottoman State tried several solutions, each time satisfying one and angering the other, and the intervention of the powers further complicated the crisis. A massacre occurred in 1845 between the sects, so the State sent its armies and occupied the country, both plain and mountain, militarily and imposed martial law. Then talks took place between the great powers and the Sublime Porte to determine what would guarantee peace in the present and the future. Their opinions finally agreed, after long deliberations and back and forth, on a compromise solution. Thus, the Lebanon issue ended temporarily. Since the Druze did not accept this settlement except hoping to gain more than what was in it, according to the whispers of the English representative to them that it would grant them over time sovereignty over all the peoples living in Lebanon, the seditions continued to run their course until the massacre of 1860 occurred, and France intervened militarily to protect the Maronites. It withdrew again after consolidating security and preserving the rights of the Maronites.

The Crimean War and its Causes

Disputes were constant between the Orthodox and Catholic priests regarding ownership or performing their religious rites in the churches considered important to them in the city of Jerusalem. France, which had acquired old treaties, supported the Catholics. Russia, on the other hand, sought to strip the Catholics of these privileges to give them to the Orthodox, so that it could use them to spread its policy and influence among the subjects of the Ottoman State who adhered to this sect, who numbered more than ten million people. Then, when Napoleon III was appointed President of the Second French Republic in the name of Prince Louis Napoleon, he approached the Ottoman State on this issue. The Sublime Porte appointed a committee consisting of several members of different sects to settle it according to the old treaties. The committee decided, after several successive meetings, the priority of Catholics in owning several churches and monasteries. Russia opposed the implementation of this agreement and threatened the Sublime Porte with war if it ordered its implementation.

Meanwhile, Tsar Nicholas worked to probe the ideas of Sir Hamilton Seymour, the English ambassador to his government, showing him the necessity of the two countries, Russia and England, uniting together to weaken France's influence in the East and taking precautions to divide the lands of the Ottoman State, as it had become impossible to cure this "sick man," as the Ottoman State was then called in international circles, as they claimed. Russia offered to be lenient with England if it helped it implement its project in giving it Egypt and the island of Crete. The English ambassador did not give him a satisfactory answer, but rather answered the Tsar that it was better to treat this patient and take care of him until he recovered from his illness, because if he died, European wars would occur in which rivers of blood would be shed when dividing his estate. This was not from the English state out of love for strengthening the Ottoman State or a passion for its survival, but out of fear of Russia's expansion in the East and its occupation of Istanbul, which would then share with England the dominion of the sea, which it alone possessed.

When the Emperor of Russia saw England's disregard for his requests, he approached the French ambassador about being lenient with it on deciding matters in Palestine according to its wishes, and offered him that Russia would also be lenient with France in return and even help it to own Tunisia to strengthen its influence in the West! And monitor England's actions on the island of Malta. But he did not find a listening ear from the French ambassador either.

It became clear to the public from this that Russia's sole intention was to declare war on the Ottoman State and divide its kingdoms. Therefore, France sent its naval ships to Greek waters in 1853 in preparation for unforeseen events. As for England, it authorized its ships to lie in wait in Malta until new orders were issued to them. Meanwhile, Prince Menshikov was exerting his efforts with the Sublime Porte to obtain the renewal of the terms of the Treaty of Hünkâr İskelesi, which stipulated that Russia would have the protection of all Christians in the Ottoman State. The Sublime Porte was delaying its answer. Then he sent the Sublime Porte a final message, and the Russian ambassador severed relations with the Sublime Porte and left Istanbul on one of Russia's ships.

When the State informed England of the copy of this message, it realized Russia's bad intentions towards the Ottoman State. It joined France and sent to its ships in Malta to join the French ships and unite with them in all their actions. It then became clear to all of Europe that France and England were united in protecting the Ottoman kingdoms against Russia's ambitions. Then these two countries issued orders to their ships in 1853 to approach the Dardanelles Strait to lend a helping hand to the Ottoman State if necessary.

Russian troops crossed the Prut River, which separates the possessions of the two countries, in July 1853 and actually occupied the two provinces, as Russia did not imagine that the Western powers would ally with the Ottoman State to fight it to protect the State.

The representatives of Prussia and Austria were interested in uniting with the representatives of France and England in reconciling the two adversaries and making peace between them to prevent bloodshed and the outbreak of war that might engulf all of Europe. The conference ended without success. Then Omar Pasha crossed the river on November 3, 1853. After a great and enormous battle, the Ottoman armies triumphed over the Russian armies and drove them out of their strongholds on the left bank of the river by force. Omar Pasha and his armies won a clear victory that astonished the whole world because Russia's defeat was not expected. When Emperor Nicholas saw this situation, he met with Franz Joseph, Emperor of Austria, and discussed with him his fear of the Western powers, France and England, coming to the aid of the Ottoman State, and asked him for help and alliance, but the Emperor did not accept this and expressed his deep regret.

Meanwhile, the French and English ships advanced to the Bosphorus Strait with the consent of the Sublime Porte to be closer to the Black Sea and to protect Istanbul if the Russians tried to attack it by sea.

In November 1853, Russian ships surprised the Turkish ships in the port of Sinop on the Black Sea and destroyed almost all of them, even though it had pledged to France and England not to take any aggressive action in the Black Sea. From that time on, war between these countries and Russia became a reality, to protect the Ottoman State from Russia's aggression and ambitions, not out of love for the Ottoman State, but out of fear of the spread of Russia's influence and its control over Istanbul, as we mentioned earlier.

In March 1854, France, England, and the Sublime Porte signed an agreement in Istanbul to fight Russia and protect the Ottoman State. Napoleon III sent a letter to the Chamber of Deputies informing it of the declaration of war on Russia in alliance with England.

After that, the two allied powers began to gather armies and what they needed of supplies, ammunition, and ships necessary to transport them. Before the arrival of the land armies, the fighting had already begun in the Black Sea. Meanwhile, Emperor Nicholas declared war on the countries hostile to him. Then the allies advanced with their armies. When the Russian army withdrew from Wallachia and Moldavia, the Austrian army occupied them!

Russia did not object to this occupation, fearing to anger Austria and its entry into the alliance formed against it, preferring the presence of Austrian armies in them to the presence of Turks or French because Austria was not inclined to war. Then France and England sent their ships to the Baltic Sea and the northern White Sea and the Pacific Ocean to strike the Russian ports. At the end of this year, contacts took place again in Vienna to reach peace and stop the damage of the war before it intensified. France and England offered Austria to unite with them against Russia if Russia did not accept peace before the end of the year and pledge to the four powers its demands, which were:

First: Russia not to monopolize the protection of the Christians of the Ottoman State and the protection of Wallachia and Moldavia.

Second: Freedom of navigation for all countries in the Danube River.

Third: Amendment of the treaties related to passage in the Istanbul Strait, especially the 1841 Treaty.

Fourth: Establishing a new basis for the balance of power in the Black Sea, so that this new tripartite treaty would be effective.

Then on December 28, the ambassadors of England, France, Russia, and Austria met with the Foreign Minister of Vienna and decided to give him the required period, and thus this year ended with hopes directed towards reaching peace. Then the Russians attacked the Ottomans and the Egyptian soldiers with them in the city of Eupatoria, but Omar Pasha, the Ottoman commander, repelled them, and the victory was solely by the grace of the Islamic armies. In March, the Emperor of Russia died and was succeeded by his son, Alexander II.

In January 1855, Victor Emmanuel, King of Piedmont in Italy, signed an offensive and defensive treaty against Russia and sent to Crimea an army of 18,000 fighters. On August 26, the allies triumphed in the Battle of Traktir, and the Russians evacuated the city of Sevastopol after burning it to the ground. The united armies occupied it, or rather, they occupied its ruins. After that, the united armies marched towards the city of Kinburn and occupied it. On the following day, the Russians destroyed the forts of Ochakov and evacuated them, heading inland. If it had not been for the beginning of winter, which comes early in those countries, Russia would not have found enough armies to stop its enemies from the city, how sacred it is to them. During 1855, the ships of France and England fired bombs at several ports in the Baltic Sea and disrupted Russian trade altogether. They also besieged the entrance to the northern White Sea and prevented commercial ships from entering it altogether. After that, no significant military battles took place, but the matter entered a political phase due to Alexander II's realization of the lack of victory, especially since Austria had openly shown him hostility after the fall of Sevastopol, and the Kingdom of Sweden joined the European alliance against it. A new conference was held in Vienna in February 1855.

The other powers demonstrated against it, especially the Kingdom of Sweden, which Russia was using methods of threat and intimidation to obtain some privileges related to fishing on the shores of Norway, so it concluded an offensive and defensive treaty with France and England against Russia on November 20, 1852, and officially declared it to all countries. Thus, Russia realized that it had become impossible for it to win over all these forces allied against it and leaned towards peace wholeheartedly, waiting for the slightest opening from the Western powers to accept it. In late 1855.

Austria proposed that a final message be sent to Russia with the original demands of the powers, along with the previous proposals during the conference that was recently held in Vienna in April 1855. If Russia did not answer all these proposals, the fighting would resume in the spring of 1856 with all severity and rigor, and the armies of Austria and the Kingdom of Sweden and Norway would join the fighting armies. The powers agreed to this, and Russia accepted these proposals, which were more influential on its influence than what it had previously rejected. After long talks, it was agreed that a new peace conference would be held in Paris to finally decide on peace in 1856. The French Foreign Minister was chosen to preside over it, and all the articles of the famous Treaty of Paris were signed, which brought Napoleon III to the height of his glory and restored France's former glory, as it had not participated in such a war since Napoleon I and preserved the Ottoman State's possessions from the dangers of Russia. It later became clear that the European powers defended the cake and the spoils that they would later divide among themselves!!

What further complicated the Ottoman State's affairs was the intervention of the powers in internal affairs and preventing the Ottoman State from fighting the rebels by threatening to sever political relations and their ambassadors descending to their ships, and even sending some warships to determine the demands of the rebels. France and Russia sent their ships in 1858 to the coasts of Montenegro to prevent the Ottoman armies from entering this region and punishing its prince for helping the rebels in Bosnia and Herzegovina... From this, it is clear that the State was in the most critical of situations due to the lack of a savior or friend among all the Christian powers allied against it politically to weaken it and obstruct all its reform efforts within its country, and the intervention of those powers in its purely internal affairs, until it seemed to the observer that the ambassadors of the powers in Istanbul had become partners with the ministers of the State in all actions during that period.

In early 1858, Grand Vizier Rashid Pasha died. He was succeeded in this dangerous position, especially in these circumstances, by the famous political figure Ali Pasha, and Fuad Pasha was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs. Both were extremely astute in political affairs and aware of Europe's evil intentions towards the only Islamic state, so they worked to settle all internal issues with wisdom and sound judgment, so that they did not leave the ambassadors of the powers any right to intervene. It was not long before calm returned to Bosnia and Herzegovina, promising its people to reform their conditions. They also ended the issue of Montenegro by defining the borders by a committee consisting of four members (French, Russian, Ottoman, and Montenegrin) and accepted the decision of this committee despite its injustice to the rights of the Sultanate, but because it was calm and order.

Then the war between the Maronites and the Druze occurred in 1860, which led to the intervention of the French army in Lebanon... Twenty days after the French armies left Beirut, Sultan Abdülmecid Khan died in June 1861. His reign lasted 22 and a half years, and on the day of his death, his brother was sworn in as Caliph.

Sultan Ghazi Abdülaziz Khan (1861-1886)

A number of internal reforms took place during his reign, including:

- The establishment of the Mecelle-i Ahkâm-ı Adliye (The Mejelle) and the laws that allowed foreigners to own real estate and all in-kind rights and dispose of them in all the Ottoman kingdoms after they had been completely prohibited from them, in the year 1285 AH, corresponding to 1869.
- The establishment of the Mecelle-i Ahkâm-ı Şer'iyye (The Mejelle of Sharia Rulings) to be used in the regular courts that were established and were being reformed. This Mejelle was prepared by a committee of the most famous jurists of that era from the scholars, jurists, and administrators in the Ottoman State.

After the events mentioned above, the Sultan was convinced that the alliance of the European powers with the State in the Crimean War and beyond was only the result of weakening it by interfering in its internal affairs and helping the Christian communities subject to it to secede from it and spread the spirit of sedition and corruption in its kingdoms under the guise of freedom and the spread of knowledge. All of this benefited Russia, its strong neighbor and ancient enemy, especially since the powers had amended after the Franco-Prussian War the most important articles of the Treaty of Paris, which was concluded after the Crimean War to maintain the balance in the Black Sea, and disregarded them after their conclusion with regard to Wallachia and Moldavia. For these reasons, the Sultan believed that it was better and more successful for the State's policy to distance itself from the Western powers and ally with Russia. He was supported in this thought by Grand Vizier Mahmud Nedim Pasha. The Sultan increased his meetings with the Russian ambassador in Istanbul. It is widely believed, although not proven by official documents, that they were seeking to lay the foundation for an offensive and defensive treaty, one of the most important articles of which would be the exclusivity of all the lands of the East, and that the Islamic provinces in which the Islamic element prevails would follow the Sublime Islamic Porte, and the annexation of all Christian regions or those in which this element prevails to the Russian state. When this project became known, it did not please the European powers that had interests in the East, especially England. Their agents and their overt and covert ambassadors worked until they convinced the ministers of the necessity of his dismissal, and their efforts found a listening ear among some scholars because of their reluctance towards the Sultan due to his public debauchery, his visit to the Paris Exhibition, and his attendance at theaters and dances... He was a Caliph of 'Akrūtā as the people of Syria call such people.

The Sheikh al-Islam issued a fatwā for his deposition, the text of which is: "If Zayd, who is the Commander of the Faithful, is mentally disturbed and has no knowledge of political affairs and continues to spend public funds on his personal expenses, to a degree that the kingdom and the nation cannot bear, and he has disrupted and ruined religious and worldly affairs and the kingdom and the nation, and his continuation is harmful to them, is it permissible to depose him? Answer: It is permissible. Written by the poor Hasan Khairallah, may he be forgiven."

He was deposed on May 31, 1876. Then the new Sultan, Murad Khan V, was sworn in by all present in the usual manner.

Sultan Murad V (May 1886 - August 1886)

He was the son of Sultan Abdülmecid Khan. He ascended to the position of Caliphate on May 31, 1876. It was said that he was educated and cultured with Western cultures, convinced of equality between all classes of his subjects, but it was claimed that signs of nervous disturbance appeared on him about a week after his appointment and then increased gradually. The Grand Vizier was hiding this matter from the public, but news of it spread because the ceremony of handing over the Sultan's sword in the Abu Ayyub al-Ansari Mosque was not held, as usual, and because he did not meet the consuls of the powers to present to him their papers of renewal of their appointment to his government. Finally, when his condition worsened, the ministers summoned the famous Austrian doctor Leidesdorf, who was known for treating mental illnesses. He came and, after examining him and observing him for several days, scrutinizing everything that appeared from him of words and signs, and inquiring about his habits and way of life, said that it was difficult for him to recover from this disease. The ministers consulted on the matter, then offered his brother, Abdülhamid Efendi, to hand over to him the reins of power, as the doctors had ruled that his brother, Sultan Murad, was not fit to manage its tasks. They met on Wednesday, Sha'ban 10, 1293 AH, August 31, 1876, and decided that it was necessary to swear allegiance to our lord, Sultan Abdülhamid Khan II. They consulted our lord, the Sheikh al-Islam, on the matter, and he issued a fatwā that it was necessary to depose him, and this is the text of the fatwā: "If the Imam of the Muslims goes insane with a complete madness that defeats the purpose of the Imamate, is it permissible to dissolve the Imamate from his custody? Answer: It is permissible, and God knows best. Written by the poor Hasan Khairallah, may he be forgiven."

I say: One must look with suspicion at what historians narrate about that stage in which the Masons controlled the internal and external affairs of the Ottoman State, starting from the stage after Sultan Abdülmecid, and God knows best the details of this incident, and its witnesses, from the Austrian doctor to the last one who took over it.

Sultan Ghazi Abdülhamid Khan II (1886-1909)

The pressure of the corrupt on the Sultan increased in order to force him to abide by the constitution, the most important goal of which was to equalize Muslims with the subjects of Jews and Christians. Corruption succeeded with the assumption of Midhat Pasha of the Grand Vizierate in 1876, and he was one of the strongest advocates of these reforms.

The truth - as I mentioned earlier - is that one must look with suspicion and scrutiny at most of what was written about the history of the Ottoman State during the last century of its life, because the Masons and Jews had infiltrated the army and all the State's departments. I have not been able to find detailed sources on the history of that stage. It can be concluded from what we have learned about their conspiracies against Sultan Abdülhamid, whom they overthrew, that those intrigues had begun several decades before his reign, since the influence of the European consuls increased, and the attachment of the new class of politicians and officers, and even some sultans, to the European model of civilization and politics increased, and the Masons and Jews gnawed at the structure of the State, until it led to its downfall at the hands of the foster child of the Dönme Jews, called (Atatürk)!

Let us consider what was written by Farid Bey the lawyer (the author of our main source, the book "History of the Ottoman State"), and it seems that he is Egyptian of Turkish origin, and his book was published in 1909, it seems, and God knows best. His book supports the Masonic "Committee of Union and Progress," which oversaw the deposition of Sultan Abdülhamid. He wrote:

The Ottoman Constitution, the National Renaissance, and Reforms in the Ottoman State

Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent died in 1566, and the Sublime Porte was at the height of its glory and power, and its kingdoms bordered India to the east and the Atlantic Ocean to the west, and Europe feared its power and might. He was succeeded by kings who did not follow in his footsteps or follow his path, especially since the European powers had allied against it and internal seditions had befallen it. It began to decline, and many parts of it were separated. It sometimes declined until Sultan Selim III assumed the caliphate in 1789, and the country was in disarray, the rulings were weak, and the Janissaries held the reins of power, appointing whomever they wanted of the sultans, deposing whomever they wanted, and killing those who did not follow their whims and purposes, and the country was in chaos that almost tore it apart. He was stirred by the love of reform and declared his inclination to organize the soldiers on the modern pattern and arm them with modern weapons, but this did not suit the Janissaries, so they attacked him and he died, and the reform was in its infancy.

[Note the writer's praise, as Sultan Selim was the first to openly commit debauchery and the process of Westernization and was deposed by a fatwā from the Mufti].

However, the idea took root in the minds of the Ottomans, and Sultan Mahmud received it and proceeded to reform from the administrative and military point of view. He dispersed the Janissary soldiers and replaced them with an organized army, and he began to send reform publications to the governors and rulers, but he died and did not complete the branches of reform except for the organization of the soldiers, which was incomplete.

The idea of reform had spread among a group of statesmen, so they began to spread it during the reign of Sultan Abdülmecid and Sultan Abdülaziz, and the greatest and most influential of them were Mustafa Rashid Pasha, Ali Pasha, and Fuad Pasha. When Sultan Mahmud died and was succeeded by Sultan Abdülmecid, he published the famous Gülhane Hatt-ı Şerif in 1839, i.e., on Sha'ban 26, 1255 AH. It caused a stir that shook Europe, and statesmen began to organize special laws for each branch of the judiciary since the issuance of that Imperial Edict. Then a committee was formed that brought together the greatest Ottoman scholars, and they compiled the Mecelle-i Şer'iyye (Sharia Mejelle), for which the royal decree was issued by Sultan Abdülaziz in 1289

The idea of reform had spread among a group of statesmen, and they began to propagate it during the reign of Sultan Abdülmecid and Sultan Abdülaziz. The most prominent and influential among them were Mustafa Reşid Pasha, Âli Pasha, and Fuad Pasha. When Sultan Mahmud died and Sultan Abdülmecid succeeded him, the famous Hatt-ı Şerif of Gülhane was issued in 1839 CE, corresponding to 26 Sha'bân 1255 AH. It caused an uproar that shook Europe, and since the issuance of that imperial decree, statesmen began to organize specific laws for each branch of the judiciary. Then, a committee was formed, bringing together the greatest Ottoman scholars, who compiled the Mecelle-i Ahkâm-ı Adliyye (Ottoman legal code). The imperial decree of Sultan Abdülaziz was issued in 1289 AH to adhere to its provisions, along with the Land Law in 1274 AH, the Tapu Law in 1275 AH, and the Penal Code in 1274 AH. All of these laws were adapted from French laws while observing the provisions of Islamic Sharī'ah (!!). Then came the Ottoman Nationality Law, the organization of Sharī'ah courts, regular courts, and commercial courts (which were secular laws), as well as regulations for civil administration, provincial administration, and the State Council. They established a system for education, a system for publications, and other regulations for printing presses, printing, authorship, and translation rights. They also established regulations for fees, minerals, roads and crossings, and other matters required for the advancement of civilization and suited to the condition of the nation. In short, they left nothing necessary for the administration of the state without codifying a law for it. The collection of these laws and regulations was known in the Ottoman state as the constitution.

[Naturally, waging war against Allāh the Exalted by legislating apart from Him was the first sign of ruin, loss, and the rallying of enemies, for: "Whoever does good, it is for himself; and whoever does evil, it is against himself. And your Lord is not ever unjust to [His] servants." (Fussilat: 46)]

Nevertheless, the rule was absolute, and the Sultan's will was above any law. During the brief period when Sultan Murad sat on the throne, Midhat Pasha and his liberal party had completed the preparation of the constitution and the arrangement of the system of the Chamber of Deputies (This Midhat Pasha is the head of the Masonic serpent, as will be defined and explained later.)

The Constitution and Sultan Abdülhamid

Sultan Murad was deposed in 1293 AH (1876 CE), and Sultan Abdülhamid ascended the throne of the Caliphate. He had promised the leader of the liberals, Midhat Pasha, before his accession, to grant the constitution and bestow freedom upon the Ottoman nation. However, upon his accession, Abdülhamid showed signs indicating that he would break his promise. For instance, he gathered the enemies of the liberals and opponents of the constitution and appointed them in the palace to strengthen his position, even though he had promised Midhat Pasha to appoint the great Ottoman poet Namık Kemal Bey, the leader of the coup, and the famous political writer Ziya Pasha, but he broke his promise. He also diligently sought to win public opinion to his side, deceiving the people. However, the liberals were not deceived and prepared to fight for the constitution. At that time, the state was at war with Serbia and defeated it, and the Ottomans captured the fortress of Alexinatz and imposed harsh conditions on them. But these states rejected these conditions and requested the Sublime Porte to keep Serbia as it was before the war and to grant Bosnia and Herzegovina, which were also in revolt, an independent administration, along with granting the Bulgarians the same. This became a cause for Serbian greed, and they decided to fight the state, with Russian engineers organizing their armies.

However, defeat was their fate, and the Ottomans captured Alexinatz and Belgrade and advanced towards the capital, Belgrade. The Prince of Serbia sought help from Russia, and its Tsar ordered his ambassador in Istanbul to submit a strongly worded message to the Sublime Porte. He then decided to hold a conference in Istanbul to consider the Balkan issue.

In short, the position of the Ottoman state was extremely critical because all of Europe had united against it, and the message from the Russian ambassador smelled of war. The ministers then decided to grant the constitution to get rid of these troubles. Sultan Abdülhamid was convinced of the necessity of its implementation because it was impossible to accept Europe's demands. To avoid the dangers arising from rejecting those demands, it was necessary to implement some reforms that Europe could not criticize, namely, the implementation of the constitution.

[Pay attention to Europe's pressure to impose the Masons and the secular constitution on the Ottoman state, as Farid the lawyer continues to say]

At that time, Midhat Pasha was appointed Grand Vizier, because all the European states trusted him, knowing that he was the leader of the liberals and the author of the constitution. Sultan Abdülhamid decided to appoint Midhat Pasha to look into the issue of the (European Conference) that the states had decided to hold in Istanbul. The first thing Midhat Pasha did was to end the disputes between the state and Serbia, Montenegro, and Bulgaria. On December 24, 1877, the ministers, scholars, princes, and others gathered at the Sublime Porte. Then Midhat Pasha came and read the imperial decree that granted the Ottoman nation the constitution and freedom.

However, as soon as the Chamber of Deputies was organized and began to look into the affairs of the state, the imperial decree was issued to dissolve it. Thus, all the pillars of that structure collapsed, and the nation was afflicted with a new era of tyranny that it had not witnessed even in the darkest ages. Sultan Abdülhamid destroyed what the liberals had built, but despite that, the idea did not die in the minds of the Ottomans. This body, despite its inherent strength or even its apparent weakness, could not bear the harm of the Hamidian government and the various forms of oppression it inflicted, especially since the banners of constitutional governments had spread from the far west to the far east, and the stars of freedom had shone everywhere.

The liberals began to work day and night until they achieved that brilliant victory in 1908. The Ottoman nation gained the constitution through the struggle of its brave army, and the national idea spread from the time of Midhat Pasha. This spread was aided by the poems of the great poet Namık Kemal Bey, who died in the prison of Magosa. Niyazi Bey formed the first gang in Resne, and he was followed by Enver Bey, Raif Bey, Hasan Bey, and Salahuddin Bey.

The movement's administration was in Salonika, and the general assembly of the Committee of Union and Progress was in Paris... and everyone was striving to spread liberal ideas and constitutional principles. What helped them spread their ideas was that there was no traitor among them, so their movement strengthened and expanded until it became impossible to keep it hidden. The Committee of Union and Progress had previously identified the forces it could rely on and found them sufficient. These forces consisted of the Second and Third Army Corps stationed in Monastir, Skopje, Edirne, and Izmir, and the Fourth Army Corps stationed in Rumelia. It was impossible for the Hamidian government to send the First Army Corps stationed in Istanbul to fight the constitutionalists because it was not possible to strip the capital of soldiers. Moreover, most of the officers had joined the constitutionalists. The soldiers of the Second and Third Army Corps were more numerous than others, so the constitutionalists began to form national gangs to resist the government if it tried to obstruct their efforts. Niyazi Bey's gang arose, followed by the gangs of Enver Bey, Raif Bey, Hasan Bey, and others.

The constitutionalists finished setting the plan in late June 1908. The Hamidian government sent Şemsi Pasha to track down Niyazi Bey's gang, but he was killed before he could begin his mission. They also sent thirty reserve divisions from Izmir, but they joined the constitutionalists and strengthened their ranks. On July 21, 22, and 23, the constitutionalists sent telegrams to the Grand Vizier from Salonika, Monastir, Skopje, and Serres, threatening Istanbul with marching on it if the constitution was not declared. When these telegrams reached Sultan Abdülhamid, he issued the imperial decree granting the constitution and the basic law.

The Reactionary Incident and the Deposition of Abdülhamid

The ranks of the despots were dispersed since the declaration of the constitution, and the aversion between them and the Committee of Union and Progress increased, so they began to think about uprooting the sources of corruption.

They first encouraged the newspapers to write against the committee. Then, the Istanbul garrison, at the instigation of the palace officials, summarized their demands in a religious form to gain the support of the people of Istanbul. Here are their demands:

1. Revival of the Sharī'ah.
2. Dismissal of the Grand Vizier and the Ministers of War and Navy.
3. Expulsion of Ahmed Rıza Bey, Hüseyin Cahit Bey, Cavid Bey, Rahmi Bey, Talat, Ismail Hakki Bey, etc., from the council.

4. Dismissal of Mahmud Muhtar Pasha because he did not join them.
5. Amnesty for them.

The Chamber of Deputies held an extraordinary meeting, and although the number of members did not exceed fifty, they decided to answer the demands of the revolutionaries and elected a delegation from among them to inform the Sultan of their decision. Tawfiq Pasha was then appointed Grand Vizier, and Edhem Pasha was appointed Minister of War, and amnesty was granted to the soldiers. They began firing their rifles in celebration, and their number reached thirty thousand. The council met again afterwards and decided to accept the resignation of President Ahmed Rıza Bey. The tone of the newspapers changed drastically, and they began to speak about Sultan Abdülhamid as they used to speak about him during the days of tyranny. This was the situation in Istanbul. News arrived of the coming of soldiers from Rumelia to protect the constitution and the Chamber of Deputies. The deputies sent a delegation to meet them. The army entered Istanbul under the leadership of Mahmud Şevket Pasha and besieged Yıldız Palace. A major battle took place there, ending with the surrender of the Yıldız garrison. However, Sultan Abdülhamid continued to resist, so the Freedom Army decided to launch the final attack. Bombs were fired at the garrison of the Sublime Porte and the military club, and they were captured. Many supporters of the old regime who had stirred up sedition were arrested, including Murad Bey al-Daghestani. Spies were executed by firing squad. The estimated number of dead was 1,200. The constitutional soldiers then besieged the barracks of Scutari and captured them. At that point, there was no longer any danger to the constitution, so the members of parliament returned to Istanbul, and the general assembly met to discuss the matter of Sultan Abdülhamid. The result was the deposition of Sultan Abdülhamid and the installation of Sultan Reşad in his place.

On April 27, 1909, Sultan Reşad was crowned with the name Sultan Mehmed V. In short, the supporters of tyranny stirred up their last sedition, and the constitution fell into a severe crisis, and its lovers and protectors were scattered. The public anticipated that Sultan Abdülhamid would repeat what he had done with the first constitution. However, the constitutional spirit had strengthened in the hearts of the Ottomans and was based on the strength of the soldiers. The supporters of the constitution endured that blow with patience and steadfastness, and the natural conflict between tyranny and freedom renewed and ended with the deposition of Sultan Abdülhamid.

(...) However, Abdülhamid, who was naturally inclined towards tyranny, did not like to see his nation enjoying freedom, advancing to the peak of perfection, organizing its affairs itself, and establishing justice. His soul prompted him to create that reactionary sedition to undermine the structures of the constitutional administration. If the hero of freedom and the commander of the Fida'i Army, Mahmud Şevket Pasha, and the heroes of freedom, Niyazi Bey and Enver Bey, had not reached Istanbul at that time, his will would have been fulfilled, and the efforts of the Committee of Union and Progress, which had struggled for freedom for thirty years, would have been in vain.

The general assembly met in a secret session and deposed Abdülhamid based on a fatwā from the Shaykh al-Islām, which read:

If Zayd, who is the Imam of the Muslims, habitually removes some important legal issues from the legal books, prevents some of these books, tears some of them, burns some of them, wastes and squanders the treasury, and spends it without legal justification, and kills, imprisons, exiles, and banishes the subjects without a legitimate reason, and commits all other kinds of injustices, then claims that he has repented and promised Allāh and swore that he would improve his condition, then breaks his oath and creates a great sedition that makes all the affairs of the Muslims disrupted, and persists in fighting, and the ability of the Muslims to remove the dominance of the aforementioned Zayd is established, and successive news comes from the sides of the Muslim lands that they consider him deposed, and his remaining becomes a certain harm and his removal a probable good, then is one of the two things obligatory: his deposition or his being charged with abdicating the Imamate and Sultanate, according to what the people of authority and decision choose from these two aspects? The answer: It is obligatory. Written by the poor servant, al-Sayyid Muhammad Diya' al-Din, may he be forgiven.

When this honorable fatwā was read to the notables and deputies, Said Pasha, the president of the notables who was chairing the session, asked them, "Do you choose his deposition or his being charged with abdicating?" They answered with one voice, "Deposition... deposition."

This is the translation of the decision of this general assembly, composed of notables and deputies: Tuesday, the seventh of Rabi' al-Thani, 1327 AH, and the 14th of Nisan, 1325 AH / April 27, 1909 CE.

The legal fatwā signed by the signature of Shaykh al-Islām Muhammad Diya' al-Din Effendi was read in the general assembly composed of deputies and notables. The aspect of deposition, which is one of the two aspects to choose between, was unanimously favored. Sultan Abdülhamid Khan was removed from the Islamic Caliphate and the Ottoman Sultanate. Crown Prince Mehmed Reşad Effendi was ascended to the position of Caliphate and Sultanate with the name Sultan Mehmed Khan V.

[End of Farid Bey's words. The summary from his book ends here with significant adaptation.]

But the truth was different from what this lawyer of the Committee of Union and Progress claimed. In short, it was that: the Jews and the issue of Palestine and the colonial powers' plundering of the Islamic world were the main reasons behind the deposition of Sultan Abdülhamid.

Shaykh Abdullah Azzam wrote in his very important book, The Line of Historical Transformation:

Most of the major events that took place in the Islamic region – particularly the Arab region – were aimed at the great goal that Herzl and the Jews behind him set their sights on, which was to reach the Promised Land. There was a formidable obstacle before the Jews that could not be overcome, which was the Ottoman state, headed by Sultan Abdülhamid II, who ruled between 1876 and 1909.

The Jews first tried to tempt the righteous Sultan Abdülhamid. Sultan Abdülhamid came to the Caliphate at a time when Freemasonry was almost strangling the state. Midhat Pasha – the "father of the liberals" as they call him – or more accurately in our view, the "father of Freemasonry at that time" – I say, he managed to depose two Caliphs and kill Sultan Abdülaziz, the uncle of Sultan Abdülhamid. He stipulated to Sultan Abdülhamid, before he came to power, that he declare the constitution (i.e., the Western secular constitution in which Jews and Christians are equal to Muslims). Sultan Abdülhamid was a cunning, intelligent personality who was proud of his Lord, so he accepted. After he came to power, he arrested Midhat Pasha and imprisoned him in Taif. Finally, Midhat was killed in prison in a clever way, which aroused the anger of the world, which is moved by Freemasonry, against Sultan Abdülhamid. However, Midhat's disciples continued to plot revenge against Sultan Abdülhamid.

Let us return to Herzl, who, after the end of the Basel Congress in 1897, went to meet Sultan Abdülhamid, taking with him the Rabbi of Constantinople (Moses Levi). They offered the Sultan offers, including:

1. Establishing an Ottoman fleet.

2. Supporting the Ottomans' policy in the world.
3. Jewish assistance to the Sultan in improving his [state's] financial situation.
4. Establishing an Ottoman university in Jerusalem.

Herzl said, "For example, if His Majesty agreed and sold us the lands that have no owners in Palestine at the price he estimates." The Sultan became angry and said: "The lands of the homeland are not for sale. The countries that were acquired with blood are not sold except for the same price."

Herzl did not despair and met the Sultan a second time in 1901. This time, they offered the Sultan himself 150 million English gold pounds. He said, "If you paid the fill of the earth in gold – I would not accept this from you in any definitive way. I have served the Islamic Ummah and the Muhammadan community for more than thirty years. I will not blacken the pages of the Muslims, my fathers and grandfathers from the Ottoman Sultans and Caliphs."

The meeting this time was with Qarah Sū, the Jewish Masonic lawyer who supervised the Salonika lodge.

Some sources reported that the Sultan shouted at Herzl, "Get out of my face, you scoundrel!" and shouted at the chamberlain who let him in, saying, "Did you not know what this pig wanted from me?"

Herzl flew with Qarah Sū to Italy, and Qarah Sū sent a telegram to the Sultan:

You will pay the price for this meeting with your life and your throne.

Herzl says in his memoirs: Sultan Abdülhamid advised me not to take any further steps in this direction because he could not give up a single inch of the land of Palestine, as it is not his property, but rather belongs to his Islamic nation, which fought for it and watered the soil with the blood of its sons.... Abdülhamid said: "The work of the scalpel in my body is easier for me than to see Palestine cut off from my empire." Then he said: Save your money, Herzl, for when Abdülhamid goes, you will take Palestine for free.

After this, the Jews decided to overthrow Abdülhamid: In 1904, they blew up a carriage in front of the mosque where the Sultan prayed the Friday prayer. Allāh saved him from death, and many people were killed.

The Masons conspired to remove him, and Freemasonry pushed its agents to occupy the highest positions in the state, such as Talat Pasha, Enver Pasha – Minister of War – Aristidi Pasha – a Greek who became Minister of Public Works, Cemal Pasha – Governor of Syria – Mustafa Kemal Pasha, commander of the Arab Eastern Front in World War I, Cavid Pasha – Minister of Finance.

Hussein Jahid Yalshin was one of the members of the three-member reconciliation committee (American, French, and Turkish) between the Arabs and the Jews. The Sultan found himself day after day surrounded by men bought by Freemasonry through the "Committee of Union and Progress", and his grip gradually weakened until they were able to force him to declare the constitution. The Chamber of Deputies (Parliament) was established, which was entered by the Jew, the Christian, and the Muslim, and Qarah Sū came to the Chamber of Deputies.

The declaration of the constitution was a victory for the Christians and Jews in the whole world, so much so that the Christian Jurji Zaydan – Dar al-Hilal – dedicated his book The Ottoman Coup to the "heroes" who declared the constitution in 1908. Then the Masons were able to move the army under the leadership of Mahmud Shawkat – an Arab – unfortunately – and the parliament met to extract a decision to overthrow the Sultan. The fingers of Nahum Haim (Rabbi of Constantinople) were prominent in the matter, and the book of deposition was presented to Sultan Abdülhamid by three people:

1. Qarah Sū.

2. Aristidi Pasha.
3. Arif Hikmet, whose mother was a servant in the Sultan's palace. The Sultan took this son of hers – Arif – and enrolled him in the navy until he became an aide-de-camp in the navy.

The removal of Sultan Abdülhamid from the Caliphate was in April 1909. This was the greatest stab in the back of Islam. On that night when Sultan Abdülhamid descended from the seat of government, we can say that:

Actual Islam was removed from existence and visibility, and Palestine — truly — fell into the hands of the Jews

Enver Pasha – one of the poles of Freemasonry and the coup against Sultan Abdülhamid – said to Cemal Pasha, *"Do you know, Cemal, what our sin is?

We did not know Sultan Abdülhamid, so we became a tool in the hands of Zionism, and global Freemasonry bought us. We exerted our efforts for Zionism, so this is our real sin."*

Bernard Lewis says: The Freemasons and Jews secretly cooperated to remove Sultan Abdülhamid because he was a strong opponent of the Jews. He strongly refused to give any inch of land to the Jews in Palestine.

(Al-Dhakhā'ir al-‘Izām / p: 921)

Turkey After Sultan Abdülhamid

The wronged Sultan Abdülhamid fell due to Jewish Freemasonry, and Turkey began to be run by (the Young Turk Association, and the Committee of Union and Progress), which became a toy in the hands of Freemasonry. The Turkish nationalism that the Committee of Union and Progress called for was in the hands of the Jews.

Thus, calamities followed one another in Turkey. The Caliphate was weak, played with by the Committee of Union and Progress – the nationalist advocates – who were secular, not religious, and the Masonic lodges spread like wildfire. Debts accumulated, and behind all this were the Jewish fingers that designed the overthrow of Turkey to reach the Promised Land.

Sultan Mehmed Reşad Khan V (1909 - 1918 CE)

Sultan Reşad was installed, and on April 27, 1909, Sultan Reşad was crowned with the name Sultan Mehmed V.

He had spent most of his life in the Zincirlikuyu Palace until the Ottoman coup against Sultan Abdülhamid.

Sultan Reşad remained confined in his palace while the military and politicians of the Committee of Union and Progress played with the fate of the Caliphate.

These criminals involved the Ottoman Caliphate during his reign in entering World War I alongside Germany against the Allies. His Crown Prince was Prince Vahdeddin. Sultan Mehmed V died before the end of the war in 1918.

Sultan Mehmed VI (Vahdeddin) (1918 - 1924)

He succeeded Sultan Mehmed V and remained likewise confined in his palace, while the Allies controlled the capabilities of the Caliphate and cut its limbs to pieces under the supervision of the British, the conspiracies of the Jews, and the implementation of the Masons. As we will see, the conspiracies highlighted Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. Turkey emerged shattered from World War I, and the major powers divided the inheritance of the "sick man"! as they called Turkey. Europe was relieved of this terrible ghoul that had been disturbing its sleep for centuries.

Mustafa Kemal came after his defeat on his front in the Arab East, and his personality emerged as a military leader through some theatrical military clashes with Greece. Pens began to highlight him.

Indeed, the major powers (especially Britain) arranged with Mustafa Kemal and stipulated conditions on him in the Treaty of Lausanne (1922), where he was represented by Ismet İnönü. Curzon – the British Foreign Secretary at the time – stipulated four conditions:

1. Abolishing the Caliphate in Turkey.
2. Crushing any attempt to restore the Caliphate.
3. Fighting Islamic rituals.
4. Adopting a Western law for life in Turkey instead of Islamic Sharī'ah.

Mustafa Kemal accepted these conditions, and the Allied forces withdrew from Turkey. When the British House of Commons stood against Curzon, who agreed to withdraw the Allied forces from Turkey, saying, "Turkey will return again to occupy Europe" he said: "Rest assured. Turkey will never rise again after we have stripped it of Islam and the Caliphate".

Mustafa Kemal first pretended to be a monk, and a picture of Mustafa Kemal appears wearing the clothes of scholars on Eid al-Adha, carrying a long rosary, and urging people to perform Islamic rituals. Days passed, and Mustafa Kemal gathered the scholars and consulted them about separating religion from the state (like the church). The scholars denounced this plan, so he wiped heads and necks and killed a large number of scholars. He declared the abolition of the Caliphate in 1924, and people mourned it. People rushed to install a Caliph for them, even if the Caliph was the King of Egypt – yet Britain refused – that this mere theoretical, artificial image-name should return.

Thus, Sultan (Mehmed VI) was the last Ottoman Caliph and the last to be called Caliph in the history of Islam and Muslims until now. No Islamic Caliphate has been established to this day. Thus, the Committee of Union and Progress came to power and was relieved of the terrible ghoul that had long disturbed its sleep and kept it awake (Abdülhamid). Islamic Turkey became a puppet in the hands of the Jews, who moved it as they pleased and as they wanted. Its provinces became a sanctuary for the Western wolves, the enemies of Islam, and this mighty giant (the Ottoman state) was eaten piece by piece.

So the West first swallowed the Balkan states of Austria, Hungary, Bosnia, and Herzegovina in October 1908 (i.e., after the Committee of Union and Progress took over the reins of power), and only two months after the declaration of the constitution. Bulgaria seceded, and Italy attacked Libya in the fall of 1911. Then the Balkan War broke out in 1912. In these few years, the Ottoman state lost all its provinces in Europe (except for Eastern Thrace). It lost the part of Libya that consisted of the provinces of Tripoli and Benghazi - Turkey withdrew from Libya in a blatant conspiracy of betrayal that is not hidden from anyone with eyes. We must not forget to mention that the Italian Jews were the Masonic lodges in Salonika, and the meetings of the Committee of Union and Progress were held in the homes of these Italian Jews. So it is not surprising that the Committee of Union and Progress gave Libya as a modest gift to Italy as a token of gratitude for their previous great favor.

[Nor do I forget to add to the account of the martyred Shaykh the news of Gaddafi's government inviting the Speaker of the Knesset — a Libyan Jew — for an official visit to Libya in November 2004, after Atatürk of Libya (i.e., Gaddafi) had already thrown open the country's doors to the Americans, Europeans, and Jews, and had willingly handed over Libya's heavy weaponry aboard ships to American bases several months prior!]

In addition to this loss, Crete was lost, and Turkey's budget was burdened by military expenses.

The war against rituals began in Turkey. The call to prayer (Adhān) in Arabic was banned, and Sharī'ah dress was prohibited. Mustafa Kemal's security men tore women's clothes in the streets, and the head covering for women was forbidden. The Keffiyeh and Agal (because the Arabs wear them) were forbidden for men, and wearing a hat was imposed on men. Reading the Qur'ān in Arabic was forbidden, and he ordered its translation into Turkish. Kemal turned the Hagia Sophia Mosque into a museum. Mosques became deserted, prayer niches emptied, and minarets became silent. People missed the youth from the path of Islam. Meeting over the Book of Allāh in the mosque became a crime punishable by law. Knowledge and Fiqh lessons disappeared from the mosques. Scholars vanished before him under the ground, killed, or stayed in their homes. Fools advanced, and the Ruwaybidāt (ignorant and foolish people who speak about public affairs) spoke, as stated in the Hadith:

"Before the Dajjāl, there will be years of deception, in which the trustworthy will be betrayed, and the traitor will be trusted, the truthful will be disbelieved, and the liar will be believed. The Wu'ul will perish, and the Tuḥūt will appear." It was said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what are the Wu'ul and what are the Tuḥūt?" He said, "The Wu'ul are the noble people, and the Tuḥūt are those who were underfoot, unnoticed."

Abu Hurairah narrated in a Marfū' Hadith: "The Hour will not come until obscenity and miserliness appear, the trustworthy is betrayed, the traitor is trusted, the Wu'ul perish, and the Tuḥūt appear." They said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what are the Tuḥūt and the Wu'ul?" He said, "The Wu'ul are the faces of the people and their nobles, and the Tuḥūt are those who were under the feet of the people, unnoticed."

In another authentic Hadith narrated by al-Ṭabarānī from ‘Awf ibn Mālīk in a Marfū‘ Hadith: “I fear for you six things: the rule of fools, bloodshed, the sale of judgment, breaking of kinship ties, youth who take the Qur’ān as musical instruments, and the abundance of police.”

Mustafa Kemal continued the war on Islam until the end of his life, and Turkey was shattered in all fields and retreated in every arena.

The Most Important Direct Internal Causes that Led to the Fall of the Caliphate

First: The Spread of Nationalist Calls

Especially the call of Turkish (Turanian) nationalism and Arab nationalism. The Masons and Jews supervised the revival and fueling of fanaticism and division between the followers of the two main national groups that made up the Ottoman state.

Turkish Nationalism

The first seeds of Turkish nationalism were sown inside the military academy in Istanbul with the German military professors who came to the college to train the Turks, who were in need of a strong army trained in modern means of power and military fighting methods, especially since Turkey was fighting the whole world, which was shooting at it from one bow. A German military mission arrived in 1883, headed by Colonel von der Goltz, and he remained working for about thirteen years, during which the seed of nationalism was sown.

As for the second factor in the emergence of Turanian nationalism, it was the migration of Hungarian and Polish refugees to Turkey after the failure of their revolution in 1848. These refugees embraced Islam and became part of the influential class in the state. Among them was Constantine Borzęcki, who later called himself Mustafa Celaledin Pasha. This man was the head of the nationalist serpent that transmitted its poison to the minds and souls of the Turks. Bernard Lewis says:

Borzęcki worked to transfer Polish nationalism and put it in a Turkish mold. He was helped in this work by what he presented of the works of Western orientalists researching Turkish affairs, which had an important impact on appreciating ancient Turkish history and the belief in a distinct identity.

We must not forget to mention again that the Committee of Union and Progress were all Masons (global Jews), and that the Jews of Salonika were the driving force behind this committee and were inside it. We return once again to mention the words of Stoddard: "The prominent fact in the formation of the Committee of Union and Progress is that it is neither Turkish nor Islamic." It overthrew Abdülhamid, Turkey, and Islam.

This call for Turkish nationalism had a bad effect reflected in the souls of the Islamic peoples who were subject to Ottoman sovereignty. They began to demand independence and form secret societies to fight Turkey, especially after the shameful and strange behavior that the Committee of Union and Progress followed. At the head of these peoples were the Arabs, who took this behavior as a justification for standing alongside Britain against the Turks in the Great Arab Revolt led by Sharif Hussein, which had dire consequences for the Islamic world.

Stoddard wrote:

The prominent fact in the formation of the Committee of Union and Progress is that it is neither Turkish nor Islamic. Since its establishment, not a single member of pure Turkish origin has appeared among its leaders and leaders. Enver Pasha is the son of a Polish convert, and Cavid was from the Jewish sect known as (Dönme). Kraso was from the Spanish Jews living in the city of Salonika. Talat Pasha was of Gypsy origin who embraced Islam as a religion. As for Ahmed Rıza, one of their leaders in that period, he was half-Gypsy, in addition to being a follower of Comte's philosophical school.

Stoddard adds that the masterminds behind the movement were Jews or Muslims of Jewish origin, and the financial support came to them through the (Dönme) and the wealthy Jews of Salonika.... They also received financial aid from international – or quasi-international – capitalism from Vienna, Budapest, Berlin, Paris, and London.

Herbert Aubrey says:

“The Jews of Salonika were Jews and known as the Dönme — meaning apostates — true partners in the Turkish revolution. These people were of Jewish ethnicity, though their beliefs might not have been traditionally Jewish. The common perception among the public was that they were Muslims in name, but in practice, followers of the Torah of Moses. At the time we are discussing, no one among the general populace knew anything about them, except for a few scholars specialized in Near Eastern studies. No one dared to predict that this sect of Judaism, known as the Dönme, would play a central role in a revolution that had such serious consequences in the course of history.”

Toynbee says:

The officers in Hamidian Turkey were the only class that was able to open a permanent intellectual window through which Western influences could penetrate in 1908. After thirty years of dark tyrannical rule, the new Turkish generation of soldiers was the spearhead of the attack of Western liberalism on Turkey.

Document of the British Ambassador in Istanbul (Lowther) in 1910 on the Relationship between the Committee of Union and Progress and the Jews and Freemasonry

This secret document is originally a very secret letter sent by the British Ambassador in Constantinople (Sir Gerard Lowther) on May 29, 1910, to the British Foreign Secretary (Sir C. Hardinge). It contains accurate information about the relationship between the "Committee of Union and Progress" and the Jews and Freemasonry.

This secret document was recently declassified in Britain, and it was published by the Kuwaiti magazine "Al-Mujtama" starting from December 25, 1978, in issues 425-429, quoting the Iraqi magazine "Afaq." We quote from it the most important parts:

- In the city of Salonika (a Greek city then under Ottoman rule), there are one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, eighty thousand of whom are Jews of Spanish origin (i.e., they fled from Spain), and twenty thousand are Jews from the tribe of Levi or Jews pretending to be Muslims, who are called (Dönmeh Jews).
- Most of the Spanish Jews have Italian citizenship, and they are Freemasons belonging to Italian lodges. They therefore enjoy the immunity granted to foreigners in the Ottoman state against pursuit and search.
- The Jew (Qarah Sū) established a few years ago in Salonika - in cooperation with Italian Freemasonry - the Macedonia Risorta lodge and convinced the Young Turks, officers and civilians, to join Freemasonry. His goal is to impose Jewish influence on the new situation in Turkey.
- It appears that the planners of the Young Turk movement in Salonika were primarily Jews.
- Shortly after the 1908 revolution, it became known that a large number of its leaders were Freemasons.
- All Jews were enthusiastic supporters of the new era.

- Every Jew became a spy for the Committee of Union and Progress.
- People began to say that the movement was more Jewish than Turkish.
- Italy appointed the Jew (Primo Levi) as Consul General in Salonika, and the United States appointed (Oscar Straus) as its ambassador in Constantinople. Straus was a Jew.
- The Dönme Jewish Colonel (Ramzi Bey) was the commander of the four regiments sent specifically from Salonika to Constantinople. He was appointed Chief of Staff of Sultan (Mehmed V). When Sultan (Abdülhamid) was deposed and imprisoned in Salonika, Ramzi Bey's brother was appointed to supervise the Sultan in his prison.
- The Ninth Zionist Congress held in Hamburg in December 1909 declared that the division of Jews into Zionists and advocates of emigration to areas other than Palestine had ended thanks to the (miracle of the Turkish revolution), meaning that Palestine was undoubtedly guaranteed.
- After Abdülhamid was deposed, martial law was declared for two years, and most of the officers in the martial courts were Freemasons.
- The Director of Publications in the state is a Jew from Salonika and has the authority to stop any newspaper.
- The telegraph news agency - which presents the Unionists' view of internal and external events - is directed by a Jew from Baghdad.
- The head of the main branch of the Committee of Union and Progress in Constantinople is a Jew from Salonika.
- The General Security Directorate in the state is in the hands of a Freemason from Salonika.

- In Macedonia and Constantinople, twelve new Masonic lodges appeared during the past year (1909).
- Officials and others - with important positions - were made to understand that their positions and livelihoods depended on their joining Masonic lodges.
- To tighten the committee's grip on the army, a large number of officers - especially those of lower ranks - were entered into a Masonic lodge called (Resne), the town of (Niyazi Bey). The lodge is headed by his brother, Captain (Osman Fahmi Bey).
- Most of the committee's deputies in the Chamber of Deputies and notables in the lodge called (Constitution) entered Freemasonry. Among its senior leaders was (Talat Bey).
- Opposition deputies, especially Arabs, began to establish their own lodges, such as (Ottoman Brotherhood Lodge) (Friends of Freedom), or join existing lodges.
- Freemasonry spread among the Bektashi sect.
- In the period between 1909 and 1910, the following Masonic lodges were established: (Eastern Loyalty, Renaissance of Byzantium, Intimate Friends of Union and Progress, Truth, Homeland Renaissance, and a branch of the (Renaissance of Macedonia) lodge, Dawn). It seems that all these Masonic lodges - like the network of Masonic lodges in Salonika and Macedonia - were led or planned by Jews.
- The Egyptian Prince Said Halim, his brother Prince Abbas Halim, and Prince Aziz Hassan are Freemasons.
- Idris Bey Ragheb - the Grand Master of the Egyptian Grand Lodge - is the founder and dominator of a number of Masonic lodges in Egypt, Syria, Palestine, and Lebanon.

- A large number of Roman Catholics in Lebanon are Freemasons.
- Muhammad Orfi Pasha founded a number of Masonic lodges in Egypt, Jerusalem, and southern Syria.
- Yusuf Bey al-Sakakini is one of the leaders of the Masons.
- The Egyptian national leader (Muhammad Farid) is a senior Freemason appointed as a representative in Egypt for the Grand Orient of Ottoman and the installation ceremony was held in a Masonic lodge in (Tanta).
- Haim Nahum, the new Grand Rabbi of the Jewish community in Turkey, was a classmate of a number of prominent members of the Committee of Union and Progress.
- Talat and Cavid represent the peak of Freemasonry in Turkey, and of course, Cavid is a Jew.
- Since Talat became Minister of the Interior - about a year ago - he has worked to spread the Masonic network in all regions of the state and has assigned senior positions in the provinces to Freemasons.
- Lowther said: It is clear from this that the secret government of Turkey is the Grand Orient Masonic lodge, headed by the Grand Master (Talat Bey).
- Freemasonry extends its activity from Turkey to Iran. The Masonic Committee of Union and Progress is behind the coup that took place in Iran, and there is talk now about starting to establish the Grand Orient Masonic lodge in Iran, and (Farajullah Khan), the Chargé d'Affaires of the new Iranian embassy in Constantinople, has recently joined Freemasonry.
- Jews are very interested in maintaining their absolute influence in the Council of Ministers of the new Turkey.

- Jews are very interested in igniting the flame of division and discord between the Turks and the occupying enemies of the Jews.
- Jewish financiers welcome the provision of loans to the new regime in Turkey in exchange for economic gains.
- Jews have enormous influence in the European press.
- Jews are striving to achieve the supreme goals of Israel in the future.
- The Jews have tightened their control over these young Turks.
- Jews finance the newspaper (Young Turk) and a number of other newspapers in Constantinople.
- European financiers - most of whom are Jews - are now providing Turkey with the required amounts.
- The Masonic Committee of Union and Progress encourages Jewish and Armenian revolutionaries to stir up unrest and instability in Tsarist Russia.
- Members of the Committee of Union and Progress imitate the French Revolution in their methods, under the guidance of the Jews.
- Jews encourage the Turks to meet with the Hungarians (Magyars) out of Turanian nationalism, because the Hungarians are of Turanian origin. All this information was obtained from local Freemasons in complete secrecy.

End of the document of the British Ambassador (Lowther), which he wrote in 1910.

Second: The Great Arab Revolt

Sharif Hussein's standing alongside Britain in World War I against the Ottoman Caliphate, after the British deceived him and made him believe that they would help him establish an Arab Caliphate in the Arabian Peninsula, Syria, and Iraq.

Sharif Hussein was looking for an opportunity to get rid of Turkish rule, especially since he felt that the Unionists in 1914 wanted to get rid of him. Abdullah, son of Sharif Hussein (the grandfather of the deceased King Hussein, and the father of the current King Abdullah, a descendant of British collaboration and successive betrayals), was then a deputy in the Turkish parliament.

Abdullah bin Hussein contacted Kitchener (the British High Commissioner in Egypt) and Ronald Storrs, the Oriental Secretary at the British Residency, and informed him of the strong aversion between his father and the Turks. He asked him about the possibility of Britain standing by the Sharif if the Sharif declared war on Turkey, but he did not receive any encouragement from them. Kitchener said: "It is unlikely that Britain will stand by your father."

[Prince Abdullah himself was a member of a secret society, and he believed in the benefits of Anglo-Arab alliance and was enthusiastic about it.]

World War I broke out in August 1914, and Abdullah was enthusiastic about declaring war on Turkey, while his brother Prince Faisal believed in standing with it [Turkey].

In 1915, Faisal visited Damascus and Istanbul, and in Damascus, he joined the "Al-Arabiya al-Fatat" (Young Arab) society and swore to support it.

Sharif Hussein declared war on Turkey on Monday, June 5, 1916. (Subhān Allāh! The Arab defeat on June 5 was on Monday, 1967!)

From the side of the grave of Hamza bin Abdul Muttalib - may Allāh be pleased with him - in Medina, he declared war after Britain promised him the independence of the Arab countries and his coronation as king over them. Kitchener had become the British Minister of War, and McMahon took over as British High Commissioner in Egypt. The well-known correspondence took place between him and McMahon (Hussein-McMahon correspondence), and they promised him the kingship of the Arab countries after their independence.

Sharif Hussein exerted all his energy to fuel Arab fervor against the Turks. The Turks were defeated, and the Sykes-Picot Agreement took place to divide the Arab countries between Britain and France, and Palestine was given to the Jews by the Balfour Declaration of 1917. The beautiful part for Sharif Hussein was that Britain exiled him for six years and robbed him of his kingdom! The shock was so violent to Sharif's nerves that he was struck by paralysis, and his body melted with grief and pain. He poured out his wrath for the rest of his life on McMahon and Lloyd George - the well-known British minister.

George Antonius says:

"I visited him a few months before his death in the year 1931. Paralysis had withered him, and his once-handsome face had turned pale with the pallor of death... He said to me: 'The English, my son, are an honorable people — in word and deed, in good times and bad: honorable! Except for His Excellency the esteemed and valiant Lloyd George — he is more like an acrobat... or a fox. I say: a fox! — with all due respect. May God have mercy on His Excellency Kitchener!'"

This was the sad and painful result of cooperation with the British. And Allāh the Great spoke the truth:

{ "O you who have believed, if you obey those who disbelieve, they will turn you back on your heels, and you will [then] become losers." } (Al-Imran: 149)

Some sincere and wise people warned Sharif Hussein of the consequences of the British treachery and this expected tragedy. Prince Arslan wrote to the Sharif when he heard of his intention to invade Syria with the Allied armies, saying: Will you have Arabs fight Arabs, O Prince?! So that the fruit of the bloodshed — of both killer and slain — ends up being Britain's takeover of the Arabian Peninsula, France's seizure of Syria, and the Jews' control of Palestine?!

Lawrence says in his book Seven Pillars of Wisdom: I knew that if we won the war, our promises to the Arabs would become dead papers. If I were an honest advisor to the Arabs, I would advise them to go back to their homes. The leaders of the Arab movement understood foreign policy in a tribal, Bedouin way. Britain and the French were making bold maneuvers based on the naivety of the Arabs, their weakness, the simplicity of their hearts and thinking, and they have confidence in the enemy... I am most proud that English blood was not shed in the thirty battles I fought, because all the countries subject to us were not worth in my opinion the death of one Englishman!

Weizmann says: Lawrence provided us with great services.

This is the famous spy Lawrence, who they used to call - Lawrence of Arabia and nicknamed him: The Uncrowned King of the Arabs!

Comparison between Turkish Nationalism and Arab Nationalism

Turanian (Turkish) and Arab nationalism focused on several important things, including:

- The purpose of both was to eliminate Muslim Turkey, and Sultan Abdülhamid in particular.
- Both nationalisms began at approximately the same time, although Arab nationalism slightly preceded Turanian nationalism.
- Both nationalisms were secular, agreeing to exclude Islam from life.

- Both nationalisms arose in foreign incubators. Arab nationalism arose in American incubators and at the American University, while Turanian nationalism arose in Jewish Masonic lodges supervised by Spanish, Polish, and Italian Jews.
- The early pioneers of both calls were not originally Muslims, nor from the race they were calling for nationalism! For example, Borzęcki, who called himself Mustafa Celaledin - of Polish origin - worked to transfer Polish nationalism and pour it into a Turkish mold. Since the establishment of the Committee of Union and Progress, not a single one of its leaders and leaders appeared to be of pure Turkish origin! Enver Pasha was a Polish convert, Cavid was from the Jewish sect (Dönme), Kraso (from the Spanish Jews) in Salonika, Talat Pasha was of Gypsy origin, and Ahmed Rıza was half Circassian and half Hungarian and influenced by the philosopher Comte!
- The early pioneers of Arab nationalism were all non-Muslims! From Butrus al-Bustani, Nasif and his son Ibrahim al-Yaziji, al-Shidyaq, Adib Ishaq, Naqqash, Shmayyel, Taql, Sarruf, Zaydan, Nimr, Mashaqah..., all of these were absolutely Christians! Then came the twentieth century, and among their leaders were: Zaki al-Arsuzi (a Turkmen Nusayri), Michel Aflaq (a Christian) whose wife was Jewish! They are the leaders of the Ba'ath Party. Antun Saadeh and George Abd al-Masih, from the leaders of the Syrian National Party, are Christians! And George Habash - one of the leaders of the Arab nationalists as well!

Cardinal Bertoli says to the Pope: Christianity in the East is what planted the revolutionary movements and movements of change, and names like Michel Aflaq, Antoine Saadeh, and George Habash may explain to you what I mean!

- Jewish-Masonic fingers were moving the vanguards of both movements. The first five who established the (Beirut Secret Society) were all Masons. Likewise, those who called for Turanian nationalism were Masons.
- Arab nationalism was influenced by American theories, and Turanian nationalism was influenced by the French Revolution. Philip Hitti - one of the historians and philosophers of Arab nationalism - says: (It was the result of the friction between the Syrian mentality and Western intellectual production that the principles of comprehensive Arab nationalism were born, and it drew its inspiration mostly from American theories, unlike Turkish nationalism, which came later than Arab nationalism and drew its inspiration from the principles of the French Revolution).
- Jewish fingers were prominent in Turkish nationalism, and Jews still strive to link Arabs to their nationalism.

Aba Eban - who was the Foreign Minister of Israel - says in a lecture at Princeton University in America: Some Arab leaders are trying to assess the extent of the Islamic resurgence after the recent defeat (1967), and that represents a real danger to Israel. Therefore, one of our foremost duties is to ensure that the Arabs remain firmly convinced of their national (ethnic) identity — not their Islamic one.

Mustafa Kemal Destroys Turkey and Abolishes the Caliphate

Atatürk was born in 1880 in the city of Salonika, which - as we have seen - is a (Greek-Jewish) city, where 140,000 people live, including 80,000 Spanish Jews and 20,000 Dönme Jews (i.e., those who pretend to be Muslims).

Mustafa Kemal is officially attributed to Ali Rıza and his mother Zübeyde, and thick doubts surround his lineage. Mustafa does not recognize his father, Ali Rıza, and it is said that his parents' origin is from Albania.

Mustafa Kemal reviewed the civil registry in Salonika and dropped the paternity record from him.

It is said that Zübeyde became pregnant with him out of wedlock from a person named Abdo Ağa because she was working in one of the brothels of Salonika. Atatürk was born not knowing the name of his grandfather on his mother's or father's side.

He joined a religious school, then his mother enrolled him in a modern school, and then he entered the military school in Salonika in 1893 CE. After four years, he graduated from the secondary military preparatory school in Monastir in the Balkans, where sedition against the Caliphate was raging.

With the help of his friends, he was transferred to Salonika in the summer of 1907 CE and appointed to the staff of the Third Army. There, he joined the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) and found stronger competitors within it, such as Enver Pasha and Talat Bey, leading to conflict between him and them. In 1908 CE, the Ottoman coup against Sultan Abdülhamid took place to declare the constitution (to establish equality between Jews, Christians, and Muslims). The movement succeeded, but Mustafa Kemal did not participate in it.

In the same year, 1908 CE, he was sent to Tripoli in Libya to sideline him. He later returned and participated in Mahmud Şevket's movement in 1909 CE to overthrow Sultan Abdülhamid, serving as a staff officer at the time, not the Chief of Staff.

In 1910 CE, he was sent to France to attend military drills. After returning from France, he was appointed supervisor of the officers' school. Filled with resentment towards the Unionists for ignoring him, they transferred him to command the 38th Infantry Division in Salonika.

Then Italy invaded Libya, and Mustafa was sent there and promoted to the rank of Binbaşı (Major).

Later, he was sent to the Levant in 1917 CE. He had reached the rank of Major General, i.e., Pasha, and became assistant commander of the Second Army. He was then appointed commander of the Palestine front.

In Palestine, the deal was struck with Allenby, the British commander who occupied Palestine. The British agreed with Mustafa Kemal for a withdrawal, allowing Allenby to enter smoothly and decisively strike the four Turkish armies after Allenby had been repulsed from the gates of Salt, defeated by Cemal Pasha, the commander of the Fourth Army.

The result of this betrayal was the shattering of Turkey forever. As for the outcome of the battle, it was a catastrophe: the number of prisoners was close to one hundred thousand soldiers, besides those killed by Druze and Armenian bullets.

After Allenby's victory, he came to Istanbul and requested the defeated Turkish state to appoint Mustafa Kemal as commander of the Sixth Army near Mosul, where British influence and the oil region were, to protect British interests and security there.

After the great defeat he inflicted on Turkey, and upon his return, Mustafa Kemal was in contact with the famous Reverend Frew, who was the head of British intelligence in Turkey.

Mustafa Kemal had a close relationship with Sultan Vahdeddin (Mehmed VI) because he was appointed as his military aide-de-camp in the spring of 1918 CE when Vahdeddin was still the Crown Prince. At that time, Mustafa Kemal expressed to Vahdeddin his hatred for the Committee of Union and Progress and showed righteousness and concern for Turkey's interests. The two quickly became close friends, and Mustafa became the Prince's soldier and confidant.

During the war, Sultan Mehmed Reşad (V) died, and Vahdeddin assumed the Caliphate. He brought Mustafa Kemal closer and elevated his status.

Then followed the staged plays of Mustafa Kemal's sweeping victories in Anatolia, especially at Sakarya, Afyon, and Izmir, which turned Mustafa Kemal into a phenomenon praised by poets, even prompting Ahmed Shawqi to say:

Allāhu Akbar, how much wonder is in victory!

O Khalid of the Turks, renew the Khalid of the Arabs!

The play was completed with this enchanting direction that captivated minds. The British tightened the conditions imposed on the Caliph to make him appear helpless and weak, while they were lenient with Mustafa Kemal to make him appear as a unique hero.

Then the Allies pretended to sympathize with the Caliph and be angry with Mustafa Kemal. The British occupied Constantinople on March 16, 1920 CE, and the Allies asked the population to obey the orders issued by the Caliph, which led to increased resentment against him. In contrast, Eskişehir and Konya were evacuated by Allied forces under siege by Mustafa Kemal without the slightest skirmish, clearing Anatolia of Allied troops, while the people were dazzled by these victories.

During the same period, a fatwā was issued by the Shaykh al-Islām describing Mustafa Kemal and his group as infidels, further increasing the people's anger towards the Sultan and the Mufti.

Through secret treaties and hidden agreements with Atatürk, the Allies decided to evacuate Istanbul.

The Destructive Plan

This plan reveals the early close connection between Mustafa Kemal and the British and the Allies, and clearly shows you the secret behind promoting Mustafa Kemal and the withdrawal of the Allied armies.

His close friend and confidant, Müzhar Müfit Kansu, revealed this document in his memoirs, saying:

On July 7, 1919, near dawn, in Erzurum, Anatolia, Mustafa Kemal confided in me and stressed the need to keep the secret. He said: "This notebook will remain a secret until the end between me, you, and Süreyya (Şevket Süreyya Aydemir)."

After we assured him of keeping the secret, he said: "Then record the date first..." He said, so I recorded the date: July 7/8, 1919, near dawn. After seeing that I had recorded the date on the page, he said: "Good, write." Then he continued:

First: The Republic will be the form of government after victory. That is one.

Second: Necessary measures will be taken regarding the Sultan and the royal family when the appropriate time comes.

Third: Women will be unveiled.

Fourth: The fez will be abolished, and we will wear hats like other civilized nations.

Müzhar Müfit said: "Here, the pen fell from my hand involuntarily. I looked at him; he was looking at me. He said to me: 'Why did you stop?' I told him: 'I hope you won't hold it against me, Pasha, if I say that you have a fanciful side.' He said to me, laughing: 'Time will be the judge of that. As for you, write.' I continued writing."

Fifth: We will adopt the Latin alphabet... "Enough, Pasha, enough."

Then the destructive program was implemented. After implementing part of it, he hinted to Müzhar Müfit, saying: "My dear Mr. Müzhar Müfit, what is the number of the point we reached? Would you take a look at your notebook?"

On March 3, 1924 CE, the Caliphate was abolished:

Atatürk presented a decree stipulating:

- Abolition of the Caliphate and separation of religion from the state, and abolition of the old courts and their laws, which must be replaced by modern courts and laws.
- Schools for religious men must give way to non-religious government schools.

The National Assembly approved the law without debate. Two days later, Mustafa Kemal gathered the princes and princesses of the old regime and deported them abroad. The day before, he had issued an order expelling the Caliph.

Mustafa Kemal uprooted this towering edifice from its roots, this edifice that had remained a beacon for Muslims in the land of Turkey for five centuries. He tore down the Islamic banner under which Muslims had sought refuge for fourteen centuries. People scattered in different directions like sheep on a winter night. Wolves began to prey on these scattered groups, each sharpening its weapon and drawing its sword to slaughter whomever it wished, however it wished.

Atatürk remained loyal to the British until death, as he decided on his deathbed to recommend the British ambassador, Sir Percy Loraine, for the presidency of the Republic.

Document in which Mustafa Kemal recommends the British Ambassador Loraine for the Presidency of Turkey

We quote it verbatim from the Al-Ahram newspaper, which relayed it from the Sunday Times on Thursday, 16 Dhul-Qa'dah 1387 AH, corresponding to February 15, 1968, under the headline: "Kemal Atatürk summons the British Ambassador to succeed him in the presidency of the Turkish Republic."

The Sunday Times published one of the strangest pages of diplomatic history under the title: "How Our Man Refused to Rule Turkey?" The newspaper said:

In November 1938, Kemal Atatürk, President of Turkey, lay on his deathbed. For 15 years, Atatürk, with strict dictatorship, tried to drag Turkey, despite itself, into the twentieth century. He banned the fez and the hijab, shattered the authority of religion, and introduced the Turkish language system with Latin letters.

When Atatürk lay on his deathbed, he feared he would not find someone to succeed him capable of continuing the work he had begun. He summoned Ambassador Sir Percy Loraine, the British ambassador, to the presidential palace in Istanbul. What passed between them remained a secret for more than thirty years, and today it is revealed by Piers Dixon about the life of his father, Pierson Dixon. Among Dixon's papers was a telegram sent by Sir Percy Loraine to Lord Halifax, the Foreign Secretary. This telegram may be the strangest document in contemporary British history. In it, Loraine recounts the details of his unusual meeting with the dying dictator. Here is the document:

"When I arrived, I found His Excellency sitting up in bed, supported by pillows, surrounded by a doctor and nurses. As soon as I entered, he dismissed the doctor and the two nurses, saying he would ring the bell if he needed them. Then His Excellency began to speak slowly but very carefully. He told me that he had sent for me because he wanted to make an urgent request of me, hoping that I would give him a definitive answer.

Then the ambassador said: My friendship and advice to him were the only ones he cared about and valued more than any other advice because they were constant and unchanging. This was the reason he consulted me on multiple occasions... with complete freedom as if I were a minister in the Turkish cabinet. Then he said: It was within his powers (as President of the Republic) to choose his successor before his death, and it was his most sincere wish that I succeed him in the position of President. Therefore, he wanted to know my reaction to the proposal."

Then, after deep reflection, the ambassador apologized and thanked the agent [Atatürk], who appeared visibly moved and leaned back against the pillows.

A Brief Assessment of the Ottoman Caliphate State

The period of the Ottoman state can be divided into three phases:

1. Phase of Strength: Extends from its founding until the end of the reign of Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan III (1774 CE). The peak of the Ottoman state was during the reign of Sultan Selim I and his son Suleiman the Magnificent (1512 - 1566 CE).
2. Phase of Weakness and Retreat: Began from the reign of Sultan Abdülhamid Khan I (1774 CE), where the Sultanate paid tribute (Jizyah) for the first time in its life, to Russia (1777 CE), and acknowledged a number of privileges for the Christians of the Ottoman state and powers for foreign intervention in its affairs, until the end of the reign of Abdülmecid Khan (1861 CE).
3. Phase of Collapse, Jewish and Masonic Conspiracies, and the Fall of the Ottoman State: Begins from the reign of Sultan Abdülaziz Khan (1861 CE), who was deposed by the Mufti for his immorality, and ends with the deposition of Sultan Abdülhamid (1909 CE), followed by the takeover by the Masons, then Atatürk's overthrow and abolition of the Ottoman Caliphate, concluding with Sultan Mehmed VI in 1924.

Names of the Ottoman Caliphs and their Reign Durations:

First - Phase of Strength:

1. Sultan Osman I Ghazi, founder of the Ottoman State (1300 - 1326 CE) Sultan Ghazi Orhan I (1326 - 1362 CE)
2. Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan I (1362 - 1389 CE) Killed in the Battle of Kosovo (Serbia)
3. Sultan Ghazi Bayezid Khan I (1389 - 1402 CE) Died as a prisoner of Timur. (Ottoman Interregnum 1402-1413)
4. Sultan Mehmed Çelebi Ghazi (1413 - 1421 CE)
5. Sultan Murad Khan II (1421 - 1444 CE, 1446 - 1451 CE)
6. Sultan Ghazi Mehmed II Fatih (the Conqueror) of Constantinople (1444 - 1446 CE, 1451 - 1481 CE)
7. Sultan Ghazi Bayezid Khan II (1481 - 1512 CE) Deposed by the Janissaries.
8. Sultan Selim I Ghazi (1512 - 1520 CE)
9. Sultan Ghazi Suleiman Khan I (the Magnificent/Lawgiver) (1520 - 1566 CE)
10. Sultan Ghazi Selim Khan II (1566 - 1574 CE)
11. Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan III (1574 - 1595 CE)
12. Sultan Ghazi Mehmed Khan III (1595 - 1603 CE)
13. Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan I (1603 - 1617 CE)
14. Sultan Mustafa Khan I (1617 - 1618 CE, 1622 - 1623 CE) Deposed by the Mufti and Janissaries.
15. Sultan Osman Khan II (1618 - 1622 CE) Deposed and killed by the Janissaries.
16. Sultan Ghazi Murad Khan IV (1623 - 1640 CE)

17. Sultan Ghazi Ibrahim Khan I (1640 - 1648 CE) Deposed and killed.
18. Sultan Ghazi Mehmed Khan IV (1648 - 1687 CE) Deposed by the Mufti.
19. Sultan Ghazi Suleiman Khan II (1687 - 1691 CE)
20. Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan II (1691 - 1695 CE)
21. Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan II (1695 - 1703 CE) Deposed by the Janissaries.
22. Sultan Ghazi Ahmed Khan III (1703 - 1730 CE) Deposed by the Janissaries.
23. Sultan Ghazi Mahmud Khan I (1730 - 1754 CE)
24. Sultan Ghazi Osman Khan III (1754 - 1757 CE)
25. Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan III (1757 - 1774 CE).

Second - Phase of Weakness:

1. Sultan Ghazi Abdülhamid Khan I (1774 - 1789 CE)
2. Sultan Ghazi Selim Khan III (1789 - 1807 CE) Deposed by the Mufti.
3. Sultan Ghazi Mustafa Khan IV (1807 - 1808 CE) Deposed and imprisoned.
4. Sultan Ghazi Mahmud Khan II (1808 - 1839 CE)
5. Sultan Ghazi Abdülmecid Khan I (1839 - 1861 CE).

Third - Phase of Collapse and Death:

1. Sultan Ghazi Abdülaziz Khan (1861 - 1876 CE) Deposed by the Mufti.
2. Sultan Murad V (May 1876 - August 1876 CE) Deposed by conspirators.
3. Sultan Ghazi Abdülhamid Khan II (1876 - 1909 CE) Deposed by conspirators through Jewish intrigues.
4. Sultan Mehmed Reşad Khan V (1909 - 1918 CE)
5. Sultan Mehmed VI (Vahdeddin) (1918 - 1922 CE) [Caliphate formally abolished 1924, Sultan exiled 1922]: Overthrown by the Masons with Jewish, British, and European planning, executed by Atatürk. He was the last Ottoman Sultan and Caliph.

With him ended the designation of the Caliphate, which had lasted for approximately thirteen and a half centuries.

First: Positive Aspects of the Ottoman Caliphate State

Initially, it must be noted that most contemporary historical references that chronicled the Ottomans have wronged this glorious state, distorted its history, and the history of Muslims during its time. This is because most history writers after them were Orientalists, and their students among the descendants of Muslims, including Turks and Arabs, were hostile towards it. Most contemporary political and historical writers associated with Muslims are secularists and nationalists. Atatürk and his followers to this day have sequestered many important documents from the Ottoman state archives, especially concerning the final stage of its history when the Masons oversaw the state's downfall.

I remember that we studied in our Arab countries since childhood, in primary schools and subsequent stages of education, something about the history of that period under the title "Ottoman Occupation" !

When I studied in the History Department at Beirut University, we studied the curricula - developed by educators and writers according to the whims of the pharaohs of our countries, agents of the Jews and Christians - they taught us the history of those who conspired to overthrow it and collaborated with the infidels, the British and their allies, from the Arab nationalists and Masons, most of whom were Christians from the Levant, presenting them as heroes of Arab nationalism and martyrs of independence! They also presented those led by the English spy Lawrence as leaders of the Great Arab Revolt against the Ottoman occupation!

From here, we say that these histories must be read with suspicion and a method of scrutiny to distinguish the reality of the negatives in that state - I will mention the most important ones later - from the fabrications and distortions created by Orientalists and their agents among the secular apostates.

When we come to the positive aspects of the Ottoman Caliphate state

At the forefront comes the preservation of the title of the Islamic Caliphate, carrying the torch of protecting Muslims against the attacks of their enemies, and unifying most of their main kingdoms into one strong state, after the Caliphate had become a symbolic title in Egypt, where the Caliph did not even control his palace under the sultanate of the Mamluk state since the fall of Baghdad, and even before that when Turkish commanders controlled the resources of what remained of the Caliphate in Baghdad while dozens of independent kingdoms and emirates divided the map of the Arab and Islamic world.

Its second virtue was ending the Byzantine Roman state, and the echoes of the Adhān resounding in the capital of their kingdom (Constantinople), which became the city of Islam (Islambol). From it, the banners of conquest and Jihād emerged to introduce Islam into the entirety of Eastern Europe (Greece, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Serbia, Bosnia and Herzegovina), extending the state of Islam throughout the Balkans, reaching, as we saw in detail, central Austria, northern Italy, controlling all the Mediterranean islands, and collecting tribute and taxes from most of the great kings of Europe at the time.

As for their third virtue, the Ottomans considered themselves protectors of the Muslims, and the Ottoman Caliph considered the duty of protecting them a responsibility upon his neck. He defended the coasts of North Africa from Libya to Morocco, sent armies and reinforcements, led by his Minister of War, even to the lands beyond the river (Transoxiana) to defend Bukhara, Termez, and Tashkent! They repelled the Safavid attacks from Iraq, eastern Anatolia, and the Caucasus region. They expelled the Portuguese from the coasts of the Red Sea, the Arabian Sea, and the Indian Ocean.

The Ottoman state reached a peak of civilization, control, and power unparalleled by any Islamic state in its history. The Ottomans were able to demolish the walls of Constantinople with bombs weighing more than 2000 kilograms, firing them from the Asian shore over a distance of 2 kilometers! This was in the mid-fifteenth century! Ottoman fleets roamed the Mediterranean Sea and surrounding seas, sometimes attacking European fleets and ports with more than a thousand ships loaded with heavy cannons! Until its Ottoman Caliph (Sultan Abdülmecid I) in the eighteenth century could call the Mediterranean Sea: "an Ottoman lake." When an English journalist asked him, surprised by that name, saying: "If you consider the Mediterranean an Ottoman lake! Then what do you call the Black Sea, which your kingdom and armies surround?" He replied smiling: "That is the swimming pool of my palace on the shores of Islambol!"

As for the Red Sea, the Ottoman Turks—guardians of Islam—reverently referred to it as the "Sea of the Haram." They forbade Crusader ships, even civilian commercial vessels, from sailing through it, lest a cross should pass before the city of Jeddah and defile the waters that touch its sacred shores. Allāhu Akbar.

Yet today, from this very Jeddah, American warships—under the protection of the House of Saud—have launched cruise missiles toward Afghanistan and Baghdad, using the Sea of the Haram as their path of destruction. From these same shores, the House of Saud has filled the coastline with entertainment complexes and venues of immorality. Glory be to the One who changes conditions.

The Islamic identity of the Ottoman banner was evident, despite the innovations and deviations that afflicted them, as we will mention later. They revered the symbols of Allāh, were concerned with protecting the Two Holy Sanctuaries, spending on their service, and guarding the pilgrimage route. They also spread mosques in all the lands their authority reached, established endowments (awqāf), built Sufi lodges (takāyā) and various service facilities, and their monuments with their Turkish architectural character are still prominent witnesses in the east and west of Muslim lands.

At a time when Eastern Europe was the stage for most of their confrontations with Europe, as we saw, economic, commercial, and industrial life flourished due to their strength and the security and stability they imposed. Istanbul became the capital of the world, followed by the capitals of Egypt, the Levant, and the Hejaz, and the ports of the Arabian Peninsula and North Africa. Trade caravans moved along the ancient trade routes (the Spice Route, the Silk Road), transporting goods to and from those capitals, to be transported by Muslim ships to the shores of the Mediterranean, and even to European ports.

Second: Negative Aspects of the Ottoman Caliphate State

The first major criticism of the Turkish Sultans from the House of Osman is that, under their rule, man-made legislation was formally introduced into the governance of the Muslim world. This marked the first time in Islamic history that the processes of legislation, codification, and ruling by other than what Allāh had revealed were institutionalized within the political system. While earlier in history some corrupt kings, princes, and even a few Muslim caliphs may have attempted to circumvent divine law through trickery, evasion, or political maneuvering, none had dared to openly codify and legislate laws in place of the Sharīʿah—until the era of the Ottomans. This shift began, as we have seen, during the reign of Suleiman the Lawgiver (Qānūnī), and perhaps even slightly earlier during the time of Mehmed the Conqueror, if the reports regarding that are accurate. Over time, this trend deepened with the increasing weakness of the state and its growing admiration and fascination with Europe, born from frequent interaction and contact. This opened the door to Westernization, the erosion of Islamic identity, and ultimately, the moral and ideological corruption of the ruling elite—those who would later preside over the final decline of the Ottoman Empire.

The Sultans of the House of Osman share with their predecessors among the caliphs, kings, and princes of previous Islamic states and kingdoms most of the negatives that characterized the palaces of rule since the system of governance shifted from the Caliphate to hereditary monarchy (mulk 'aḍūḍ) and then coercive monarchy (mulk jabrī). Among these are:

- Conflict over kingship between sons and brothers. Frequent killings and depositions among brothers and those who rallied around each of them from the evil entourages. However, the Ottoman Sultans added to this a vice unprecedented by any contenders for the throne in the history of Muslims: the innovation of killing the Sultan's brothers upon his accession, eradicating all of them, even infants! This was under the pretext of avoiding the fitnah of rivals competing with the Caliph for the throne, which would corrupt the state and weaken it before its enemies! According to some historians, the Sultans found some human devils who issued fatwās for them, arguing that this had justification in the Almighty's saying "And fitnah is worse than killing"! So they committed the killing of brothers fearing the fitnah of disagreement and division!
- Interference of foreign mothers in palace conflicts. Making matters worse, many of them were daughters of infidel kings or chosen captives, including Russians, Serbs, Italians, who worked for the benefit of their homelands and competed with their sons' brothers for the position of Crown Prince.
- Extravagance, luxury, and excessive acquisition of palaces, furnishings, fine clothes, kitchens, and royal baths. I had the opportunity to visit some of these monuments in Istanbul, where the observer sees wonders upon wonders from the remnants of their legacy, the best of which were stolen during the Atatürk era.

- Favoritism, oppression of subjects, and excessive taxes and duties imposed by tax farmers and those in charge of public affairs. This increased in the later stages of the state with its shift towards a feudal system, where the Sultan granted lands (iqṭāʿ) to Pashas and Beys. They owned the lands and the farmers and peasants on them, subjecting the people to humiliation and oppression, the news of which spread far and wide. It became material for TV series and films in subsequent times, even reaching [characters like] Ghawar Al-Toshé!.

The Ottoman period had specific negatives beyond those they shared with others, mentioned above. Among these are:

Their civilizational direction was one-dimensional and manifested in a military focus, and they did not give importance to other aspects of civilizational progress in the fields of Islamic and applied sciences, nor in the realms of thought and literature. Thus, the Islamic world was marked by ignorance and backwardness since the 17th century, while Europe was witnessing major transformations through its intellectual, political, social, and industrial revolutions. This created a civilizational gap between the East and the West, contributing to the shift of the banner of human civilization from our East to their West.

Religious backwardness, stagnation, and sectarian fanaticism (as the Turks ruled and fanatically adhered to the madhhab of Imām Abū Ḥanīfah, may Allāh have mercy on him), while they ruled over an Islamic expanse where authentic madhāhib among Muslims were diverse. Their era also witnessed encouragement for Sufism (Taṣawwuf) and the schools of dervishes. The Ottoman sultans and the shaykhs of the sultans were often Sufis. The atmosphere of backwardness, poverty, and injustice that characterized that period pushed people towards Sufi orders (ṭuruqiyyah) as an escape from their bitter reality. Sufism added ignorance to the Ummah's backwardness, especially in its final third.

Turkish racism, which existed from the beginning, as Turks held most important positions. Strangely, the neglect of the Arab element and other Eastern ethnic groups was noticeable, while some Muslims from the conquered Western lands were able to find room in positions. This created a gap between the Ottomans and the primary component of the Islamic Ummah in number and importance: the Arabs. This phenomenon intensified in the later phase of the Ottoman Caliphate when the idea of nationalism—after the French Revolution—found its way to captivated Turks and Arabs alike. Turanian (Turkish) nationalism emerged sharply, and its tyrants from among the Masons and Jews took control of affairs. They thus created the justification for conspirators among Arab Masons, misled intellectuals, and those aspiring to kingship to also raise their banner of Arab nationalism. This was one of the greatest tools that demolished the edifice of the Caliphate (Khilāfah).

Thus, the negatives accumulated, despite the great positives we mentioned earlier, leading to the inevitable outcome decreed by Allāh. The overall reasons for the fall can be summarized briefly in the following points:

Third: General Reasons for the Collapse of the Ottoman State

1. The introduction of man-made legislation alongside Islamic Sharī'ah under the pretext of codification and organization, and the winds of Westernization blowing due to admiration for the superficialities of Western civilization. This is one of the most significant reasons for the loss of Muslims, past and present.
2. Luxury and extravagance in the lives of the sultans, their courts, government officials, and the upper classes of society. This is the second most important reason for the collapse of kingdoms and states.

3. Injustice, tyranny, and an individualistic, factional, nationalist despotic system. Excessive taxes (mukūs) on the subjects. The spread of the feudal system in its worst forms and evils. The prevalence of classism in society. This is the third most important reason for decline and ruin.
4. Intellectual, jurisprudential (fiqhī), and religious stagnation, sectarian entrenchment (taqawqu‘ madhhabī), and the one-dimensional military focus of Ottoman civilization at the expense of other civilizational aspects.
5. Interference by consuls and embassies of foreign states in the affairs of the Sublime Porte (Dīwān al-Khilāfah), and support for minorities, especially Christians, to undermine the unity of the state.
6. The dominance of nationalist sentiment among the Turks. Adoption of the policy of Turkification, racial discrimination, and suppression of other nationalities, especially in Arab lands.
7. The control of Dönme Jews and Masons over the state administration in the last third of the Ottoman state's life, especially the final century.
8. The spread of Shu‘ūbiyyah and nationalism among Arabs and others as a reaction to Turkish discriminatory policies. The trend towards resisting the Ottoman Caliphate, fighting it, and assisting the English against it!
9. The fascination of the political, military, cultural, and intellectual elite in the Ottoman state in general with Western civilization, their attempts to imitate it, and the loss of the spirit of Islamic honor (‘izzah).

And finally, the external cause:

This is the conspiracy of European states, especially the English, Russians, French, Italians, and others. Their cooperation with the Jews, their insistence on overthrowing the Ottoman state, and their alliance against it, in order to bring the Jews to Palestine, and for the Europeans, especially those three states, to divide its inheritance, dismember the Islamic and Arab world, and swallow it.

A Review of the Conditions of Arab and Islamic Countries and Kingdoms Since the Collapse of the Ottoman Caliphate (from 1214 AH - 1800 CE to 1425 AH - 2004 CE)

I believe that to complete the benefit and achieve the intended purpose of summarizing Islamic history in the introduction of a study aimed at establishing a call for global Islamic resistance, led by conscious vanguards who comprehend their Jihādī creed (‘aqīdah), understand the realities of their situation, and are aware of the lessons of their history, it is useful to conclude this historical chapter with a summary of what befell the countries of the Arab and Islamic world after the dissolution of the Caliphate. This is what is termed modern history for Arabs and Muslims. Although most of these tragic events befell Muslims after the dissolution of the Ottoman Caliphate and the plundering of its legacy by Western Europe and Russia, following its official fall after World War I and its loss alongside Germany in that war.

However, these events, considered the second round of Crusader campaigns, had begun earlier, as colonial European countries bit off whatever they could from Muslim lands on the distant peripheries of the Islamic world. This began as early as the 16th century, but its serious beginning can be dated to Napoleon's campaign against Egypt in 1798 CE, a date that coincides with the onset of weakness and decline in the Ottoman Caliphate, as we saw earlier.

Given my inability to access contemporary references as I write this research during a stage of hiding where necessary books are unavailable, and due to the lack of desired references, especially the book "Mawsūʿat al-Tārīkh al-Islāmī" (Encyclopedia of Islamic History) by the brilliant historian Professor Maḥmūd Shākir—may Allāh have mercy on him—who chronicled all Muslim lands from the inception of the Islamic state until the early 1980s, and other specialized historical books on contemporary political history, this section will therefore be brief, relying mostly on what remains in my memory from readings, studies, or what I lived through and witnessed of our history during this last quarter of the 20th century. These are pages that perhaps are best described as harsh and bitter, lest we describe them as black—though saying so would not deviate from reality.

I believe, however, that it is the darkness of a night that has heralded its departure, in shāʾ Allāh, as I glimpse the emergence of vanguards of Mujāhid youth, manifest upon the truth, weaving the threads of dawn with their very remains, so that its bright morning may soon shine—in shāʾ Allāh—in the skies of our vast Arab and Islamic world.

This diligent effort, upon which I seek Allāh's help in writing this extensive research over three years, while we are in this phase of fear, movement, and concealment, is but a humble contribution to weaving a modest share in the fabric of that awaited great dawn, inevitably coming by Allāh's permission.

I ask Allāh for sincerity and acceptance, and a conclusion with shahādah in the path of Allāh, after witnessing the first glimmers of its dawn, to enjoy the warmth and light of that radiance, after decades of that intensely dark, bitterly cold night have stretched on for too long.

I will summarize this modern history in two parts: the Arab world, then the most important countries of the Islamic world. I will begin with the Arab world, listing the countries from East to West, from Asia to Africa. The Arab world has fragmented into twenty-two states! Subject to increase these days according to George Bush's programs! And the number of Islamic countries has exceeded fifty-five states!! This is not due to more countries entering Islam, of course, but rather due to the division of its dish (qaṣ'ah) on the table of the colonialists, scattered to pieces (shadhar madhar)!

First: The Arab World

1. Iraq:

Iraq was an Ottoman province (wilāyah) from 922 AH (1516 CE) until 1335 AH (1917 CE). Germany, France, and England competed to occupy it. After German unification, Germany pursued a policy of eastward expansion at the expense of the collapsing Ottoman state, evident in its project to extend the Berlin-Baghdad railway.

Britain recognized the danger of German influence and moved to confront it due to the threat it posed to the British presence in the Gulf.

When World War I broke out in 1332 AH (1914 CE), British forces began moving from India to occupy Iraq, taking advantage of the Ottoman state joining Germany. These armies succeeded in capturing Fao and Basra, gradually controlling southern Iraq by 1333 AH (1915 CE). In 1335 AH (1917 CE), they occupied Baghdad and Mosul, and Britain declared the end of Iraq's dependency on the Ottoman state.

At the San Remo Conference in 1338 AH (1920 CE), it was decided to place Iraq under British protection (Mandate).

Regarding the development of the Iraqi national movement, it began with members of the "Jam'īyyat al-‘Ahd" (Covenant Society), who held a meeting in Damascus declaring Iraq's independence and its political and economic union with Syria. They also carried out military actions on the Syrian-Iraqi border.

Iraqis inside the country responded to the call for resistance and launched a revolution in 1337 AH (1920 CE), which extended from Mosul to Basra, involving various tribes and sects. Only Basra, Baghdad, and Mosul remained in British hands.

Britain had crowned Prince Fayṣal ibn al-Sharīf Ḥusayn as King of Iraq in 1339 AH (1921 CE, error in original text stating 1930). He worked towards independence through negotiations, and the treaty of 1350 AH (1930 CE, error in original text stating 1932) was concluded. According to it, Iraq gained some benefits, including admission as a member of the League of Nations in 1350 AH (1932 CE).

When World War II began in 1357 AH (1939 CE, error in original text stating 1375 AH), Britain saw an opportunity to benefit from the privileges of the 1348 AH (1930 CE) treaty by using Iraqi communication lines and some military bases. This increased tensions in Iraq until the revolt of Rashīd ‘Ālī al-Kaylānī erupted in 1359 AH (1941 CE).

Military conflict broke out between the British and Iraqis, ending with Rashīd ‘Ālī al-Kaylānī fleeing Iraq. Britain succeeded in winning over Prince ‘Abd al-Ilāh and Nūrī al-Sa‘īd to implement its plans to bolster its influence in Iraq.

In 1363 AH (1944 CE, error in original text stating 1364), five Iraqi political parties were formed, some opposing British policy, but Britain managed to dissolve them.

On 8/5/1374 AH (April 5, 1955 CE), the Baghdad Pact was announced between Iraq and Turkey. Britain, Iran, Pakistan, and the United States later joined. This served to isolate Iraq and some Arab countries from the Arab liberation current prevalent at the time.

To confront the Pact, a national committee of nationalist and communist forces was formed to lead the national movement. Their efforts culminated in the revolution of 10/7/1377 AH (July 14, 1958 CE), which overthrew the monarchy and declared a republic.

In 1968 (error in original text stating 1965), the Arab Socialist Ba‘th Party seized power through a coup in Iraq, installing Aḥmad Ḥasan al-Bakr as president. Three years later (error, actually 11 years later in 1979), the influential Ba‘th Party figure Saddam Hussein, al-Bakr's deputy, managed to quietly remove him and assume the presidency of Iraq. His era began with the liquidation of all centers of power within the party and the state through brutal force and bloody executions, until he solely controlled power as one of the most powerful and ruthless dictators in the Arab regimes. The Ba‘th Party period in Iraq—as in Syria—was characterized by the elimination of all other political trends. It followed a secular, atheistic, leftist path aligned with Moscow. Saddam Hussein fought Islam and Islamists, brutally oppressed them, and led Iraq down a path of disbelief (kufr), injustice, and tyranny. However, credit is given to Saddam for striving to build a strong, scientifically and technologically advanced state, establishing a large, well-equipped army, developing military industries, especially missiles, and even aspiring to possess nuclear capabilities. During his bloody dictatorial reign, Iraq witnessed urban development and economic prosperity, benefiting from its vast oil resources.

After the Shi‘a Khomeini revolution that overthrew the Shah of Iran, Iran adopted the principle of exporting the revolution to Arab and Islamic countries and mobilized Shi‘a forces, whom Saddam, like others, had harshly persecuted. Saddam brutally crushed the Shi‘a. America exploited the situation between the two powerful neighbors and succeeded in igniting a fierce war between them, with each country accusing the other of starting the war, which lasted from 1980 (error in original text stating 1979) to 1988 (error in original text stating 1987) and devastated the resources of both countries. However, Iraq emerged with significant military experience and developed its army. America exploited Saddam's expansionist tendencies, and the American ambassador lured him and encouraged the occupation of Kuwait. He became entangled in the Second Gulf War, easily occupying Kuwait in 1990. Thus, Saddam swallowed the bait set by America to provide a flimsy excuse for its colonial presence in the region. America, along with its allied armies of nearly a million soldiers, advanced to liberate Kuwait and save its friends among the Gulf rulers, as it and those treacherous rulers claimed. The war in 1991 resulted in the destruction of the Iraqi army, the subjugation of the Gulf rulers, the extortion of their financial reserves in American banks, and the establishment of an American foothold in the region.

America imposed unjust sanctions on the Iraqi people under the pretext of containing Saddam's regime. Over 13 years of brutal blockade, more than one and a half million children died due to lack of food and medicine, in addition to the men and women who perished. This was besides the war itself, in which more than 300,000 soldiers and civilians were killed under savage American bombing! After ensuring the collapse of Iraq and its regime, America executed the second phase of the Judeo-Crusader program and occupied Iraq completely and openly in the Third Gulf War, which it called the "War to Liberate Iraq." This was facilitated by a group of Iraqi opposition figures nurtured by America and Britain during the years of sanctions, led primarily by Shi'a forces based in Iran, in addition to other groups. Saddam's brutality had pushed the Shi'a and other forces to the point of being willing to cooperate with the devil to overthrow him. Complex political issues intertwined—this is not the place to detail them—to mark the beginning of the major colonial program through which America and its ally Britain are sweeping the entire Middle East from the gateway of Iraq, after occupying Afghanistan and imposing themselves as a new imperial colonial power on the entire world. Thus fell the regime of Saddam and the Ba'th rule, which lasted nearly 35 years. These days, a collaborator government appointed by America governs Iraq, where over 150,000 American soldiers and about 50,000 British soldiers, besides the armies of other Crusader allies, wreak havoc and corruption.

2. Syria:

Syria remained under Ottoman rule for about 400 years. As the Ottoman state weakened, the seeds of the Arab nationalist movement began to sprout in Syria due to the intrigues of the disciples of Crusader Orientalists, mostly Christians. Their ideas found fertile ground due to the policy of "Turkification" pursued by the Masons who controlled the Ottoman state in its later stages. Nationalist activity began in the form of cultural societies inside and outside Syria, including the Jam'iyat al-Nahḍah al-'Arabiyyah (Arab Renaissance Society) founded in Damascus in 1324 AH (1906 CE) and Jam'iyat al-'Arabiyyah al-Fatāh (Young Arab Society) founded in 1329 AH (1911 CE) in Paris, which moved to Damascus and remained there until 1337 AH (1920 CE). Then, the First Arab Congress was held in Paris in 1331 AH (1913 CE), representing an Arab union within the framework of Arab nationalism.

Following this congress, the Turks attempted rapprochement with the Arabs, and the Arabs responded in an effort to ward off the dangers of European ambitions. However, the movements of "Turkification" and "Arab Nationalism" were advancing, and reconciling two nationalisms within one state was impossible. From that time, a rift occurred between the two nations, and suspicion prevailed. When World War I broke out in 1332 AH (1914 CE), Turkey entered the war alongside Germany. Here, what is known as the Great Arab Revolt against Turkey took place, led by Amīr Ḥusayn ibn 'Alī, the Wālī of Hejaz, against the Turks, after being deceived by the British into an alliance. The people of Shām (Syria region) joined him. The World War ended with the defeat of Germany and its allies, and the victory of Britain and France, who divided the region between them according to the Sykes-Picot Agreement and the Balfour Declaration, which granted Palestine to the Jews.

In 1338 AH (1920 CE), the Syrian General Congress appointed Fayṣal ibn al-Ḥusayn as King of Syria. In the same year, the San Remo Conference resolutions were issued, which included placing Syria under the French Mandate. France issued an ultimatum to King Fayṣal, demanding acceptance of the French Mandate and demobilization of the Syrian army within 48 hours.

Before the ultimatum expired, French forces advanced on Damascus. King Fayṣal declared Jihād. The people rallied around their government. The French army met the Syrian army and volunteers led by Minister of Defense Yūsuf al-‘Aẓmah in the heroic Battle of Maysalūn in June 1338 AH (1920 CE), but it ended with the victory of the French army, which occupied Damascus and then other Syrian cities.

Consequently, King Fayṣal left Damascus, and the French took complete control of the country. France pursued a sectarian policy, dividing Syria into four statelets: Damascus, Aleppo, the Alawite State, and the Druze State.

The Syrians did not submit to these measures; some resistance movements arose. In 1343 AH (1925 CE), the Druze revolted against the French, and the revolution spread to Hama and Damascus. The revolutionaries won several battles, but the French brutally suppressed them.

Facing pressure from the revolutionaries, France agreed to form a national government in Damascus, which tried through negotiations to conclude a treaty stipulating the formation of a national army and the issuance of a constitution. However, the French High Commissioner dissolved the government in 1348 AH (1930 CE).

France formed a government with which it concluded a treaty in 1354 AH (1936 CE). France then recognized Syria's conditional independence.

When World War II began in 1357 AH (1939 CE), France reimposed military rule in Syria. Continued national resistance and Anglo-French rivalry forced France to grant Syria independence in 1359 AH (1941 CE), although its forces remained.

In 1361 AH (1943 CE), Shukrī al-Quwatlī was elected president of the independent Syrian Republic. France was then forced to withdraw its forces from Syria in 1365 AH (1946 CE), completing its liberation and independence.

After independence, a series of military coups took place in Syria, orchestrated with planning and support from the US embassy in Damascus. In 1958, unity was established between Egypt and Syria under Jamāl ‘Abd al-Nāṣir, but Syria separated from Egypt in a military coup three years later! Then came the turn of the Arab Socialist Ba‘th Party to carry out the coup of March 8, 1963. Most of the party leadership were from non-Muslim sects, including Christians, Druze, Ismā‘īlīs, and Nuṣayrīs. The Ba‘thists openly declared disbelief (kufr), atheism, and war on Islam, monopolized power, and crushed political forces—Islamic, nationalist, and leftist alike. Then they split amongst themselves, executed each other, and a coup occurred in 1966 (error in original text stating 1965) against President Amīn al-Ḥāfiẓ, who was of Sunnī origin, increasing the influence of Nuṣayrīs and Druze in power. On June 5, 1967, Syria and Egypt lost the war with Israel, suffering a humiliating defeat. Israel occupied the Golan Heights without a fight, as Syria's defense minister at the time, Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad, allegedly sold the Golan to Israel—a scandal widely known internationally and regionally. Consequently, Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad and the Nuṣayrīs were rewarded with control of Syria, supported by global powers and Zionism. This followed the last coup in Syria, termed the "Corrective Movement," meaning correcting the path of the Ba‘th Party!

Since then, the Nuṣayrī sect has ruled Syria with sectarian despotism.

Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad ruled Syria from 1970 to 2000 (error in original text stating 1998) with an iron fist, using military and intelligence apparatuses. He crushed any whisper of opposition to his rule, regardless of political identity. The influence of apostate Ba‘thists from the Sunnī sect, which constitutes 80% of Syria's population, weakened. The country rapidly proceeded down paths of kufr, atheism, and secularism. Corruption and bribery spread throughout all political, administrative, judicial, and economic sectors, and the people tasted various forms of suffering!

An armed Islamic revolution against Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad's regime, led by Shaykh Marwān Ḥadīd, occurred in Syria, with events spanning from 1973 to 1983. It gained traction among Sunnī Muslims, but the regime brutally oppressed the people and all shades of Islamists, especially Jihādīs and the Muslim Brotherhood. Its aggression extended to anything related to Islam; mosques were raided, copies of the Qur’ān were torn, worshippers were killed. In February 1982, the revolution peaked and centered in the city of Hama. The Nuṣayrī-Ba‘thist regime bombarded the city with artillery and aircraft, killing over 50,000 Muslims within 14 days! Amidst suspicious and astonishing international media silence. The government continued arrests, which had intensified since 1979, and more than 25,000 Muslims were executed in prisons through organized execution campaigns and massacres! Their bodies were buried in mass graves. The revolution ended (Refer to the books "The Islamic Jihādī Revolution in Syria" and "Muslims and Nuṣayrīs in Bilād al-Shām" by the author).

Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad intended to appoint his son Basil as his successor to the presidency, arranging this with America and regional powers, primarily Israel. However, Basil suddenly died, reportedly in a car accident. He then hastily arranged for the succession of his son Bashar with the same powers. The American Secretary of State, the Jewish hag Madeleine Albright, came to Damascus and oversaw the Syrian parliament's unanimous vote to amend the constitution within 40 minutes, transferring the succession to Bashar, who continues to rule Syria through the intelligence agencies established by his father to this day.

3. Lebanon:

Lebanon was part of Bilād al-Shām, which was an Ottoman province. When Britain and France divided the Middle East, Lebanon fell into France's share as part of Syria. However, France gave Lebanon special status due to the large Christian community there, upon which France intended to rely for its influence in the region. When France divided Syria into several statelets, Lebanon was one of them. Lebanon was placed under the French Mandate according to the San Remo treaty. General Gouraud began redistricting Syria and Lebanon, and in August 1338 AH (1920 CE), a decision was issued declaring the establishment of the State of Lebanon, announced its independence from Syria. France then carved out parts of adjacent regions to the territory of Lebanon, annexed them to it, and named it the "State of Greater Lebanon!!" Note that this "Greater Lebanon"!! covered an area of only 10,000 square kilometers after the annexations!

The French then exploited Lebanon, seeking to divide the citizens and sow discord among them to consolidate their foothold. However, some Lebanese did not submit to France, and revolts erupted periodically. Among the most famous was the Jabal ʿĀmil revolt in 1338 AH (1920 CE), which the French suppressed. But the French relied on the loyalty of the Maronite Christians to extend their influence.

Revolts continued and converged with those in Syria, especially during the 1343 AH (1925 CE) revolt in Jabal al-Druze. The French subsequently ruled Lebanon directly, although they established a representative council until 1344 AH (1926 CE), when they granted the country a constitution. Charles Dabbās was elected President of the Lebanese Republic, remaining until his death in 1350 AH (1932 CE).

In 1351 AH (1933 CE), Ḥabīb Bāshā al-Sa‘d was appointed the new president, followed by Émile Eddé in 1936 CE. In 1355 AH (1937 CE, error in original text stating 1936), an agreement was reached between France and the Lebanese that the President of the Republic would be Maronite and the Prime Minister Sunnī Muslim.

When World War II began, the French authorities interfered with the political and administrative system in Lebanon and fostered corruption in the country.

In 1354 AH (1936 CE), Shaykh Muḥammad Tawfīq Khālīd, the Muftī of Muslims, presented several demands to the High Commissioner to achieve comprehensive independence and recognition of Lebanon's sovereignty and unity with Syria. Meanwhile, Butrus ‘Uwayḍah, leader of the Maronite community, presented demands aimed at achieving independence and sovereignty, strengthening relations with Syria, and establishing a constitution for the country.

In 1361 AH (1943 CE), a government was formed representing the main sects in Lebanon: Maronites, Sunnīs, Shī‘a, Greek Orthodox, Greek Catholics, and Druze, reflecting a form of national unity. The President of the Republic was Bishārah al-Khūrī. France then granted Lebanon independence in 1364 AH (1945 CE), and French forces withdrew from Lebanon in 1365 AH (1946 CE).

The sectarian unrest continued in the artificial state of Lebanon! The civil war erupted between the Maronites, Islamic and Islamic-affiliated sects, and nationalists in 1958. The events calmed down, only to explode again in 1975 between the alliance of Maronite Christians, openly supported by Israel, and the nationalist and Islamic forces and the Palestinians residing in Lebanon. The Nusayri regime, with American permission, entered the war between the parties, and the Syrian army, in cooperation with the Israeli air force, carried out the massacre of the Palestinian refugee camp of Tal al-Za'tar, killing some 50,000 people in that massacre! Then the Nusayris carried out another massacre against Muslims in Tripoli, northern Lebanon. The strength of the Lebanese Shi'a and Nusayri communities grew during that war with support from Syria and Iran... The civil war destroyed Lebanon, and some two hundred thousand people from various sects perished. Then Israel openly intervened, and its armies, led by Sharon at the time, swept in and occupied Beirut! It carried out horrific massacres against the Palestinians in 1982, especially in what became known as the Sabra and Shatila massacres. The Palestinian organizations were forced to leave Lebanon.

Then the Arab Summit Conference was held in Ta'if, which established a fragile agreement, giving Syria a free hand in Lebanon with American-Israeli permission... Now, after the occupation of Iraq, the American-Zionist program has changed, as America is rearranging the region's map, demanding that Syria withdraw from Lebanon, where it seems that the sects, led by the Maronites, will play a new role in Bush's program to redivide what Sykes-Picot divided, redraw it, and redivide and reconstruct it under the microscope.

4. Palestine:

Palestine holds a great status among Muslims due to the presence of Bayt al-Maqdis, the second of the two Holy Mosques and the first of the two Qiblahs. Sharīf Hussein bin Ali agreed with Britain that Palestine would be part of the greater Arab state that they promised him before World War I, but Britain wanted to annex it to its empire to give it to the Jews under the Balfour Declaration issued in 1335 AH / 1917 CE, in which Britain pledged to adopt the decision of the First Zionist Congress in 1314 AH / 1897 CE that Palestine would be a national homeland for the Jews.

World War I ended with the victory of the Allies - including Britain - and Palestine was placed under British Mandate in 1338 AH / 1920 CE at the San Remo Conference. Britain reneged on its promises of independence to the Arabs while it committed to its promise to the Zionists of a homeland for the Jews in Palestine.

During the Mandate period from 1338 AH / 1920 CE - 1367 AH / 1948 CE, Britain enabled the Zionists to acquire land and opened the doors of Palestine to receive Jews from around the world, increasing the number of the original Jewish population, which was 15,000 original Jewish inhabitants, to hundreds of thousands before 1948. It made Hebrew an official language and allowed them to form military units, while it followed a plan to restrict the Arabs.

During that period, popular Palestinian revolutions took place, the most prominent of which were the revolutions of 1338 AH / 1920, 1347 AH / 1929 CE, and 1354 AH / 1936 CE. Hajj Amin al-Husayni, the Mufti of Jerusalem, was one of the most prominent leaders during that period. As a form of appeasement, Britain proposed a plan to partition Palestine into three areas: Jewish, Arab, and British. The Palestinians rejected this partition, and the revolutions erupted again.

The revolution of 1355 AH / 1937 CE, led by the martyr ‘Izz ad-Dīn al-Qassām, was the most intense, but Britain aborted it with the mediation of some Arab leaders, especially Prince Faisal bin Abdul Aziz, the King of Saudi Arabia! Britain was forced to abandon the idea in 1356 AH / 1937 CE. After World War II, Britain declined to a second-class power, and the United States of America emerged as one of the two superpowers in the world; and the Jews focused their efforts on winning over the United States. American President Truman proved to Zionism that the United States was a better ally when he exerted pressure on Britain that resulted in allowing 100,000 Jews to enter Palestine, an action that made Britain hasten to internationalize the issue and refer it to the United Nations in 1947.

The United Nations Special Committee on Palestine recommended its partition into two states, one Arab and one Jewish, with the internationalization of Jerusalem. This was voted upon, and the state of Israel was established in 1948. Britain withdrew from Palestine after handing over all the components of the state to the Zionists administratively and militarily, and after enabling them to control areas of land exceeding the areas defined by the United Nations partition. On 7/7/1367 AH (May 15, 1948 CE), the establishment of the state of Israel was announced, and the Zionist organizations continued their raids to expand at the expense of the areas inhabited by Arabs.

This led to the first war between Arabs and Israel in 1367 AH / 1948 CE, which ended with the defeat of the Arab armies due to the betrayals of the Arab presidents and kings, especially in the neighboring countries and Saudi Arabia. The establishment of the state of Israel was confirmed. The Jews seized more land, leaving only the West Bank, which was placed under Jordanian rule, and the Gaza Strip, which was placed under Egyptian rule. In 1375 AH / 1956 CE, Israel attacked Gaza and Sinai in collusion with England and France, which ended with the expansion of the state of Israel and the annexation of new lands after horrific massacres against the Arabs of Palestine.

In 1382 AH / 1963 CE, the establishment of the Palestine Liberation Organization was announced. It formed a Palestinian army that succeeded in inflicting some losses on Israel inside and outside its borders with Lebanon and Jordan. In 1386 AH / 1967 CE, the war between Arabs and Israel erupted for the second time, resulting in the Arabs losing the Golan Heights, the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and the Sinai Peninsula, which were occupied by Israel, as a result of the betrayal of the Syrian regime and the penetration of Nasser's army leadership by Israeli intelligence through dissolute adulterers!

In 1392 AH / 1973 CE, the October War took place, in which the Arab armies defeated Israel, but they were unable to liberate the occupied territories due to the intervention of the United States and its support for Israel, and the betrayal of President Sadat, who stopped the attack, and the repetition of the Syrian regime's usual betrayals.

After the Palestine Liberation Organization obtained recognition as the legitimate and sole representative of the Palestinian cause, it began a series of secret and public negotiations with Israel under the auspices of the traitorous Arab regimes and international supervision, in order to end the Arab-Israeli conflict. This began with the Camp David Accords between Egypt, Israel, and the Palestinians under American sponsorship in 1980, followed by a surrender leap in the Madrid Peace Conference (1991), which was followed by the Oslo Accords between the organization and Israel, and then conferences and conspiracies followed one after another, under American supervision and cooperation from the Arab regimes and the Organization of Islamic Cooperation, which includes the countries (with Muslim populations). Until Bush took over and put forward what was called the "Roadmap" for settling the Palestinian issue in 2002, and for establishing a token state for the Palestinians within 2005, but Israel is still evading and continuing the series of killing and massacres against the Palestinians, and America is still becoming more open in its bias, in what appears to be a blatant plan to displace the remaining Palestinians, demolish al-Aqsa Mosque, and establish the alleged Temple on its ruins.

The Palestinian Intifada against the Jews erupted in 2000 and transitioned to armed action. The Islamic Jihadi organizations emerged to fill the void in the arena after the exposure of the bankruptcy, betrayal of the Muslims' cause, and incapacity of the secular nationalist leftist line. These days are witnessing violent clashes between the Palestinian Jihadi forces and the Jews, while the Palestinian Authority, after the death of Arafat, continues its rottenness and decay under the leadership of traitors like Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), who is nominated to deliver the coup de grâce to the issue of Palestine these days.

5. Jordan:

Jordan was historically part of the province of al-Shām throughout Islamic history. However, it began its history as an independent state in 1339 AH / 1921 CE under the Sykes-Picot Agreement, which placed it in the British share. Its borders were drawn on the geographical area extending east of the Jordan River between Saudi Arabia, Iraq, and Syria. Jordan was a district under Syria during the Ottoman era, and according to the San Remo Agreement, Transjordan and Palestine were placed under British Mandate. Then Britain decided to separate Transjordan from Palestine and appointed Prince Abdullah bin Sharīf Hussein over it, provided that his rule would be administratively independent and "enlightened"! in the opinion of a British representative residing in Amman.

In 1346 AH / 1927 CE, a Jordanian-British treaty was concluded in which Britain formally recognized the independence of Transjordan, with an absolute monarchy. This was later amended in 1352 AH / 1933 CE, giving the Kingdom a degree of sovereignty and independence. During World War II, Jordan sided with the Allies, and the Jordanian armed forces participated in the war effort. Britain then announced the end of its mandate over Jordan in 1365 AH / 1946 CE, and the establishment of the "Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan" was declared. Prince Abdullah was sworn in as a constitutional king of the country.

In 1368 AH / 1948 CE, the war between the Arabs and the Jews erupted, and King Abdullah was the supreme commander of the Arab armies! But the English officer (Glubb Pasha) was the actual commander!!!!... Thus, the war ended with the Nakba and the seizure of a part of the land by the Jews and the establishment of Israel. In 1369 AH / 1950 CE, King Abdullah announced the annexation of the West Bank from Palestine to Jordan after the establishment of the state of Israel.

In 1370 AH / 1951 CE, King Abdullah was killed and was succeeded by his son King Talal, who in 1371 AH / 1952 CE drafted a constitution that was in line with the new reality. However, they declared him mentally unstable, and he was succeeded in 1372 AH / 1953 CE by his son King Hussein bin Talal.

Hussein remained in power for more than 46 years! He was a shrewd and skillful traitorous agent who mastered playing on the contradictions of the region and was known for his complicity with the English who created the Jordanian throne and then with the Americans who inherited influence in the region. His very old contacts with the Zionist Jews were almost public. He himself revealed them and announced their long duration, stating that they went back to his days of friendship with Ben-Gurion, the founder of Israel!

Jordan has a very shallow economy. It is a desert country with few resources and relies on regional and international aid for its survival. Two-thirds of the population consists of Palestinians displaced during the successive wars in Palestine. Therefore, the internal political balance is critical, and it lost its balance in 1970 when fighting broke out between the Palestinians and the Jordanian regime, resulting in the death of more than twenty thousand Palestinians! The Palestinian organizations were expelled from Jordan, most of them settling in Lebanon, where they were also expelled, as we saw, after the civil war massacres in 1982.

Hussein signed a peace treaty with Israel, establishing diplomatic relations with it, and the Israeli flag flew openly over Amman in broad daylight over the heads of its predominantly Palestinian population!

Hussein died of cancer in 1998 - as I recall - and America oversaw the change of succession, removing his brother and crown prince for decades and appointing his son (the current King Abdullah), who spent most of his life in Britain, to continue his father's policy. His relations and visits to Israel deepened. When America invaded and occupied Iraq, the Jordanian government provided America with important logistical services, and American forces moved from Jordanian territory and airspace after joint maneuvers with the Jordanian army. American-Israeli programs today rely on the great treacherous services provided by the Jordanian regime to the enemies for their comprehensive launch in the region today, economically, culturally, and politically.

While I was putting the final touches on the book, the news reported a curious story that reminds us of the days of the Mamluks and the states of the sects! King Abdullah announced the removal of his brother Hamza from the position of Crown Prince and the appointment of his 9-year-old son. Jordanian figures rushed to express their praise for this legitimate and great achievement! And sufficient for us is Allāh, and He is the best disposer of affairs, in this age of farces we are living in!!

6. The Land of the Two Holy Mosques, known as "Saudi Arabia":

During the Ottoman era, the country known today as "Saudi Arabia" consisted of semi-independent parts. The most important was Najd, which was not practically under Ottoman rule, and the Hijaz, which was ruled by the Sharīfs who followed the Ottomans and were under their protection and care. The north bordering Syria and Iraq was under the rule of the House of Rashīd also by authorization from the Ottomans.

The establishment of the current Saudi state has gone through three stages since the eighteenth century CE:

The First Stage: The First Saudi State

This begins in 1157 AH - 1744 CE, the year the preacher Shaykh Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb migrated to the town of Dir‘iyyah and concluded an agreement with its Emir, Imam Muhammad ibn Sa‘ūd, for mutual support and cooperation in spreading the call. Prince Imam Sa‘ūd ibn Muḥammad ibn Muqrin (1725-1765 CE) is considered the founder of the First Saudi State. The echo of the Wahhābi call then spread throughout the Arabian Peninsula.

Prince Muhammad ibn Sa‘ūd died in 1178 AH / 1765 CE and his son Prince ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Muḥammad was sworn in as Imam. He expanded their state, reaching Wadi al-Dawasir in the south and Samawah in eastern Iraq in the north. Imam ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Muḥammad was assassinated in 1228 AH / 1813 CE. He had appointed his son Sa‘ūd as his successor, and the people pledged allegiance to Sa‘ūd as Imam. In 1228 AH / 1813 CE, he was able to conquer Makkah and put an end to the influence of the Sharīfs in the Hijaz.

The Ottoman state was not pleased with the loss of its authority over the Hijaz, and the increasing activity of the Salafist movement in parts of Iraq added to the Ottomans' fears. After Sharīf Ghālib sought help from the Ottomans, Sultan Mahmud II assigned his governor in Egypt, Muhammad Ali Pasha, to regain the Hijaz, and he seized Makkah and Taif.

The Second Egyptian Campaign

Muhammad Ali himself then marched to the Hijaz in 1228 AH / 1813 CE and was able to consolidate his authority in Makkah, Madīnah, and Taif and entered Tihāmah and Asīr. Meanwhile, Imam Sa‘ūd ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz died and was succeeded by his son ‘Abdullāh in 1230 AH / 1814 CE. Muhammad Ali then prepared a strong new campaign and placed his son Ibrāhīm Pasha in charge. Ibrāhīm Pasha advanced towards and captured Dir‘iyyah, the capital of the Saudis, after a long siege and bitter fighting. A truce was reached between them, and Imam ‘Abdullāh went to Egypt with the remaining of his supporters to sign the truce with Muhammad Ali. Muhammad Ali's forces were able to extend their influence to the Qatif area.

The first stage or the First Saudi State ends with the surrender of Imam ‘Abdullāh in 1818 CE.

The Second Stage or the Second Saudi State:

This begins when Prince Mishari bin Sa'ūd al-Kabīr was able to escape from Egypt and was then sworn in as Imam in 1235-1236 AH (1819-1820 CE). Turkī bin 'Abdullāh bin Muhammad bin Sa'ūd, who had fled when Dir'iyyah was surrendered, was appointed Emir of Riyadh. Prince Turkī was then succeeded by his son Prince Faysal bin Turkī in 1250 AH / 1834 CE, and he continued his struggle with rivals from his family on one hand and with the Egyptians on the other.

Imam Faysal bin Turkī had given the Emirate of Hail to one of his men who helped him eliminate his father Turkī's killer, Abdullah bin Rashīd, who would become the founder of the House of Rashīd Emirate. The reign of Faysal bin Turkī is divided into two periods: the first begins with his assumption of the Emirate after the killing of his father (1250 AH / 1834 CE), which was a period of strife and unrest, and ends with Faysal's surrender to Khurshīd Pasha, the Egyptian governor of Najd and Hijaz, after nine years of resistance - where he took him to Egypt and appointed his uncle Khālīd ibn Sa'ūd in his place to rule Najd with a modern rule. The people of Najd were alienated from him and considered him a foreigner, and then they all agreed to depose him, which they did after resisting for two years. He was then succeeded by 'Abdullāh bin Thunayyān bin Ibrāhīm bin Thunayyān bin Sa'ūd in 1257 AH / 1842 CE, but his rule did not last long as Muhammad Ali had released Imam Faysal bin Turkī, and the people of Najd pledged allegiance to him in 1259 AH / 1843 CE. He continued in the second stage for twenty-four years and extended his sovereignty over the greater part of the Arabian Peninsula, with al-Ahsa, Qatif, Wadi al-Dawasir, Asir, Jubayl, and al-Qassim submitting to him. With his death in 1282 AH / 1865 CE, the second Saudi stage or the Second Saudi State ends, as the sons of Faysal bin Turkī disputed the rule, and the Ottoman state had exhausted the people of Najd with its multiple campaigns. The dispute between Sa'ūd, 'Abdullāh, and Muhammad, the sons of Faysal, continued, but in 1291 AH / 1874 CE, Imam ibn Faysal died, and his brother ‘Abd al-Raḥmān took over the Imamate after him. He was able to bring back his elder brother ‘Abdullāh and reconcile with him, and pledged allegiance to his brother ‘Abdullāh, but the sons of Sa‘ūd broke away from the family. The House of Rashīd was obedient to the House of Sa‘ūd until then.

However, in 1299 AH / 1881 CE, the incident of al-Hamādah occurred, which led to Ibn Rashīd's seizure of Najd and his taking of Imam ‘Abdullāh and his brother ‘Abd al-Raḥmān as prisoners to Hail with ten others from the House of Sa‘ūd. Sālim bin al-Subhān was appointed Emir of Riyadh, and he killed the sons of Sa‘ūd, Muhammad and Sa‘d and ‘Abdullāh, and exiled their families to Hail.

In 1308 AH / 1889 CE, Imam ‘Abdullāh fell ill, so he and his brother ‘Abd al-Raḥmān were allowed to return to Riyadh, but Imam ‘Abdullāh died in the same year, and his brother ‘Abd al-Raḥmān was sworn in as Imam. Then Ibn al-Rashīd seized Najd, so ‘Abd al-Raḥmān took his family and children and they left for al-Ahsa, then to Qatar, and finally to Kuwait, where they remained until his son ‘Abd al-‘Azīz conquered Riyadh and established the Third Saudi State.

The Third Saudi State

Britain had extended its authority over Kuwait, as will be discussed later, and its ambitions extended to controlling the Arabian Peninsula and the Land of the Two Holy Mosques. However, with its realistic understanding of the importance of the Land of the Two Holy Mosques in the hearts of Muslims and their aversion to the presence of foreign forces there, it resorted to occupying it indirectly by appointing a ruling family loyal to it. This is what it did after studying the history of the region and the tribal forces within it.

The ruler of Kuwait, loyal to the English, Mubārak al-Sabāḥ, advised the British to rely on ‘Abd al-Raḥmān bin Faysal Āl Sa‘ūd - who was a refugee with him - for this task. After the British representative met with ‘Abd al-Raḥmān Āl Sa‘ūd, ‘Abd al-

Raḥmān convinced him that his old age was not suitable for the task and presented his son (ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz) to carry out the British program. The representative was impressed with ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, who was in his twenties, and saw in him capability and intelligence. From that point begins the history of the Third Saudi State, which continues to this day. May Allāh disgrace and destroy them.

Britain provided ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz with the necessary gold, advisors, and a military expert to help him prepare his forces. He launched his first campaign in 1901 CE under the pretext of restoring his ancestors' kingdom, but he suffered a crushing defeat and returned to Kuwait.

After considering the matter, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz decided to try again, but under the pretext of reviving the call of Shaykh Muhammad ibn ʿAbd al-Waḥḥāb and concealing himself under this religious call, which was loved by the people of Najd. Indeed, his call gained the support of the people, and in 1319 AH / 1902 CE, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was able to return to Najd, seize Riyadh, and declare himself Emir. He began to remove all traces of the authority of Banū Rashīd in Hail.

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz then began to gather the supporters of the Waḥḥābi call and formed from them what became known as "Ikhwān man ṭāʿ Allāh" (Brothers of those who obey Allāh). They were like an armed militia of ideological Mujahideen known for their strength and strong faith. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz's forces expanded, and he moved with energy and activity and proved his efficiency and shrewdness.

He then conquered al-Qassim in 1321 AH / 1903 CE after two decisive victories in al-Bakrīyah and al-Shinānah. The final victory over Ibn Rashīd was achieved in the battle of Rawḍat Mahannā near the city of Buraydah in 1334 AH / 1913 CE, thus ending the 42-year rule of the Ottomans in al-Aḥsa.

After World War I, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was titled "Sultan of Najd and its Dependencies".

At that time, Britain had another agent working in the Hijaz with the Sharīfs, the famous agent "Lawrence of Arabia". He had deceived Sharīf Hussein - as we mentioned - by promising to help him establish an Arab Caliphate in the Arabian Peninsula, Syria, and Iraq if he fought the Ottoman Caliphate alongside them, which he did under the name of the Great Arab Revolt. Britain then deceived him and divided his dream kingdom between itself and France. The British then had to choose one of the two agents (ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz) and (Sharīf Hussein) for the Arabian Peninsula. After deliberations and consultations, the choice of the British Colonial Office fell on the unhappiest of the unhappy, so they chose ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and exiled the other deceived one to spend the rest of his life and die in exile in Cyprus!

After that, he sent two campaigns to the Hijaz and seized it, and his title became "King of the Hijaz and Sultan of Najd and its Dependencies." The English were determined to give Sultan ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz ownership of all parts of the Arabian Peninsula, and he was able to include Asir and Najran within the borders of his kingdom. In 1350 AH / 1932 CE, King ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz issued a decree unifying the parts of the Hijazi Kingdom, the Najdi Sultanate, and the other Emirates, and the British gave them this odd, abominable name after the family of their agent, thus giving birth to the state called the "Kingdom of Saudi Arabia"!

Ikhwān man ṭāʿ Allāh had believed the religious claims of Ibn Saʿūd and intended to continue spreading the call of Tawḥīd in the vicinity towards Iraq, Kuwait, Yemen, and Syria... But the British program was different, and the English only wanted the call of Tawḥīd as a cover for their program of giving the region whose borders they had drawn to the family of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Āl Saʿūd. Dissension began between ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and the "Ikhwān man ṭāʿ Allāh," who were the fuel for the establishment of his kingdom! The Ikhwān also objected to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz on several matters, including being called "His Majesty the Sultan," his numerous English advisors and his adherence to their advice, and what they noticed as the beginning of the infiltration of a modern flavor into his system. The matter led to war between ‘Abd al-‘Azīz and the Ikhwān. The English helped him by bombing their gatherings with planes, and he marched with those who were loyal to him from the tribes and helpers and eliminated them in the famous battle known as the "Battle of al-Sabīlah." He slaughtered the callers to Tawḥīd, killed most of them, and those who remained alive dispersed in the villages and deserts... After al-Sabīlah, the English advisors flew with joy and threw their Arab kufiyyahs in the air, openly displaying their clothes and identity.

After that, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz concluded a treaty with the English by which the government of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth pledged to confine the rule of Saudi Arabia to ‘Abd al-‘Azīz and his descendants after him, provided that he does not make any political matter or decision except with their consultation. The British representative and King ‘Abd al-‘Azīz signed this document, which was recently published among the documents retrieved from the British Foreign Office and covered by books and media outlets! Another document in which ‘Abd al-‘Azīz recognized the right of the Jews in Palestine also became famous, as his son and Foreign Minister (Faysal) helped them thwart the great revolution against the Jewish immigrants in 1936, as was mentioned in the first chapter. Then oil was discovered and plundered by British and then American companies.

After World War II, and the emergence of America as a superpower, and the relative decline in the size and role of Britain. America inherited control over most of the British colonies after the sun and even the moon set on them, and it became a tail for America!

With his cunning, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz realized the international transformations. He met with the (Jewish) President Roosevelt on board an American battleship, and America pledged to him and his heirs what Britain had pledged, just as he and his descendants pledged to them what he had previously pledged to the English in terms of loyalty, obedience, and agency, which is what happened and is still happening, as we witnessed in these recent unfortunate days! In 1373 AH / 1953 CE, King ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz died.

King Saʿūd then succeeded his father in 1953, and the family and the scholars pledged allegiance to him. However, Saʿūd was convinced by the nationalist ideas that flourished in the Arab countries at that time, and he openly displayed his modern ideas and blatant sinful behavior. The reasons for his deposition converged, and this is what the family and the scholars did. He was deposed in 1964 CE. His sons left to live in the West, and his daughters and grandchildren became material for sex and debauchery news magazines due to the obscene extravagance they plundered from their share of the Muslims' wealth. Some magazines even published a picture of some of his daughters' children from illegitimate relationships and fornication.

Then, King Faisal bin Abdul Aziz took power, and his rule continued until 1975 CE.

King Faisal is considered the founder of modern Saudi Arabia and the founder of secularism in it. The kingdom witnessed an oil boom during his era, and immense wealth flowed into his treasury. Since he had served as his father's foreign minister for most of his life, he was experienced and skilled in international politics. The country witnessed prosperity, development, and advancements in education during his reign. He established Saudi radio and television on modern foundations, which included immorality, disobedience, music, unveiled women, and temptation... When some princes, sons of his brothers, who had some sense of honor and righteousness, rebelled against this, he suppressed them and killed their leader. In order to curb the power of the Wahhābi scholars and their leader, the righteous scholar - as we believe him to be - Muhammad bin Ibrahim Āl ash-Shaykh, Faisal's genius blossomed in regulating the religious institution. During his reign, branches of the official religious institution were established, headed by the Council of Senior Scholars, the Committees for Fatwa, Da'wah, and Guidance, the Supreme Judicial Council, the Committee for Enjoining Good and Forbidding Evil and other such bodies. For the global role that Saudi Arabia would play due to the status of the Two Holy Mosques within it and its financial capabilities, and to compete with Abdul Nasser, who sought to lead the Arabs and established institutions and radio stations for that purpose... the genius of the Saudis, with the consultation of their masters, blossomed in establishing international religious institutions to plant the project of spiritual dominance over the Islamic world. Thus, the Muslim World League, the World Assembly of Muslim Youth, the Saudi Red Crescent Authority, and the World Relief Organization were established.

The religious institutions within the country were built in the manner of the Vatican structure, and something resembling a "Pope" was placed at their head, creating the position of Grand Mufti of the Country, Chairman of the Council of Senior Scholars... Billions were spent on these institutions internally and externally to impose their media presence and establish their prestige at home and abroad, and they succeeded in doing so for many reasons, including the fact that most of the workers in those institutions were sincere, dedicated, and righteous people who saw the immediate and tangible effects of their charitable and benevolent actions but did not realize the goals of those who created them and the goals of their masters.

Towards the end of his reign, Faisal witnessed - as some people say - a shift towards a sense of honor and righteousness, and he began to hope for the recovery of Jerusalem. The Kingdom during his reign attempted to play a fundamental role in Arab, regional, and international politics. King Faisal entered into a war with the nationalist and leftist currents in the Arab world. Saudi Arabia represented the vanguard of what was called the "Arab Reactionary," or the "Arab Rightist" current loyal to America and the West, in the face of the Arab socialist, nationalist, and communist leftist forces led by Abdul Nasser, and the Ba'athists in Syria and Iraq and the like... Faisal entered into a proxy war with Nasser's Egypt in Yemen, where Saudi Arabia supported the Zaidis, and Abdul Nasser supported the Republicans.

In the 1973 war between Arabs and Israel, the Arabs decided to use the oil weapon against Israel and its supporters in the West. King Faisal implemented the decision to embargo oil to the West, which disrupted the global economy and revealed the impact of this dangerous economic weapon. America decided to kill King Faisal. It also developed long-term policies to occupy the Gulf and militarily control the oil sources, which has been implemented since 1990. Indeed, America was able to recruit one of Faisal's nephews, who was one of the princes who frequented the brothels of Europe and America, dissolute adulterers and drunkards, and how many of them are there in the House of Sa'ūd and their like in the ruling families in our afflicted Islamic world. He sneaked into his uncle's palace and assassinated him. Thus, Faisal was killed, and his era ended. Allāh knows his state and in what condition and intention he met his Lord.

After the death of King Faisal, his brother Khalid bin Abdul Aziz took power. His brother Fahd was pledged allegiance as Crown Prince after him. During his reign, the Kingdom continued its subservient approach to America and the West, and the urban development and modernization reached their peak in various fields during his reign.

During Khalid's rule, the actual ruler was Fahd, the Crown Prince. Then Khalid died suddenly, and it was said that he was poisoned, so that the Dajjāl with the one eye could take his place and bear the burden of disbelief and agency in the land of the Two Holy Mosques.

After the death of King Khalid, King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz took power. He was famous for his debauchery, immorality, and his red nights in the luxurious resorts of Europe and America prepared for those like him among the wealthy debauchers. He was also famous as one of the biggest gamblers in the casinos of Europe and America, so much so that a British newspaper wrote about him under the title: "The Prince who lost Six Million Pounds and left Laughing!!" This was when he lost the equivalent of ten million dollars in one of London's casinos! The press photographed him smiling, unaffected by that calamity, may Allāh not bless him.

Fahd took power while the Islamic awakening in the Kingdom was living its golden age, after the Kingdom became a refuge for Islamists fleeing from criminal military governments in various Arab and Islamic countries, especially from Egypt and then Syria, where the Muslim Brotherhood and the Jihadi organizations that split from them engaged in armed confrontations. The refuge of prominent Islamists in Saudi Arabia led to a fusion of its Salafist Wahhābi awakening with the incoming political and Islamic Jihadi ideas from Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere. Saudi Arabia's policy was to absorb this phenomenon based on the identity it espoused and its special circumstances.

Then the Kingdom, at the instigation of America, adopted the support for the Afghan Jihād, and opened the door wide for those who wanted to fight with their wealth and themselves. This led to tens of thousands of Saudis traveling to Afghanistan and being influenced by contemporary Jihadi ideas based on the issues of sovereignty. All of this led to the development of the Islamic awakening in the Kingdom during that period, at the same time that Fahd opened the door wide to the wave of modernity and secularization. This led to a state of division in Saudi society between these currents, in addition to the official religious current allied with the absolute dictatorial monarchy. This conflict is still raging today between these three currents.

After Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and its threat to Saudi Arabia, as America programmed with Saddam and lured him into it, American and allied forces arrived and struck their bases in Saudi Arabia and the surrounding oil Emirates. This led to a state of boiling in Saudi Arabia after the return of the Mujahideen from Afghanistan safely to their bases, which led to the idea of Jihād against the Saudi government and rebelling against it due to its agency for the Americans and the spread of man-made laws in its legislation. As a result of the accumulation of various forms of corruption, numerous peaceful political reform calls emerged, both Islamic and secular, and the political situation in Fahd's kingdom began to become turbulent since the early nineties, reaching its peak with Shaykh Usāmah bin Lādin's rebellion against the government and his call for Jihād against it after launching the slogan of expelling the polytheists from the Arabian Peninsula.

After the events of September 2001, which were carried out mostly by Saudi martyrdom operatives, and after America's occupation of Iraq and its massive presence in the region, America bared its fangs and revealed its programs, which included bringing about changes in the situation in Saudi Arabia, which put the future of the Saudi family since 2003 in the hands of the American genie. And the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) spoke the truth: "Whoever helps an oppressor in his oppression, Allāh will set him upon him."

In early 2004, events of an armed Jihadi revolution erupted targeting Americans and the Western presence in Saudi Arabia, as well as the ruling family and its security apparatus alike, making Saudi Arabia a new field for the open confrontation between Muslims and their Jihadi vanguard and their Islamic awakening, and America and its allies and their vanguard of the forces of apostasy and hypocrisy from the rulers of the Arab and Islamic world, with the ruling family in Saudi Arabia and its official religious institution at the forefront of this front of apostates and hypocrites.

The history of the contemporary Saudi state and its hypocritical scholars during the reign of ‘Abd al-‘Azīz and his descendants requires large specialized volumes to record their black history and the calamities they inflicted upon the Ummah of Muhammad (peace and blessings be upon him), locally, and on the Arab, Islamic, and international levels. The kings of this family, who numbered during the twentieth century (1901-2004) about 7000 princes, formed a local miniature tribe of Gog and Magog in the Arabian Peninsula and the Land of the Two Holy Mosques. They humiliated the servants of Allāh and spread corruption on Earth. If Gog and Magog will drink the Euphrates and the Sea of Galilee, as is in the narrations, then Gog and Magog Āl Sa'ūd have drunk the oil lake of the Peninsula and pumped it into the veins of the Jews and Christians, and they have engaged in all forms of war against Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers.

At the level of the Kingdom that they named after those who succeeded them, they inserted man-made legislation into their laws and disregarded all that some of their righteous scholars, such as Muhammad bin Ibrahim, who wrote about them and their like in his "Treatise on the Judgment of Laws" and issued a fatwa and ruled, as did many of the scholars of the Peninsula who lived during his time, that those who rule by man-made laws or mix them with Islamic Sharī'ah are disbelievers. Their internal and external policies also showed absolute loyalty to the West, especially to America, until this became clear in their assistance, fighting alongside them, and providing military and other services to them in the recent American wars in the region. As for the killing and imprisonment of those who enjoin justice among the people, there is no end to their crimes. As for their corruption, immorality, and squandering of the Muslims' wealth in their immoral adventures at banquets of alcohol and gambling, and the brothels of the affluent, they have become material for the media. Suffice it to mention a piece of news published by a newspaper that focuses on the news of the world's wealthy, where it said that Prince Sultan's daily expenditure (and note: daily!) is 3 million dollars! As for Fahd, he is the prince who lost 10 million dollars and left laughing, may Allāh curse them! He continues to pay - according to the widely reported news about him in the media and books - blackmail checks to many prostitutes, flight attendants, and singers who are agents of intelligence services, with whom he spent his youth, and commemorative photos were taken of him secretly, for which he pays the price in blackmail in the internal and external positions and policies of the Kingdom, and to pay the prostitutes their retirement and old-age pensions!

The successive kings of Saudi Arabia have also supported every Taghut among the Tawagheet of the Arab and Muslim countries whose throne has been shaken in the face of the Mujahideen opposing them, with hundreds of millions of dollars. They supported the Nusayris during the Jihād in Syria, supported the Algerian government in confronting the Muslims, supported the communists in Yemen in their war with the northerners, supported the Maronite Christians against the Muslims and Palestinians in the civil war in Lebanon, and even supported the dictator Marcos in the Philippines against the Muslims, supported Putin against the Chechen Mujahideen, supported the Indian government while it was slaughtering Muslims in Kashmir and Assam, and funded America's war against the Taliban... And the list of their public crimes, not to mention the secret ones, is long.

As for their greatest crime in squandering billions and billions of oil wealth, whoever contemplates it is overcome with anguish and oppression. Saudi Arabia is the largest oil-producing country in history, exporting more than 10 million barrels per day, in addition to other exports and transit revenues, amounting to more than half a billion dollars daily as the sun rises and sets... Most of these resources are poured into the banks of the Jews and the Crusaders, and Saudi Arabia pays enormous bills from them in implementing American policies. This is a long discussion, and what has been published about it in books and writings is very extensive for anyone who wishes to investigate it. Suffice it to mention that one of the latest news leaked to the media was about their paying a large financial bribe to the Spanish government during the era of Aznar to ally with Bush in his invasion and occupation of Iraq in 2004. Allāh knows the amount! So reflect. May Allāh fight them. And sufficient for us is Allāh, and He is the best disposer of affairs.

7. Kuwait:

The area of Kuwait was known as "al-Qurayn," while "Kuwait" is a diminutive of the word "Kūt," which is a neighboring area. It is a small port built by Muhammad bin 'Uray'ir, the leader of the Banū Khālīd tribe that controlled the area.

The modern history of Kuwait began with the migration of "Āl al-Sabāḥ" from Najd. They agreed with Banū Khālīd to jointly administer the country's affairs. But Āl al-Sabāḥ became independent in ruling Kuwait in 1170 AH / 1756 CE, led by Prince Sabāḥ al-Jābir, who was titled Sabāḥ the First.

His successor, Shaykh 'Abdullāh al-Mubārak, obtained the title of Qā'im Maqām in the region from the Ottoman Turks in 1292 AH / 1876 CE. Then, Shaykh Mubārak bin Sabāḥ the Second ruled from 1313 AH - 1334 AH / 1896 CE - 1917 CE.

Shaykh Mubārak saw that in order to preserve the rule in his family with the support of Britain, he should sign a protection treaty with Britain in 1316 AH / 1899 CE. After this treaty, Britain became responsible for Kuwait's foreign relations!

In 1915 CE, Shaykh Mubārak al-Sabāḥ died. The European missionaries and evangelists in their books call him "Mubārak the Great" and praise his services in facilitating the entry of missionary activity into the Arabian Peninsula and the Arabian Gulf region! The English also praise him as one of their most loyal helpers and advisors. We have already mentioned that he was behind the proposal of Āl Sa'ūd and their tyrant 'Abd al-'Azīz for the task of controlling the Land of the Two Holy Mosques, Najd, and its dependencies within the English program to control the island of Islam and Muslims. This is a sufficient ruinous boast for him, in addition to his great services in placing Kuwait under British protection to preserve his rule, handing over the country's foreign policy decisions and internal policies, and his support for the missionaries.

In 1921 CE, Shaykh Ahmad al-Jābir took power, and his reign witnessed the exploration of oil and the export of the first shipment of Kuwaiti oil in 1946 CE. Various government administrations were also organized during his time, and educational missions were brought in. American influence entered alongside British influence.

Then, Shaykh Ahmad al-Jābir was succeeded by his cousin ‘Abdullāh al-Sālim al-Sabāḥ in 1950 CE. He brought about a social, cultural, and political uprising in Kuwait. During his reign, Kuwait's independence was declared in June 1961 CE, and it joined the Arab League and the United Nations in 1382 AH / 1963 CE.

He was then succeeded by the current Emir, Jābir al-Sabāḥ. During his reign, Kuwait became the most corrupt of the Arab Gulf states in the areas of religion, morals, and secular policies, to the extent that religion and Sharī‘ah became subjects of ridicule and mockery in its official newspapers. It was even announced there that a converted apostate Kuwaiti had taken a rank in the church, and a court ruled against a Kuwaiti writer who insulted the Divine Essence with a fine of 100 Kuwaiti dinars and a one-month suspended prison sentence!! - Highly Exalted is Allāh above the denial of the deniers.

As for Kuwait's transformation into a real American base and a passage and center for the movement of American forces to occupy the region, it is too well-known to waste pages explaining it here. Kuwait granted American and British forces 60% of its territory as a military base for maneuvers for the attack to occupy Iraq in 2003. The details are well-known. As for the support of its government, like the government of Saudi Arabia and all the Gulf states, with immense wealth for the war against Islam and Muslims, it is well-known. Suffice it to give an example of this from what I recall from memory: the well-known support of Kuwait for the communist government of Moscow with 4 billion dollars while the Afghan Mujahideen were knocking on the doors of Kabul just before its fall in 1992 and bankruptcy threatened the Red Army with dissolution.

8. Qatar:

The peninsula of Qatar is located within the Arabian Gulf, and its capital is "Doha." It is an area rich in oil and gas. Qatar was part of the Arabian Gulf coast that was called Bahrain. In 1360 AH / 1842 CE, Shaykh Muhammad Khalīfah (one of the tribal leaders) was appointed governor of Qatar, and he tried to become independent from Āl Khalīfah and clashed with them in a battle in which he was defeated, and Āl Khalīfah returned to rule Qatar.

The Saudis and Āl Khalīfah disputed over the rule of Qatar and clashed with them in a fierce battle that ended in favor of the Saudis, who became the rulers of Qatar. The first to pledge allegiance was Muhammad bin Thāni, who took over the leadership of his tribe; from then on, Āl Thāni appeared in Qatar. Shaykh Muhammad then tried to separate from the rule of Āl Khalīfah and rule alone, and battles took place between the two sides, ending in 1299 AH / 1882 CE.

However, Shaykh Muhammad's attempt bore fruit during the reign of his son Qāsim, who is considered the founder of the independent Emirate of Āl Thāni under the sovereignty of the Ottoman Caliphate in Qatar, as he unified Qatar and became independent from Bahrain.

He was then succeeded by his son Shaykh ‘Abdullāh from 1331 AH / 1913 CE to 1368 AH / 1949 CE.

During the reign of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh, Qatar lost its sovereignty and independence and came under British protection, like its neighbors. A protection treaty was concluded in 1334 AH / 1916 CE. During his rule, oil was discovered in Qatar. Then Shaykh ‘Abdullāh died and was succeeded by his son Shaykh ‘Alī from 1368 AH /

1949 CE to 1379 AH / 1960 CE. Britain then withdrew from the Gulf, and Qatar declared its independence in 1390 AH / 1971 CE, where it entered completely into American influence, as happened to its neighbors.

In 1391 AH / 1972 CE, Shaykh Khalīfah bin Hamad Āl Thāni seized power in the country. Britain granted it independence from British protection. Its economic and social conditions improved, benefiting from the oil wealth that began production and export in 1949 CE.

Then gas was discovered in Qatar, and it became one of the leading gas exporting countries in the world. Then the current Emir of Qatar removed his father in the late nineties and took power. During his reign, Qatar began to try to play a regional role in the region and to oppose Saudi policies. It is witnessing bold developmental political changes compared to the totalitarian regimes in the Arab Gulf. One of its most successful policies was the establishment of the famous and widely known bold satellite channel, Al Jazeera.

In the war to occupy Iraq in 2003, America, as is well known, moved the command of its armies and forces operating in what it calls the Central Command area to Doha in Qatar, which is the command responsible for some one million soldiers in the region extending from Central Asia to the farthest Maghreb. From al-Sayliyyah base near Doha, America managed the aerial and missile bombardment operations, electronic warfare, and then the ground occupation of Iraq, which advanced through Kuwaiti territory. It also served as the media center for the American forces during the war. To Allāh we belong, and to Him we shall return.

9. Bahrain:

It is a group of islands located in the Arabian Gulf between the Qatar peninsula and the coast of al-Ahsa, and it contains eleven islands, the largest of which is the island of Bahrain. It was formerly known as the island of "Awal" and was ruled by Āl Khalīfah from the ‘Utūb tribe, who strengthened their relationship with Āl Sa‘ūd against the Ottomans.

Britain's position in Bahrain was then consolidated after World War II, and in 1365 AH / 1946 CE, Bahrain became a base for British colonialism in the Gulf.

Britain then announced Bahrain's independence in 1390 AH / 1971 CE, and a decision was issued to name it "State of Bahrain" during the reign of ‘Īsā bin Salmān, the Emir of Bahrain. Then the Emir of Bahrain died and was succeeded by his son Hamad bin ‘Īsā. In 2002, this (Hamad) decided to turn Bahrain into a kingdom! He enacted a constitution and granted some freedoms, and titled himself "His Majesty the King of the Kingdom of Bahrain"! (Majesty pronounced with a fatha on the zā’ to avoid embarrassment! although he rightfully deserves the sukūn on his zā’ with merit) noting that the area of his glorious kingdom does not exceed 600 square kilometers, slightly more than the area of a medium-sized golf course. And Allāh has His affairs in His creation.

The Americans have turned Bahrain into a brothel for the rest and relaxation of their fighting soldiers in the region, where they have brought groups of prostitutes from Eastern European countries and various allied countries, including some Arab ones! during the war to liberate Kuwait and the war to liberate Iraq, and the subsequent liberations we await. Allāh knows best. By the blessings of those of greatness, majesty, sovereignty, and highness... and their inflated scholars of leniency... may Allāh curse them.

10. United Arab Emirates:

This state is located on the eastern tip of the Arabian Peninsula, bordering the Arabian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman, and includes seven Emirates: Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, Umm al-Quwain, Ajman, Ras al-Khaimah, and Fujairah. The Qawāsīm tribe dominated these areas and engaged in extensive maritime activity, controlling navigation in the Gulf during the era of their leader Raḥmah bin Maṭar al-Qāsimī in 1159 AH / 1747 CE. They succeeded in defeating the Portuguese and extended their influence in the region.

Britain then managed to eliminate the Qawāsim after campaigns and concluded a treaty with the Shaykhs of the Emirates. According to this, the British political resident managed the affairs of the "Trucial States," as they were called, from his center in Iran from 1823 CE to 1934 CE. The political resident then moved to Bahrain in 1948 CE, and the first British political officer was appointed as political resident in Sharjah.

The British Political Residency was then established there in 1953 CE and moved to Dubai in 1954 CE. In 1968 CE, the British government announced its withdrawal from the Gulf region by a date not exceeding 1971 CE. Efforts began to unify the Emirates into one state. In the same year, 1968 CE, Shaykh Zāyid bin Sulṭān Āl Nahyān, the ruler of Abu Dhabi, agreed with Shaykh Rāshid bin Saʿīd Āl Maktūm, the ruler of Dubai, and discussed the union of the two Emirates with him. The other seven Emirates and Bahrain and Qatar were then invited to a meeting in Dubai. The agreement known as the Dubai Agreement emerged from this meeting. Shaykh Zāyid was chosen as the chairman of the Supreme Council of the Union.

However, disagreement arose among the Emirs regarding the drafting of the constitution. In 1971 CE, a seven-emirate union formula was reached, including the Emirates of the Omani coast, and the birth of the "United Arab Emirates" was announced in 1971 CE, which included six Emirates: Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, Ajman, Umm al-Quwain, and Fujairah. The Emirate of Ras al-Khaimah then joined the new state (1972 CE), which was formed and recognized by Britain. The United Nations General Assembly also agreed to accept it as a member, while Bahrain and Qatar kept themselves away from the nascent union.

Despite its relatively large area, the UAE has a population of only about 250,000 citizens. Around one million Indians, most of whom are Hindus, have been living there for decades, in addition to another million foreigners, including a large Christian Filipino community and a large number of Europeans, especially Britons. The UAE is considered a center for the activity of missionary organizations throughout the region. After the entry of American influence, it also became a major air and naval base for allied American and British forces. Dubai has become one of the largest global commercial capitals and a den of corruption, debauchery, and prostitution on a global scale. It has also become a major headquarters for counter-terrorism operations, with major American security offices run by Americans and Britons in cooperation with some Arab intelligence agencies, especially the Egyptian one, which has extensive experience in fighting Islamists. The senior command of the small UAE army is British, the middle ranks are Pakistani mercenaries, and the lower ranks are from various volunteers! They are headed by some honorary generals from the sons of the princely family!

11. Oman:

Oman is located in the southeastern corner of the Arabian Peninsula. It is considered a stronghold of the Ibadi Kharijites who established a state there since the late Umayyad era.

Oman was exposed to the Portuguese threat, and the Ottomans confronted them. It was also subject to Turkish-Persian rivalry due to its strategic location. However, the weakness of the Ottomans and the Portuguese opened the door to British and French influence. During the reign of Sultan Saʿīd bin Taymūr, he was able to consolidate the unity of Oman by annexing the "Buraimi" oasis with the help of Britain in 1954 CE. Then Sultan Qābūs bin Saʿīd took power in 1970 CE after killing his father and seizing power. The country witnessed a political and economic renaissance during his reign. During his reign, the Sultanate of Oman joined the Arab League and the United Nations after its independence. Oman is considered one of the most important British and American military bases in the region.

12. Yemen:

Yemen was not completely subject to Ottoman rule, and all the campaigns undertaken to turn it into an Ottoman administration failed due to the rugged nature of the land and the solidarity of its people around the Zaidi Imams in Sana'a.

Zaidi families ruled in Yemen since 1506 CE in the capital Sana'a. During that period, a long conflict occurred between the Turks and the Zaidi family. In the nineteenth century CE, the influence of the Ottomans was limited to Tihamah, southern Yemen, and Sana'a and its surroundings.

This continued until a truce was reached between the Ottomans and the Yemenis, known as the "Da'ān Agreement." During this time, the English were trying to consolidate their foothold in Aden and expand their sphere of influence. After World War I and Turkey's defeat, the Ottomans pledged to evacuate the Arab countries - including Yemen. Imam Yaḥyā Ḥamīd ad-Dīn seized the kingdom and became independent in 1923 CE, and the Ottomans recognized Yemen's independence. The conflict in Yemen against Britain continued until a treaty was concluded in 1934 CE, in which Britain recognized Yemen's independence.

However, it left the border problem in the south unresolved. Thus, the dispute remained, and Britain remained present in South Arabia in Aden. Britain repeated its attack on Yemen in 1956 CE. In 1957 CE, 'Abdullāh bin al-Zayr revolted against Imam Yaḥyā and succeeded in assassinating him and seizing power in Sana'a. However, Imam Ahmad bin Yaḥyā succeeded in defeating him and regaining power.

In March 1955 CE, a coup against Imam Ahmad took place but failed.

In September 1962 CE, the revolution led by ‘Abdullāh al-Sallāl erupted in Yemen with the help of Egypt and succeeded in declaring a republican system in North Yemen.

Britain had withdrawn from Aden and handed over power there to the communists, who became independent in South Yemen and fought against Islam and Muslims. They openly declared atheism, demolished mosques, and killed scholars. Then Allāh set them against each other, and they annihilated each other in a fierce war over a short period.

In North Yemen, the "Jawīsh" Ali Abdullah Saleh had taken power and remains in power until now. With his cunning, he was able to take control of affairs. He then exploited the weakness of the southerners and initiated the war of unity in cooperation with the Islamists and the northern tribes. Yemen was generally unified in 1993.

Then Abdullah Saleh began a policy of rapprochement with America and marginalizing Islamists and suppressing all forms of opposition. After the September events, Saleh openly allied with America in its counter-terrorism campaigns. He launched liquidation campaigns against the Mujahideen and the Yemeni army fought several fierce battles to expel them from their tribal strongholds - on behalf of America - inflicting heavy losses on the Mujahideen. Events are still recurring in Yemen to this day.

Bitterly reminding us of what its poet al-Bardūni said, as if describing the country, its president, and those senior Shaykhs and scholars who were ridden upon, when he said, opposing Abū Tammām's Bā'iyyah poem:

What shall I tell of Sana'a, O my homeland a beauty whose lovers are consumption and scabies.

What do you see, O Abū Tammām? Have our lineages lied? Or has their gold forgotten its origin?

Noble heads refuse the fire of their honor if the tail rides them to their masters.

And hope remains in Allāh that He will send from Yemen by the blessing of the prayer of His beloved Muṣṭafā (peace and blessings be upon him), those who resemble the soldiers of al-Mu‘taṣim, whom al-Bardūni described in the same poem, saying:

Sixty thousand like lions of the jungle set out and to the fortune-teller they said: We are the shooting stars.

And the matter does not require sixty thousand. And I ask Allāh to set upon the "Jawīsh" from the youth of Islam those by whom He will heal the breasts of a believing people. And that is not difficult for Allāh.

13. Egypt:

England and France competed to occupy Egypt at the end of the eighteenth century due to its strategic location. Britain, in particular, was interested in it because it lay on the route to its colonies in Asia.

Therefore, Britain sent a fleet that was able to defeat the French - after their occupation of Egypt with Napoleon's campaign in 1212 AH - 1798 CE - in the Battle of Abū Qīr Bay in 1212 AH - 1798. After the French evacuated Egypt in 1801 CE, Britain sent a fleet to invade Egypt through Rosetta in 1212 AH - 1807 CE, but the resistance of its people led to the failure of this invasion.

Muhammad Ali had succeeded with his intelligence in climbing on the shoulders of the popular movement. He was able to convince the people of his suitability, so the Ottomans decided to appoint him as governor of Egypt. He succeeded in becoming independent in Egypt in 1219 AH - 1805 CE. Sultan Selim III then acquiesced and issued a decree appointing him in 1806 CE. He formed a modern army and sent missions to France, which supported him and planted agents among his advisors in various fields, especially in education and Orientalist intellectual invasion.

Secularism and contemporary Arab schools of misguidance were founded during his reign, and they were the gateway to affliction for Egypt and the entire Arab world, as we will see in the next chapter.

Muhammad Ali led successful military campaigns in Sudan, the Arabian Peninsula, Syria, and Greece, but the alliance of European countries feared his ambitions, so they set a limit for him, which led to the loss of his imperial dreams after his defeat in the Battle of Navarino Bay in 1242/1827 CE against the British, and his forced withdrawal from all the provinces he had seized except Egypt according to the Treaty of London in 1255 AH / 1840 CE.

Nevertheless, Muhammad Ali succeeded in establishing a ruling family in Egypt. After his death, Abbas I took over, followed by Saʿīd Pasha, then Khedive Ismāʿīl, then Khedive ʿAbbās, down to King Farouk, the last ruler of the family, whose rule ended with the July Revolution in 1271 AH / 1952 CE led by President Gamal ʿAbdul Nāṣir and his companions known as the Free Officers. King Farouk ended up in exile in Italy, where his family engaged in prostitution!

It should be noted that during the reign of Khedive Ismāʿīl, French influence in Egypt increased significantly. One of its manifestations was the granting of a concession to Ferdinand de Lesseps to dig the Suez Canal to connect the Red Sea with the Mediterranean Sea. The digging and opening of the canal cost Egypt many lives and huge sums of money, leading the state to fall under the burden of debt. This led to the intervention of England and France and their success in supervising financial affairs in Egypt through the "Debt Fund" and forming a Franco-English bilateral committee to ensure the collection of debts.

France and Britain had concluded a friendly agreement in 1801 CE, according to which France evacuated Egypt and abandoned its colonial ambitions to subjugate Egypt to its control.

Britain seized the opportunity of the 'Urābī Revolution led by Ahmad 'Urābī against Khedive Tawfīq to achieve its goal of occupying Egypt.

Britain sent a campaign to Egypt in 1299 AH - 1882 CE. It succeeded in seizing Alexandria, then defeated the 'Urābīs at Tell el-Kebir, and then occupied Cairo and finally put an end to the 'Urābī Revolution. However, the political resistance movement against the English continued thereafter under the leadership of Muṣṭafā Kamāl, who tried to exploit France's hostility towards Britain and denounced the English in international forums, especially after they committed the crime of the Denshāway massacre in 1323 AH - 1906 CE. He also founded the National Party in 1324 AH / 1907. He had issued the newspaper "al-Liwā'" in 1318 AH / 1901 CE, which ignited the national movement in Egypt against the English.

In 1337 AH / 1919 CE, a major revolution against the English erupted under the leadership of Sa'd Zaghlūl demanding independence and the annulment of the British protectorate over Egypt which the English had imposed in 1332 AH / 1914 CE.

After the failure of the revolution, the Egyptians resorted to negotiations to achieve independence. Then Muṣṭafā al-Naḥḥās concluded a treaty with Britain in 1354 AH / 1936 CE, which granted Egypt incomplete independence.

England continued to cooperate with the palace and King Farouk and the minority parties that formed weak governments whose policies resulted in further corruption. Then the Free Officers movement led by Gamal 'Abdul Nāṣir staged the July 23, 1952 CE revolution.

An Islamic movement had emerged in Egypt in the late twenties that had a profound impact on the course of events in Egypt and the Arab world in general. This was the Muslim Brotherhood movement founded by Shaykh Ḥasan al-Bannā, who laid the foundations of his movement which aimed at restoring the Islamic Caliphate, rectifying the situation of Muslims, calling for a return to the implementation of Islamic Sharī'ah, and defending the issues of Muslims. The movement soon entered into conflict with the palace and British influence. The movement spread widely in Egypt between 1928 and the end of the forties and extended to the Levant and other countries. The English feared it greatly, especially after the contributions of the Brotherhood's Mujahideen in Egypt and Syria in the war against the Jews in 1948. Then the English and King Farouk conspired against the movement. The Mujahideen returning from Palestine were imprisoned, and Imam Ḥasan al-Bannā, may Allāh have mercy on him and forgive him, was assassinated. Then the special (secret) organization he established played a role in resisting the English in the Suez Canal area. Then the Brotherhood agreed with the Free Officers to overthrow King Farouk, and the Free Officers' coup succeeded in 1958. Major General Najib took over the presidency of the state, and then the presidency was transferred to Gamal 'Abdul Nāṣir, who betrayed the Brotherhood and turned against them, imprisoning their leaders in 1954, and executing some of them, the heroes of the resistance against the English. Then 'Abdul Nāṣir announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal, and the war known as the Tripartite Aggression against Egypt occurred in 1956.

Britain, France, and Israel participated in it, and this war provided 'Abdul Nāṣir with sufficient propaganda for his enthusiastic call for Arab nationalism, Arab unity, socialist ideas, and the liberation calls he advocated. Many countries in the Arab world were witnessing liberation movements carrying these ideas. 'Abdul Nāṣir also had international movements with some world leaders, especially the call for a gathering of non-aligned countries alongside the communist Yugoslav leader (Tito), the Indian leader (Nehru), and the Indonesian (Sukarno), where the Bandung

Conference was held in his country (1954). These ideas were inclined towards the Soviet Union in what was known as the policy of positive neutrality in the American-Soviet conflict. The story of 'Abdul Nāṣir is long and is an important stage in the history of Egypt and the Arab world, and this is not the place to investigate it. 'Abdul Nāṣir's ideas and propaganda spread in the Arab world, where the call for Arab nationalism was being promoted, and various political parties were being formed on its basis. In 1958, Arab nationalists in Syria and 'Abdul Nāṣir reached an agreement to declare unity, which the masses applauded and celebrated, and then the unity was dissolved within 3 years. 'Abdul Nāṣir ruled Egypt with a tyrannical Pharaonic rule, and for that purpose, he established security and intelligence agencies that violated the sanctity of people's lives, honor, and sanctity. Tens of books and studies have been published about that dark era, which suffice to mention here.

The "Inspirational Leader," as they called him, oppressed every opponent, and the Islamic movement, especially the Muslim Brotherhood, bore the brunt of that oppression, which reached its peak in 1965 when 'Abdul Nāṣir declared war on them during a visit to Moscow and boasted that he had imprisoned 17,000 men from them in one night! Then he executed a constellation of the best sons of Egypt, headed by the martyred teacher Professor Sayyid Quṭb, may Allāh have mercy on him and gather us with him in the highest ranks of Paradise. Tens of thousands of Brotherhood members entered 'Abdul Nāṣir's prisons in stages since 1954, and most of them were not released until the era of his successor Sadat in the mid-seventies!

During 'Abdul Nāṣir's rule, corruption spread throughout the state apparatus, and debauchery and immorality became widespread, especially among the leadership of the army and intelligence agencies. The Israeli Mossad was able to plant agents among the army leaders, whose commanders and security officials drowned in prostitution and degeneracy. On the morning of the fifth of June 1967, Egypt was on a date with the consequences of that era during which most of them worshiped the idolized man. In less than half an hour, while the senior commanders and officers of the Egyptian army were asleep after a red night spent as drunken adulterers, the Israeli air force destroyed the Egyptian air force on the ground at its airports. Thus, the Egyptian ground forces were left at the mercy of the Israeli air force, which carried out horrific massacres among them. The Six-Day War resulted in the Jewish occupation of the Sinai Desert up to the Suez Canal bank, while the Ba'athists and Nusayris on the Syrian front sold the Golan Heights to Israel. Hafiz al-Assad, as we mentioned, announced the collapse of the fronts and the arbitrary withdrawal from them twenty-four hours before the Jews reached them. Then 'Abdul Nāṣir and his worshipers staged the play of his resignation after the defeat, and the rabble came out into the streets shouting for his life and his remaining in power. After two years of the defeat, 'Abdul Nāṣir died in 1969. After his death, many books were published about him, some of which went to the extreme of sanctification.

The so-called Nasserist parties spread in Egypt and the Arab world, and some went so far as to believe what some retired American and other intelligence officers published, where they proved that he was an agent of American intelligence and that he implemented a program prepared with them from the beginning to the end. Among the most famous of these books is "The Game of Nations" by its author Copeland, who elaborated on this hypothesis, which his lovers rejected and considered it Zionist propaganda! Regardless of the speculations, the undeniable facts are that he was a tyrannical, arrogant disbeliever in Allāh's religion. Egypt and its people suffered great hardships during his reign. He left it after him a barren wasteland of poverty and corruption, and the spread of immorality, disobedience, and misguided, deviant ideas.

He was then succeeded in power by (Anwar Sadat), and he quickly took an opposite direction. He adopted an American approach and called his policy "Infitāḥ"

(openness). Capitalism grew during his reign, and relations with the Soviet Union shrank. To counter the leftist tide that grew like cancer during the reign of his deceased predecessor, Sadat adopted policies, one of which was to give leeway to Islamic movements. He released the Muslim Brotherhood and allowed Islamic Da‘wah to grow in universities. Soon, Islamists filled universities, professional and scientific unions, and swept the Egyptian street, so he began to curb their power.

In 1980, Sadat surprised the world by proposing the idea of peace with Israel and normalizing relations under the pretext of building and developing Egypt in an atmosphere of peace. He followed this with his famous visit to Israel and Jerusalem, and returned to find the Muslim giant he had released from ‘Abdul Nāṣir’s flask waiting for him in Cairo. He then followed his rapid steps with the famous Camp David Accords. The media showed him shaking hands with Menachem Begin, the butcher of the infamous Deir Yassīn massacre. Under these agreements, Israel returned the Sinai Desert to Egypt while remaining under its practical control, and the Israeli flag flew over Cairo on the banks of the Nile above the first Israeli embassy in the Arab world. The honorable scholars and preachers spoke out against him, so he imprisoned them. He declared war on Islamists in 1981, imprisoned their leaders, and challenged creation by announcing that he had thrown them in prison like dogs!

Soon after that, Allāh sent him lions from Islam who threw him under the chairs, dead like a dog in reality, not metaphorically, as the Mujahideen from the Islamic Group and Jihād organizations killed him in the famous platform incident, while he was at the height of his glory and reviewing his forces, having appeared before his people in his finery at a large military parade. Allāh caused the ground to swallow him up and sent the soldiers of Allāh to make him follow his predecessor the Pharaoh and be a sign for those who came after him.

He was then succeeded by the current Pharaoh, his deputy (Hosni Mubarak), may Allāh not bless him. He completed the path outlined by America and proceeded with the policies of normalization with the Jews. He still rules Egypt with an iron fist and the grip of the security apparatus and martial law since 1981 until today, where he is arranging with the Americans for the inheritance of the Pharaonic throne by his son Gamal Mubarak!

Mubarak's reign witnessed a fierce war by the Egyptian regime against the Islamists. The Jihadi groups confronted him and entered into a bitter conflict that only recently came to an end after the security agencies succeeded, thanks to the policies of liquidation and oppression and the cooperation of the scholars of the sultans, may Allāh disgrace them with him, in aborting the Jihād, leaving the field clear for Mubarak and his group to roam freely throughout the land of Kinānah.

Today, Egypt is considered one of the pillars of American-Zionist policies in the region and a support for the Arab and Islamic regimes in their security and intellectual struggle against Islamists.

Despite this, America continues to hint at its programs targeting Egypt with partition and threats after its agents have infiltrated various aspects of Egyptian life.

14. Sudan:

Muhammad Ali Pasha, the ruler of Egypt, succeeded in sending several campaigns to Sudan led by his youngest son Ismā'īl Kāmil in 1819/1821 CE. These campaigns were able to annex Sudan to Egypt and achieve the unity of the Nile Valley. When Britain seized Egypt in 1299 AH / 1882 CE, it planned to separate Sudan from Egypt and reach the sources of the Nile.

When the Mahdist Revolution broke out in Sudan under the leadership of Sayyid Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdī, Britain asked Egypt to withdraw its forces from Sudan and sent a campaign led by Gordon, but the rebels defeated and killed him in Khartoum in 1302 AH - 1885 CE. In 1313 AH - 1896 CE, Britain sent the Kitchener campaign to Sudan and used the efforts of Egyptian soldiers! The campaign succeeded in defeating the Mahdist rebels in 1315 AH - 1898 CE after seizing Omdurman, and thus Britain achieved the annexation of Sudan to its empire.

Britain and its client government in Egypt agreed in 1316 AH - 1899 CE to rule Sudan under a condominium despite the protests of Egyptian nationalists. Britain began to stir up conflict between Egyptians and Sudanese but did not succeed. After the revolution of 1337 AH - 1919 CE in Egypt, a revolution broke out in Sudan led by ‘Abdul Qādir Wad Ḥubūbah demanding the evacuation of Britain from the Nile Valley.

Despite Britain's suppression of the revolution, the national movement in Sudan escalated. In 1340 AH - 1922, the Sudanese Union Society and the White Flag Society were formed, and they began to work secretly to expel Britain and achieve the unity of Egypt and Sudan.

However, the Sudanese national movement continued to resist the British presence. The Ummah Party was formed under the leadership of al-Mahdī, and the National Unionist Party under the leadership of al-Azhari to lead the struggle against Britain. After the July Revolution in Egypt in 1371 AH - 1952 CE and the signing of the evacuation agreement in 1375 AH - 1956 CE, Egypt and Britain agreed to leave the choice to the Sudanese to determine their fate. They chose independence, which was achieved in 1956 CE, and a state was established under a republican system recognized by the Arab League and the United Nations.

Civilian and military governments succeeded each other in Sudan until Ja‘far al-Numayrī took power in a military coup. During his reign, the Islamic movement grew, the most prominent of which was the Sudanese National Islamic Front led by Hasan al-Turābī, which was founded on the principles of the Muslim Brotherhood, but then al-Turābī separated from it and formed his own movement with a new ideology based on his ideas and independent interpretations in movement and Fiqh. Then al-Turābī and al-Numayrī allied on the basis of implementing Sharīʿah in Sudan. Then al-Turābī arranged a military coup that overthrew al-Numayrī and brought to power what was known as the Salvation Revolution by officers belonging to al-Turābī led by President ʿUmar al-Bashīr. Then a divorce occurred between al-Turābī and his officer students, and they imprisoned their Shaykh several times, as he turned to the opposition!

Al-Bashīr and his companions tried to advance Sudan and implement Sharīʿah, but American conspiracies exhausted them by supporting armed rebellion movements in southern Sudan, its east, and recently in its west. The matter led the al-Bashīr group to choose a policy of submission to America and its endless demands. They expelled the Mujahideen, then expelled Bin Laden, then signed humiliating agreements with the southern Christians, then opened public offices for the FBI and concluded security agreements to combat terrorism. They even went so far as to hand over some of the Mujahideen pursued by the Libyan regime to Gaddafi's government, knowing that they were handing them over for execution, just as they handed over a number of Saudi brothers to their country's security apparatus in 2004. Despite the endless concessions, the American government continues to pursue the Sudanese government with threats and intimidation, to the extent that the matter has reached these days the announcement by America and Western countries, including Britain, France, and others, of direct political and military intervention in western Sudan, under the pretext of tribal disputes in the Darfur region, in a clear plan to divide Sudan, proving that the policy of appeasement and concessions only results in the beast preying on the black bull after eating the white bull while it was looking on and abandoning it. And glory be to the Judge, as you judge, you will be judged. And indeed, in that is a lesson for those with understanding, if there is any remnant of them.

15. Libya:

After the achievement of Italian unity in 1285 AH / 1870 CE, Italy aspired to participate in the European colonial movement. Due to its proximity to Libya, it considered it a vital area, so many Italians emigrated to Libya and formed a community that began to spread Italian culture and language in the country and pave the way for Italian political and economic influence.

Italy then paved the way for the occupation of Libya after the approval of international powers such as England, France, Russia, and Germany of its ambitions. It sent a campaign that occupied Tripoli and Benghazi after the failure of the Ottoman garrison in the fighting in 1329 AH / 1911 CE. The other regions were destined to fall into the hands of the invaders in 1912 CE. The city of Ajdabiya fell in 1923 CE, and Fezzan fell in 1928 CE.

In 1929 CE, Mussolini issued a decree unifying Cyrenaica and Tripolitania into one province, and his forces occupied the Kufra Oasis in 1930 CE.

When the Jihād movement against Italy arose, Italy suppressed it brutally and forcefully. It mobilized Muslims in the Ottoman state and the Arab world, and volunteers began to pour into Libya led by ‘Azīz al-Maṣrī and Anwar Pasha. The Sanūsīs (who were a religious Sufi Jihadi movement) in the region of Cyrenaica also played an important role in the Jihād, and the rebels tightened the noose on the Italians and strengthened the Ottoman garrisons in Libya.

After the failure of the Ottoman state in its war with Italy in the Balkans, it succumbed to Italy's demands to permanently withdraw its forces from Cyrenaica and Tripolitania.

The Sanūsīs then confronted the occupation and adopted the method of lightning raids (guerrilla warfare) and were close to defeating the Italians, were it not for Britain's military support and its winning over of Ahmad al-Sanūsī, who left Libya for Istanbul in 1918 CE.

In 1920 CE, Italy concluded a treaty with Muhammad Idrīs al-Sanūsī. The two parties agreed to end the war, and al-Sanūsī recognized Italy's sovereignty over Cyrenaica, and Italy recognized his sovereignty over the lands that were under his influence.

Nevertheless, the national movement continued the struggle, especially after Mussolini came to power in Italy in 1922 CE. He declared that Libya was Italian and annulled all previous agreements.

Then the Mujahid Shaykh, the martyr ‘Umar al-Mukhtār, may Allāh have mercy on him, led the struggle movement, adopting the method of lightning warfare, which exhausted the Italian armies. However, Italy sent new forces to Libya and succeeded after much effort and heavy losses in capturing the rebels. ‘Umar al-Mukhtār was captured and hanged as a martyr - as we believe him to be - may Allāh have mercy on him, in 1350 AH / 1931 CE.

When World War II broke out and Italy joined Germany, Muhammad Idrīs al-Sanūsī returned to Libya accompanied by British forces that were able to liberate Libya in 1943 CE after the defeat of the Axis forces, and the situation was set for Libya's independence, which was announced in 1951 CE. The monarchy was established in Libya.

In 1968, Colonel Gaddafi staged a military coup (believed to have been arranged with British intelligence), and he seized power in Libya and has been there until now. He named Libya the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

The Colonel was known for his erratic temper and his bloody, oppressive dictatorial rule. He was also known for his military and political adventures in the neighboring areas and in regional issues, which exhausted Libya's economy and inflicted heavy losses on its small army due to its small population. Then his devils tempted Gaddafi to come out to the world with strange political theories. He published a book in which he attributed divinity to himself and called it The Green Book. He claimed it was the third theory of governance between the socialist and democratic approaches. The book is a mixture of oddities, nonsense, disbelief, misguidance, and ridiculousness that causes nausea. I read most of it with effort, difficulty, and a lot of patience despite its small size. I marveled at the author's ability to gather such an amount of absurdity, dullness, and meanness.

Gaddafi then openly declared disbelief and strange religious views. He denied the Sunnah, removed some words from the Qur'ān, legislated, invented, and lied about Allāh. He took some female singers as his personal guards. He has oddities and trivialities that take a long time to discuss, reminiscent of the eccentricities of the absurd, heretical, and amazing Fatimid Caliph al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh al-'Ubaydī.

Many coups have been attempted against Gaddafi, and they almost overthrew him were it not for the intervention of American and British intelligence to save him despite his revolutionary claims. A Jihadi movement also rose up against him in Libya in 1989, which he suppressed with cruelty and bloodshed. Then a Jihadi movement rose up in the mid-nineties, which he was also able to eliminate. He filled Libya's prisons with the best of Muslim youth and called them heretics!

May Allāh fight him. Gaddafi has boasted throughout his lean years of rule with slogans of Arabism, socialism, and unity. However, he recently emerged to the Ummah with his African claims and his determination to detach himself from the Arab world and withdraw from the Arab League.

Then he wore a strange shirt decorated with pictures of some African presidents and pictures of heads resembling gorillas. He then recently announced a complete submission to American and Western policies. He handed over all of his country's strategic stockpile of missiles and the beginnings of a nuclear research project and claimed that it was Libya's stockpile of weapons of mass destruction. Bush has been using him as an example for the leaders of the Arab and Islamic world and others to follow in his footsteps.

Libya is currently paying huge compensations to every European country that claims to have been subjected to a terrorist act supported by Libya, with European politicians announcing the return of relations with Libya. Bush also announced that he is satisfied with Libya, and approved the resumption of the plundering of Libya's oil by colonial companies as a reward for Gaddafi's humiliating subservience, may Allāh curse him.

Despite its relatively large area, the UAE has a population of only about 250,000 citizens. Around one million Indians, most of whom are Hindus, have been living there for decades, in addition to another million foreigners, including a large Christian Filipino community and a large number of Europeans, especially Britons. The UAE is considered a center for the activity of missionary organizations throughout the region. After the entry of American influence, it also became a major air and naval base for allied American and British forces. Dubai has become one of the largest global commercial capitals and a den of corruption, debauchery, and prostitution on a global scale. It has also become a major headquarters for counter-terrorism operations, with major American security offices run by Americans and Britons in cooperation with some Arab intelligence agencies, especially the Egyptian one, which has extensive experience in fighting Islamists. The senior command of the small UAE army is British, the middle ranks are Pakistani mercenaries, and the lower ranks are from various volunteers! They are headed by some honorary generals from the sons of the princely family!

11. Oman:

Oman is located in the southeastern corner of the Arabian Peninsula. It is considered a stronghold of the Ibadi Kharijites who established a state there since the late Umayyad era.

Oman was exposed to the Portuguese threat, and the Ottomans confronted them. It was also subject to Turkish-Persian rivalry due to its strategic location. However, the weakness of the Ottomans and the Portuguese opened the door to British and French influence. During the reign of Sultan Saʿīd bin Taymūr, he was able to consolidate the unity of Oman by annexing the "Buraimi" oasis with the help of Britain in 1954 CE. Then Sultan Qābūs bin Saʿīd took power in 1970 CE after killing his father and seizing power. The country witnessed a political and economic renaissance during his reign. During his reign, the Sultanate of Oman joined the Arab League and the United Nations after its independence. Oman is considered one of the most important British and American military bases in the region.

12. Yemen:

Yemen was not completely subject to Ottoman rule, and all the campaigns undertaken to turn it into an Ottoman administration failed due to the rugged nature of the land and the solidarity of its people around the Zaidi Imams in Sana'a.

Zaidi families ruled in Yemen since 1506 CE in the capital Sana'a. During that period, a long conflict occurred between the Turks and the Zaidi family. In the nineteenth century CE, the influence of the Ottomans was limited to Tihamah, southern Yemen, and Sana'a and its surroundings.

This continued until a truce was reached between the Ottomans and the Yemenis, known as the "Da‘ān Agreement." During this time, the English were trying to consolidate their foothold in Aden and expand their sphere of influence. After World War I and Turkey's defeat, the Ottomans pledged to evacuate the Arab countries - including Yemen. Imam Yaḥyā Ḥamīd ad-Dīn seized the kingdom and became independent in 1923 CE, and the Ottomans recognized Yemen's independence. The conflict in Yemen against Britain continued until a treaty was concluded in 1934 CE, in which Britain recognized Yemen's independence.

However, it left the border problem in the south unresolved. Thus, the dispute remained, and Britain remained present in South Arabia in Aden. Britain repeated its attack on Yemen in 1956 CE. In 1957 CE, ‘Abdullāh bin al-Zayr revolted against Imam Yaḥyā and succeeded in assassinating him and seizing power in Sana'a. However, Imam Ahmad bin Yaḥyā succeeded in defeating him and regaining power.

In March 1955 CE, a coup against Imam Ahmad took place but failed.

In September 1962 CE, the revolution led by ‘Abdullāh al-Sallāl erupted in Yemen with the help of Egypt and succeeded in declaring a republican system in North Yemen.

Britain had withdrawn from Aden and handed over power there to the communists, who became independent in South Yemen and fought against Islam and Muslims. They openly declared atheism, demolished mosques, and killed scholars. Then Allāh set them against each other, and they annihilated each other in a fierce war over a short period.

In North Yemen, the "Jawīsh" Ali Abdullah Saleh had taken power and remains in power until now. With his cunning, he was able to take control of affairs. He then exploited the weakness of the southerners and initiated the war of unity in cooperation with the Islamists and the northern tribes. Yemen was generally unified in 1993.

Then Abdullah Saleh began a policy of rapprochement with America and marginalizing Islamists and suppressing all forms of opposition. After the September events, Saleh openly allied with America in its counter-terrorism campaigns. He launched liquidation campaigns against the Mujahideen and the Yemeni army fought several fierce battles to expel them from their tribal strongholds - on behalf of America - where he inflicted heavy losses on the Mujahideen. Events are still recurring in Yemen to this day.

Bitterly reminding us of what its poet al-Bardūni said, as if describing the country, its president, and those senior Shaykhs and scholars who were ridden upon, when he said, opposing Abū Tammām's Bā'iyyah poem:

What shall I tell of Sana'a, O my homeland a beauty whose lovers are consumption and scabies.

What do you see, O Abū Tammām? Have our lineages lied? Or has their gold forgotten its origin?

Noble heads refuse the fire of their honor if the tail rides them to their masters.

And hope remains in Allāh that He will send from Yemen by the blessing of the prayer of His beloved Muṣṭafā (peace and blessings be upon him), those who resemble the soldiers of al-Mu'taṣim, whom al-Bardūni described in the same poem, saying:

Sixty thousand like lions of the jungle set out and to the fortune-teller they said: We are the shooting stars.

And the matter does not require sixty thousand. And I ask Allāh to set upon the "Jawīsh" from the youth of Islam those by whom He will heal the breasts of a believing people. And that is not difficult for Allāh.

13. Egypt:

England and France competed to occupy Egypt at the end of the eighteenth century due to its strategic location. Britain, in particular, was interested in it because it lay on the route to its colonies in Asia.

Therefore, Britain sent a fleet that was able to defeat the French - after their occupation of Egypt with Napoleon's campaign in 1212 AH - 1798 CE - in the Battle of Abū Qīr Bay in 1212 AH - 1798. After the French evacuated Egypt in 1801 CE, Britain sent a fleet to invade Egypt through Rosetta in 1212 AH - 1807 CE, but the resistance of its people led to the failure of this invasion.

Muhammad Ali had succeeded with his intelligence in climbing on the shoulders of the popular movement. He was able to convince the people of his suitability, so the Ottomans decided to appoint him as governor of Egypt. He succeeded in becoming independent in Egypt in 1219 AH - 1805 CE. Sultan Selim III then acquiesced and issued a decree appointing him in 1806 CE. He formed a modern army and sent missions to France, which supported him and planted agents among his advisors in various fields, especially in education and Orientalist intellectual invasion.

Secularism and contemporary Arab schools of misguidance were founded during his reign, and they were the gateway to affliction for Egypt and the entire Arab world, as we will see in the next chapter.

Muhammad Ali led successful military campaigns in Sudan, the Arabian Peninsula, Syria, and Greece, but the alliance of European countries feared his ambitions, so they set a limit for him, which led to the loss of his imperial dreams after his defeat in the Battle of Navarino Bay in 1242/1827 CE against the British, and his forced withdrawal from all the provinces he had seized except Egypt according to the Treaty of London in 1255 AH / 1840 CE.

Nevertheless, Muhammad Ali succeeded in establishing a ruling family in Egypt. After his death, Abbas I took over, followed by Sa'īd Pasha, then Khedive Ismā'īl, then Khedive 'Abbās, down to King Farouk, the last ruler of the family, whose rule ended with the July Revolution in 1271 AH / 1952 CE led by President Gamal 'Abdul Nāṣir and his companions known as the Free Officers. King Farouk ended up in exile in Italy, where his family engaged in prostitution!

It should be noted that during the reign of Khedive Ismā'īl, French influence in Egypt increased significantly. One of its manifestations was the granting of a concession to Ferdinand de Lesseps to dig the Suez Canal to connect the Red Sea with the Mediterranean Sea. The digging and opening of the canal cost Egypt many lives and huge sums of money, leading the state to fall under the burden of debt. This led to the intervention of England and France and their success in supervising financial affairs in Egypt through the "Debt Fund" and forming a Franco-English bilateral committee to ensure the collection of debts.

France and Britain had concluded a friendly agreement in 1801 CE, according to which France evacuated Egypt and abandoned its colonial ambitions to subjugate Egypt to its control.

Britain seized the opportunity of the 'Urābī Revolution led by Ahmad 'Urābī against Khedive Tawfīq to achieve its goal of occupying Egypt.

Britain sent a campaign to Egypt in 1299 AH - 1882 CE. It succeeded in seizing Alexandria, then defeated the 'Urābīs at Tell el-Kebir, and then occupied Cairo and finally put an end to the 'Urābī Revolution. However, the political resistance movement against the English continued thereafter under the leadership of Muṣṭafā Kamāl, who tried to exploit France's hostility towards Britain and denounced the English in international forums, especially after they committed the crime of the Denshāway massacre in 1323 AH - 1906 CE. He also founded the National Party in 1324 AH / 1907. He had issued the newspaper "al-Liwā'" in 1318 AH / 1901 CE, which ignited the national movement in Egypt against the English.

In 1337 AH / 1919 CE, a major revolution against the English erupted under the leadership of Sa'd Zaghlūl demanding independence and the annulment of the British protectorate over Egypt which the English had imposed in 1332 AH / 1914 CE.

After the failure of the revolution, the Egyptians resorted to negotiations to achieve independence. Then Muṣṭafā al-Naḥḥās concluded a treaty with Britain in 1354 AH / 1936 CE, which granted Egypt incomplete independence.

England continued to cooperate with the palace and King Farouk and the minority parties that formed weak governments whose policies resulted in further corruption. Then the Free Officers movement led by Gamal 'Abdul Nāṣir staged the July 23, 1952 CE revolution.

An Islamic movement had emerged in Egypt in the late twenties that had a profound impact on the course of events in Egypt and the Arab world in general. This was the Muslim Brotherhood movement founded by Shaykh Ḥasan al-Bannā, who laid the foundations of his movement which aimed at restoring the Islamic Caliphate, rectifying the situation of Muslims, calling for a return to the implementation of Islamic Sharī'ah, and defending the issues of Muslims. The movement soon entered into conflict with the palace and British influence. The movement spread widely in Egypt between 1928 and the end of the forties and extended to the Levant and other countries. The English feared it greatly, especially after the contributions of the Brotherhood's Mujahideen in Egypt and Syria in the war against the Jews in 1948. Then the English and King Farouk conspired against the movement. The Mujahideen returning from Palestine were imprisoned, and Imam Ḥasan al-Bannā, may Allāh have mercy on him and forgive him, was assassinated. Then the special (secret) organization he established played a role in resisting the English in the Suez Canal area. Then the Brotherhood agreed with the Free Officers to overthrow King Farouk, and the Free Officers' coup succeeded in 1952. Major General Najib took over the presidency of the state, and then the presidency was transferred to Gamal 'Abdul Nāṣir, who betrayed the Brotherhood and turned against them, imprisoning their leaders in 1954, and executing some of them, the heroes of the resistance against the English. Then 'Abdul Nāṣir announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal, and the war known as the Tripartite Aggression against Egypt occurred in 1956.

Britain, France, and Israel participated in it, and this war provided 'Abdul Nāṣir with sufficient propaganda for his enthusiastic call for Arab nationalism, Arab unity, socialist ideas, and the liberation calls he advocated. Many countries in the Arab world were witnessing liberation movements carrying these ideas. 'Abdul Nāṣir also had international movements with some world leaders, especially the call for a gathering of non-aligned countries alongside the communist Yugoslav leader (Tito), the Indian leader (Nehru), and the Indonesian (Sukarno), where the Bandung Conference was held in his country (1955). These ideas were inclined towards the Soviet Union in what was known as the policy of positive neutrality in the American-Soviet conflict. The story of 'Abdul Nāṣir is long and is an important stage in the history of Egypt and the Arab world, and this is not the place to investigate it. 'Abdul Nāṣir's ideas and propaganda spread in the Arab world, where the call for Arab nationalism was being promoted, and various political parties were being formed on its basis. In 1958, Arab nationalists in Syria and 'Abdul Nāṣir reached an agreement to declare unity, which the masses applauded and celebrated, and then the unity was dissolved within 3 years. 'Abdul Nāṣir ruled Egypt with a tyrannical Pharaonic rule, and for that purpose, he established security and intelligence agencies that violated the sanctity of people's lives, honor, and sanctity. Tens of books and studies have been published about that dark era, which suffice to mention here.

The "Inspirational Leader," as they called him, oppressed every opponent, and the Islamic movement, especially the Muslim Brotherhood, bore the brunt of that oppression, which reached its peak in 1965 when 'Abdul Nāṣir declared war on them during a visit to Moscow and boasted that he had imprisoned 17,000 men from them in one night! Then he executed a constellation of the best sons of Egypt, headed by the martyred teacher Professor Sayyid Quṭb, may Allāh have mercy on him and gather us with him in the highest ranks of Paradise. Tens of thousands of Brotherhood members entered 'Abdul Nāṣir's prisons in stages since 1954, and most of them were not released until the era of his successor Sadat in the mid-seventies!

During 'Abdul Nāṣir's rule, corruption spread throughout the state apparatus, and debauchery and immorality became widespread, especially among the leadership of the army and intelligence agencies. The Israeli Mossad was able to plant agents among the army leaders, whose commanders and security officials drowned in prostitution and degeneracy. On the morning of the fifth of June 1967, Egypt was on a date with the consequences of that era during which most of them worshiped the idolized man. In less than half an hour, while the senior commanders and officers of the Egyptian army were asleep after a red night spent as drunken adulterers, the Israeli air force destroyed the Egyptian air force on the ground at its airports. Thus, the Egyptian ground forces were left at the mercy of the Israeli air force, which carried out horrific massacres among them. The Six-Day War resulted in the Jewish occupation of the Sinai Desert up to the Suez Canal bank, while the Ba'athists and Nusayris on the Syrian front sold the Golan Heights to Israel. Hafiz al-Assad, as we mentioned, announced the collapse of the fronts and the arbitrary withdrawal from them twenty-four hours before the Jews reached them. Then 'Abdul Nāṣir and his worshippers staged the play of his resignation after the defeat, and the rabble came out into the streets shouting for his life and his remaining in power. After two years of the defeat, 'Abdul Nāṣir died in 1969. After his death, many books were published about him, some of which went to the extreme of sanctification.

The so-called Nasserist parties spread in Egypt and the Arab world, and some went so far as to believe what some retired American and other intelligence officers published, where they proved that he was an agent of American intelligence and that he implemented a program prepared with them from the beginning to the end. Among the most famous of these books is "The Game of Nations" by its author Copeland, who elaborated on this hypothesis, which his lovers rejected and considered it Zionist propaganda! Regardless of the speculations, the undeniable facts are that he was a tyrannical, arrogant disbeliever in Allāh's religion. Egypt and its people suffered great hardships during his reign. He left it after him a barren wasteland of poverty and corruption, and the spread of immorality, disobedience, and misguided, deviant ideas.

He was then succeeded in power by (Anwar Sadat), and he quickly took an opposite direction. He adopted an American approach and called his policy "Infitāḥ" (openness). Capitalism grew during his reign, and relations with the Soviet Union shrank. To counter the leftist tide that grew like cancer during the reign of his deceased predecessor, Sadat adopted policies, one of which was to give leeway to Islamic movements. He released the Muslim Brotherhood and allowed Islamic Da'wah to grow in universities. Soon, Islamists filled universities, professional and scientific unions, and swept the Egyptian street, so he began to curb their power.

In 1980, Sadat surprised the world by proposing the idea of peace with Israel and normalizing relations under the pretext of building and developing Egypt in an atmosphere of peace. He followed this with his famous visit to Israel and Jerusalem, and returned to find the Muslim giant he had released from 'Abdul Nāṣir's flask waiting for him in Cairo. He then followed his rapid steps with the famous Camp David Accords. The media showed him shaking hands with Menachem Begin, the butcher of the infamous Deir Yassīn massacre. Under these agreements, Israel returned the Sinai Desert to Egypt while remaining under its practical control, and the Israeli flag flew over Cairo on the banks of the Nile above the first Israeli embassy in the Arab world. The honorable scholars and preachers spoke out against him, so he imprisoned them. He declared war on Islamists in 1981, imprisoned their leaders, and challenged creation by announcing that he had thrown them in prison like dogs!

Soon after that, Allāh sent him lions from Islam who threw him under the chairs, dead like a dog in reality, not metaphorically, as the Mujahideen from the Islamic Group and Jihād organizations killed him in the famous platform incident, while he was at the height of his glory and reviewing his forces, having appeared before his people in his finery at a large military parade. Allāh caused the ground to swallow him up and sent the soldiers of Allāh to make him follow his predecessor the Pharaoh and be a sign for those who came after him.

He was then succeeded by the current Pharaoh, his deputy (Hosni Mubarak), may Allāh not bless him. He completed the path outlined by America and proceeded with the policies of normalization with the Jews. He still rules Egypt with an iron fist and the grip of the security apparatus and martial law since 1981 until today, where he is arranging with the Americans for the inheritance of the Pharaonic throne by his son Gamal Mubarak!

Mubarak's reign witnessed a fierce war by the Egyptian regime against the Islamists. The Jihadi groups confronted him and entered into a bitter conflict that only recently came to an end after the security agencies succeeded, thanks to the policies of liquidation and oppression and the cooperation of the scholars of the sultans, may Allāh disgrace them with him, in aborting the Jihād, leaving the field clear for Mubarak and his group to roam freely throughout the land of Kinānah.

Today, Egypt is considered one of the pillars of American-Zionist policies in the region and a support for the Arab and Islamic regimes in their security and intellectual struggle against Islamists.

Despite this, America continues to hint at its programs targeting Egypt with partition and threats after its agents have infiltrated various aspects of Egyptian life.

14. Sudan:

Muhammad Ali Pasha, the ruler of Egypt, succeeded in sending several campaigns to Sudan led by his youngest son Ismā'īl Kāmil in 1819/1821 CE. These campaigns were able to annex Sudan to Egypt and achieve the unity of the Nile Valley. When Britain seized Egypt in 1299 AH / 1882 CE, it planned to separate Sudan from Egypt and reach the sources of the Nile.

When the Mahdist Revolution broke out in Sudan under the leadership of Sayyid Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdī, Britain asked Egypt to withdraw its forces from Sudan and sent a campaign led by Gordon, but the rebels defeated and killed him in Khartoum in 1302 AH - 1885 CE. In 1313 AH - 1896 CE, Britain sent the Kitchener campaign to Sudan and used the efforts of Egyptian soldiers! The campaign succeeded in defeating the Mahdist rebels in 1315 AH - 1898 CE after seizing Omdurman, and thus Britain achieved the annexation of Sudan to its empire.

Britain and its client government in Egypt agreed in 1316 AH - 1899 CE to rule Sudan under a condominium despite the protests of Egyptian nationalists. Britain began to stir up conflict between Egyptians and Sudanese but did not succeed. After the revolution of 1337 AH - 1919 CE in Egypt, a revolution broke out in Sudan led by ‘Abdul Qādir Wad Ḥubūbah demanding the evacuation of Britain from the Nile Valley.

Despite Britain's suppression of the revolution, the national movement in Sudan escalated. In 1340 AH - 1922, the Sudanese Union Society and the White Flag Society were formed, and they began to work secretly to expel Britain and achieve the unity of Egypt and Sudan.

However, the Sudanese national movement continued to resist the British presence. The Ummah Party was formed under the leadership of al-Mahdī, and the National Unionist Party under the leadership of al-Azhari to lead the struggle against Britain. After the July Revolution in Egypt in 1371 AH - 1952 CE and the signing of the evacuation agreement in 1375 AH - 1956 CE, Egypt and Britain agreed to leave the choice to the Sudanese to determine their fate. They chose independence, which was achieved in 1956 CE, and a state was established under a republican system recognized by the Arab League and the United Nations.

Civilian and military governments succeeded each other in Sudan until Ja‘far al-Numayrī took power in a military coup. During his reign, the Islamic movement grew, the most prominent of which was the Sudanese National Islamic Front led by Hasan al-Turābī, which was founded on the principles of the Muslim Brotherhood, but then al-Turābī separated from it and formed his own movement with a new ideology based on his ideas and independent interpretations in movement and Fiqh. Then al-Turābī and al-Numayrī allied on the basis of implementing Sharī‘ah in Sudan. Then al-Turābī arranged a military coup that overthrew al-Numayrī and brought to power what was known as the Salvation Revolution by officers belonging to al-Turābī led by President ‘Umar al-Bashīr. Then a divorce occurred between al-Turābī and his officer students, and they imprisoned their Shaykh several times, as he turned to the opposition!

Al-Bashīr and his companions tried to advance Sudan and implement Sharī'ah, but American conspiracies exhausted them by supporting armed rebellion movements in southern Sudan, its east, and recently in its west. The matter led the al-Bashīr group to choose a policy of submission to America and its endless demands. They expelled the Mujahideen, then expelled Bin Laden, then signed humiliating agreements with the southern Christians, then opened public offices for the FBI and concluded security agreements to combat terrorism. They even went so far as to hand over some of the Mujahideen pursued by the Libyan regime to Gaddafi's government, knowing that they were handing them over for execution, just as they handed over a number of Saudi brothers to their country's security apparatus in 2004. Despite the endless concessions, the American government continues to pursue the Sudanese government with threats and intimidation, to the extent that the matter has reached these days the announcement by America and Western countries, including Britain, France, and others, of direct political and military intervention in western Sudan, under the pretext of tribal disputes in the Darfur region, in a clear plan to divide Sudan, proving that the policy of appeasement and concessions only results in the beast preying on the black bull after eating the white bull while it was looking on and abandoning it. And glory be to the Judge, as you judge, you will be judged. And indeed, in that is a lesson for those with understanding, if there is any remnant of them.

15. Libya:

After the achievement of Italian unity in 1285 AH / 1870 CE, Italy aspired to participate in the European colonial movement. Due to its proximity to Libya, it considered it a vital area, so many Italians emigrated to Libya and formed a community that began to spread Italian culture and language in the country and pave the way for Italian political and economic influence.

Italy then paved the way for the occupation of Libya after the approval of international powers such as England, France, Russia, and Germany of its ambitions. It sent a campaign that occupied Tripoli and Benghazi after the failure of the Ottoman garrison in the fighting in 1329 AH / 1911 CE. The other regions were destined to fall into the hands of the invaders in 1912 CE. The city of Ajdabiya fell in 1923 CE, and Fezzan fell in 1928 CE.

In 1929 CE, Mussolini issued a decree unifying Cyrenaica and Tripolitania into one province, and his forces occupied the Kufra Oasis in 1930 CE.

When the Jihād movement against Italy arose, Italy suppressed it brutally and forcefully. It mobilized Muslims in the Ottoman state and the Arab world, and volunteers began to pour into Libya led by ‘Azīz al-Maṣrī and Anwar Pasha. The Sanūsīs (who were a religious Sufi Jihadi movement) in the region of Cyrenaica also played an important role in the Jihād, and the rebels tightened the noose on the Italians and strengthened the Ottoman garrisons in Libya.

After the failure of the Ottoman state in its war with Italy in the Balkans, it succumbed to Italy's demands to permanently withdraw its forces from Cyrenaica and Tripolitania.

The Sanūsīs then confronted the occupation and adopted the method of lightning raids (guerrilla warfare) and were close to defeating the Italians, were it not for Britain's military support and its winning over of Ahmad al-Sanūsī, who left Libya for Istanbul in 1918 CE.

In 1920 CE, Italy concluded a treaty with Muhammad Idrīs al-Sanūsī. The two parties agreed to end the war, and al-Sanūsī recognized Italy's sovereignty over Cyrenaica, and Italy recognized his sovereignty over the lands that were under his influence.

Nevertheless, the national movement continued the struggle, especially after Mussolini came to power in Italy in 1922 CE. He declared that Libya was Italian and annulled all previous agreements.

Then the Mujahid Shaykh, the martyr ‘Umar al-Mukhtār, may Allāh have mercy on him, led the struggle movement, adopting the method of lightning warfare, which exhausted the Italian armies. However, Italy sent new forces to Libya and succeeded after much effort and heavy losses in capturing the rebels. ‘Umar al-Mukhtār was captured and hanged as a martyr - as we believe him to be - may Allāh have mercy on him, in 1350 AH / 1931 CE.

When World War II broke out and Italy joined Germany, Muhammad Idrīs al-Sanūsī returned to Libya accompanied by British forces that were able to liberate Libya in 1943 CE after the defeat of the Axis forces, and the situation was set for Libya's independence, which was announced in 1951 CE. The monarchy was established in Libya.

In 1968, Colonel Gaddafi staged a military coup (believed to have been arranged with British intelligence), and he seized power in Libya and has been there until now. He named Libya the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

The Colonel was known for his erratic temper and his bloody, oppressive dictatorial rule. He was also known for his military and political adventures in the neighboring areas and in regional issues, which exhausted Libya's economy and inflicted heavy losses on its small army due to its small population. Then his devils tempted Gaddafi to come out to the world with strange political theories. He published a book in which he attributed divinity to himself and called it The Green Book. He claimed it was the third theory of governance between the socialist and democratic approaches. The book is a mixture of oddities, nonsense, disbelief, misguidance, and ridiculousness that causes nausea. I read most of it with effort, difficulty, and a lot of patience despite its small size. I marveled at the author's ability to gather such an amount of absurdity, dullness, and meanness.

Gaddafi then openly declared disbelief and strange religious views. He denied the Sunnah, removed some words from the Qur'ān, legislated, invented, and lied about Allāh. He took some female singers as his personal guards. He has oddities and trivialities that take a long time to discuss, reminiscent of the eccentricities of the absurd, heretical, and amazing Fatimid Caliph al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh al-'Ubaydī.

Many coups have been attempted against Gaddafi, and they almost overthrew him were it not for the intervention of American and British intelligence to save him despite his revolutionary claims. A Jihadi movement also rose up against him in Libya in 1989, which he suppressed with cruelty and bloodshed. Then a Jihadi movement rose up in the mid-nineties, which he was also able to eliminate. He filled Libya's prisons with the best of Muslim youth and called them heretics!

May Allāh fight him. Gaddafi has boasted throughout his lean years of rule with slogans of Arabism, socialism, and unity. However, he recently emerged to the Ummah with his African claims and his determination to detach himself from the Arab world and withdraw from the Arab League.

Then he wore a strange shirt decorated with pictures of some African presidents and pictures of heads resembling gorillas. He then recently announced a complete submission to American and Western policies. He handed over all of his country's strategic stockpile of missiles and the beginnings of a nuclear research project and claimed that it was Libya's stockpile of weapons of mass destruction. Bush has been using him as an example for the leaders of the Arab and Islamic world and others to follow in his footsteps.

Libya is currently paying huge compensations to every European country that claims to have been subjected to a terrorist act supported by Libya, with European politicians announcing the return of relations with Libya. Bush also announced that he is satisfied with Libya, and approved the resumption of the plundering of Libya's oil by colonial companies as a reward for Gaddafi's humiliating subservience, may Allāh curse him.

16. Tunisia:

Tunisia entered under the rule of the Ottomans in 980 AH / 1573 CE, like other Arab countries before it. The Turks remained there for about 300 years. Due to the weakness of the Ottoman state, both France and Italy competed to occupy Tunisia. But France succeeded in extending its influence by concluding a friendly treaty with the Bey of Tunis in 1245 AH / 1830 CE, by which it obtained commercial privileges within Tunisia.

France also managed to prevent Britain from intervening in Tunisian affairs by agreeing with it that England would have a free hand in Cyprus in exchange for England not competing with France in Tunisia.

France seized the opportunity of a Tunisian tribe crossing into Algeria and sent an army to Tunisia that was able to defeat the Bey Muhammad al-Sadiq in 1298 AH / 1881 CE and forced him to sign a treaty recognizing the transformation of Tunisia into a French protectorate.

Then the Islamic and national Jihād and resistance movement erupted in Tunisia in 1881 CE with the formation of the "Islamic Association" movement, which resorted to denouncing the occupation and stirring up national sentiments from an Islamic perspective. Some scholars from the Zaytuna Mosque moved to call for Jihād. Indeed, the rebels moved from the centers of tribal gatherings in the south, and the revolution spread to the cities of Kairouan, Sousse, Gabès, Zaghuan, and Sfax. The rebels were able to take complete control of the southern parts of the country, but France adopted a brutal method in suppressing the revolution and persecuting the rebels. In 1908 CE, the "Young Tunisian Party" was founded, which demanded a constitution, and its members engaged in battles with the French in 1911 CE, but France suppressed them brutally.

In March 1920 CE, the "Destour Party" was founded, which was able to take over the leadership of the struggle against French colonialism through propaganda, politics, and social action, and it succeeded in mobilizing intellectuals and workers. France concluded a treaty granting Tunisia independence in 1956 CE. Thus, Tunisia was handed over to its cunning agent, Habib Bourguiba, who was able to deceive the scholars with a false Islamic identity, but then openly declared his apostate secular identity when he gained power, and publicly fought Islamic legislation and rapidly led Tunisia towards Westernization, spreading immorality, and obliterating its religious identity.

In the early eighties, the winds of the Islamic awakening blew over Tunisia from the East, and a number of preachers founded the "Islamic Tendency Movement" led by Shaykh Rachid Ghannouchi. The movement entered the arena of peaceful political competition, but Bourguiba suppressed the movement and imprisoned its leaders and was able to divide its leadership and win over some of them. The movement then entered the general elections in the mid-eighties and won a majority that surprised various circles and raised alarm signals in Europe, especially in France. The movement was suppressed, but it continued its political work and was preparing for a sudden military coup. However, the plan was exposed.

Then his interior minister at the time, Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, hastily arranged a white coup in coordination with the Americans to avoid the success of the Islamists' coup. He thus seized power. He oppressed Islamists and others and ruled Tunisia with a dictatorial rule, continuing the path of Westernizing this ancient Islamic country. The Islamic movement and its leaders were scattered in European countries, and their supporters were relentlessly pursued. Tunisia became one of the pillars of American colonial policy in the Arab world. Then, in October 2004, the Pharaoh of Tunisia held a farcical election to renew his term and won with 95.96% in a nauseating democratic scene.

17. Algeria:

The Ottoman state ruled Algeria like the other Arab countries. Their rule lasted for about 300 years. The Ottoman rule of Algeria went through several stages, starting from the era of the Beilerbeys in 1546 CE to the Deys in 1081 AH / 1671 CE, which ended in 1930. At the same time, France coveted the strategically located Algeria, especially since it had enjoyed commercial privileges there since the sixteenth century.

In 1315 AH / 1801 CE, France signed a treaty with Algeria stipulating freedom of trade between the two parties. It hastened to occupy Algeria to prevent British influence from spreading there, and for this purpose, it concluded a secret treaty with Russia in 1223 AH / 1808 CE, in which France obtained Russia's approval for the occupation of Algeria.

However, its preoccupation with European problems delayed the invasion until 1245 AH / 1830 CE. France then used a trivial matter as a pretext for the invasion and occupation: the insult to the Dey Hussein's consul when he slapped him with his fly whisk on the face.

Indeed, France sent its fleet, which besieged the Algerian coasts for three years.

In 1245 AH / 1830 CE, France took advantage of the weakness of the Ottoman state and sent a military campaign that succeeded in capturing Algeria in 1245 AH / 1830 CE after expelling the Ottoman garrison from it. Then the Algerian resistance movement against the occupation developed under the leadership of Emir Abdelkader al-Jaza'iri, around whom the tribes rallied and pledged allegiance to him in Oran in 1832 CE. Sufi men also supported him, and everyone agreed on Jihād.

From the city of "Mascara" in western Algeria, Emir Abdelkader began to raid the territories under French occupation after imposing his influence over the western regions of the country. The rebels defeated the French armies in the "Battle of al-Muqṭa'" in 1250 AH / 1835 CE. He then resorted to guerrilla warfare and inflicted successive defeats on the French. In May 1252 AH / 1837 CE, the French concluded a treaty with Emir Abdelkader, the "Treaty of Tafna," in which France recognized Emir Abdelkader's sovereignty over western Algeria, and he also recognized France's authority over the territories it had occupied. The Emir benefited from the treaty, which allowed him to organize his forces and fortify cities and border areas, and he also took care of organizing the affairs of his state. When France violated the terms of the treaty and attacked the rebels, Emir Abdelkader was able to capture the areas surrounding the city of Algiers in 1255 AH / 1840 CE.

The French reaction was to raid cities in western Algeria, capturing Tlemcen, Mostaganem, and other cities in the Oran region. Emir Abdelkader was forced to flee to the desert. His fate ended with his capture and imprisonment in Algeria in 1268 AH / 1852 CE. The French then allowed him to leave Algeria, and he went to Damascus to be his exile and remained there until his death in 1300 AH / 1883 CE.

France then followed a policy of settling French people in Algeria after confiscating the property and lands of the locals, and it aimed to sow discord between Arabs and Berbers in an attempt to imprint the country with a French character and abolish its Arab-Islamic identity.

Then Allāh destined for Algeria an extraordinary man, Shaykh 'Abd al-Ḥamīd bin Bādīs, who founded the "Association of Muslim Scholars," which preserved the Islamic and Arab identity of Algeria through its educational and scholarly work and formed the generation that carried the banner of the Great Revolution that began in 1954, and continued until independence was achieved in 1963, after Algeria had sacrificed more than a million lives of victims and martyrs.

However, what happened was that France, with its cunning, after realizing that its presence in Algeria was impossible and that independence was inevitable, chose to work towards handing over authority after it to a group of organizations and parties whose pioneers had been raised on ideas imported from Europe, especially from nationalist, socialist, and Western liberal currents, which together formed what became known as the "National Liberation Front," in which the influence of Islamists gradually diminished. Thus, France determined who would succeed it in Algeria and bound them by the terms of the Évian Accords. French President de Gaulle said at the time:

"They want Algeria's independence? Fine! We will give it to them and take it back after thirty years!"

Algeria became independent, and its presidency went to Houari Boumédiène, who was an Arab nationalist and a leftist close to communist thought. Algeria during his tyrannical and police-state era plunged into bankruptcy and the abyss. The influence of the military members of the "National Liberation Front Party," many of whom held French citizenship, increased, and this party became the sole ruling party since then. This current, known as the "Francophone Current," took on the task of fighting Islam and liquidating Islamists in Algeria.

After the death of Boumédiène, he was succeeded by President Chadli Bendjedid. The National Liberation Front Party continued its one-party policy, and Chadli added to his predecessor's bad policies a return to France's embrace, whereas Boumédiène was an Arab and nationalist leftist who was hostile to France. Thus, the influence of the Francophone current and powerful senior military officers increased.

Algeria's conditions worsened and became more bankrupt despite being one of the largest oil and gas exporting countries in the world.

In the early seventies, Shaykh Muṣṭafā Būya'li rose up, demanding that Chadli's government stop the spread of corruption, return the country to its Islamic roots, and remind them of the principles of the 1954 revolution which raised the slogan of Islam and Jihād, as the Shaykh was one of the Mujahideen who participated in it. Shaykh Būya'li then declared Jihād and founded the "Islamic State Movement." He took up arms and went to the mountains with a group of his supporters to fight the Algerian regime. The government was able to kill him, may Allāh have mercy on him, in 1976, and arrested many of his supporters and sent them to prison.

In the late eighties, the economic crisis in Algeria reached its peak, and the Algerian people erupted in a public demonstration revolution known as the "Bread Riots." The Algerian regime and its president Chadli realized that a radical change in the situation was necessary, so Chadli announced in 1988 a series of comprehensive reforms, the most important of which were ending the one-party policy and launching the democratic process and the freedom to form political parties.

Thus, Algerians enthusiastically rushed to form parties and establish newspapers, and the political movement flourished. Among the foremost who moved with enthusiasm in this space of freedom were the various components of the Islamic awakening in Algeria, which had been experiencing suppressed prosperity since the mid-seventies, like the rest of the Arab and Islamic countries that were witnessing a massive Islamic awakening after the bankruptcy of the mirage of nationalist and leftist ideas that flourished during the fifties and sixties began to become apparent.

Thus, Chadli announced the holding of municipal elections (1988), followed by parliamentary elections in 1989, in order to begin the democratic process in Algeria. The various parties began their preparation for this experience.

The political scene in Algeria during the 1989 elections consisted of three axes:

1. The ruling party, which is the "National Liberation Front Party," which has ruled Algeria since independence in a police-state manner and had monopolized power for a quarter of a century.
2. The forces of the Islamic awakening.
3. The secular parties that were formed at that time.

The Islamic Salvation Front was the strongest of the Islamic blocs, led by Shaykh Abbasi Madani. Alongside him was Shaykh Ali Belhadj, one of the callers of the Salafist current. The Front consisted of a mixture of schools and leaders of the awakening, Islamic organizations, and independent preachers, in addition to a broad base of ordinary Muslims who believed in the generalities of the Islamic political project. As for the nascent secular forces after the freedom of parties:

These forces and parties multiplied after the freedoms were granted, but the most prominent of these forces, as proven by the subsequent elections, were:

Firstly: The Socialist Forces Front Party: This is a party spread in the Kabylie region and carries a Western liberal ideology. It was led by Ait Ahmed. He led demonstrations after the Salvation's victory to disperse it and to frighten the government and the West of the fundamentalist advance.

Secondly: The Rally for Culture and Democracy Party: This is a party that is fiercely hostile to Islamists and advocates for their eradication. It was led by Saïd Sadi.

Thirdly: The Communist Party: Led by Louisa Hanoune. It adopted the democratic approach.

With the conclusion of the municipal elections, it became clear that the Islamic Salvation Front had crushed the strongest secular political parties in Algeria, which was the ruling party (the National Liberation Front Party), and that the newly formed secular parties had only obtained crumbs.

Thus, the Salvation Front took over most of the municipalities in Algeria, and its members began to serve the people with good spirit and sincerity, which Algeria had lacked for a long time, thus raising the Front's popularity and qualifying it for the next victory, which was the legislative (parliamentary) elections. The first round resulted in the Front winning a landslide majority in its first round, and it seemed that this would enable it to achieve a landslide majority in the second round of the supplementary elections, which would qualify it to form the government alone and thus run for the presidency of the state!

Alarm bells rang in the East and West, and the major Crusader countries announced their readiness to intervene to block the path of Islamists to power. Indeed, François Mitterrand, the French President at the time, declared that France was ready to intervene militarily to prevent Islamists from coming to power. The only solution before them was to stage a military coup supported by the West, especially France, to block the path of Islamists from ruling Algeria.

The coup happened. The military brought in a former general, Mohamed Boudiaf, to take over the presidency of the state. The leaders of the Islamic Salvation Front were arrested and imprisoned, demonstrations were suppressed with violence, and the military regime that seized power and crushed democracy with the support of the hypocritical West opened many desert prisons for tens of thousands of Islamist detainees. This was the beginning of the contemporary Jihadi uprising in Algeria and the beginning of a bloody chapter that has not ended to this day, a chapter that has cost this beloved country some quarter of a million innocent Muslim lives to this day. France and the West welcomed the coup plotters who had planned and supported them, to join them in attacking the results of this great lie they call "democracy." I have written a book detailing these events titled "My Testimony on the Events of Jihād in Algeria 1989-1996" for those who wish to delve into the details.

Algeria is currently headed by President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. He won a landslide popular support in the presidential elections, relying on a national reconciliation project he adopted to end the aftermath of those events. He based it on a civil concord law introduced by his predecessor, which provides amnesty for armed individuals who surrender to the authorities.

Algeria, known for its strong ties with France, is witnessing an increase in its ties with America under Bouteflika's reign. It has been considered one of America's preferred allies in the fight against terrorism, with Bush occasionally expressing his satisfaction with Bouteflika's policies in liquidating and besieging fundamentalist currents. The events in Algeria are still ongoing, although their intensity has decreased after the elimination of armed groups, many of which deviated from the right path due to intelligence infiltration and ended up targeting innocent people, which led to their loss of popularity and brought them to paths of defeat and fragmentation. And I ask Allāh to facilitate for this beloved country a matter of guidance in which the people of His obedience are honored and the people of His disobedience are humiliated. Indeed, He is capable of that.

18. Morocco:

Marrakesh remained independent of the Ottomans, although relations of cooperation and mutual benefit existed between them from time to time. It also remained opposed to the ambitions of Spain and Portugal until the early twentieth century. After France occupied Algeria in 1830 and Tunisia in 1881, it turned its gaze towards the Far Maghreb, which was ruled by the Alawite Sharīfian state. At the same time, Spain coveted the occupation of the country. France, on the other hand, concluded the "Entente Cordiale" with England in 1904, which allowed it to obtain Britain's approval for the occupation of the Far Maghreb.

At the Algeciras Conference in 1906, it was decided to establish a special international system in Tangier, and it was also decided to give Spain and France a free hand to spread their influence in Morocco. While Spain succeeded in seizing the "Rif" region in the north, France directed a campaign against the Far Maghreb in 1907 in exchange for France giving England a free hand in Egypt. It occupied the cities of Casablanca and Oujda, then seized the city of Fez in 1329 AH / 1911 CE.

In 1912 CE, France forced Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥafīẓ to sign a treaty of protection over the country. When Spain protested this, negotiations took place between Spain and France, ending in the signing of a treaty dividing Morocco into two separate zones: one for France and the other for Spain, while Tangier remained an international zone.

France then worked to erase the Arab-Islamic identity of Morocco through the efforts of its representative in Morocco, "General Lyautey," the Resident-General who held political, military, administrative, and financial authority in his hands and who allowed French immigrants to settle in the Far Maghreb. The Jihād and national resistance movement erupted as a result, and a revolution broke out in Fez in 1912 CE, which soon spread to neighboring areas, but France suppressed it brutally and harshly.

Then another revolution was launched by the Berber tribes and the inhabitants of Chaouia, and the rebels laid siege to Fez, but Lyautey used artillery to bombard the rebels and break the siege.

The resistance then concentrated in the Middle Atlas region, and the rebels succeeded in capturing Marrakech and Agadir in 1912 CE, but the French suppressed the revolution and seized the two cities and secured transportation between Fez, Meknes, and Rabat.

At that point, the rebels took refuge in the mountains and maintained their independence there until 1934 CE.

As for the national resistance in the Rif region, it was led by ‘Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī in 1921 CE and remained independent until 1926 CE.

The rebels won several battles, including "Abarkan" and "Ighrīm," against the Spanish and were able to defeat them and kill their commander in the famous Battle of Anwāl, in which al-Khaṭṭābī defeated the armies of five European countries, consisting of the French and Spanish and their allies, killing thousands of them and capturing ten thousand soldiers, including some 100 generals and 5 marshals.

Al-Khaṭṭābī was pledged allegiance by the rebels to be the "Emir of the Rif." He ruled by Islamic Sharī‘ah and sent police, judges, and jurists to teach people their religion in their scattered villages in the mountains. France realized the danger of al-Khaṭṭābī's victories and intervened with the help of the Spanish. French forces, with the help of the Spanish navy, succeeded in defeating the rebels, and Spanish aircraft bombarded villages and civilians with poison gas!! Al-Khaṭṭābī was defeated and exiled to France, but his supporters helped him escape on the way, and he sought refuge in Egypt, where this heroic Shaykh remained until his death in 1963 CE. May Allāh have mercy on him with vast mercy. Nevertheless, the resistance against the French and Spanish continued. In 1934 CE, the first political organization in Morocco was formed under the name "Moroccan National Action Bloc" for the liberation of the country. Then the "National Party" was founded, and the national movement intensified with Muhammad bin Yusuf's accession to power and his support for the rebels and their assistance. The "Istiqlal Party" was also founded in 1358 AH / 1940 CE, and the resistance movement erupted throughout Morocco. In 1947 CE, Sultan Muhammad bin Yusuf delivered an enthusiastic speech in Tangier in which he demanded freedom, sovereignty, and national unity. This ignited the enthusiasm of the rebels who continued to cooperate with the Sultan until Morocco gained its independence and unity in 1956 CE.

Morocco was then ruled by King Hassan II bin Muhammad V for a long period. He was a tyrannical Pharaoh and a dictatorial oppressor. He killed everyone who opposed him from every direction and ideology, from Islamists to communists and the ideas in between. He filled his infamous terrifying prisons with prisoners, many of whom died under the whips of executioners and torture devices imported from Europe! The King also surrounded himself with many criminal security agencies and fortified his rule with a thick layer of the Sultan's scholars and palace jurists from Morocco who bowed and prostrated to him under the pretext of the angels prostrating to Adam (peace be upon him)! Indeed, the King imported the Sultan's scholars from all corners of the world, from Arab and non-Arab countries. Morocco in his era was known for poverty, unemployment, corruption, the spread of drugs, prostitution, debauchery, and social decay in many segments of society. The King was at the forefront of famous adulterers and well-known corrupt individuals, so much so that it was said that the famous French actress Brigitte Bardot mentioned her red nights with him in her memoirs! The King al-Khanfūs - as Shaykh ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd Kishk, may Allāh have mercy on him, used to call him - also won several awards from international fashion houses as a king of elegance!! while most of his people were dying of poverty and need, and his youth were throwing themselves into the jaws of death on illegal immigration boats in search of work on the shores of Europe! But an Islamic awakening of various trends, from Sufism to Salafism to Jihādism, to political Islam, stood against this corruption, and faced harshness, oppression, and restrictions from the King according to the seriousness of its confrontation with him.

The King died in 2002, and was succeeded by the current King Muhammad VI, a rotten copy of his father. Morocco also entered the American orbit like others, and its security apparatus became a battalion in the American offensive against Muslims in what is known as combating terrorism. I ask Allāh for him and his like among the Pharaohs of Muslim countries the prayer of our master Noah (peace be upon him):

{Noah said, "My Lord, do not leave upon the earth from the disbelievers any inhabitant. Indeed, if You leave them, they will mislead Your servants and will not beget except wicked, [confirmed] disbelievers."} (Noah: 26-27).

19. Mauritania:

It is located south of the current Kingdom of Morocco. Islam entered it after the Arab conquest of the Maghreb in the late first century AH. The region was named "Shinqīṭ" and was subject to Moroccan states such as the Almohad state, the Hafsid state, the Saadian state, and the Alawite state.

The region was subjected to raids by the Portuguese, who established centers for the trade of gum, gold, and slaves there, followed two centuries later by the Spanish, then the French, and then the Dutch.

In 1901 CE, France sent a campaign to occupy the country. Its commander convinced the local Emirs to request French protection. When France occupied Marrakesh - the current Kingdom of Morocco - the entire country fell under French occupation, which named it "Mauritania."

The French followed a policy of discrimination between white Muslims and black Africans and fought the Arabic language, attempting to spread French culture. However, the Jihād resistance movement against the occupation erupted in 1908 CE and continued until 1934 CE, demanding independence.

Then two main parties were formed to confront French colonialism: the "National Union Party" and the "Youth Organization Party." They then merged into one party in 1948 CE, the "Mauritanian Understanding Party," which later split. Finally, a union was formed in 1958 CE under the name "Mauritanian Rally Party," which adopted the cause of liberation and independence.

During the reign of de Gaulle, a constitution was issued for them, which Mauritania reluctantly accepted, and it became a member of the French Union according to it. In 1959 CE, the Mauritanian Rally Party won the elections, and its president, Moktar Ould Daddah, formed the ministry and the party became the ruling party in the country.

Then a new party emerged calling for complete independence and joining Morocco, the "Renaissance Party." In 1960 CE, Mauritania achieved its independence and became a member of the United Nations. It was also accepted as a member of the Arab League in 1973 CE.

In 1978 CE, a coup took place in Mauritania led by Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, but he did not remain in power for long as another coup overthrew him. Several subsequent coups led to instability in the country, especially after facing economic and political problems with its neighbor (Senegal).

The matter finally led, through a military coup some twenty years ago, to the current President, Maaouya Ould Sid'Ahmed Taya. He ruled the country with a military intelligence rule and brought it to the depths of crises, poverty, and corruption. However, the new leap made by this Taghut is the openness to America and Israel, to the extent that he established full diplomatic relations with Tel Aviv and opened an embassy for the Zionist enemy in Nouakchott, the capital!

Several popular uprisings and military coups were launched against him, which he suppressed all with iron and fire. He continues to oppress the Muslims in Mauritania, may Allāh curse him and destroy him and his like among the Pharaohs of Muslim countries.

20. Eritrea:

I do not have enough information at hand now to write a comprehensive summary of this Muslim region. However, what I recall from my general knowledge is that it was subject to Ethiopian (Abyssinian) occupation for a long time, and the Muslims suffered various forms of torture during the reign of its emperor Haile Selassie I. Jihadi revolutions have been taking place there for decades to get rid of Abyssinian rule and gain independence from them. Then a communist coup occurred in Ethiopia, but Eritrea continued to suffer the same affliction under their rule, and the armed Jihadi revolutions continued.

Then missionary organizations infiltrated Ethiopia, and various intelligence agencies established revolutionary and political entities based on secular, leftist, and Christian ideologies, also demanding Ethiopia's independence and fighting the Abyssinians. The Eritrean rebels received various forms of support from Arab countries and regimes until their independence was achieved. However, power went to the so-called Isaias Afwerki, who turned his back on the Arabs and denied the Arab identity of Eritrea and even its Islamicity. He followed a policy of openness to the West and to Israel, which intensified its presence in the Red Sea opposite the coasts of Makkah and controlled the Bab el-Mandeb Strait! The Muslim Mujahideen continued their fighting, but against the government of their country this time, and in Eritrea today, there are a number of armed Islamic organizations operating under difficult conditions of isolation and poverty, to the extent that the issue has become almost forgotten by Arabs and Muslims while missionary organizations and Israeli Mossad are causing corruption in it. And sufficient for us is Allāh, and He is the best disposer of affairs.

21. (and 22) Somalia and Djibouti:

They occupy a strategic location known as the Horn of Africa opposite the coasts of Yemen and the Arabian Peninsula. Arab tribes migrated there long ago and intermingled with Africans. They had trade relations with the Arabs since pre-Islamic times. After the advent of Islam, these relations continued, and Arab tribes migrated in the fourth century AH to East Africa and founded trading cities such as Mogadishu and Brava, bringing Islam and Arab civilization with them. The Arabs mingled with the coastal inhabitants from the Bantu tribes, and the blood mixed to form the Swahili people who speak the Swahili language. The region then came under Portuguese colonization after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope route in 1498 CE. When the Ottomans settled in Aden, they raided the Portuguese with the help of Arab elements, and in 1586 CE, they were able to annex Mogadishu to the Ottoman state.

When the Ya'ariba state was established in Oman, it sent a naval fleet to the East African coast in 1698 CE, which was able to extend Omani sovereignty over the country with the exception of the Mozambique colony.

During the era of the Busaid state of Oman, Malaba fell to Sultan Sa'īd bin Sulṭān in 1837 CE, and he even moved his capital from Muscat to Zanzibar.

Due to the conflict among the members of the Busaid family, Britain intervened in Somalia's affairs, as did France, Britain, Ethiopia, and Kenya to support their influence in the country.

France then managed to take control of an area near the Bab el-Mandeb Strait known as French Somaliland, and similarly, England took another area known as British Somaliland, and Italy took a third known as Italian Somaliland.

Then the Somali national movement erupted in the late nineteenth century and forced Britain to evacuate the interior areas of British Somaliland.

Then the resistance movement against the French, British, and Italians intensified, demanding the independence and unity of Somalia.

The liberation of Italian Somaliland was achieved in 1960 CE after the United Nations resolution in 1959 CE. British Somaliland was also liberated in the same year, and the two regions united into one republic known as the "Republic of Somalia" in 1960 CE. French Somaliland, however, did not gain independence until 1977 CE, and is called the "Republic of Djibouti."

Both countries joined the Arab League.

Somalia was ruled for a long time by a stubborn Taghut, Mohamed Siad Barre, but when he died in the late eighties, Somalia fragmented into a tribal conflict due to the deeply rooted, complex, and intertwined tribal conflicts within it. This allowed for American intervention in the early nineties, and American warships anchored off the coast of Somalia, but they soon became bogged down in its sand and mud. The tribes and Mujahideen resisted them, and the specter of a Somali Vietnam loomed before the Americans, so they fled in haste, leaving everything behind. Somalia remains fragmented in a critical state of instability with fighting erupting from time to time.

Second: The Conditions of Some Countries in the Islamic World

1. Turkey:

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk's rule in Turkey (1924-1938):

Anyone who follows the history of Mustafa Kemal can almost be certain that this man ruled Turkey alone with absolute power, unchallenged by anyone, a dictatorial rule based on crushing, annihilation, blood, and carnage.

He declared the republic after a conspiracy he hatched with his companions and believed in the necessity of uprooting the dominance of religion from Turkey. He then abolished the Caliphate and enacted a law that considered any opposition to the republic and any inclination towards the deposed Sultan as treason punishable by death.

On March 3, 1924 CE, he presented a proposal to abolish the Caliphate and expel the Caliph, separate religion from the state, abolish the old religious courts and their laws, replacing them with modern courts and laws, and abolish religious schools, replacing them with secular state schools.

The next day, he issued an order to expel the Caliph and all princes and princesses from Turkey, and they were deported outside the country.

After getting rid of his opponents, he continued his destruction of Islam and the country. He imposed the hat - which was a symbol of disbelief in the eyes of the Turks - and the Turks opposed it, so he erected gallows for them in the city squares.

He then imported European man-made laws, inviting experts to draft criminal, civil, and commercial laws taken from Italian, Swiss, and German laws.

He then abolished the Arabic script used by the Turks and with which the entire Islamic heritage of Fiqh, Hadith, Tafsir, and history was written. He forced them to write in Latin letters to permanently separate them from their religion and heritage. A day was set after which anyone who had not mastered the Latin letters would be punished by being deprived of their job, stripped of their nationality, expelled from the country, and imprisoned.

He then prohibited polygamy and decreed equality between men and women in all rights, duties, and inheritance. He established art schools for young men and women, schools for teaching Eastern and Western dance, prohibited the hijab, removed women from their homes and placed them in state positions, established mixed theaters, and encouraged dance parties.

He turned the two great mosques - Hagia Sophia and the Fatih Mosque - into museums. He erected his statues everywhere.

He forced people to give the call to prayer in Turkish and to recite the Holy Qur'ān in Turkish, not in Arabic. He once heard the call to the Fajr prayer from a nearby mosque and ordered the minaret to be demolished.

He introduced the Western Gregorian calendar instead of the Hijri calendar. He abolished Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha. He made Sunday the weekly holiday instead of Friday. He prohibited pilgrimage and the hijab.

In short, he ruled as if there was no one else in Turkey.

He used to say: I am Turkey, and Turkey is me. I am its lungs with which it breathes, so any attempt to destroy me is an attempt to destroy Turkey.

Thus, he continued to destroy Turkey and erase from its face this religion - which had raised it - to rule lands for five consecutive centuries on which the sun never set. He continued his destruction of all the pillars upon which the structure of this towering Muslim state was built until Turkey became at the tail of the convoy of slaves in all aspects of life.

Several revolutions took place against Atatürk, the most important of which was the Naqshbandi Sufi revolution in 1924, and then in 1930, but he suppressed them brutally. He was also resisted by the Sufis of the Tijānī order and the movement of Said Nursī through peaceful and Da‘wah methods, and he suppressed them too. He then ruled alone.

Then Atatürk fell ill with liver disease due to alcohol, his memory weakened, and he suffered from various sexually transmitted diseases.

During his dying illness, Atatürk summoned the British Ambassador (Loraine) to recommend him for the presidency of the Turkish Republic, as before!

The Turks tell amazing stories about the torment he suffered during his illness. He would cry out in a way that pierced the balconies of the palace where he resided (Dolmabahçe Palace) in Constantinople.

He became skin and bones, his teeth fell out, and he willed that no funeral prayer be performed over him. In November 1938 CE, Atatürk departed from the world, cursed in the heavens and on earth.

After destroying Islamic Turkey, tearing apart the family, shattering morals, trampling values, violating rituals, and turning mosques into grain warehouses.

İrfan Orga says: "Atatürk was convinced that his struggle must be directed against religion, and he believed from his childhood that there was no need for God. He used to say: The power of reason and will overcomes the power of God. At the end of his life, he would raise his fist and point to the sky mockingly and threateningly."

From the book al-Dhakhā'ir (pp. 740-744).

Turkey after Atatürk (1938-2004 CE)

1. Atatürk died after leaving Turkey in utter poverty. His destructive achievements were the focus of the West's attention. They clung to his destructive achievements with their molars, and his deputy İsmet İnönü was brought in to become president of the republic. He recognized Israel in 1948 CE, and America began to plant military bases in it.
2. The West then wanted to test the Kemalist experiment on the Turkish people. They forced İsmet İnönü to establish political parties. İnönü chose Celal Bayar and tasked him with forming the opposition party and the Democratic Party. Adnan Menderes assisted Celal Bayar, and Adnan became the focal point of the party.
3. Turkey then joined NATO in 1950, American bases spread throughout it, and it came under American and Jewish influence.
4. Allāh willed that a strange incident would happen to Adnan Menderes during this period. One time, while he was flying in an airplane, one of its engines stopped, and the pilot announced a state of danger. Menderes made a vow to his Lord that if He saved him, he would restore Islam to Turkey. The plane burned, and the only person who survived was Menderes.
5. The Democratic Party entered the elections in 1950 with a strange program that all American studies predicted would fail completely.

The program included no more than the return of the call to prayer in Arabic, allowing Turks to perform Hajj, re-establishing and teaching religion in schools, and abolishing state intervention in women's dress.

He built his election campaign on the basis of a gradual return to Islam as a fundamental source of strength for the religious Turkish people.

The result was astonishing. Atatürk's party fell to thirty-two deputies, and the Democratic Party won three hundred and eighteen seats. The global Masonic Jewish community was greatly astonished when Menderes swept away Atatürk's successor. That day, İnönü exclaimed: Adnan Menderes won with his religious propaganda.

Adnan Menderes took the reins of power as prime minister, and Celal Bayar as president of the republic. He immediately began to fulfill the promises he had made to the people during the elections.

Menderes responded to the demands of the people and held the first cabinet meeting on the first of Ramadan. He presented the people with the gift of the blessed month: the call to prayer in Arabic, freedom of dress, freedom of religious education, and began renovating mosques.

The 1954 elections came, and Atatürk's party deputies fell to 24. He allowed the teaching of the Arabic language and the reading and teaching of the Qur'ān in all schools up to the secondary level, and the construction of ten thousand mosques. He established twenty-two institutes in Anatolia to graduate preachers, speakers, and religious teachers. He allowed the publication of magazines and books calling for adherence to Islam and following its guidance. He vacated the mosques that the previous government had used as grain warehouses and returned them to places of worship.

Menderes approached the Arabs against Israel, imposed censorship on medicines and goods manufactured in Israel, and expelled the Israeli ambassador in 1956. He opened 25,000 schools for memorizing the Qur'ān.

Global Jewish organizations moved against Menderes and mobilized America and the Masonic Western countries in the army. The Masonic General Cemal Gürsel staged a coup in 1960 and hanged Adnan Menderes, Fatin Rüştü Zorlu, and Hasan Polatkan.

The Jewish journalist Sami Kohen wrote: The direct reason that led Menderes to the gallows was his policy of rapprochement with the Islamic world and the gradual coolness and weakening of our relations with Israel, then the Justice Party was suppressed.

1. In 1965, elections were held again, in which the Justice Party won a sweeping majority. Its leader was Süleyman Demirel. İnönü said: Demirel did not defeat me, but the Islamic Sufi Nur community defeated me, the followers of Shaykh Said Nursī.

The Justice Party won 263 seats out of 450, and Demirel doubled the number of Imam Hatip schools to 72 and Qur'ān memorization schools to twelve thousand schools. He became closer to the Arabs and his relations with Israel cooled. He participated in the Islamic demonstration against Israel in Rabat. America and the global Jewish organizations behind it moved and mobilized the army, and a military coup took place in which Demirel was removed from power, but he was not executed because he was a Freemason.

1. Debts on Turkey increased day by day, multiplied, until the inflation rate reached 42-60% in 1970. Unemployment was 20%, and debts were 21 billion dollars in 1970 and became 17 billion in 1979.

The government surrendered to the International Monetary Fund and devalued the Turkish Lira 8 times. In 1980, the interest rate rose to 30%, the highest rate in the world.

1. The National Salvation Party (Islamic) appeared in 1972, led by Dr. Necmettin Erbakan, who held a doctorate from a German university. Many Turkish youth rallied around this party. The party stood against the Crusader West led by America, demanding withdrawal from NATO and the liberation of Turkey from American bases. It stood against Israel and the Jews and opposed Turkey's accession to the European Common Market. It demanded the dispatch of Turkish army brigades to assist the Afghan Mujahideen, just as the government had sent an army to fight with America in Korea.

2. In 1972, it entered the election battle and won forty-two seats. It participated in the government with the Republican People's Party led by Bülent Ecevit. Erbakan stipulated that he would be the Deputy Prime Minister and have eight ministers in the Turkish government.
3. In this year, Turkey invaded Cyprus to protect the Turkish Muslims from the brutality of the Greek Cypriot Christians, and Erbakan played an important role in the decision to intervene.
4. The party began to try to re-educate Turks on Islam. It opened the doors of Hajj for the people, and the number of pilgrims reached 150,000 annually, a huge number compared to what came before, even though the population was around fifty million. The party opened 3000 educational centers in villages and 3000 schools for training Imams and preachers. It put in place a plan to establish an Islamic university. Nearly two hundred thousand students enrolled in the Imam Hatip schools. The party demanded that Friday be the official holiday instead of Sunday, that marriage contracts be performed according to Sharī'ah, and that the Qur'ān and Arabic language be taught in schools. The party controlled the General Union of Turkish Students.

On September 7, 1980, the party held a demonstration under the slogan of the Day of Saving Jerusalem, burned the Israeli flag, and demanded the establishment of an Islamic state and the rule of Islamic Sharī'ah. At this point, America mobilized the Turkish army, and Kenan Evren staged the American coup on September 12, 1980.

Some American officials also stated that there were increasing fears of an Islamic rule that would contradict the path of the Turkish leader Atatürk, who laid the foundations for the secular state in Turkey. The Turkish coup saved Turkey from turning from a secular state into a state ruled by Islamic religious traditions.

Weinberger praised Evren and his group and gave Turkey seven hundred and three million dollars.

Evren arrested Erbakan and the men of the National Salvation Party and began his era by placing a wreath of flowers on Atatürk's grave. Evren and his government considered 1981 to be the year of Atatürk.

Evren banned bearded men from remaining in universities, especially the Sakarya Academy, and prohibited the hijab.

On April 24, 1981, Necmettin Erbakan, the leader of the National Salvation Party, and thirty members of the party appeared before a military court-martial. The military prosecutor read the indictment. The crimes listed in the indictment were:

- a. Working to replace the principles of the legal, social, economic, and political state with principles based on Islam.
- b. The existence of a number of youth, student, labor, and professional organizations, licensed and secretly affiliated with the party, working to implement Islamic Sharī'ah in Turkey.
- c. The party's meetings and chants revealing its goals. Among these chants were "Muhammad is our leader" and "We will destroy the idols and establish the Islamic state," and from its banners: "{And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed - then it is those who are the disbelievers.}" (Al-Mā'idah: 44).
- d. Their frequent mention of Allāh in their meetings and reminding the Ummah that it has fought throughout its history for the sake of Islam, not for individuals or heroes.

e. Erbakan's insistence on opening Qur'ān teaching schools in every village and his insistence on opening the Hagia Sophia Mosque.

f. He attacked the Treaty of Lausanne, the change of the Arabic script, and the replacement of laws, and concluded his speech by saying that Turkey today is an atheist republic.

g. The party demanded that Friday be the official holiday instead of Sunday and that marriage be according to Sharī'ah and the teaching of the Qur'ān and Arabic language in schools. The public prosecution demanded that Erbakan and his brothers be imprisoned for 14-36 years.

Turkey after the Military Coup:

In the early nineties, the military agreed to reinstate democracy, and Turgut Özal was elected prime minister. He then succeeded in the presidential elections and achieved notable economic reforms.

In 1996, the National Salvation Party ran in the elections under the name "Welfare Party" and won the highest number of votes, obtaining 22% of the votes alone. The world was in turmoil, and Erbakan became prime minister. He faced international pressure under which he was forced to sign a number of treaties with Israel. The military and secularists were not satisfied with him, and the Constitutional Court ruled to dissolve the party and prevent him and his senior aides from engaging in politics and dissolved the Welfare Party.

In 2003, some Islamists, remnants of the Welfare Party and others, returned to form a party that adopted a very, very moderate Islamic secular line in the eyes of the West, led by Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, who was a student of Erbakan and was the mayor of Istanbul, a man of wide renown known for his integrity and services. The party, named the "Justice and Development Party," won 36% of the votes in the elections! The secularists submitted to the result, and Europe recognized its integrity. They formed a government that is still subject to pressure and blackmail from America and the West, and is making many legal and principled concessions. However, it is credited with resisting the Americans and not providing all the required military services, and not allowing the Americans to pass overland to northern Iraq from Turkey. This was a relatively honorable stance compared to what the traitorous Arab rulers did during and after the occupation of Iraq. Turkey is witnessing great social and political polarization between deeply rooted Islamism and rampant secularism. We must mention here that the current government provides significant services to America in the areas of combating terrorism and pursuing Turkish and other Mujahideen, which has made Turkey a target for the operations of some Jihadi organizations.

2. Pakistan:

Pakistan is located in the Indian subcontinent and has a population of about 140 million people today. Islam entered India during the Umayyad Caliphate, and the Abbasids were able to regain Islamic influence in India during the first Abbasid era after the Hindu revolution against Muslims. India also witnessed the rise of successive Islamic states such as the Ghaznavid state, whose founder Mahmud of Ghazni was able to expand in the Indian subcontinent at the expense of the Hindus and made tremendous efforts that were followed by the Ghurid state for the spread of Islam. Other states followed, such as the Mughal state, which gained great fame in Islamic art, architecture, and trade. Islam became widespread and ruled two-thirds of the Indian subcontinent.

In the late era of the Mughal state, the country was subjected to foreign invasion by the Portuguese, French, and English.

The English established the British East India Company since the beginning of the sixteenth century CE (1009 AH). It opposed the Portuguese influence in India and opened the way for the English occupation of some regions of India.

The English followed a policy of inciting Hindus against Muslims. The reaction was the emergence of Islamic movements opposing Britain, but the English suppressed the rebels brutally and harshly and declared that "India is a British colony." As a result, Islamic Jihād and national resistance movements erupted. Then the Islamic current began to be active at the hands of some scholars and thinkers such as Muhammad Iqbal and politicians such as Muhammad Ali Jinnah, who demanded the liberation of Muslims in India. In 1324 AH, the "Muslim League Party" was founded, which established an Islamic university in Dacca.

During World War I, Gandhi opposed the British occupation peacefully. Muhammad Ali Jinnah also called for an Islamic movement advocating for violence for the liberation of the country instead of Gandhi's peaceful policy.

In 1347 AH, Muslim leaders led by Muhammad Ali Jinnah decided to demand a federal system that would grant Muslims in India self-rule, which was rejected by the Indian National Congress led by Gandhi.

In 1349 AH, the "Muslim League" led by Muhammad Iqbal called for the establishment of a separate Islamic state in India, which was first named "Pakistan."

This was followed by a period of bloody conflicts between Muslims and Hindus. The Muslims stood firm throughout and remained steadfast in their demands until Britain agreed to grant India independence in 1366 AH (1947) and recognized the state of Pakistan in the same year.

It is believed that Jinnah was an agent of Britain. He was of Ismaili esoteric origin, and his wife and family soon became Christian. He established Pakistan on English constitutional and political foundations.

Pakistan joined the United Nations in mid-Shawwāl 1366 AH, and Muhammad Ali Jinnah was its first president. After his death in 1367 AH, he was succeeded by (Khwaja) Nazimuddin, who announced the implementation of Islamic Shari'ah, but this was not implemented.

In 1376 AH, the first constitution of Pakistan was drafted based on the principles of English legislation, which was entirely and in detail contradictory to Islamic Shari'ah. According to it, it became a constitutional republic, and its capital was the city of Karachi. Iskander Mirza became the president of the republic and then ceded it to the military commander (Muhammad Ayub Khan).

In 1385 AH, war broke out between India and Pakistan over the Muslim-majority region of Kashmir. Pakistan was defeated, and Ayub Khan resigned from the presidency of the republic to the army commander (General Yahya Khan) in 1389 AH.

In 1390 AH / 1971 CE, elections were held, and the Awami League led by Mujibur Rahman, who opposed the Pakistan People's Party led by Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, won. This conflict reflected a more violent conflict between East Pakistan and West Pakistan. In 1391 AH / 1972, East Pakistan declared its independence, and a civil war erupted, which ended with the declaration of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the leader of the Pakistan People's Party, as president of the Republic of West Pakistan, after the separation of East Pakistan, which formed the state of Bangladesh.

In 1397 AH, a military coup took place led by General Zia-ul-Haq against the rule of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, who was later executed.

Zia-ul-Haq worked on gradually implementing Sharī'ah and provided significant services to the Afghan Mujahideen. Pakistan came under American influence during his reign, but American demands and intervention in the affairs of Pakistan and Afghanistan were significant, and Zia-ul-Haq did not fully implement them, as the man was under the influence of his nationalist convictions and Islamic sentiment. America assassinated him, and the Bhutto family (his daughter Benazir Bhutto and his son Murtaza Bhutto) carried out the operation under the supervision of the American embassy. Then power returned to the Pakistan People's Party led by Benazir Bhutto, the Prime Minister of Pakistan. She then lost the elections to a new party that emerged under the name of the Muslim League and was led by Nawaz Sharif. Although Pakistan was entirely subservient to American policies during the era of Benazir and Sharif, America needed a military agent and strong ruler who would implement its policies in Pakistan and Afghanistan in a dictatorial manner. So it arranged for a military coup against Nawaz Sharif, bringing General Pervez Musharraf to power in 1997. Since then, America has ruled Pakistan almost directly.

In 2001, Musharraf carried out the main mission for which he came, and America relied entirely on him to overthrow the Taliban regime and liquidate the Arab, Pakistani, and Central Asian Mujahideen in a horrific massacre (see the details in the book "Musharraf's Pakistan - The Problem, The Solution, and the Necessary Duty").

Musharraf then held a rigged sham election in which he appointed himself a constitutional president! He then staged another play in which he brought some parties to parliament, and the Islamists participated in this play!

Musharraf continues his great services to America today in uprooting Islam from Pakistan, amidst the astonishment and incapacity of the currents of scholars and Islamists, most of whom have been struck by paralysis or blindness, despite their strength and large numbers. Musharraf announced on the day he took power that his role model was Atatürk, the destroyer of the Caliphate in Turkey and the eraser of Islam from it. Pakistan is still experiencing the consequences of this plan, and Allāh's help is sought.

3. Iran:

Iran is a word derived from the name of the Aryan peoples who migrated to the region located east of Iraq and extending to the western borders of Turkestan in ancient times.

The word "Persia" was used to refer to this region during the Islamic era. The Mongols established the "Ilkhanate State" in Iran, which ruled most of its territories until the rise of the Shi'a Safavid state in 906 AH, considered the beginning of modern Iranian history.

The founder of this state was Shah Ismail Safavi, who managed to unify the country and establish a state based on the Twelver Shi'a doctrine.

The Safavid state entered into conflict with the Sunni Ottoman state, which ended with the defeat of the Safavids in the Battle of Chaldiran in 930 AH.

Among the most famous rulers of the Safavid state was Tahmasp, son of Shah Ismail, who refused to acknowledge dependence on the Ottomans. So, they fought him and entered Baghdad, then Tabriz, the Safavid capital, in 941 AH.

After his death, he was succeeded by his son, Shah Abbas the Great, whose reign saw British intervention in Iranian affairs. He succeeded in recovering Baghdad and Tabriz from the Ottomans. He also founded a city known by his name, "Bandar Abbas," which became an important trading base.

When the Safavid state weakened, a commander of theirs, "Nader Shah," ascended the throne of Iran in 1149 AH. He defeated the Ottomans and expelled the Russians from some Iranian cities they had previously seized. He also expanded eastward as far as Bukhara and Afghanistan and attacked the Mughal state in India, destroying their capital, "Delhi."

After his assassination in 1163 AH, many regions became independent from Iran, such as Afghanistan and Georgia. Russia gained control of Turkestan, and chaos and unrest prevailed in Iran. This situation continued until the establishment of the Qajar dynasty in 1193 AH. The founder of this state in Iran was "Agha Mohammad Khan," who managed to quell the seditions and restore the unity of Iran.

During the reign of his successor, "Fath Shah," Iran became a arena of international conflict between France, Russia, and Britain. The Russians seized some northern regions of Iran, while Britain obtained commercial concessions and also took some land in eastern Iran and annexed it to India.

During the reign of "Naser Shah," some aspects of European civilization were adopted, and his successor, Shah Mozaffar ad-Din, who took power in 1314 AH, followed a policy of adopting European civilization. Due to the pressure of national opposition, he issued a constitution for the country in 1324 AH.

When World War I broke out, Iran became an arena of international conflict between Germany and Turkey on one side, and Russia and England on the other. After the end of the war, a treaty was concluded between Iran and Britain, in which the latter recognized Iran's independence.

In 1340 AH / 1922, an officer, "Reza Pahlavi," carried out a military coup, and Iran was liberated from the Russians and the British.

Reza Pahlavi followed the approach of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk in Turkey, turning towards a policy of "Westernization." He introduced modern Western systems, abolished foreign privileges, and founded the University of Tehran in 1354 AH.

When World War II began, Reza Pahlavi adopted a position of neutrality. However, the Allies' conspiracy led to a Russian-British attack on Iran, supported by the United States. Reza Pahlavi was overthrown in 1363 AH / 1945 and was succeeded by Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

Mohammad Reza Pahlavi declared war on the Axis powers, and in return, the Allies provided economic and military aid to Iran. Then, Iran fully came under American and British influence. The Shah became their policeman in the Gulf region.

After the war, the Russians cooperated with the communist "Tudeh Party" to cause trouble for the Shah. However, in 1365 AH, relations with Russia improved, and a treaty was signed in 1365 AH, under which the Russians withdrew from northern Iran.

As for Britain, it obtained concessions for oil exploration in Iran, as well as commercial concessions for Iranians according to an agreement concluded in 1367 AH. Mohammad Mosaddegh raised the banner of opposition against the Shah and the British, and the National Consultative Assembly approved the nationalization of the oil industry. The Shah sought the help of General Zahedi and entrusted him with the premiership. He succeeded in suppressing the national movement, arrested Mohammad Mosaddegh, and sentenced him to death.

The communist "Tudeh Party" carried the banner of opposition, and the Shah succeeded in suppressing it, just as he suppressed the "Fada'iyān-e Islam" movement, which had a Shi'a Islamic political orientation. Many opposition parties were born. In 1375 AH, Iran joined the "Baghdad Pact," which was loyal to the West, especially the United States, which provoked the Soviet Union.

Under these circumstances, the Shah attempted to carry out political, social, and economic reforms. He abolished feudalism, issued the election law, worked to appease the workers by sharing profits with them, and spread Western culture in the country.

However, national and Islamic opposition increased, led by Ayatollah Khomeini, a prominent Shi'a cleric. Thus, the Shi'a Islamic Revolution in 1398 AH / 1979, led by "Khomeini," overthrew the monarchy and declared the establishment of the Islamic Republic in Iran. Iran is still ruled by it today.

Afghanistan:

It is located in the heart of Central Asia, and its capital is "Kabul." It is surrounded by Pakistan to the east and south, bordered by Iran to the west, and Western Turkestan to the north.

This region, whose inhabitants embraced Islam during the Umayyad era, played an important role in Islamic history and civilization. It was Arabized due to the diversity of its inhabitants, including Arabs, Turks, Persians, and Mongols, and its languages varied, including Arabic, Turkish, and Persian, in addition to the Afghan "Pashto language."

Several Islamic states were founded there during the Abbasid era, including the Samanid, Tahirid, and Saffarid dynasties. The Ghaznavid state also rose in this region and succeeded in spreading Islam in many regions of India.

Then Afghanistan was exposed to the Mongol invasion and came under the rule of the "Timurids." During their reign, it witnessed a cultural, urban, and intellectual flourishing. Then it was invaded by the Safavid state, but an Afghan leader, "Ahmad Khan," managed to separate from it and establish an independent rule in 1153 AH. This state was known for the first time in history as the "Afghan State," with "Kandahar" as its capital.

During the reign of his son, "Timur Shah," the capital was moved to "Kabul," and the influence of his state extended to India after the victory over the "Marathas" in the Battle of Panipat.

With the death of Timur Shah, the Afghan state weakened, and the Sikhs in India succeeded in seizing many of its Indian provinces.

During the reign of "Zaman Shah," who succeeded his father Timur Shah in 1207 AH, conflict arose between members of the ruling family. He tried to restore the glory of his state after the situation stabilized for him, so he clashed with the British in India. Therefore, they conspired against him and supported his brother Mahmud Shah, who took over the rule instead of him. During his reign, conflict arose among the members of the ruling family until "Dost Mohammad" gained power and called himself "Emir of Kabul" without being called Shah or King, neither he nor any of his successors.

Then Britain and Russia competed to seize Afghanistan, and Britain succeeded in occupying it in 1255 AH. However, the return of "Dost Mohammad" to power allowed him to expel the British in 1257 AH and forced them to recognize his sovereignty over his country.

In 1280 AH, Dost Mohammad died and was succeeded by his son, "Sher Ali." During his reign, Britain tried to extend its influence over Afghanistan, so he sought the help of the Russians, and the Second Afghan War broke out in 1295 AH between Sher Ali and Britain, which ended with his defeat and the country falling prey to British occupation.

However, the Jihād movements and the resistance of the Afghan tribes against the British erupted during the reign of Abdur Rahman, the grandson of Dost Mohammad. Russia intervened in the conflict, which ended with the signing of the Treaty of St. Petersburg in 1325 AH, one of the most important terms of which was the recognition of Afghanistan's independence and respect for its sovereignty.

During the reign of his successor, "Amanullah Khan," British influence returned to Afghanistan again, so the Third Afghan War broke out between the two parties in 1339 AH - 1921, and the Afghans were able to inflict a crushing defeat on the British and forced them to recognize their independence again.

During the reign of Amanullah Khan, there was an attempt to move towards secularism and adopt Western systems in the manner of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. A popular Islamic revolution erupted led by the scholars. Amanullah Khan abdicated in favor of his brother Inayatullah in 1348 AH, and a bandit called "Bacheh Saqqā" succeeded in seizing Kabul and declared himself king of Afghanistan under the name "Habibullah Ghazi."

The commander (Mohammad Nadir Shah), the cousin of the deposed king, returned to the country, seized power, and declared himself king of Afghanistan. During his reign, the Democratic Party, with its communist leanings, was founded in 1351 AH.

After his death, his son, King "Mohammad Zahir Shah," took over. He developed the army, tried to establish a constitutional system, spread education, strengthened his relations with Islamic countries, and followed policies of openness to the West, frequently visiting Italy and European countries.

Russian-American competition began in Afghanistan, and the Russian threat increased. The communists tried to overthrow the government, cooperating with Sardar (Mohammad Daoud), the king's cousin. They succeeded in carrying out a coup in 1393 AH, which abolished the monarchy and declared the establishment of the republic. He ruled the country in an extremely cruel and bloody manner, killing thousands of people!

Then the communists succeeded in carrying out a new military coup in 1398 AH / 1980 CE, led by "Mohammad Noor Taraki." Thousands of people were killed within days! And 29 of Daoud's sons were executed before his eyes. Then he was executed by firing squad!!! Thus, Daoud tasted what he had made people taste of oppression and killing! Then Taraki followed the path of red communism.

Resistance and Jihād movements erupted, taking on the character of Islamic Jihād against the communist government. The Soviet Union and the United States intervened in the "Afghan Issue." The Soviets prepared another coup led by "Babrak Karmal," supported by Soviet forces that intervened directly in a clear invasion in 1979 CE.

The Mujahideen parties rose to confront Russia and received Islamic and international support, which led to a crushing defeat of the Russians. The Russians withdrew in 1989. Their defeat in Afghanistan was a prelude to the collapse of the Soviet Union, its disintegration, and the disintegration of the global Warsaw Pact.

Then the Mujahideen were able to overthrow the communist rule, especially after the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1990 and the demise of global communism.

However, the sedition of conflict between the different factions of the Mujahideen plunged the country into civil wars between (1992 - 1996), orchestrated by America and some European and Islamic countries, led by Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. Around 40,000 Muslims were victims of this war, including the best of the Mujahideen.

Then the Taliban movement was born in Kandahar in late 1993, led by Mullah Mohammed Omar. They succeeded in establishing an Islamic emirate that declared rule by Islamic Shari'ah after entering Kabul in 1996. Afghanistan became a refuge for Arab and Islamic Jihād movements. The Taliban entered into a bitter conflict with the Northern Alliance of Uzbeks, Tajiks, and Shi'a Hazaras, and international and regional powers intervened again...

Until America invaded Afghanistan with the help of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, some European countries, and Iran! after the famous September events, and overthrew the Taliban emirate in December 2001. Various Islamic forces and the Taliban are still waging Jihād again against the American forces and their allies to this day.

(See the author's book "Taliban and Afghanistan and the Battle of Islam Today - 1", and further details related to this topic will follow in the coming chapters, God willing.

Central Asian States (Turkestan):

Turkestan (the land of the Turks) is located in Central Asia, bordered by China and Mongolia to the east, the Caspian Sea and the Ural River to the west, Tibet, Kashmir, Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iran to the south, and Mongolia and Siberia to the north. It was occupied and divided between the former Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China through several treaties, starting with the Treaty of Nerchinsk in August 1689 and ending with the Treaty of Saint Petersburg in February 1981.

The western part occupied by the Soviet Union is known as Western Turkestan and consists of five countries with a combined area of approximately 5 million square kilometers! As for the eastern part occupied by the People's Republic of China, it is known as Eastern Turkestan (Xinjiang), as the Chinese called it after its occupation. Its area is approximately (1,734,750) square kilometers.

The Russian Invasion of the Islamic Countries of Central Asia and its Stages:

The Russians were a pagan nation, then they entered Christianity in 378 AH, which is 988 CE.

After the conquest of Constantinople by the Ottomans in (857 AH / 1452 CE), its priests fled to Russia, and the Russians became the representatives of the Eastern Church and carried the banner of the Crusade in Asia.

Ivan III appeared in 885 AH / 1480 CE and began his wars against the Muslim Tatars, driving them away from Moscow.

He was succeeded by his grandson (Ivan the Terrible), who swept across the lands of the Muslim Tatars, seized the Volga River basin, and imposed Christianity on the Tatars there or forced them to emigrate.

Ivan imposed Christianity on the Bashkir Muslim lands. Its people practiced Islam secretly for about 300 years, and their descendants declared Islam in 1905 during the reign of the Tsar, who granted religious freedoms.

Ivan seized Siberia from the Muslims in 988 AH / 1580 CE. Then he occupied the Caucasus, which was subordinate to the Ottomans, taking advantage of their conflict with the Shi'a Safavids in Iran.

The Shah of Iran (Nader Shah) recognized Russian control over the Caucasus in 1813 CE, and the people of the Caucasus declared Jihād against the Russians under the leadership of the Dagestan people between 1722 and 1859 CE. They fought the Russians for 137 years until the Caucasus submitted. Then the Russians advanced into Central Asia after realizing the difficulty of expanding in Europe. Tsar Alexander II of Russia decided in 1273 AH / 1856 CE that Central Asia was the area for Russian expansion, and the Tsarist forces moved into Central Asia starting from 1276 AH / 1859 CE.

The Russians occupied Tashkent in 1282 AH / 1865 CE, followed by the fall of cities and khanates (small emirates).

Samarkand fell in 1868 CE, then Bukhara in 1873 CE, then Khiva in 1874 CE. The Russians faced fierce resistance in Kokand, so they shelled the city and carried out a terrible massacre there in 1876 CE. Then Merv and the Turkmen lands fell after violent resistance from 1873 to 1874 CE. The Russians completed their control over Turkestan in 1900 CE, and it became a base for Russian military administration, which implemented an Iron Curtain policy and attempted to Christianize the Muslims.

The Russian advance and the fall of the Muslims were rapid, despite the brave resistance, due to several factors, the most important of which were ethnic conflict and racial division among more than a hundred ethnic and national groups that make up the ethnic fabric of the region! As well as backwardness and the low level of education and armament among Muslims. Also, the weakness and decline of the Ottoman state in Istanbul and its inability to aid the Muslims, as passed in its history during that period.

The Tsarist Russians imposed a policy of brutality and enforced backwardness and ignorance on the country to facilitate its occupation.

Chaos prevailed in the Tsarist state for a quarter of a century (1905-1928), and political rebellion movements expanded, leading to the Bolshevik Revolution after the defeat of the Tsars by Japan and the collapse of their prestige in 1904 CE and as a result of widespread administrative and economic corruption and mismanagement in the provinces.

The Bolshevik Revolution began with a workers' movement in the city of Petrograd in March 1917 CE, and Lenin (the Jew) returned from Switzerland carrying the principles of communism advocated by Marx (also a Jew). He seized power and appealed to the minorities in the Soviet Union for help in return for justice for ethnic groups and religions with false attractive promises. He specifically gave Muslims a large share of these promises and encouraged them, so many Muslims joined the Bolshevik revolution seeking revenge against the tyranny of the Tsars.

Despite the signs of betrayal by the Bolshevik Russians towards Muslims, a state of fragmentation and disunity prevailed among them, and many Muslim clerics and scholars sought to stand with the Bolsheviks and the Russian authorities and dragged the Muslim masses behind them into disbelief, error, and occupation!

Lenin continued his policy of deception and issued appeals for sympathy and solidarity with Muslims. He published documents and statements that incited Ottoman and Iranian Muslims against the Tsars and accompanied this with some open policies towards Muslims, such as handing over some Islamic endowments and historical sites to their religious administration.

Nevertheless, the Muslims were not completely deceived by Lenin. His forces met fierce resistance, especially in Turkestan, Uzbekistan, and the Fergana Valley.

A massive Islamic civil revolution occurred in the Ural and Siberia regions, defeating the Red Army. This revolution stabilized in the Fergana Valley, and the Ottomans tried to help them. This resistance continued from 1918 to 1928 CE.

After the collapse of the resistance, division and corruption spread among many Turkestani and Uzbek Muslims. Many of them joined communist and socialist parties, associations, and institutions. Many Muslim clerics tried to reconcile communism, Islam, and Marxism, but this did not prevent the policy of liquidating Muslims during the reigns of Lenin and then Stalin until they eliminated those Muslims who supported them.

Stalin succeeded Lenin, and the policy of oppression continued and became overt, especially after the end of World War II, in which the Muslims suffering under the occupation of the Soviet Union performed greatly. Many Muslim religious leaders stood firmly with the Soviet Union, Moscow, and Stalin against the Germans in the Second War!!

Stalin was able to deceive many hypocritical Islamic religious leaders, from the highest representatives of fatwa to many ordinary Muslims. After the end of World War II, Stalin launched a war of extermination against Muslims in the Caucasus and the republics of Central Asia, and his victims numbered more than 20 million Muslims. Millions of them were transported to die in the frozen Siberian desert until they ate the corpses of their dead! This policy continued after him during the reigns of Khrushchev, then his successor Brezhnev, and those who followed them, until the Soviet Union disintegrated by the grace of Allāh and then by the grace of the Afghan Jihād and the standing of the Islamic Ummah and its Mujahideen vanguard with dignity and honor in Afghanistan, leading to their defeat and the end of their state in 1990 CE. Praise be to Allāh.

Gorbachev came to power after the reform movement (Perestroika). The Soviet Union disintegrated, and communism disappeared. The republics of Central Asia nominally became independent. Russia linked them with it through military administration and actual military presence, especially on the borders, particularly in Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan.

Then, under American supervision, a Central Asian States Association was established to resist the creeping Islam from Afghanistan.

On the Caucasus front, the Russians suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Chechens between 1994 and 1997, followed by the independence of Chechnya, then its re-occupation and the displacement of most of its people. Jihād is still ongoing there to this day. Signs of the revolution moving to Dagestan and then the rest of the Caucasus are appearing to meet the raging fire simmering under the ashes also in Transoxiana and Central Asia soon, God willing.

The Reality of the Central Asian Republics and Muslims After the Disintegration of the Soviet Union:

The defunct Soviet Union consisted of fifteen main union republics before its disintegration. Its combined population was about 286 million, and it occupied a total area of 22 million square kilometers. The percentage of the Muslim population was about 75 million.

Anyone who looks at the percentage of Muslims in those republics in Central Asia is amazed to discover that more than half of its area is based on predominantly Islamic republics, and that most of its major capitals were Islamic centers just a hundred years ago, and that this extended for more than a thousand years. Glory be to Allāh. Perhaps the following official statistics highlight this, which are statistics with long-term future political and military implications.

The republics of the defunct Soviet Union, according to their importance and the percentage of Muslims in them, are as follows [1]:

Firstly: The Russian Federation: Its capital is Moscow. Its area is about 10 million sq km. Its population is about 143 million, and the percentage of Muslims ranges between 10-25% of the population.

The Russian Federation includes several republics located in the Volga Basin:

1. The Republic of Bashkiria: Its capital is (Ufa), its population is 4.5 million, the percentage of Muslims is 56%.
2. "Tatarstan": Its capital is (Kazan), its population is 4.5 million. The percentage of Muslims is 50%.
3. "Mordovia": (Saransk) 1.15 million. Percentage of Muslims 55%.
4. "Mari El": (Yoshkar-Ola) 1.15 million. Percentage of Muslims 52%.

5. "Orenburg": (Orenburg Chkalov) 250 thousand people. Percentage of Muslims 50%.
6. "Udmurtia": (Izhevsk) 1.850 million people. Percentage of Muslims 52%.

The Russian Federation is followed by five autonomous republics located in the North Caucasus:

1. Dagestan: Its capital is (Makhachkala) and its population is 2.35 million. Percentage of Muslims 60%.
2. Kabardino-Balkaria: Its capital is (Nalchik) 760 thousand people. Percentage of Muslims 55%.
3. Republic of Karachay-Cherkessia: Its capital is Cherkessk. 450 thousand people. Muslims 60%.
4. North Ossetia-Alania: Its capital is (Vladikavkaz) one million people. Muslims 55%.
5. Chechnya and Ingushetia: Its capital is (Grozny) its population is 1.73 million. Muslims 66%.
6. Republic of Adygea: Its capital is (Maikop) 540 thousand people. Muslims 50%.
7. Republic of Siberia: Its capital is (Omsk) 25 million people. Percentage of Muslims is 25%.

This is about the Russian Federation itself. Then we come to the republics that became independent:

Secondly: The Republic of Belarus: Its capital is (Minsk) one million people. The percentage of Muslims is not specified.

Thirdly: The Republic of Ukraine: Its capital is (Kyiv) and its population is 51 million people, including the population of the Crimea (numbering 7 million) and the percentage of Muslims in it is 71%!!!

Fourthly: The Republic of Latvia: Its capital is (Riga) and its population is 2.5 million. The percentage of Muslims is unknown.

Fifthly: The Republic of Estonia: Its capital is (Tallinn) its population is 1.15 million people. The percentage of Muslims is unknown.

Sixthly: The Republic of Moldova: Its capital is (Chisinau) its population is 4 million people. The percentage of Muslims is 5%.

Seventhly: The Republic of Lithuania: Its capital is (Vilnius) its population is 3.5 million people, and there are 18,000 Muslims.

Eighthly: The Republic of Armenia: Its capital is (Yerevan) and its population is 3.3 million people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 17%.

It is followed by the autonomous Republic of Nakhchivan, whose population is 300 thousand people. Its capital is Nakhchivan, and the percentage of Muslims is 95%.

Ninthly: The Republic of Georgia: Its capital is (Tbilisi) and its population is 3.5 million people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 19%. Georgia is followed by:

The Republic of Abkhazia: Its capital is (Sukhumi) and its population is 750 thousand people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 19%.

The Republic of Adjara: Its capital is (Batumi) and its population is 450 thousand people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 40%.

Tenthly: The Republic of Azerbaijan: Its capital is Baku, and its population is 7.27 million people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 82%, most of whom are Shi'a.

Then the Islamic republics of Central Asia:

Eleventh: The Republic of Uzbekistan: Its area is 447,400 sq km. Its capital is (Tashkent), its population is 25 million people. The percentage of Muslims in it is 88% of the population.

Twelfth: The Republic of Tajikistan: Its capital is (Dushanbe). Its population is 5.5 million people, and the percentage of Muslims is 80%.

Thirteenth: The Republic of Kyrgyzstan: Its capital is (Bishkek) and its population is 5 million people. The percentage of Muslims is 73%.

Fourteenth: The Republic of Turkmenistan: Its capital is Ashgabat, its population is 4 million. The percentage of Islam among them is 86%.

Fifteenth: The Republic of Kazakhstan: Its capital is (Almaty), and its population is 17 million. The percentage of Muslims is 52%.

The fourteen republics became independent from the Soviet Union, of which only the Russian Federation remained.

Summary of the Conditions of Muslims in Central Asia After the Departure of Russian Control:

1. Continuation of security and military relations with the Russian army and security forces, especially on the borders with Afghanistan.
2. The five countries are linked under Russian-American supervision in the Central Asian States Alliance, which is a security and military alliance to confront the surge of Jihād and Islam coming from Afghanistan.
3. The entry of American, Jewish, and Western occupation and influence, and the resulting economic and cultural dominance and missionary and Christianization movements, replacing the former Russian communist influence.

4. The transformation of the main communist cadres, parties, and figures into agents for the Americans under new national and democratic names.
5. The continuation of the policy of hostility towards Islam in a blatant manner at the hands of apostates and communists from among the Muslims of the country after this task was entrusted to the Crusader Russian colonialism. Thus, these governments waged an open war on various Islamic movements, da'wah, and activities such as schools, Quran memorization centers, and manifestations of adherence. They particularly pursued Jihād oriented trends, as in most Islamic countries, under the guise of fighting terrorism.
6. In Tajikistan, the confrontation with the Islamists reached the point of armed clashes, and the government was able to domesticate the main Islamic movement there, which is the Renaissance Movement, while parts of the movement with a Jihād orientation continue to control areas and parts of Tajikistan.
7. In Uzbekistan, with the emergence of Jihād oriented beginnings that reached the point of planning to assassinate the head of state and carrying out some military Jihād actions, a wave of arrests occurred, followed by trials in which unfair death sentences were issued against some Mujahideen and prison sentences against dozens of others. This confrontation proved regional security support and cooperation at the level of the five countries and internationally under American supervision, as many of these defendants were arrested from multiple countries and handed over to the government of Uzbekistan immediately, due to direct cooperation between the countries of the region, Russia, the Americans, and the international system, for fear of a leap that the Muslims' Jihād might achieve in Central Asia after the brilliant victory they achieved in Afghanistan, which led to the establishment of a real nucleus for the awaited Islamic state and the desired return of the Muslim renaissance, God willing.

8. Kyrgyzstan: Military maneuvers were conducted against terrorism and the fear of a presumed Taliban attack! despite the dispersion and disappearance of the Taliban, in mid-2004.
9. Turkmenistan: The construction of new mosques and the printing of the Quran were prohibited. Beards and veils were banned, and the government ordered the writing of the Turkmen president's ravings - in a book he wrote - on the walls of mosques alongside or instead of the Quran!

Eastern Turkestan Occupied by China:

Eastern Turkestan was opened for the first time at the hands of the Mujahid commander Qutaybah ibn Muslim, who entered "Kashgar" during the reign of the Umayyad Caliph Walid ibn Abd al-Malik in 96 AH / 715 CE.

At the end of the Umayyad era and the beginning of the first Abbasid era in the third century AH, the Khagan of the Turks, Sultan "Satok Bughra Khan," embraced Islam and named himself Abd al-Karim. His sons and prominent men of his state followed him in Islam. From that day on, Islam became the official religion of the state, and Turkestan remained an independent Islamic state for about nine centuries. Since then, all its people have been Muslims.

In the eighteenth century CE, many parts of the Islamic world fell prey to European and Asian colonialism. In Asia, the Russian and Chinese colonizers agreed to divide the land of the Turkic Muslims through several treaties. This Muslim part fell into the hands of China after 1,200,000 Turkestani Muslims were killed, and 22,000 Turkic families were exiled into China to be assimilated into the Chinese population!

Turkistani Independence:

"(1) These details were written by the martyr Amīr Hasan Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī in Kabul in 2000 to be appended to the author's message, 'Muslims in Central Asia and the Coming Battle of Islam.'"

The Muslims of East Turkistan rose up against Chinese colonialism and Buddhist oppression in seven major, widespread revolutions. The last of these, in 1863 CE, resulted in the liberation of East Turkistan from Chinese rule and the formation of an independent kingdom in the 19th century CE. Local governments were formed in five regions, all of which came under the rule of "Atālīq Ghāzī Ya‘qūb Beg," to whom the Ottoman Sultan granted the title of Amīr of the Muslims. Atālīq was a good man who built mosques and Islamic schools, many of which still exist today. However, the colonial ambitions of Russia and China were renewed. Chinese forces indeed took control of East Turkistan in 1878 CE. A decree was issued on November 18, 1884, making East Turkistan a province and naming it "Xinjiang," meaning "New Territory," with Ürümchi as its capital.

The Second Independence of East Turkistan:

The revolutions of the Turkistanis against Chinese colonialism continued, and many Muslims were killed in their struggle for their salvation and the salvation of their country from Buddhist Chinese rule. The Chinese government suppressed these uprisings with great brutality and cruelty. But the more they increased their oppression and violence, the more they found determination among their people. Eventually, a religious figure, "Thābit Dāmullā," succeeded in liberating the country and forming the Republic of East Turkistan in Kashgar in November 1933 CE.

However, the Chinese governor, Sheng Shicai, crushed the revolutionaries and their republic in July 1934 with the help of Russia, which feared the presence of this young Muslim state nearby.

Chinese Communist Rule in East Turkistan:

In 1949 CE, the commander of the Chinese army in East Turkistan announced the surrender of the country and its submission to the head of kufr (disbelief) and atheism in China, Mao Zedong, the leader of the Chinese Communist Party. Chinese Communist forces entered East Turkistan in October 1949. Thus began a new era of terror and injustice in the history of Muslim East Turkistan.

The Post-Mao Zedong Era:

This period is characterized by the shift of the communists from implementing a policy of overt terror to practicing a policy of applying scientific communism and cultural Sinicization (rendering things Chinese). The most prominent of these practices include:

First: Restricting the practice of religious rituals and preventing the spread of Islamic teachings to sever the new generations' connection to their Islamic identity.

Second: Preventing the Turkistani people from exercising their legitimate human rights, such as education and freedom of expression, in addition to persecution, arrest, and even killing.

Third: Confiscating the wealth of East Turkistan and depriving its original inhabitants of the bounty of their land, imposing a life of poverty and hardship on them, and neglecting economic development in the country.

Fourth: Deceiving the world by establishing a superficial autonomy for East Turkistan, managed by the Chinese from behind the scenes and implemented by their loyal Turkistani officials.

Fifth: Flooding East Turkistan with Chinese immigrants and settling them in the living and working places of the original inhabitants.

Sixth: Carrying out nuclear explosions in Turkistani territories, resulting in environmental pollution with poisons and the spread of diseases among the Turkistani people.

Seventh: Forcing the Muslim Turkistani people to implement a birth control policy and applying the harshest penalties to those who violate this policy.

Eighth: Encouraging marriage between Turkistanis and Chinese.

Muslims continue to suffer under this injustice, oppression, and tyranny to this day, which has led some of them to take up arms against the Chinese government that relentlessly pursues them. Some of them sought refuge with the Taliban in 1997 and re-established the Islamic Party of Turkistan. Many of them were killed during the American invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, defending the Islamic Emirate. Then, the Pakistani army in the border areas of Sarhad killed their Amīr, "Hasan Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī," along with a group of his companions in November 2003. May Allāh have mercy on them and accept them among the strangers who fled with their religion, and may He gather us with them in 'Illiyīn.

6. Indonesia:

It is the largest Muslim country in terms of population, with over 200 million people, about 92% of whom are Muslims. Islam spread there through trade and replaced paganism and Buddhism. Indonesia includes a group of islands located in Southeast Asia, the largest of which are Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Sulawesi, Timor, the Moluccas, New Guinea, and the Malay Peninsula.

Due to its strategic location, it was exposed to Portuguese, Dutch, English, Spanish, and American colonial competition. Portugal was the first to occupy Indonesia and followed a policy of evangelization that converted some to Christianity. Then, Indonesia came under the rule of the Spanish, who inherited the Portuguese empire.

Then, the Dutch took control of the country in 1005 AH and established the Dutch East India Company in 1011 AH, headquartered in Jakarta.

In 1226 AH, Britain took control of the country, then shared its rule with the Netherlands under an agreement concluded between them in 1229 AH.

Resistance of the Indonesian people against colonialism erupted under the leadership of Prince 'Abd al-Fattāḥ, who formed an army of fidā'iyyīn (self-sacrificers) and built a strong fleet that caused trouble for the Dutch.

In the 13th century, the resistance did not stop, and a long war broke out, inflicting heavy losses on the Dutch.

Several Indonesian parties were founded after World War I, such as the "Muḥammadiyyah Association," the "Syarikat Islam" party, the "Ā'ishiyah Association" specifically for women, the "Young Java Party," and the "Association of Muslim Scholars," among others. Most of them had a jihādi Islamic character. These associations and parties then crystallized into two main parties: the "Green Shirts Party" and the "Red Shirts Party." The first party resorted to negotiations to achieve independence, while the other adopted the method of armed jihād and transformed into a "Communist Party." During the interwar period, the "Greater Indonesia Party" and the "National Party" were founded under the leadership of Sukarno, who succeeded in forcing the Netherlands to reduce its policy of violence and economic extortion.

When World War II broke out, Japan occupied Indonesia in 1361 AH. The national resistance movement erupted under the leadership of Ahmad Sukarno and Muhammad Hatta, and an Islamic party called "Ḥizbullāh" was also founded. All participated in confronting the Japanese occupation.

When the war ended, Japan declared Indonesia's independence in 1364 AH. After Japan's withdrawal, England and the Netherlands participated in a campaign against Indonesia and were able to seize some important areas and cities in Sumatra and Java. With the continuation of the struggle, they were forced to recognize Indonesia's independence according to an agreement concluded in 1366 AH. But the Netherlands resorted to invading the country again in 1368 AH and canceled the 1366 AH agreement. As a result of international pressure, the Hague Conference was held in 1369 AH, which resulted in the end of Dutch colonialism.

Then, a conflict occurred between the communist-leaning parties and the Islamic ones. The conflict resulted in the division of Indonesia into two governments: one Soviet, centered in Madiun, and the other national, centered in Jakarta. Then the two states united in 1369 AH under the name of the "Republic of Indonesia," headed by Ahmad Sukarno.

A communist coup took place in 1385 AH, but the Minister of Defense entrusted General Suharto with confronting the coup, which Ahmad Sukarno supported.

Under pressure from the national Islamic forces, Sukarno was forced to abdicate in 1386 AH (1968), and General Suharto assumed the presidency of the republic.

Then the country's conditions deteriorated due to the corruption of Suharto and his family... Many disturbances occurred, leading to the adoption of political reforms and elections contested by secular parties and civilian and military figures. These conditions remain the same today. In the last elections in 2004, the presidency of the republic went to a military general who pledged in his victory speech to fight terrorism in cooperation with America and Australia!!

The country has been and continues to be subjected to a strong Christianization movement for hundreds of years, which intensified during the last century. I read in some statistical reports from some Saudi Islamic institutions in 1992 that the number of those who converted to Christianity in Indonesia was about 30 million people!

Given the country's size, industrial development, and the strong Islamic awakening within it, Indonesia is exposed to conspiracies to divide it. European countries, with the support of Christian movements that they had helped convert during the years of occupation and then independence, succeeded in separating East Timor from Indonesia. The Moluccas Islands are witnessing fighting between Muslims and Christians who have committed brutal acts, burning houses and some of them were photographed eating the raw and grilled flesh of slain Muslims! Recently, a strong Islamic awakening has revived in Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, and neighboring East Asian countries, which has turned into jihād and confrontation with American, Western, and Australian interests. This has made these countries targets of frenzied American campaigns under the pretext of combating terrorism. May Allāh assist our brothers and grant them victory.

7. Malaysia:

A contemporary Islamic kingdom comprising a peninsula of Malaya and northern Borneo, consisting of thirteen states. Islam spread in Malaysia through trade. In 675 AH, its king converted to Islam under the name of "Sultan Muhammad Shah," and his subjects followed. The country had previously been subjected to Portuguese colonialism in 918 AH, which was then replaced by Dutch colonialism in 1051 AH.

In 1201 AH, the country came under British rule, and in 1360 AH (1940), Japan invaded the country, then withdrew after World War I. British colonialism returned and established a federation between the British protectorates in Malaya.

In 1375 AH, the constitution was issued, and a coalition front was formed under the leadership of Tunku Abdul Rahman, who managed to obtain independence in 1376 AH.

In 1383 AH, a federation comprising Malaya, Singapore, and North Borneo was established, known as the Federation of Malaysia. In 1385 AH, Singapore left the federation.

A contemporary renaissance occurred in Malaysia, influenced by the Japanese model, transforming it into a prosperous industrial state. Malaysia is currently witnessing a promising Islamic and jihādi awakening. May Allāh open up to them.

We will suffice with these examples from the Arab and Muslim countries, for the story is repeated and simple, and its summary is:

The gradual occupation of Muslim countries by European and other powers since the 17th century, which escalated after the collapse of the Ottoman Empire. Then the rise of resistance and jihād movements against that occupation, followed by the emergence of secular, nationalist, and leftist parties that seized the efforts of jihād. The colonizers arranged for them to take over the rule after independence, so they fought Islam, plundered the country, and humiliated the people for the benefit of their masters. Then the Russians and Americans inherited colonial influence, and the tragedy continued and intensified.

Then, when America gained sole control over the world since 1990, it controlled those rulers and subjugated them. After the events of September 2001, the disaster increased and turned into a nightmare for Muslims due to the alliance of those apostate rulers with America against their people in general and committed Muslims in particular, under the pretext of combating terrorism. America, led by George W. Bush, declared the new Jewish crusades, starting with the occupation of Afghanistan and then Iraq, while preparing for the next stages in the neighboring areas.

After the rapid review of the most important historical milestones of Islam and the most important kingdoms and states that arose throughout that history, and before moving on to the next chapter in which we will conduct an analytical study of the milestones of the conflict with the Romans, the features of that conflict, and the power equations within it, in order to search for the causes of victory and defeat in the stages of that conflict, we find it beneficial, indeed necessary, to present a quick idea beforehand about the history of these Romans, the main milestones of the states and kingdoms that carried their banner throughout history, up to our present day. As well as a summary of the course of the conflict between Muslims and the Romans since the Prophetic mission up to our present day.

Because the most important information we need, after knowing ourselves, our history, the milestones of our victories and defeats, and their causes, is to know as much as possible about our enemy. To know their weaknesses and strengths and to study the history of our conflict with them, and the data and causes of victory over them, with the permission of Allāh.

A Quick and Brief Overview of the History of the Romans

(600 BC - 2004 AD)

The gathering of the ancient Roman tribes began in the eastern plains of the Italian Peninsula. There they built the ancient nucleus of the city of Rome, during the sixth century BC.

As a result of the narrow agricultural plains around them, those tribes within the peninsula engaged in bloody conflict over resources, which made them experienced in fighting and pushed them to spread outside the peninsula, expanding by land in Europe and by sea along the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea.

The Romans inherited from the Greeks their civilization which had collapsed, and they inherited most of its components. They inherited its religion and its gods, just as they inherited the philosophy of the Greeks and their political and social system which was based on a class system (nobles - slaves - commoners). They also developed their democratic system and took from it the foundations of their civilization, which is considered an extension of Greek civilizations in terms of general characteristics.

Because they grew up on the coasts of the sea, the early Romans built a commercial fleet with which they traversed the ports of the Mediterranean, east and west. Soon, power and ambition lured the early Roman kings to build a strong military fleet with which they gradually controlled the coasts of that sea, which was later known as the Sea of the Romans. Their armies invaded by land and sea all the countries around it, eventually establishing a formidable colonial empire that included all of Europe, the lands of Greece, the western lands of Anatolia, the Levant, Egypt, and North Africa. Their authority reached the Horn of Africa and the lands of Abyssinia.

With this expansion, the Romans came into contact and conflict with the other powerful empire in the East, namely Persia. Anatolia (Turkey) and the borders of the Levant towards Iraq were the theater of a long and bitter conflict between the two empires that lasted until the rise of Islamic civilization which removed both of them from the East.

As we mentioned, the Romans remained on their pagan religion until Christ (peace be upon him) came with the religion of Christianity. The Jewish rabbis incited the Roman ruler in Palestine against him and his followers, and they sought to kill him and betrayed him. But Allāh raised him:

(1) I do not have at my disposal now – in my current isolation – any sources to give this important title its scientific due. What I have written is the result of what remains in my memory from what I studied in the history department curriculum at Beirut Arab University, and the general knowledge and information I have accumulated. Perhaps I will do justice to the paragraph in a later edition, if Allāh wills and helps, and if there is still life and determination. And Allāh is the helper.

{And [for] their saying, "Indeed, we have killed the Messiah, Jesus, the son of Mary, the messenger of Allāh." And they did not kill him, nor did they crucify him; but [another] was made to resemble him to them. And indeed, those who differ over it are in doubt about it. They have no knowledge of it except the following of assumption. And they did not kill him for certain.} (Al-Nisā': 157).

They persecuted his followers for more than two centuries, during which time the Jewish rabbis undertook to distort the new religion. The followers of Christ (peace be upon him), his disciples, and their students traveled throughout the land, pursued. The Romans carried out massacres against them everywhere they fled, as mentioned in the Holy Qur'ān in the story of the people of the Trench and the people of the Cave. This continued until it reached its peak during the era of the Emperor Diocletian, who severely persecuted the Christians, so much so that his era is called the "Era of Martyrs" in Christian history. He is the emperor during whose reign the people of the Cave emerged at the end of the third century CE, and Allāh knows best.

Gradually, the number of Christian followers increased throughout the Roman Empire. Emperor Constantine succeeded his predecessor Diocletian. Constantine's wife was Christian, so he recognized Christianity as a second official religion alongside paganism, and the persecution of Christians subsided. Then, Constantine soon converted to Christianity, and paganism disappeared, making Christianity the religion of the Romans from the beginning of the fourth century CE to this day.

When Constantine adopted Christianity, he found it scattered among many sects, as a result of the dispersal of the disciples, the secrecy of their followers, and the mixing by the rabbis. He asked them to collect the many gospels and condense them into a single book that the empire would adopt. So the first Christian Council was held, where the rabbis and monks found about four hundred different gospels before them. The oldest of these historically attributed to Christ dated back about two hundred years after his ascension (or their belief in his crucifixion), due to the persecution and the oral transmission of the gospel narratives by Christian rabbis for fear of writing them down for fear of the Romans. When they were written down two centuries or more after the ascension of Christ, they contained much confusion as a result of the interjections of narrators and the passage of time. This is the primary reason for the distortion of the Gospel, which was continuously distorted by churchmen during the Roman era and thereafter. Thus, the First Church Council came out with four authorized gospels: the Gospels of Luke, John, Matthew, and Mark.

Peter was one of the leading Jewish rabbis who were hostile to the religion of Christ and his followers. He tortured whoever he could in cooperation with the Roman ruler in Palestine. Then he claimed that he had converted to Christianity and that he had been tasked with building the great church on the rock of Rome. So he went there and established the church that developed into the Vatican and became the headquarters of the Christian popes to this day. To this Peter is attributed the distortion of many Christian beliefs (especially in the Catholic denomination). Thus, Christian denominations became a mixture of the teachings of Christ, Jewish principles, and what remained of the origins of Greco-Roman paganism. The doctrine of the Trinity prevailed, with the three hypostases (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit), as the Christians lie and falsely attribute to Allāh, exalted is He above what they associate with Him.

The Christians adopted the doctrine of the crucifixion of Christ and based their religion on this great lie. Then the Catholic denomination, whose followers, led by the Pope of Rome and supported by its emperor, pursued the remaining Christian sects that did not believe in the divinity of Christ and other falsehoods, and persecuted them with the harshest methods and ended their existence.

The second important thing that Constantine did after introducing Christianity and unifying the Gospels was that he built the city of Constantinople, in a place he chose during one of his travels in the Golden Horn area on the Bosphorus Strait, which connects the Black Sea to the Sea of Marmara. It is the city of Islāmbūl (Istanbul) today. Constantine made it the second capital of the empire after Rome, and this was the beginning of the division of the Romans into Eastern and Western, a division that was political and even doctrinal.

After the death of Constantine, another emperor succeeded him who saw the vastness of the Roman Empire, which included all of Europe, the shores of the Black Sea, most of Anatolia, the Levant, the Nile Valley, Abyssinia, and North Africa. He decided to divide it administratively into four sections, each with an independent governor. After the death of the emperor, this division turned into two eastern provinces with Constantinople as their capital, including Eastern Europe, the eastern and southern Mediterranean, and two western provinces covering most of Western Europe with Rome as their capital.

In the late fourth century CE, massive human migrations occurred from Central Asia towards its west. Tribes pushed and displaced each other from their lands, forcing many of them to cross into northeastern Europe. This became known as the barbarian invasions of northern Europe from the direction of the Scandinavian countries. Among the most prominent of these tribes were the Germanic, German, Czech, Slavic, Gallic, Gothic, Alanic, Huns, and Vandal tribes... These tribes were characterized by their ferocity and brutality in their barbaric attacks. These pagan pastoral peoples knew nothing of civilization except fighting and destruction.

These invasions and the acts of looting and plundering practiced by the barbarians in the northeastern part of the Roman Empire exhausted the emperors and drained much of their strength while they were preoccupied with their historical conflict with the Persians in the East. The Roman emperor was forced to offer these tribes to settle in northeastern Europe, and to have the rights of residence, agriculture, and hunting north of the Danube River, hoping to relieve himself of their attacks. They settled for a while, but soon they made this region a launching pad for attacks on Western Europe.

Attila, the fierce leader of the Huns tribes, emerged. He led massive armies, reaching a quarter of a million cavalry in some of his battles! The motto on his banner was a dagger plunged into the ground with "The land trampled by my horse does not grow grass" written beneath it!

His attacks ultimately resulted in the fall of Rome in the mid-fifth century CE, and thus the barbarian tribes were pushed to settle in Western Europe, each settling in one of its regions, forming the ancient basis of the current European nation-states. The Gauls settled in France and were called the Franks. The Germanic and German peoples settled in the Rhine basin (Germany). The Alans settled in Italy. The Goths settled in Spain. The Vandals settled in the south of Spain, and their land was named after them as "Vandalus," meaning the land of the Vandals, which eventually became "Al-Andalus."

Over time, these peoples mixed with the Romans and the indigenous peoples of those lands, intermarrying with them and then converting to Christianity. Independent kingdoms and civilizations arose for these states, and all followed Rome and the Pope of the Vatican as the center of religious influence for all of Europe. Meanwhile, Eastern Europe remained unified, ruled by the Caesar of the Romans, who controlled a part of Anatolia, the Levant, Egypt, Abyssinia, and parts of North Africa. The Eastern Romans, who were called Byzantines, developed their independent denomination and their Orthodox Church. Some kingdoms in Europe grew to imperial size, such as Germany, France, and Spain, while other kingdoms in Italy, Portugal, and England operated under a feudal system, where the king, nobles, and church formed an alliance during those Middle Ages.

Thus, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) was sent in 610 CE, and these were the conditions of the international system at that time. The Persians were in Iraq, Iran, the Caspian basin, and parts of Afghanistan and Sind. The Byzantine Romans and the kings of Europe shared the West and the Mediterranean basin. The state of Islam arose, and his (peace and blessings be upon him) prophecy was fulfilled, as it is narrated that he said:

Then Persia is one or two blows, and there will be no Persia thereafter forever. And Rome has its horns; whenever a horn perishes, another takes its place, people of rock and people of the sea, far off until the end of time. They are your companions as long as there is good in life.

So the Muslim armies marched to incorporate Persia and its components into the civilization of Islam, and to take from the Roman Empire all their colonies in the East and South of the Mediterranean. The international system, as we explained in the previous chapter, devolved into a conflict between Muslims and the Romans.

During the eleventh and twelfth centuries CE, the weakness of the Muslims tempted the Romans. Encouraged by the Pope of the Vatican, whose calls coincided with the economic interests and internal problems and rivalries of the European kings, the first Crusades were launched from Western Europe. The kings of Europe participated, led by the kings of England, France, and Germany, and the Caesar of Constantinople assisted them with equipment and the naval fleet.

The Crusades lasted for about two centuries and a little more. During this time, internal wars between European kingdoms did not cease, nor did the bloody conflicts between the nobles of Europe, the feudal lords, and their kings, as well as between the kings and successive popes. This was also the case between the Eastern Romans and the neighboring Eastern European kingdoms. With the defeat of the Crusades, as we will explain in the following paragraphs of this chapter, the armies of Europe returned from the East carrying with them the spirit of Islamic civilization and its humanities and sciences, and the essence of what they had preserved from the civilizations of the East that Islamic civilization had melted together and transmitted their essence, such as the civilizations of India, Persia, Turkistan, and the borders of China.

During those Middle Ages (from the fifth century to the fifteenth century CE), Europe was in a state of backwardness and ignorance, under the darkness of the conflict of kings and feudal lords and the dominance of the church allied with them, which undertook to plunge the people into the darkness of ignorance and Jahiliyyah. The European kingdoms had civilizational contact with the Muslim kingdoms in Al-

Andalus. The sons of kings and prominent nobles would visit its capital, Córdoba, and its universities and libraries to study and seek knowledge.

The situation remained thus until the Ottoman Turks were able to conquer Constantinople in 1453 CE, bringing an end to the Middle Ages and marking the beginning of the modern era in Europe. Shortly thereafter, the Christian kings of Spain, supported by the kings of Europe, managed to bring down the last Muslim kingdom in Al-Andalus (Granada) in 1492 CE. They also inherited the essence of its civilization. These factors led to the renaissance of the European kingdoms and their nation-states.

At the same time, at the beginning of the fifteenth century, Tsarist Russia began its eastward expansion, controlling the northern half of the Asian continent (over the next three centuries). It joined the club of major European crusader powers and later entered into fierce crusader wars with the Ottoman Empire, as we have seen.

During the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, and up to the mid-eighteenth century, the Ottoman Empire controlled the Mediterranean Sea and the East, penetrated into Eastern Europe, seized its kingdoms and the remnants of the Byzantine Roman Empire, and advanced westward into the Balkan countries. From the seventeenth century until the mid-eighteenth century, it stood at the gates of Vienna, the capital of Austria. There, the efforts of the kings of Europe and the Vatican united to stop this Islamic advance, as the countdown to the Ottoman Empire began during the second half of the eighteenth century, and the star of modern European civilization (the contemporary Romans) began to rise after the star of the Muslims had set.

During the fifteenth century, and as a result of the suffering of the European peoples from the control of the Pope of the Vatican and the Catholic denomination, reform movements arose, born in Germany and spreading throughout Europe, leading to the emergence of a new Christian denomination, the Protestant denomination, which carried many Jewish biblical influences. It soon gained popularity in Britain and moved from there to settle in the United States later. Thus, Europe was divided into three main denominations, geographically distributed among the majority, with the Orthodox denomination prevailing in Russia and Eastern Europe, the Catholic denomination prevailing in Central and Western Europe, and the Protestant denomination spreading in Britain and the United States.

The industrial and scientific revolutions led to the renaissance of Europe. The French Revolution at the end of the eighteenth century led to the awakening and renaissance of the peoples of Europe. The movement of colonial explorations that began from Europe since the late fifteenth century CE, blessed by the Pope, resulted in the establishment of major maritime colonial empires, at the forefront of which were Portugal, Spain, Britain, France, and the Netherlands...

During the eighteenth century, Europe witnessed numerous revolutions. The feudal system collapsed, and the bourgeoisie emerged, leading to the rise of the capitalist industrial system in place of feudalism. Major battles took place between kings and nobles, resulting in the unification of scattered principalities and the formation of federal states, such as the wars of Italian and German unification during the nineteenth century. The features of the map of Europe and its nation-states began to take shape, close to their current form.

During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the major European empires engaged in numerous colonial wars among themselves within Europe and in distant colonies across the seas, from North and South America to Africa, to South and Southwest Asia, and in remote islands in the oceans. These battles resulted in the defeat of Spain and Portugal, and the British and French seizing most of their colonies, making the two countries the strongest in Europe, whose Western civilization became the natural heir to Roman civilization.

With the Ottoman Empire reaching the state of weakness we mentioned earlier, it entered a state of agony and was referred to in the international political parlance of the time as "the sick man." Colonial Europe began to conspire to divide it and sharpen its knives to partition and swallow its remnants. The Jews entered the conspiracy at this stage to carry out intrigues and seize control of the nervous system of the new Romans (Europe and America) by controlling the world of politics, finance, media, prostitution, and espionage!

The most important reasons for the renaissance of Europe, its regaining of the banner of civilization, the rise of Western civilization, and its colonial launch since the early sixteenth century – in brief:

The Crusades in the East and the transfer of the essence of Islamic civilization's heritage and what it preserved from the civilizations of the East in Persia, India, and Central Asia, and benefiting from all of that. The activity of the scientific translation movement and the study of the causes of defeat in the Crusades (since the thirteenth century).

The fall of Constantinople and the migration of scholars, libraries, and the legacy of Roman civilization to Europe (during the fifteenth century).

The fall of Al-Andalus and the plundering of its flourishing libraries, and completing what they had gained from the Crusades by inheriting the components of Arab Islamic civilization (since the sixteenth century).

Geographical discoveries and the development of European fleets and the return of their benefits from trade profits, especially after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope and the diversion of trade routes from the Muslim lands. And what they gained from the treasures of the conquered lands, especially the New World (the American continent, since the sixteenth century).

The discovery of steam power and the development of ships and locomotives, and the discovery of gunpowder and explosives and the development of weapons (since the seventeenth century).

The French Revolution at the end of the 18th century against the monarchy and its holy alliance with the Church, and the launch of political ideas and the nationalist renaissance that led to the fall of the feudal system and the unification of major nation-states like Germany, Italy, and France at the expense of small principalities.

The revolution against the Church and the release from its rigidity, and the launch of the experimental world and intellectual freedom after the French Revolution against kings and the Church.

The Industrial Revolution in the 18th and 19th centuries and the revolution of scientific inventions and the development of civilian and military industrial machinery.

The military spirit and the colonial orientation towards conquest, expansion, sacrifice, and effort in various parts of the earth under the leadership of adventurous kings yearning for glory, wealth, and expansion.

Thus, these factors gave rise to powerful colonial states, foremost among which was Tsarist Russia, whose armies swept and controlled more than half of the Asian continent. And Britain, which formed an empire that included China, India, most of North America, and many other countries in Asia and Africa, to the extent that they called it "the empire on which the sun never sets." And France, which followed it in spread and expansion, as well as the imperial Spain and Portugal, which were pioneers in colonial expansion, and other countries like the Netherlands, Belgium, and Italy...

During the nineteenth century, wars of independence began in North America. The revolution led by George Washington resulted in the establishment of the United States of America, which was formed after the subsequent civil wars to join Tsarist Russia and the Western European countries in the club of major powers.

The European-European conflict over European policies and colonial gains led to the outbreak of World War I (1914-1918), which claimed the lives of about six million people! One of its results was the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, whose legacy Britain and France plotted to divide. They expanded to become the two largest colonial powers in history, especially Britain, which became an empire on which the sun never sets.

Thus, Europe, after World War I, embarked on the main wave of the second Crusades against the Muslim world, which can be practically dated from Napoleon's campaign against Egypt in 1798, although the Crusader advance on the edges of the Muslim world had begun since the beginning of the sixteenth century, when Portugal, Spain, France, Britain, and the Netherlands occupied many colonies on the fringes of the Muslim world. But the peak of the campaigns was after the Sykes-Picot Agreement in 1917 CE between France and Britain.

The colonial conflict among the European countries themselves and the emergence of Nazi Germany and its formation of a hostile axis to the European countries in cooperation with Italy and Japan led to the outbreak of World War II (1939-1945). This war, which claimed the lives of about 82 million people, led to the destruction of the economic and social structures of the European colonial countries and redrew the map of Europe in approximately its current shape. It also led to the decline of the European countries and the rise of the Soviet Union, which inherited Tsarist Russia and established a communist state ruling its legacy from Moscow, after the Bolshevik Communist Revolution in 1917 CE. As well as the rise of the United States of America as the two largest countries among the Roman countries controlling the destiny of the world. These two countries inherited most of the important colonial legacy of the European countries and thus primarily inherited the banner of the contemporary Romans.

As we mentioned, the new international system arose shortly after World War II, and the Soviet Union primarily, along with the United States and the remaining strong European countries – France and Britain – shared dominion over the world for half a century.

The Soviet Union collapsed after its entanglement in Afghanistan, and the United States of America, whose military power had matured to become stronger than the sum of the nine strongest major military powers that follow it in the list of strong countries, as strategic studies say, became the sole superpower. Its economy joined to be the strongest economy on Earth. With its scientific and technological capabilities and a population of nearly 300 million people, it became the heir to Roman civilization, as its leaders declared. This is a fact.

Britain (the old, dissolved colonial state) rushed to enter its orbit by virtue of the unity of language and denomination (Protestant) and shared history. The rest of the European countries became subordinate to it through NATO, which began to include most of the components of the Warsaw Pact from Eastern European countries and even Russia itself... so that the efforts of the Romans could unite in the third Crusades against the Muslim world, led by America, which began since the announcement of the New World Order in 1990 and reached its peak since the end of the twentieth century and the beginning of the third millennium CE, which are our current days, when America, its allies, and its hypocritical followers undertook to fill the earth with injustice and oppression.

The Dominance of the Jews over the defunct Soviet Union and current Russia

The Bolshevik Revolution and the Jews:

The Bolshevik Revolution was Jewish in thought, planning, funding, and execution. Its philosopher and thinker was Marx, the grandson of the Jewish rabbi Mordecai Marx. Likewise, Lenin, who turned Marx's words into the reality of a revolution and provided the communist movement with his writings, was also Jewish.

A resolution of B'nai B'rith (the Jewish Sons of the Covenant) in 1939 stated: "We have spread the spirit of false liberation revolutionary spirit among other nations to convince them to abandon their religions, and even for people to be ashamed of declaring the teachings of these religions. We have succeeded in convincing many to openly declare their complete atheism and their disbelief in a Creator altogether. We have seduced them to boast of being descendants of apes - Darwin's theory - and then we have presented them with ideologies whose true depths are impossible for them to fathom: Communism and Anarchism, which serve our interests and goals."

As for the funding, it was Jewish, as mentioned.

Brownsville, the eastern neighborhood of New York, was the stage for the planning of the revolution, led by Trotsky. This neighborhood is still the center of global Jewish planning for the destruction of humanity.

In the first week of the revolution, a two-part decree was issued concerning the Jews:

- Hostility towards Jews is considered hostility to the Semitic race and is punishable by law.

- Recognition of the right of Jews to establish a national homeland in Palestine.

The first political book of the Bolshevik Revolution:

Composed of seven individuals, five of whom were Jews by birth:

Lenin: Jewish, and his wife (Trubskaya) was Jewish.

Trotsky: Jewish.

Kamenev: Jewish.

Sokolnikov: Jewish.

Zinoviev: Jewish.

As for Stalin, his wife was Jewish, named Rosa Kaganovich.

Yenukidze: Russian and not Jewish, he was the only one.

The state formed by Lenin in 1918 CE:

This was the first government after the revolution:

| Department                 | Total Number | Jews |
|----------------------------|--------------|------|
| Ministers                  | 22           | 17   |
| War Administration         | 43           | 34   |
| Internal Affairs Committee | 64           | 45   |

|                               |            |            |
|-------------------------------|------------|------------|
| Foreign Affairs Committee     | 17         | 13         |
| Press Committee               | 42         | 41         |
| Total Senior Officials | 532 | 425 |

This means that 80% of the officials were Jewish.

Perhaps the reader thinks this was at the beginning of the revolution, but the matter continued to this day. In 1965 CE, the Soviet writer Nina Alexeyeva wrote: "The number of Jews in the Soviet Union does not exceed one percent, but they represent sixty percent of the faculty in higher institutes and universities, and eighty percent of the ideological guidance officials in the party and foreign policy. The Deputy Prime Minister and the head of the Economic Council in the Soviets are Jewish."

(Al-Dhakha'ir, vol. 1, pp. 971-973)

The Yalta Conference in 1945 CE and the Dominance of the Jews over the Great Powers

Following the Second World War, the three poles (Roosevelt, Stalin, Churchill) met and decided to eradicate Nazism, divide Germany into occupation zones among the Allies, dismantle the Japanese Empire, and form democratic governments in Eastern Europe. They also studied the Zionist memorandum which included:

- That Germany be required to pay compensation of 5 billion dollars to be distributed among the affected Jews in Europe and those who had migrated to America and Palestine.
- Lifting all restrictions on Jewish immigration to Palestine.

- Granting Jews assistance to establish their political entity.

As for the three poles, they were either Jews by lineage or by inclination and sentiment.

Roosevelt: Jewish, descended from a Jewish family named Rosenberg, which later changed to Roosevelt. They migrated from Spain to America, and his grandfather, Clinton Roosevelt, was one of three who formed a committee to raise funds for Marx and Engels to produce the Communist Manifesto. The Jews presented the American President Roosevelt with a gold medal inscribed with:

"Prosperity and wisdom to Franklin Roosevelt, our new prophet who will restore us to the Promised Land."

As for Stalin, he was Jewish by lineage, and his wife was Jewish, named Rosa Kaganovich. This Jewish beauty and her family continued to manage the Soviet Union for nearly three decades during Stalin's rule. Lazar Kaganovich, Rosa's brother, had control over Stalin and Molotov.

"As for Churchill, he was one of the most ardent enthusiasts of the Zionist idea."

(Al-Dhakha'ir, vol. 1, p. 981)

The Dominance of the Jews over Europe

I used to have some statistical information and studies about this topic in my archive, but I lost them in London due to my rapid migration from there to Afghanistan, and then I lost the other part in Afghanistan during its fall.

However, the gist of what I remember from that is the enormous control of the Jewish and Zionist lobbies over the world of politics, press, media, banks, and economic institutions in Europe in general.

Among what I remember, for example:

- Al-Mushahid Al-Siyassi magazine, published by the BBC, published a study in one of its issues in 1996 about the power of the Jewish lobby in the two main British parties (the Conservative Party and the Labour Party). It concluded that the Jews control both parties to a surprisingly similar degree. It was puzzled by the question: Who will the Jews support in the elections between the two parties?! I had the magazine in my archive, and it contained an important statistical report.
- When I was studying in France in 1985, the Jewish organizations and associations held a conference under the slogan "Year 2000 - France is Jewish!" It was in French: L'an 2000 La France est juif!!

Newspapers published studies about the spread of Jews in various state institutions, and the statistics were astonishing! The far-right French nationalist National Front party, which is against Jews, Arabs, and foreigners, published dangerous information about this Jewish penetration...

The same can be said about every other country, and this information can be obtained by anyone who wants to delve deeper from the Internet... It is enough to see the positions of the European Union, including its declaration of Palestinian organizations, including Hamas, as terrorist organizations, despite Europe's recognition of the right to resist occupation, and the evidence is numerous. Although European peoples have begun to express their dissatisfaction with this situation. An official statistic from the European Union even announced that about 60% of the European population sees Israel as the primary threat to world peace, which caused a violent reaction among European Jews and Israel.

The Dominance of the Jews over Contemporary America and the Phenomenon of Judaizing Christians (The Evangelical Church) and The Neoconservatives

America was discovered in 1492 CE. When news of the riches of the New World began to reach the ears of people in Europe, it became, over the next three decades, the destination of adventurers, dissidents, and those persecuted in Europe, just as it became an exile for criminals and exiles.

The Jews, who were suffering from injustice and contempt from Christians in Europe, realized the importance of this New World. Some even believed that it was the Promised Land that they had been promised in their ancient books.

When gold mines and immense wealth appeared, the Jews' sense of smell and greed were aroused, and they began a massive migration to the New World. They quickly formed a large community and worked in their historical field, finance and usury.

When America gained independence and the United States of America began to form, some of them had already gained influence in the fields of banking, capital, and banking operations. One of the early American presidents, (??), feared and predicted the influence of this faction and warned against them. In a document that is still preserved in the Library of Congress, he warned his people about them, saying that he expected that if this group were not restrained and prevented from pursuing its ambitions and greed, he expected that a time would come upon his American nation when these people would control them and own their livelihoods... I kept a copy of his famous statement.

Indeed, the matter came to pass as he had warned. The Jews played a prominent financial role in funding countries in World War I and then World War II. They also participated in funding the industrial renaissance in Europe and America. By the end of the nineteenth century, the Jews had monopolized the trade of money, business, and banking in Europe and America, and they had a lobby that controlled American and European election campaigns. They controlled the media and press sectors in America, as well as Europe. They controlled the film industry and the world of Hollywood, and they infiltrated their beautiful women to be mistresses or wives of prominent political and economic figures! They established associations and organizations, and the Jewish community in America exceeded eight million people, most of whom live in the economic heart of the United States (New York City), which is considered one of the Jewish capitals of the world. Then Jews and the children of Jewish women entered the field of politics themselves, and some of them became members of Congress, the Senate, ministers, and even presidents!

Given that the majority of American Christians adhere to the Protestant denomination, which is based on interpretations of the Old Testament (the Torah) and Jewish books and literature, new sectarian schools were born that consider loving Jews and working for the restoration of their glory in Israel as among the closest religious acts.

These denominations and associations developed and acquired numerous media outlets, including hundreds of radio stations, television channels, newspapers, magazines, books, research and advocacy centers... etc.

Then the Evangelical Church appeared, and among its most prominent beliefs was the obligation to support Israel as a religious duty and the belief that a global battle would take place in the plain of Armageddon in northern Palestine between the Jews, supported by Christian kings, and the Muslims, and that these battles would result in the destruction of millions of people, and that they would be a prelude to the return of Christ descending from heaven to save those who believed in him. These people believed that the end of the twentieth century or the beginning of the current century was the time for this event. Many American politicians believed in these talismans, including President Reagan himself! Several books have been written about this topic, and some of them have been translated into Arabic. (Sheikh Safar Al-Hawali has valuable studies and books on this topic for those who wish to delve deeper).

Therefore, Israel has received unlimited support from America during the last quarter of the last century and still does. Then, at the end of the last century, a new religious and political school emerged in America with even more ominous beliefs. They called themselves the Neoconservatives, and they included the administration of President George H.W. Bush and the current administration and the current President George W. Bush himself.

These individuals base their doctrine on biblical myths, the necessity of rebuilding the Temple and the Kingdom of Israel, and that Allāh blesses America for undertaking this mission. This is in addition to imperial dreams of American expansion, their dominance over the Middle East in alliance with the Jews, the supremacy of the white race's civilization, and the necessity of annihilating other races. They adopted the theories of the "Clash of Civilizations," arguing that the earth cannot accommodate two civilizations, and that the white race's civilization - Christian in religion, democratic in politics, capitalist in economy, and permissive in ethics and culture - must crush other civilizations, subjugate them, and impose its religion, culture, and system upon them.

Indeed, these neoconservatives, who can be called Judaized Crusaders, declared Islam and Muslims their primary enemy and announced the collision with their civilization as an inevitable destiny. One of their leaders even said, "We are the heirs of the Roman civilization, and its enemies throughout history are our enemies in the present." George W. Bush declared that his current war in the Middle East is a crusade, then apologized and said it was a slip of the tongue, but the wicked man repeated it several times consecutively! One of his prominent generals, a clergyman working in guidance, insulted Islam and the Messenger of Islam (peace and blessings be upon him) in a manner consistent with the baseness of that accursed general. The evidence for this requires a separate book and is well-known.

Thus, the Jews gained complete control over the current administration. Jews, the sons and husbands of Jewesses, and their students became the majority in the Senate, Congress, the government, and institutions. Practically, our war with Israel has become a war with America. May Allāh destroy them.

This is a brief summary of the history of the Romans from their origin to the present day, which has continued for about 2500 years so far and will continue until the Hour comes upon the worst of creation. The Romans will then be the most numerous people, as the truthful and trustworthy one (peace and blessings be upon him) informed us.

Development of the International System and Summary of the Conflict Between Muslims and the Romans

(8 AH - 1425 AH) (629 CE - 2004 CE)

From Thawbān, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said:

"Then the nations are about to call each other [to attack] you as diners call one another to a dish." Someone asked: "Will that be because of our small number at that time?" He said: "Rather, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like scum, like the scum of the torrent. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and cast weakness (al-wahn) into your hearts." Someone asked: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death." (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd)

And from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) that he said:

"Then Persia will have one or two blows, then there will be no Persia ever after. And the Romans are possessed of horns; whenever a horn perishes, another takes its place, people of rock and people of sea. Far off, for the rest of time, they are your companions as long as there is good in life." (Musnad al-Ḥārith, Zawā'id al-Haythamī Vol. 2 / p. 713).

And from him (peace and blessings be upon him): "The most hostile people towards you are the Romans, and their destruction will be with the Hour." (Musnad Aḥmad 17335).

If we were to summarize the conflicts and wars of Islamic civilization with its enemies throughout history, from its rise to the present day, we would find that it clearly confirms what was reported by him (peace and blessings be upon him). The stages of the conflict were as follows:

The Prophetic State and the Conflict with the Romans

The conflict with the Romans during the Prophetic State:

The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him)'s directive to the Muslims to engage in Jihād against the Romans (Banū al-Aṣfar) was the basis for what followed, the continuation of this eternal conflict. The beginning of this, as we saw in Mu'tah (8 AH - 629 CE) after their treachery against the Messenger of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), and then Tabūk. Then the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) prepared the army of Usāmah to invade the Romans, and he personally supervised it until the last breath of his life. Among his last noble words, as mentioned in the noble traditions, were: "Dispatch the expedition of Usāmah... May Allāh curse whoever lags behind it..." Since then, the mill of this eternal confrontation has continued to turn.

The Conflict with the Romans during the Era of the Rightly Guided Caliphs

It is clear from the above that the conflict with the Romans was one of the two main efforts of confrontation during the time of the Rightly Guided Caliphs. After the fall of Persia and its entry into Islamic civilization during the eras of ‘Umar and ‘Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with them), the confrontation with the Romans became the main focus. The Islamic confrontation was characterized by an offensive nature, and as we saw in detail in the history chapter, the Muslims quickly seized from the Romans; Bilād al-Shām and Egypt, and most of the possessions of the Byzantine Romans in North Africa, and threatened the Roman capital (Constantinople) itself during the caliphate of ‘Uthmān (may Allāh be pleased with him). They even entered Al-Andalus against the Western Romans, although they did not remain there.

The Conflict with the Romans in the Umayyad Era

As we detailed in (page? and after), the conflict with the Romans was the main focus of the wars of the Islamic state, alongside their movement eastward in the lands of Sind (Pakistan), Karmān (Balochistan), Sijistān (Iran), Khurāsān (Afghanistan), and the lands beyond the river (Central Asia). The conflict at that time was characterized by an offensive phase, during which the Muslims were able to seize all of North Africa from the Byzantine Empire. They also seized Al-Andalus from the Mulūk (Goths). They entered the lands of the Franks (Gaul), which is France, entering its cities of Toulouse, Lyon, and Bordeaux. The advance stopped near the city of Tours in northwestern France!!

Thus, the conflict included the Eastern Romans (Byzantines) and the Western Romans (kingdoms of Western Europe). The Muslims also seized some Mediterranean islands during this period and besieged Constantinople several times. The Romans did not have significant offensive initiatives during the Umayyad period. The most important of these were:

Raids of the Jarājima (Mardaite):

The Jarājima raided the Islamic frontiers during the reign of ‘Abd al-Malik ibn Marwān in the year 70 AH, incited by the Romans, taking advantage of his preoccupation with the war against Ibn al-Zubayr and the suppression of the uprisings that occurred during his reign. ‘Abd al-Malik dealt with them by paying money; he negotiated with the Byzantine Emperor Justinian II to pay him a thousand Dīnārs every week, on condition that he would abandon assisting them in their raids.

Naval Raids of the Romans:

The Byzantine fleet raided the Arab fleet in the year 129 AH and defeated it. The Byzantine fleet was able to capture Cyprus.

During this period, the Muslims entered into conflict with the pagan Turks in Central Asia, and the conquering leader Qutaybah ibn Muslim continued until he conquered Afghanistan, the lands beyond the river, Western and Eastern Turkestan, and reached the borders of China, adding about 5 million square kilometers to the area of the Islamic state. Meanwhile, his counterparts were advancing in the conquest of the lands of Sind and northern India, so that the Islamic state reached its greatest expansion through conquests during the Umayyad Caliphate.

The Abbasid State and the Conflict with the Romans

Firstly: The conflict with the Romans during the first Abbasid period (the period of strength):

As we saw in detail, the conflict with the Romans was the main focus, and almost the only one, during that period. In its beginning, it was offensive through the system of summer and winter campaigns. Then it became almost entirely defensive, and the Romans' raids on the long defensive line with them, extending from the borders of the Arabian Peninsula east of Anatolia to northern Bilād al-Shām, reaching Antioch and the Mediterranean Sea northwest of Bilād al-Shām, became numerous.

Among the most important raids that the state was subjected to during that period were:

- Raids of the Khazar with groups of Turks on Armenia in the year 147 AH, taking Muslims and Dhimmīs captive and destroying the city of Tiflīs (the capital of Georgia today), then their second raid in the year 183 AH.
- Raids of the Sea Pirates (Al-Maydh) on Basra in the years 148 AH, 149 AH, 153 AH, 178 AH, 179 AH, 225 AH, 227 AH, and 231 AH.
- And their raid on Jeddah in the year 151 AH.
- Raids of the Romans with their ships on Damietta (Egypt) in the year 238 AH.

As for the Western Romans (kingdoms of Western Europe), the truce was the nature of the relationship with them. It sometimes turned into good relations, as was the case between Harūn al-Rashīd and Charlemagne, the king of Gaul (present-day France), who even exchanged gifts.

Secondly: The conflict between the Abbasids and the independent Islamic states with the Romans from the second Abbasid period until the rise of the Ottoman state (247 AH - 922 AH):

The conflict with the Romans did not stop in either of its two aspects, the Eastern (Byzantine Romans) and the Western (Christian kingdoms of Europe). As we mentioned, since the end of the Golden Age of the Abbasid state, it was predominantly defensive, except in a few cases. The reality is that with the weakening of the central caliphate of the Banū al-‘Abbās in Baghdad, the independent states, as we saw in the summary of their history, took on the honorable mission of Jihād, defensively and offensively, and protecting the territory and defending the lands of the Muslims, their lives, and their honor.

So we found the Seljuks in the lands of Rayy and Anatolia fighting the Byzantine Romans fiercely, and the Ḥamdānids did the same in northwestern Bilād al-Shām.

When the Atābeg state was established, the Zengids fought the Crusaders who came from the kingdoms of Europe, and the Caesar of Constantinople did not hesitate to support them for two centuries. When the Ayyubid state was established, they inherited that honorable mission from their cousins the Zengids. When the Mamluks inherited the rule of Egypt and Bilād al-Shām, they inherited with it the completion of the noble mission and completely cleansed Bilād al-Shām from the defilement of the Crusaders. Meanwhile, the Seljuks continued their Jihād against the Romans in Asia Minor, until the Ottomans, their descendants, arose and carried the banner of honor that was still fluttering, borne by various kings and princes despite the immorality and conflict over kingship that afflicted them, as we mentioned some of that.

As for the west of the Muslim lands, the situation remained the same, as we saw. The Aghlabids, the Almohads, the Almoravids, and others among the kings and princes of the kingdoms of the Maghreb al-Aqṣā defended Islam and the Muslims whenever the Romans - in both their aspects - were tempted to attack the lands of Islam. As for the state of Al-Andalus, the dust of war remained unsettled between the Muslims and the Christians of Spain, supported by the kings of Europe, until they were finally able to overturn the state of Islam there after division and misguidance spread, and cooperation with the Christians among the kings of the Ṭawā'if. When they dared to seek their help against each other, Allāh gave the Christians power over them and overturned their state.

And this Sunnah continued consistently, until the banner of Jihād against the Romans was taken up by the nascent Islamic Ottoman state, which was pounding the fortresses of Constantinople in the east of the Muslim lands, while the Western Romans were pounding the fortresses of Granada in its west on the shores of the Atlantic, thus beginning a new era of this eternal conflict between us and the Romans.

The Ottoman State and the Conflict with the Romans

Then the Ottoman state was born from the descendants of the Seljuk Turks in Anatolia, and Sultan Mehmed the Conqueror was able to pound the walls of Constantinople with cannons whose projectiles weighed up to 3 tons in 1452 CE! This was after the Ottoman state rose with a renaissance that equaled and surpassed the renaissance of the Byzantine Romans and the developed European states at that time.

The fall of Constantinople constituted an earthquake on a historical level, so much so that historians considered it the end of the Middle Ages and the beginning of the modern era, and rightly so, for this was a reason for the Ottoman expansion in conquests to the north, south, and west, and their rise until the Islamic state under their banners reached imperial size and reunited its parts under one Caliph, after the Ottomans transferred the Caliphate to themselves and made its center Constantinople, which became known as Islāmbūl, meaning "City of Islam," which was later called Istanbul.

It was also the beginning of the renaissance of the European states and the subsequent Industrial Revolution and economic and social revolutions. Thus, modern European states with great might were born. They took over the conflict with the Islamic state at that time, which was the Ottoman Caliphate.

The armies of the Ottomans spread, conquering the lands of Greece, the coasts of the Black Sea, the Balkans, and the countries of Eastern Europe, until they reached the walls of Vienna, the capital of Austria, at the end of the seventeenth century, where they stopped. And Europe began its second counter-Crusader offensive.

While the Turks were spreading across Europe and Asia after the conquest of Constantinople in 1452, the Christian armies were besieging the last Muslim kingdoms in Al-Andalus, leading to the fall of the last stronghold of Islam in Western Europe (Granada) in 1493. The conflict intensified between the Ottomans and the colonial European states, which carried the torch of the Crusader Roman civilization after the Roman Byzantine Empire from Constantinople. Thus, the conflict between Islam and the Romans continued throughout the period of the Ottoman Caliphate until the European states were able to overthrow it and announce it in 1924, when the colonial states divided its legacy, which is the sum of the Arab and Islamic world. Meanwhile, they divided the countries of the world.

The Islamic World After the Fall of the Ottoman Caliphate and the Conflict with the Romans

The conflict between Muslims and the Romans did not stop with the absence of Muslims as a political force from the international stage after the fall of the Ottomans. The conflict of Islam continued, represented by the Islamic peoples and their Jihādī and liberation movements against the forces of the European colonial states in all their countries. In the farthest east of the Muslim lands, the Russian armies spread to overthrow the Islamic capitals in Asia. Their forces seized the lands of the Bashkirs, Tatarstan, Crimea, the eastern Black Sea, Siberia, and the Caucasus. Then they marched on the republics of Central Asia and overthrew their major capitals after fierce resistance and millions of losses. Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan fell, and the famous Islamic capitals of Marw / Bukhara / Tirmidh / Tashkent, between the beginning of the 16th century and 1904, when the armies of Tsarist Russia settled on the banks of the Oxus River, which forms their border with Afghanistan, which was in the sphere of English influence.

After the European states seized the Arab and Islamic world in Asia and Africa, the Muslims continued their conflict with the new Romans, represented by the major colonial powers, foremost among them Britain, France, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Portugal, Belgium, and others. These countries divided the occupation of the world, with the lion's share going to Britain and then France. The Ministries of Colonies in Paris and London divided the legacy of the Ottoman state, especially the lands of the Arab world, in what was known as the conspiracy or agreement of Sykes-Picot, which was concluded in 1919. Britain then introduced a new factor into the conflict with the Muslims: the Jews, by the British Minister Balfour issuing his ominous promise to make Palestine a national homeland for the Jews. Thus, the lands of India and Sind (Pakistan), Afghanistan, Iran, Southeast Asia, and many Islamic countries, including the Arabian Peninsula, Sudan, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, and Palestine, were under English occupation. Syria, including Lebanon, Tunisia, Algeria, parts of Morocco, and part of the Horn of Africa, were under French occupation. Spain took parts of Morocco and Mauritania and some African countries, and Italy took Libya and parts of the Horn of Africa.

Most of the Islamic countries in Central Africa had fallen under the occupation of those European countries before that. The lion's share went to France. The islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans, from the Philippines to Indonesia to Singapore to Thailand, Malaysia, Burma, and Bangladesh, also fell under their occupation before that. This colonial phase formed a field of conflict between the Islamic peoples and the Romans, represented by the European colonial states. The Roman-Jewish colonial powers did not hide the Crusader spirit in their colonial movement, and it appeared in many of their statements. Among these is that when the British commander Lord Allenby placed his banner with two crosses on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem, he cried out, "Now the Crusades are over," with a spirit of revenge for the defeat of his ancestors by the hand of Salāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī. As for General Gouraud, one of his first actions was to visit the tomb of Salāḥ al-Dīn, strike it with his sword, and break off a piece of stone from it, which is still preserved in the Military Museum in Damascus, saying to him, "Here we are back, Salāḥ al-Dīn." As for the Italians, their military anthem during the occupation of Libya overflowed with Crusader hatreds and boasted of the soldiers going to kill Muslims. There are many examples of the Crusader spirit of the modern colonial movement.

The Conflict Among the Romans Themselves After the Absence of Muslims from the International Power Stage and Their Transformation into Colonial Spoils

Thus, the shape of the international system changed to become a field of conflict between the Romans themselves over colonial spoils and European policies, which ignited two devastating world wars. The first lasted between 1914 and 1918 and claimed about 9 million lives in Europe. In it, Germany managed to drag the Ottoman state, whose affairs were in the hands of the Masons and the Sabbatean Jews, into the war on its side, which justified the division of its remnants after Germany lost the war, as did its dying ally, the Ottoman state.

Then the Second World War broke out between 1939 and 1945, claiming about 82 million human lives in Europe, Russia, and America. This war resulted in the destruction of Europe's infrastructure, economically and socially, allowing for the birth of two new great colonial powers on earth: Russia and America. European countries then rushed to join the alliance of one of these two states. Eastern European countries joined the Soviet Union, forming the Warsaw Pact under the leadership of Moscow. Most Western European countries joined the American alliance, forming NATO under the leadership of Washington. A new stage in the international system began, in which the conflict was between these two poles, as Muslims no longer existed on the international stage as a party, because they had become spoils, preyed upon by those countries and controlled in their orbit, following the example of their ancestors, the Ghassanids and the Lakhmids.

The Modern World Order and the Rise of the Soviet and American Empires and Their Conflict for Influence

As mentioned earlier, the Second World War led to the destruction of Europe and the decline of its colonial powers from prominence, and the emergence of two great powers: the Soviet Union and the United States of America. Then the Eastern European countries entered as quasi-colonies of the Soviet Union to form the Warsaw Pact and what was called the Eastern Bloc. Western Europe, led by Britain and France, joined the American alliance and formed NATO or the Western Bloc. The Second World War in 1945 resulted in a redrawing of the balance of power in the world on this basis. The League of Nations was established by the major powers to lay the foundation for a new international order at that time, then it was amended to become the United Nations. China rose as an economic, nuclear, and human power and imposed itself among the great powers, forming with America, the Soviet Union, France, and Britain the permanent members of the Security Council, the most important institution emerging from the United Nations.

The Cold War began between the two poles in the areas of espionage, the arms race, and the conflict for influence in bringing as many Third World countries as possible into the orbit of one alliance or the other.

The Bolshevik Communist Revolution had occurred in Russia in 1917, and the Soviet Union with its Leninist-Marxist philosophy replaced Tsarist Russia. After the Second World War, the Soviet Union supported liberation movements in countries that had not yet gained independence from the colonial powers during the revolutions that took place against them in the interwar period. Socialist and communist thought also spread in many countries and carried the principle of revolution against dictatorships supported by the colonial states, especially America and Western European countries. The Soviet Union supported these movements, and the conflict for influence between America and the Soviet Union led to the system of proxy wars, with the Soviet Russians supporting these movements.

The proxy wars and conflicts of influence led to the Soviet sweep of most Third World countries, especially in many countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. The Soviets established a strong foothold in important Arab countries such as Iraq, Syria, Egypt, South Yemen, Libya, Algeria, and the Horn of Africa.

Several proxy wars followed, in which various countries or even the people of a single country fought in this conflict for influence, such as those that took place in Korea, Vietnam, the Horn of Africa, North and South Yemen, Lebanon, as well as many countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Both countries also played on the Arab-Israeli conflict, with overt support from America for Israel and the Soviets playing the role of supporting the Arab side. It is noticeable that many of these wars and revolutions narrowed the areas of American influence, to the extent that it can be said that the result of these boxing rounds between America and the Soviet Russians showed the Russians' superiority on points in most of those rounds. Until the Russians, in the exhilaration of victory and progress, committed their fatal historical error and proceeded to occupy Afghanistan in 1979 in an almost overt manner following a series of communist coups supported by them against the monarchy there since 1965. Thus, in a strategic leap, they achieved half of the Tsarist dream of reaching the warm waters of the Arabian Gulf, as there was no barrier between them and it except the Pakistani-Iranian Balochistan triangle, with a distance of no more than 500 kilometers.

It seemed as if America had accepted the fait accompli and surrendered, showing no significant movement despite the alarm bells ringing about the approach of the sworn enemy to the oil sources, which control the main economies of the world. No one expected the surprise that occurred and changed the face of the world, taking it to a new historical stage that swept away all its old constants.

The defeat of Russia in Afghanistan and the collapse of the Soviet Union, and the rise of the New World Order led by America as the sole pole that single-handedly controls the political and economic destinies of the world

It did not occur to any of the policymakers, military geniuses, or great thinkers that a people ranking fourth among the poorest peoples in the world could withstand the strongest military power on earth, which is adjacent to it with a border exceeding 1000 kilometers, providing it with ideal and direct logistical support. But Allāh willed for the miracle to happen. The Afghans withstood the Russian agents from among their rulers from 1965 to 1979, which caused the overthrow of one coup after another. Then they withstood the direct invasion and fierce military confrontation with the crushing military machine of the Red Army for three years (1979-1982) until the American administration and its NATO allies were convinced that there was a historical opportunity to destroy the Soviet Red Army on the peaks and slopes of the Hindu Kush, in a way much worse than what was done to the American army in Vietnam. So the Congress decided in 1982 to adopt the Afghan Jihād and ride its wave.

The American permission to support it and the order to their European allies and their followers from the Islamic world, especially key countries such as Pakistan, whose border with Afghanistan exceeds 2200 kilometers, Saudi Arabia, which enjoys the influence of religious authority and the Two Holy Mosques over Muslims, Egypt, with its strategic weight in the Arab and Islamic world, and other countries, led to the opening of the doors for all types of financial and arms support for the Afghan Jihād. America and its European allies contributed large financial shares and obligated the Gulf states, especially Saudi Arabia, to pay large shares of the support. The door was opened for anyone from the Muslims who wanted to support the Afghan Jihād, and Pakistan opened its embassies to those who wanted to go there, and some Arab airlines reduced the price of tickets for those who wanted to participate in Jihād! There was permission from America. The Islamic movements, especially the Jihādī ones, benefited from the opportunity and were present in the field and fought the battle to support the Muslims. In short, Allāh decreed that all the conditions for the stunning victory would be met. This is not the place to recount the history of this unique experience in the history of Muslims, and even the world, in its details and consequences, which is a very important topic that requires dedicated volumes. However, what is related to our topic here is to say that the conflict between the Soviet Red Army and the entire Warsaw Pact and the Muslims on the land of Afghanistan resulted in a stunning victory that forced the Russians to retreat from Afghanistan after ten years, in 1989, dragging the tails of disappointment and defeat, having suffered tens of thousands of killed and wounded and leaving behind the wreckage of more than 50,000 military vehicles, as well as the debris of hundreds of aircraft.

Thus, America won the last round in the proxy war with the Soviets by knockout, as the Muslims delivered that punch to the Soviet Union! The outcome was in America's favor. It was the starting point for the collapse of the Eastern Bloc and America's sole control over the world, enabling it to announce the New World Order.

The ball rolled quickly as the Russians were forced to announce the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact, and the removal of the Berlin Wall between the two Germanys. The various republics quickly gained independence from Russia, and the communist regimes in Eastern European countries fell one after another like dominoes, replaced by regimes that rushed to prostrate themselves at the doorstep of the world's only superpower, America.

Thus, the parameters of the international system changed, giving rise to a new phase on its ruins, whose beginning can be dated to 1990, the time of the launch of what was called the "New World Order."

Gorbachev, who oversaw the dissolution of the Soviet Union, met with Margaret Thatcher, the then British Prime Minister, and the American President Reagan, to declare that Islam, its civilization, and its peoples are the next enemy of Western civilization. The idea of expanding NATO to include Russia and Eastern European countries was put forward, effectively merging Warsaw into NATO. When asked about the usefulness and meaning of NATO's continued existence after the demise of the Eastern Bloc, and why it was not transformed into an economic and cultural alliance, its officials replied that there was a need to strengthen and expand it to confront the coming danger represented by Islam and Islamic fundamentalism. Then Clinton succeeded Reagan to announce the launch of campaigns against Islamic terrorism. And America began to shape the world's policies and interfere in the destinies of its peoples and states. Among the most prominent effects of the establishment of the New World Order on the Arab and Islamic world are the following:

America's enticement of Iraq to invade Kuwait and America, Britain, and NATO countries leading an international coalition of 31 countries, whereby some Arab and Islamic countries were obligated to participate in the invasion of Iraq and the Gulf. The mobilization reached nearly a million soldiers! Half of them were Americans, and the British constituted 20% of them, while NATO participated fully in the burdens and responsibilities. The invasion, which was the beginning of the new Crusader campaigns against the Islamic world, as more than one American official declared, resulted in America establishing a foothold in the Gulf and effectively occupying it.

Many studies have revealed this program, which is the overt occupation of oil and energy sources, which had been planned since the early 1970s during the era of President Carter, and the American rapid intervention forces (Marines) were specifically formed for it. Thus, the program of the new Crusaders began with the invasion of the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Obligating the concerned Arab countries, the Palestinians, and the Arab and Islamic world behind them to sign peace and normalization agreements with the Jews, and the Zionist program began to move towards expelling the Palestinians and controlling the region through the program of cultural, economic, political, and social normalization with the Jews.

The launch of what are called campaigns against terrorism against Jihādī and Islamic fundamentalist movements, which evolved into campaigns against the entire Islamic awakening and reached, during the era of Bush, who succeeded Clinton, to become campaigns of annihilation or subjugation of all Muslims. Thus, a conspiracy to eliminate the gains of the Afghan Jihād began, and the wars of annihilation against Muslims in Bosnia and Chechnya were launched, and the Arab and Islamic governments began to implement what was assigned to them: the complete liquidation of the bases and organizations of the Islamic and Jihādī awakening everywhere.

Thus, Muslims were forcibly returned to the arena of conflict with the Romans after the conflict among the Romans themselves during the period of World War I and II, and then the Cold War period, resulted in America winning the competition. Britain quickly joined its ranks, and the NATO European countries, whether willing or fearful, were dragged into following it in managing this New World Order.

The Latest Episodes in Our Conflict with the Romans (The Conflict of Muslims with America and its Allies) Currently

The events of September 11, 2001, the American occupation of Iraq, and the outbreak of the Crusader war against Muslims led by America and its current president George W. Bush since the beginning of the 21st century:

Clinton's term ended, and the American elections in 2000 resulted in the victory of George W. Bush, the son of the American President George H.W. Bush, during whose era the New World Order and the Crusader campaigns were launched. A handful of his father's men and some Christian Zionist extremists, who call themselves the "Neoconservatives," managed to join him to form the new American administration. Their leaders, politicians, thinkers, and theorists raced to declare their principles, aspirations, and ideas, and they were not ashamed of them. One of them openly stated: "Americans are the heirs of the Roman Empire, and its enemies throughout history are its enemies in the present and future." Bush later did not hide his statement that "he is leading a crusade against Muslims." The issue of prioritizing support for Israel, occupying oil sources, and increasing the scope of anti-terrorism offices in the capitals of the world's countries, especially Arab and Islamic ones, was no longer a secret. America embarked on a policy of marginalizing Europe and the major countries of the world, and the administration adopted the global anti-terrorism project as a program to liquidate Islamic movements and drag Arab and Islamic governments into it, willingly or unwillingly.

The student movement of Islamic sciences in Afghanistan, or what is called the "Taliban movement," had been able to end the civil war, defeat the warring factions in Afghanistan, put an end to the spread of corruption on earth, and establish a system of rule based on Islamic Law. It declared the establishment of the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan, entered Kabul in 1996, and Mullah Muhammad Omar was declared the Amir al-Mu'minīn there. By 2000, it had managed to consolidate its foothold and rule in Afghanistan and controlled about 94% of its area.

As the anti-terrorism campaigns had constricted the earth for many young men of the Jihādī movements, and many Muslim youths, especially from the Arab countries and Central Asia, the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan became a refuge and a place of migration for many cadres and young men of those movements. Thus, the destruction of the Islamic Emirate and the expulsion of this مهاجر Jihādī elite, who were called the "Arab Afghans," from it became a priority. America began this with a series of measures of political and economic siege, media distortion, and security confrontations.

On the morning of September 11, 2001, 19 young Mujāhidīn affiliated with the al-Qā'idah organization led by the Jihādī Shaykh Usāmah Bin Lādin, managed to hijack a number of planes and carry out martyrdom operations in Washington and New York, destroying the towers of the World Trade Center and a side of the Pentagon building, the headquarters of the US Department of Defense, resulting in the killing and wounding of several thousand Americans.

Although these operations represented a major escalation after a number of other smaller operations against American targets carried out by al-Qā'idah or other organizations due to the wave of American aggression against Muslims and their support for the Jews in Palestine and all enemies of Islam, the American and international media were able to portray the subsequent brutal and oppressive American reactions and the launch of a global war against terrorism and the fight against Muslims on all fronts, portraying it as a justified reaction due to the Islamic terrorist attacks on America and its national security.

Bush began his global war on terror, and part of that was:

Launching a massive media campaign to create and prepare the atmosphere by portraying Muslims in general, and the Islamic awakening and Jihādīs in particular, as the imminent danger to humanity. Exaggerating the size and capabilities of this enemy to the extent of claiming that the Jihādīs possess weapons of mass destruction, the latest technologies of the era, and tens of thousands of trained fighters spread in dozens of countries. America merged all of this under the name "al-Qā'idah," whose name the American media turned into a frightening "bogeyman" that must be fought, incorporating every Islamic effort against it under this name, and even anyone it wanted to crush in its campaign. By this, America justified all subsequent aggression and measures and justified its march in a campaign of occupation on the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Attacking the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan, overthrowing the Taliban government, and destroying the infrastructure of the Afghan and Arab Mujāhidīn there.

Launching the campaign against terrorism and obligating all countries to it and holding dozens of conferences for this purpose. Bush raised his grandfather Qābīl's slogan, "I will surely kill you"! He launched the saying, "Whoever is not with America in its war on terror is against it," leaving no room for neutrality.

Bush unleashed his security agencies, including the CIA, FBI, and others, and the security agencies of other countries that he brought into the campaign, willingly or unwillingly, in a barbaric campaign of killing, capturing, torturing, displacing, and establishing detention centers that surpassed Nazi concentration camps in their procedures, disregarding all calls from international and American human rights organizations.

In March 2003, America finished preparing the political and media atmosphere over a year and a half of hype in order to exaggerate Iraq's capabilities and Saddam Hussein's regime, by claiming they possessed weapons of mass destruction, and invented another illusion: the relationship between Saddam Hussein and al-Qā'idah. It created a fear of the transfer of (imaginary) weapons of mass destruction from Iraq to al-Qā'idah and terrorists, based on this (imaginary) relationship. So the armies of America and its ally Britain advanced with about 300,000 soldiers armed with the most advanced military technology in history. They attacked Iraq from the territories of a number of Arab and Islamic countries, foremost among them Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt, Pakistan, and Turkey. Over twenty days, aircraft and missiles pounded civilian and military targets, and then in the first month of July, it announced the end of its operations and the occupation of Iraq. The UN Security Council, with all its members, quickly legitimized this occupation after Russia, France, and Germany abandoned their faltering opposition to the war and entered the American orbit.

Bush, his senior administration officials, and his media are now preparing the atmosphere to move to the next step: Syria and perhaps Iran. He is hinting at dividing Saudi Arabia and taking over Egypt. This is not the place to review a history that must be written and analyzed with utmost accuracy and honesty for the future generations of Muslims. However, the goals announced shamelessly by Bush and his administration have been openly declared, and they are:

Changing the political map of the Middle East by changing some regimes and redrawing the features of their existence.

Reshaping the map of the Middle East geographically by dividing countries, creating new ones, expanding some, and annexing parts of others.

Redrawing the cultural, civilizational, and religious features of Arabs and Muslims and altering their components to ensure their compatibility with the colonizer's ideas and to eliminate all seeds of renaissance and resistance.

Working to link the Middle East region to the American economy through economic partnership and trade exchange agreements, in which Israel is integrated, turning the peoples of the region into subservient consumers of American products and Zionist administration.

Occupying Iraq indefinitely, thereby controlling the largest oil reserves in the world, in addition to the oil it controls in the Gulf and Central Asia, which guarantees America control over the lifeline of the global economy and dominance over the countries of Europe, Russia, East Asia, and China.

Imposing the Zionist project for the state of Israel, which has become the sole military power, not just the strongest, in the region, after America dismantled the Egyptian army, destroyed the Iraqi army, and established a program for Syria to abolish its army, not modernize it, and abolish compulsory conscription, reducing its numbers to the level necessary for maintaining internal security only.

Thus, the slogan "I will surely kill you" has returned to be raised again by the hand of the twenty-first century Hulagu: "Mr. Bush!" and his new American-British-Jewish crusade.

And the conflict continues in all clarity between Islām and Muslims and their new Roman adversaries, just as it has been for 14 centuries. Exactly as the Trustworthy, the Believed One (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold... an eternal, everlasting conflict with the Romans. And it will continue as such until the Hour is established.

Conflict with the Rūm and Its Power Dynamics Throughout History

From Thawbān, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: “The nations are about to call each other [to attack] you as diners call one another to a dish.” Someone asked: “Will that be because of our small number at that time?” He said: “Rather, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like scum, like the scum of the torrent. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and cast weakness (al-wahn) into your hearts.” Someone asked: “O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?” He said: “Love of the world and hatred of death.”

And from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) he said: “Persia will be [defeated in] one or two thrusts, then there will be no Persia after it ever. But the Rūm are the people of horns (generations); whenever one horn perishes, another horn replaces it. People of rock and people of the sea. Alas, until the end of time, they will be your companions if there is good in living.”

As has become clear to us from the previous chapter, the conflict of the Muslims with the Rūm has continued since the era of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) until our present day, and it continues. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) informed us in some narrations, which are considered among the miracles of his prophethood (peace and blessings be upon him), that our fighting with them is an eternal conflict, continuing until the establishment of the Hour. Among these narrations are:

It is mentioned in Musnad al-Ḥārith and Zawā'id al-Haythamī, Vol. 2 / p. 713: Chapter on Fighting Persia and the Rūm: Mu'āwiyah ibn 'Amr narrated to us, Abū Ishāq narrated to us from al-Awzā'ī from Yaḥyā ibn Abī 'Amr from Ibn Muḥayrīz who said: The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: “Persia will be [defeated in] one or two thrusts, then there will be no Persia after it ever. But the Rūm are the people of horns (generations); whenever one horn perishes, another horn replaces it. People of rock and people of the sea. Alas, until the end of time, they will be your companions as long as there is good in living." Ibn Ḥammād also cited it in Kitāb al-Fitan, Vol. 2 / p. 479.

It is mentioned in the Musnad of Imām Aḥmad (may Allāh have mercy on him), Ḥadīth No. 17335:

Ḥasan ibn Mūsā narrated to us, Ibn Lahī'ah narrated to us, al-Ḥārith ibn Yazīd narrated to us from 'Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Jubayr that al-Mustawrid said: While I was with 'Amr ibn al-ʿĀṣ, I said to him, I heard the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) say: 'The most severe of people against you are the Rūm, and their destruction will only be with the Hour.' 'Amr then said to him, "Have I not forbidden you from [saying] such things?"

Indeed, historical events have confirmed what the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold. No sooner had the state of Islām been established during the time of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) than the clashes between Muslims and the Rūm began, and this has continued, as we summarized earlier, without cessation to this day. I read in a newspaper during the Second Gulf War (Operation Desert Storm and the liberation of Kuwait) that some historians had counted the wars between Muslims and the Rūm, and they numbered more than 3,600 wars between various Islamic states and Rūm states! Over 1,410 years.

Muslims have fought many nations, such as the Persians, Turks, Sindhis, Indians, Mongols, Chinese, and others. All of these were wars and clashes limited by their history and time. But history has proven that the Rūm are "the people of horns (generations)"; whenever one generation perishes, another replaces it. And whenever one of their states fades, leadership passes to another. They are the people of the land and sea armies. We are still in conflict with them, and this will remain until the establishment of the Hour. Even the conflict with the Jews will end with their annihilation in the battle of the stone and the tree. And even the conflict with Ya'jūj and Ma'jūj will end when Allāh the Exalted destroys them. But it is the Rūm, their states, and their kingdoms, and the fighting with them will continue until the establishment of the Hour, as mentioned in the Ḥadīth, and they are the most severe of people against the Muslims. Indeed, the Hour will be established while the Rūm are the most numerous of people, as stated in the authentic Ḥadīth, even though it will only be established upon the most wicked of creation, who are the majority of them. This is only because they possess characteristics – by the decree of Allāh – that have enabled them to endure.

It is narrated in the Musnad of Imām Aḥmad: From al-Mustawrid al-Fihri, who said to 'Amr ibn al-ʿĀṣ, 'The Hour will be established while the Rūm are the most numerous of people.' 'Amr ibn al-ʿĀṣ said to him, 'Consider what you are saying!' He replied, 'I am telling you what I heard from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him).' 'Amr ibn al-ʿĀṣ then said, 'If you have said that, it is because they possess four qualities: they are the quickest of people to return after a retreat, they are the best of people to a poor, needy, and weak person, they are the most forbearing of people during tribulation, and the fourth is a good and beautiful quality: they are the most resistant of people to the oppression of kings.' (Musnad Aḥmad 17334).

It is beneficial, as we endeavor in this research to answer the important question for which this book was written, which is: "How do we confront our enemies in the post-September world under American leadership?" That is, how do we successfully confront the Third Jewish-Crusader campaigns, if Allāh wills. It is beneficial to present the main stages in our clash with the previous Crusader campaigns, to identify the keys to victory and defeat in them, through a focused analytical study. This is the subject matter of this chapter, if Allāh wills.

How did those first and second campaigns, and this recent third one, proceed? Who were its parties on the side of the Rūm? Who undertook the confrontation, defense, and resistance on the Muslim side? Who was with us and who was against us, from within our ranks and from outside, during these campaigns?

I will not dwell here on the detailed events of history, as it is recorded and well-known in its references, especially the history of the First Crusader Wars, as well as the Second, which represents modern Arab history. A brief overview of this was covered in the previous chapter. However, I will suffice here with analysis, investigation of lessons, and drawing of conclusions.

This chapter is one of the most important foundations of the call to resistance in the field of Fiqh al-Wāqī' (understanding contemporary reality) and exploring the causes of victory and defeat.

We will take from history the three main stages of the Rūm's campaigns against the Muslims. And we will adopt a theoretical historical division for them, as we observe they were as follows:

- The First Crusader Campaigns (from approximately the mid-eleventh century to the end of the thirteenth century CE), on the coasts of Bilād al-Shām and Egypt, which included the occupation of Bayt al-Maqdis.
- The Second Crusader Campaigns (approximately 1800 - 1970). Against the components of the Ottoman State and the Islamic world, especially the Arab world, after the Sykes-Picot Agreement (1919) and the Balfour Declaration (1917).
- The Third Crusader Campaigns (1990 - 2004 and still ongoing). Against the Islamic world in general and the Middle East in particular.

There is a clear observation that the center of conflict in all three Crusader campaigns primarily revolved around Bilād al-Shām and its neighboring regions of Iraq, Egypt, and the Arabian Peninsula. And there lay the keys to victory and defeat for both sides.

We should not forget that the arena of modern conflict (from the sixteenth century to the present day) with the contemporary Rūm, in general, has extended across the length and breadth of the Islamic world, targeting all its lands from the farthest islands of the Philippines in the Pacific Ocean in the east to the farthest coasts of Marrakech and Mauritania on the Atlantic shores in the west. And from Central Asia, Crimea, the Balkans, and North Africa in the north, to Central Africa, Southeast Asia, and Indonesia in the south.

Sources of Authority (Marji‘iyyah) among Muslims

Before delving into the study of the three Crusader campaigns and their power equations, it is useful to draw attention to the concept of authority and leadership among Muslims throughout Islamic history, as this will help, as we shall see, in understanding the management of that conflict.

According to the agreed-upon understanding, "Ūlū al-Amr" (those in authority), as a Sharī‘ah-political term among Muslims, refers to the scholars (‘Ulamā’) and the rulers (Umarā’). By virtue of the Sharī‘ah texts and established practice, the leaders of the people, especially the heads of major tribes and clans, and those among them possessing sound judgment and intellect, formed the third pillar of authority among Muslims, alongside the rulers and scholars. Thus, authority among Muslims throughout their history can be identified with three sources, which are, in order of importance, as follows:

1. Political Authority: This consists of the legitimate Caliph (Khalīfah) when one exists, or the Sultans, Kings, and Princes who hold power and authority in the case of multiple kingdoms, which was prevalent throughout most of Islamic history.

2. Religious Authority: This consists of the scholars of the Islamic religion (‘Ulamā’ ad-Dīn), as this authority devolved to the scholars and Imāms of the four schools of thought (Madhāhib) and their major, followed by scholars and jurists (Fuqahā’) throughout Islamic history. Then, the spiritual leadership of the Sufi orders (Ṭuruq Ṣūfiyyah) and their Shaykhs, who had followers and influence, emerged. Often, the Imāms of the Madhāhib were themselves Imāms of the followed Sufi orders in most parts of the Islamic world.
3. Social Authority: This generally consisted of the heads of tribes and clans that form the basic structure of Arab and Islamic societies.

This was the case throughout Islamic history, whether in situations of political unity under a single Caliph or during periods of division under the authority of multiple kings and princes.

Indeed, people always turned to these authorities for leadership and guidance, especially during major calamities.

I am not here to digress into analyzing this and its role in Islamic history or its political and social impacts, except to the extent necessary to understand the structure of resistance in Islamic societies against the Crusader campaigns and the role of these authorities in it.

It is also necessary to clarify that this academic assessment, based on observation and conclusions, is not an evaluation of the rightness or wrongness of the methodologies of those groups, neither from an intellectual nor from a Sharī‘ah perspective. The research may indicate that a certain segment or a particular school of thought played a role in resistance, which we mention according to its importance, without this being, as it should be understood, an endorsement of the detailed beliefs, methodology, or way of thinking of the proponents of that phenomenon. It is an academic assessment and classification, not an evaluation for preference or correction of methodologies and beliefs to determine right from wrong according to the standards of Sharī'ah-based policy (al-Siyāsah al-Shar'īyyah).

I believe that while most Muslims today are ignorant of the role of these authorities, their cohesion, and their impact on the Ummah's coherence and ability to resist, the enemy has realized this and has worked to destroy these three authorities as much as possible. And it has invented alternatives for them or corrupted them and made them serve its purposes, as we will see by following those campaigns in the subsequent analytical study.

The First Crusader Campaigns (1050 - 1291 CE)

The summary, by way of a brief overview from historical references, is that when the Abbasid Caliphate (Khilāfah Banī al-'Abbās) weakened, and influence around the Abbasid Caliph fell to commanders and soldiers – most of whom, during the second half of its history, were Turks who appointed a Sultan from among themselves who became the de facto ruler of the Caliphate's center and its surroundings. The Caliph's influence was mostly confined to his palace or to Baghdad and its environs. Over time, the princes who theoretically followed the Caliph in the peripheries of the Caliphate state established independent states and kingdoms, which often fought among themselves, or their leaders vied for kingship and authority within them. These kingdoms often fragmented to include mere small cities or even castles and fortresses. Thus, there was a kingdom in Mosul, another in Beirut, a third in Tripoli, a fourth in Aleppo, another in Damascus, and so on. The Shī'ah gained control over the Caliph's court in Baghdad, the Qaramitah spread in the Arabian Gulf, and the Ismā'īliyyah and Nuṣayriyyah – extremist Shī'ah groups – controlled the coasts of al-Shām. The Ubaydid state, which attributed itself to the Fatimids, arose and established an independent caliphate for itself in Egypt that lasted for nearly two centuries.

During that time, at the beginning of the eleventh century CE, the Pope of the Vatican issued his call to the kings of Europe for the necessity of liberating Bayt al-Maqdis and the "True Cross" – which they falsely claim Christ was crucified on – from the hands of the "infidels" (Kuffār) – meaning the Muslims. Kings from various parts of Europe, especially England, France, and Germany, quickly responded to the call for political and economic interests, as many historians suggest, though the Crusader spirit was not absent from their motives either. The Caesar of Constantinople cooperated with these campaigns by supplying them with provisions as they passed through his lands in Eastern Europe and Asia Minor, as well as by placing the Roman fleet at their service.

Thus, the Crusader campaigns, which historians date as seven major campaigns, followed one another against the coasts of al-Shām, southwestern Anatolia (in the region of Edessa, which is between Adana and the Sanjak of Alexandretta in present-day Turkey), and finally Egypt, over two hundred years. During these campaigns, the Crusaders managed to occupy Bayt al-Maqdis and establish a central principality there. They also succeeded in establishing numerous Crusader principalities, independent of each other, depending on their links to the European kings who collaborated against the Muslims, who were often fighting amongst themselves.

The Islamic principalities bordering the Crusader principalities were weak, fragmented, and fighting among themselves, such as the principalities of Aleppo, Hama, Damascus, Homs, and Mosul. They witnessed many coups and internal conflicts. The princes and sultans therein made their people taste the woes of unjust taxes (mukūs) and various forms of oppression. Thus, the Crusaders occupied the regions that, according to contemporary geographical terms, comprise the Sanjak of Alexandretta, the Syrian coast west of al-Shām from the mountains to the Mediterranean Sea, and the entire region of Lebanon and Palestine. The weak Abbasid Caliph in Baghdad could do nothing. The Fatimid Caliph in Cairo did not lift a finger; rather, Fatimid history witnessed cooperation with the Crusaders. History also recorded the cooperation of the Nuṣayriyyah, who inhabit the western mountains adjacent to the coast in Syria, with the Crusaders, as they fought alongside them. The Islamic world, especially the Arab Mashriq, generally witnessed a state of severe turmoil and weakness during that period.

However, the historical documents that confirm this deteriorating situation at the level of political authority also prove that this period witnessed a scholarly flourishing, in which many great scholars (‘Ulamā’), Imāms, and orators (Khuṭabā’) emerged. The mosques (Masājid) bore the responsibility of religious authority and the guidance of the people, alongside social authority, far from the corruption of palaces and the conflicts of princes. The tribal social structure was cohesive and soundly built, so the people turned to their leaders among the scholars and tribal chiefs and acted upon their opinions.

With the arrival of the Crusaders, the scholars and orators rose up, urging the people to Jihād and knocking on the doors of the princes, inciting them to fight, starting from the Caliph's gate in Baghdad to the gates of the princes of al-Shām. However, historical references narrate unfortunate stories of the state of fragmentation and corruption among various types of princes and rulers of cities and fortresses. Some historians have recounted stories from that era, such that scholars toured the mosques, urged the people, and collected funds to build an army for Jihād. They knocked on the doors of princes searching for someone suitable for this task. None of the princes welcomed them until they heard of one who was thought to possess goodness and chivalry. They went to him and gave him the money after he promised them good. Then they returned to him but could not find him. They searched for him for a month in the Syrian desert (Bādiyat al-Shām) and found that he had gone hunting and, with the money they had collected for Jihād against the Crusaders, had built a palace in the desert for himself, his companions, and his retinue for nights of hunting and sport!!

Historians have narrated that the state of most of the Ummah at that time was one of preoccupation with the world and its adornments. They recounted how orators and preachers would ignite the enthusiasm of the people in the masājīd, which resounded with weeping and wailing, yet as soon as the men left the masjid, each would return to his worldly affairs, paying no heed to anything else... As if history is repeating itself today!!

Soon, the Ummah awakened from the shock, and the religious authority played its role within the Ummah. Books chronicling that era describe how this religious authority sharpened the resolve of the men of the Ummah, and how the social authority, along with the heads of tribes and clans in al-Shām and its surroundings, responded to the calls for Jihād. The elites of the Ummah at that time began clashing with the Crusaders from the very first day, until the resistance escalated.

The Ummah quickly regained its political authority with the rise of one of the amīrs of northern al-Shām, the Atabeg, the Mujāhid Amīr ‘Imād al-Dīn Zangī, who confronted the Crusaders in northwestern al-Shām and succeeded in toppling the Crusader state of Edessa. His star shone, and the Mujāhidūn and some amīrs rallied around him. The nucleus of the Zangid state began to form, with its capital initially in Mosul (northwestern Iraq, on the border of al-Shām), then moving to Aleppo (northwestern al-Shām) during the reign of his son, King Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd Zangī (may Allāh have mercy on him). He took power after the Bāṭinī Assassins from the Nuṣayriyyah of al-Shām assassinated his father. He assumed the emirate, and his authority extended to include northern Iraq, Syria, and Jordan. The Zangid state was established, and Nūr al-Dīn shouldered the task of building the foundational base for Jihād against the Crusaders in the East. Indeed, the credit goes to him (may Allāh have mercy on him) for all the glories later achieved by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. The history of this period is very well-known, covered by books, media, films, and television series, making repetition and digression unnecessary.

The ascetic King Nūr al-Dīn spent his life engaged in Jihād against the Crusaders in al-Shām, achieving one victory after another. The Zangid authority extended to Damascus, which became their capital after Aleppo in the Jihād.

The Crusaders were keen on capturing Egypt due to its significant impact in supporting whoever controlled it in the conflict over al-Shām. They were enticed by the weakness of the Fatimids and the correspondence of some of their senior viziers with the Crusaders in Bayt al-Maqdis, inviting them to Egypt and promising to hand it over. Nūr al-Dīn recognized the importance of the race to Egypt and sent his army there under the command of the Kurdish commander Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh to support the Fatimid Caliph's army against the anticipated Crusader campaign against Egypt. Asad al-Dīn was accompanied by his nephew, the emerging commander Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī, despite the latter's reluctance to leave al-Shām. However, the destinies of glory awaited him in Egypt.

Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, upon whom the Fatimid Caliph relied to strengthen his position against his viziers, who were vying for power and conspiring with the Crusaders, passed away. The Fatimid Caliph chose Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn for the position of Ḥājib (chief minister), thinking he could control him due to his youth and his being a foreigner in Egypt, and to use his army to strengthen himself against the Fatimid amīrs. The Crusader campaign against Egypt took place, and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and the army of al-Shām and Egypt fought valiantly. Nūr al-Dīn sent them reinforcements, enabling them to repel the Crusader campaign that attacked them by land and sea, with the help of the Roman (Byzantine) fleet from Constantinople. Shortly after the victory, the last of the Fatimid Caliphs died. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn then declared the end of the Fatimid Caliphate, delivered the Friday khuṭbah in the name of the Abbasid Caliph, reinstated the Sunni Shāfi'ī madhhab in Egypt, and consolidated his rule there. This reached a point where Nūr al-Dīn and his aides in Damascus feared Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's independent rule over Egypt. Nūr al-Dīn summoned him multiple times, but Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn delayed, until Nūr al-Dīn considered marching to Egypt with his army to ensure its annexation to his kingdom, aiming to unite Egypt and al-Shām in the Jihād against the Crusaders.

It was by Allāh's decree and His kindness that Nūr al-Dīn, the ascetic, Mujāhid king, passed away. His family declared his son Ismā'īl as his crown prince, who was an eleven-year-old child. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn went to Damascus, acknowledging Ismā'īl, and to discuss confronting the Crusaders. The people of authority and decision-making (ahl al-ḥall wa al-'aqd) from the 'ulamā' and leaders of Egypt and al-Shām gathered and gave their bay'ah (pledge of allegiance) to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī as Sultan over the lands of Egypt and al-Shām. They were convinced that it was not appropriate for affairs to be entrusted to a child under circumstances of confronting the Crusaders, and of the necessity for a strong sultan to assume guardianship over the affairs of the Muslims and lead the Jihād. Thus, the Ayyūbid state was established.

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn proceeded to correspond with the amīrs in the Ḥijāz, Yemen, and North Africa, as well as the Seljuk kings in Rayy, northern Iraq. His relationship with the Abbasid Caliph in Baghdad also strengthened, as he sought to unite the ranks of the Ummah for the upcoming confrontation. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn had concluded a temporary hudnah (truce) with the Crusaders to free himself to eliminate the fitan (seditions) of minor Fatimid amīrs in Egypt and those fighting over fiefdoms and fortresses in al-Shām. Then, the Crusaders violated the hudnah when their commander, Arnaṭ (Reynald de Châtillon), raided a caravan of ḥujjāj (pilgrims) south of Jordan. The hudnah was thus broken, fighting erupted, and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's victories followed one after another, culminating in the Battle of Ḥaṭṭīn and then the conquest of Bayt al-Maqdis. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn then installed the magnificent Friday minbar that Nūr al-Dīn Zangī (may Allāh have mercy on him) had ordered to be made, to be placed in al-Masjid al-Aqṣā for the first Friday khuṭbah after the conquest. It was destined to be installed during Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's reign, and the imām of the Friday masjid in Aleppo, who had prophesied the conquest that occurred in 583 AH, delivered the khuṭbah from it, at the very same time the Shaykh had prophesied!!

When death approached Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, he divided the kingdom among his sons, who soon fell into disagreement among themselves. The kingship eventually passed to his brother, al-Malik al-ʿĀdil, who took over the rule of Egypt and al-Shām. During his reign, the last of the Crusader campaigns against Egypt occurred, led by King Louis IX of France, whom al-Malik al-ʿĀdil captured and imprisoned in Manṣūrah. He was later released. There, after reflection and contemplation on the history of two centuries of military Crusader campaigns, Louis IX wrote his observations on the failure of the military invasion of the Islamic East and the necessity of working towards an intellectual invasion. His observations formed the initial groundwork for the contemporary Crusader campaigns, which were based on missionary work, Westernization, and then, five centuries later, colonialism.

Then al-Malik al-ʿĀdil died after having shouldered the mission of Jihād against the Crusaders. Later, when power passed to al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismāʿīl, who became Sultan over al-Shām, and to his uncle al-Malik Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, who became king over Egypt, Ismāʿīl colluded with the Crusaders and sought their help against Najm al-Dīn in Egypt. He gave them a number of castles and fortresses and allowed them to buy weapons from the markets of Damascus. Confronting him resolutely was the Sultan of the ʿUlamāʾ of his time, ʿIzz al-Dīn ibn ʿAbd al-Salām, the scholar of Damascus. Ismāʿīl imprisoned him, then released him. ʿIzz al-Dīn then traveled to Egypt to continue his practice of ḥisbah (enjoining good and forbidding evil) towards the Sultan of Egypt, who sheltered and honored him.

The Ayyūbids in Egypt increased their number of slaves and Mamlūks, gathering hundreds and thousands of them, and appointing them as soldiers and commanders. The strength of each Ayyūbid amīr in Egypt and al-Shām came to be measured by the number of his slaves and Mamlūks, many of whom were from Central Asia and the lands of Turkistan. The Mamlūk commanders were enticed by their own strength and the state of decay and weakness of their Ayyūbid kings and amīrs. So, they revolted against them and took over the rule in Egypt, and consequently al-Shām, after the death of Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb during the Battle of Manṣūrah (1250 CE). His wife, Shajar al-Durr, married the chief of his Mamlūk commanders and then abdicated the throne to him. Thus, the Mamlūk state was established. The Sultan of the ‘Ulamā’, ‘Izz al-Dīn ibn ‘Abd al-Salām (may Allāh have mercy on him), has a famous historical account in this regard: he did not issue a fatwā affirming the validity of their rule because they were slaves and not free men. They were compelled to comply with his fatwā, which necessitated their sale and the return of their price to the Bayt al-Māl (treasury) of the Muslims, until they became free, and only then did their rule become valid!!

The Mamlūk state carried the banner of Jihād against the Tatars (Mongols), who had invaded the East, toppled Baghdad, and violated the cities of al-Shām, and were knocking on the doors of Egypt. It's Mamlūk Sultan, the Mujāhid Quṭuz, who rose to meet them. The Sultan of the ‘Ulamā’ did not issue a fatwā for him to take money from the public to buy weapons until after Quṭuz had contributed his own wealth and taken the wealth of the Mamlūk amīrs for that purpose. Then, the scholar issued the fatwā for him and incited the Muslims in Egypt and al-Shām to Jihād. The Battle of ‘Ayn Jālūt was the first strategic defeat for the Tatars, leading to the beginning of their retreat.

Al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Baybars succeeded Quṭuz as Sultan after assassinating him as they were returning from ‘Ayn Jālūt, in order to seize the kingship and the joy of victory!

Nevertheless, Baybars shouldered the responsibility of Jihād against the Crusaders in al-Shām for approximately 27 years, until he expelled them from their last fortresses. The complete expulsion was achieved during the reign of Sultan Khalīl ibn Qalāwūn, thus ending the First Crusades (1291 CE).

The lessons and morals to be drawn from the course of these campaigns are many. What concerns us for this research is to understand the authorities that managed the confrontation on the Islamic side:

1. The Political Authority: It was initially absent. Then it was formed through the Zangids, then the Ayyūbids, then the Mamlūks.
2. The Religious Authority: It managed the confrontation until the political authority was established. Then it stood as a support for it until the end of the confrontation.
3. The Social Authority: It stood alongside the other two authorities. The necessary components were complete, and so the Islamic Ummah confronted the nation of the Crusaders.

The equation of the confrontation in the First Crusades was, in short:

The Ummah of Islām vs. The Nation of the Cross = The Ummah of Islām was victorious.

The Islamic Ummah did not confront them with small segments, nor with small gangs, nor with limited organizations, neither secret nor public. The entire Ummah stood up to the Crusades and defeated them. Neither the conflict among amīrs and sultans for kingship, nor the weakness of the common people of the Ummah and their dereliction of Jihād, hindered this.

The Second Crusades (1798 - 1970)

The First Crusades lasted in the Arab East for about two hundred years. This enabled them to have close contact with Islamic civilization, not just militarily. There were many periods of hudnah (truce), and many commercial relations were established between the Crusader and Islamic emirates around them. Many European travelers and clergymen were able to visit Muslim lands and witness the vast difference in thinking, development, political and economic systems, and social and cultural life. They were also able to transfer many manuscripts and books, to the extent that European historians consider the Crusades one of the causes of the Renaissance in Europe and the end of the Middle Ages.

In the final days of the campaigns, the Christian kings realized they had no way to remain. They began to rethink their methods of invading and dealing with Muslims.

In the last campaigns against Egypt (1249 CE), Louis IX, King of France, was captured along with thousands of his Crusader soldiers by the Mamlūks and imprisoned. There, he had ample time for reflection to lay down important foundations for Crusader thinking on how to invade the Muslims. He wrote those important directives, the gist of which was:

"Indeed, Muslims cannot be defeated as long as their creed is established. The war against Muslims must begin with a war of words."

Then, it was not long before the First Crusades ended completely with the fall of Acre in the year 640 AH - 1291 CE.

Thus, the Crusading West realized that Muslims could not be overcome by subjugation and military force because, due to their religious sentiments and the nature of their creed, they are provoked within them all reasons for resistance and fighting. The way to do so was to invade them intellectually, changing their way of belief and thinking to dry up the roots of their strength and ability to resist, thereby making it easy to overcome them militarily.

The Intellectual Invasion of Muslims and Its Practical Results in the Political Arena:

The First Crusades ended at the close of the thirteenth century, and the Second began at the dawn of the eighteenth century. So, how did the Crusaders benefit from a period of 500 years to prepare and plan for a return based on experience and knowledge?!

Ever since the remnants of the defeated Crusader campaigns returned to Europe, European scholars and thinkers have immersed themselves in studying the essence of our Arab and Islamic civilization. The translation movement flourished, and centers and universities of Orientalism—the specialization in Eastern studies—were established. With the collapse of Islamic rule in al-Andalus in 1492 CE, something similar occurred. During the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, the activities of travelers, scouts, and Orientalists increased. Then, missionary movements arose under the patronage of the Pope, with European kings competing to support the sacred missions of sailors and explorers. Over these long centuries, these researchers and Orientalist and exploratory missions penetrated all parts of the Arab and Islamic world. They produced studies and research, and transferred books and manuscripts that accumulated in colossal Orientalist study centers specialized in studying us.

As an example, I once entered the library of the School of Oriental Studies in London to search for books on the contemporary political history of Algeria. When we accessed the library's computer catalog, I learned that the library contained what amounted to 114 km of shelves packed with books from various studies and languages, including Arabic and others! When I requested books about Algeria, I found out there were 30,000 books on Algeria in various languages. When we specified the Arabic language, I recall there were over 5,000 books. When we specified the requirement for books in Arabic on the contemporary political history of Algeria, I found 263 books. And I found what I was looking for regarding documents from the independence era in dozens of them!! So, reflect. I also learned by chance that the library holds 6,000 Pashto language manuscripts dating back to various periods. You may well ask: How many Pashtuns know how to read their written language?! Meanwhile, European scholars have studied it and read its manuscripts!

I have seen similar things at the Centre Georges Pompidou in Paris, which is a library of read, audio, and visual materials containing hundreds of thousands of books, research papers, and studies. I learned of similar situations in universities in Holland, Germany, and elsewhere. In Spain, I saw the El Escorial library near Madrid, which contains about fifty thousand Arabic manuscripts, not to mention what is held in the Vatican Library and other centers for missionary work and Christianization.

In short, modern colonialism penetrated our lands after acquiring information in all aspects, and they read us and understood us as one reads the lines on their palm. They moved scientifically and systematically. These are the Romans and their characteristics. Most of us only know the superficial veneer of their current civilization, characterized by decadence, immorality, and licentiousness. But the civilizational foundation of these Roman nations is far more complex than that. We must know them as they knew us, and resist them with insight, just as they invaded us with insight and knowledge.

Some Arab and Muslim historians and researchers have written a number of books on Orientalism and its relationship with colonialism, and on missionary movements and their relationship with colonialism, leading one to marvel at the interconnectedness of these three subjects. Thus, the intellectual invasion of our lands began with the arrival of Napoleon's campaign (1789 CE). The Freemasons began to infiltrate Arab countries and the Ottoman Khilāfah. The winds of Westernization and intellectual colonialism began to blow upon our lands before the physical colonialism that arrived with full force in the mid-nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, though it had already started nibbling at the edges of the Islamic world since the sixteenth century.

Parallel to the intellectual invasion, the vanguards of colonialism persistently worked on cultivating colonial proxies and establishing relations with various segments of society, especially its emirs and its 'ulamā'. Thus, they infiltrated the nervous system of the Islamic body, which lay ailing and moribund with the Ottoman Khilāfah. When the grand colonial concoction was ripe, colonialism was aided in its invasions by Europe's achievements, as we mentioned earlier, in the scientific renaissance, the Industrial Revolution, and advancements in weaponry and rapid transportation. Thus, colonialism descended upon us, fully equipped, and the Muslim lands fell more easily than a storm fells the yellowed leaves of a diseased tree whose trunk is worm-eaten, its roots decayed, and corruption has crept into every aspect of its civilization – religiously, intellectually, politically, and on every level.

The Sunan (Divine laws) brought it to the point where what Ibn Khaldūn had foretold about the rise, fall, and demise of kingdoms came to pass for us. Thus, civilization witnessed its fourth shift, according to Toynbee, as we mentioned in the previous chapter, from the Islamic East to Crusader Western Europe and its heir, America.

The Beginning of the Second Crusader Campaigns:

The Second Crusader campaigns and their main thrust can be dated to the beginning of the nineteenth century, with Napoleon's campaign to Egypt in 1789 CE. However, their advance towards the peripheries of the Islamic world, their establishment of bridgeheads and naval bases on the coasts of Muslim lands, and their occupation of distant islands on the fringes of the Islamic world date back to the mid-sixteenth century. Their audacity reached the point of establishing colonies on the shores of the Arabian Peninsula and even contemplating the invasion of Al-Ḥaramayn (the Two Holy Sanctuaries), as the Portuguese fleet attempted. However, the Ottomans and their dominant naval power thwarted this attempt. Soon after, the Ottomans controlled the Mediterranean Sea, the Red Sea, and the Arabian Sea. After the English seized Portugal's colonies on the coasts of Africa, India, and the islands extending to the Philippines, and after their occupation of the Indian subcontinent, they managed to occupy the southern coasts of the Arabian Peninsula and the coasts of the Arab-Persian Gulf. In cooperation with the Gulf sheikhdoms, they established protectorates that were practically subservient to the British Crown. They did not dare – due to their civilizational understanding and comprehension – to think of occupying the heart of the Arabian Peninsula, especially Al-Ḥijāz, due to the presence of the holy sites and fearing the existence of the central (Ottoman) Khilāfah, even if only nominally, and fearing to provoke a declaration of general Jihād by it in defense of the Muslim Holy Sanctuaries against Britain in regions where they had no desire for conflict.

Then, the Franco-British rivalry openly began for the heart of the Islamic world south of the Mediterranean, in Bilād al-Shām, Egypt, North Africa, and the Arabian Peninsula. Napoleon occupied Egypt at the beginning of the nineteenth century and advanced to southern Palestine. France occupied Tunisia, Algeria, and parts of northern Morocco between 1830 and 1844 CE. Spain also entered the Moroccan Sahara and the Rif region in 1860 CE.

The Second Crusader campaigns reached their peak shortly after World War I and the Ottoman State's loss of the war alongside Germany, after Freemasons gained control of its administration and the deposition of its last Caliph, Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd. The Sykes-Picot Agreement, or rather conspiracy, was concluded in 1917. In the same year, the Balfour Declaration was issued by the British Colonial Office, promising Palestine as a national homeland for the Jews after Britain would take control of it according to the agreement, which allocated Palestine to its share.

Thus, the entire Arab Mashriq fell under the occupation of the armies of the Second Crusader campaigns, under the guise of modern colonialism. The French General (Gouraud) entered Damascus in 1920, and France occupied Syria, which included Lebanon. The English General (Allenby) entered al-Quds (Jerusalem) in 1921. The British army occupied Palestine, Transjordan, and Iraq after Britain betrayed Sharīf Ḥusayn and reneged on the promises made to him by its minister (McMahon) to gain his assistance and incite the Arabs to revolt against the Ottoman Turks. Sharīf Ḥusayn was deceived, believing Britain would help him establish an Arab Khilāfah on the ruins of the Ottoman one, encompassing the Arabian Peninsula, Iraq, and Bilād al-Shām. He led what became known as the Great Arab Revolt, where Arabs in Al-Ḥijāz and Bilād al-Shām fought their Turkish brothers, soldiers of the Khilāfah, with British support and cooperation. Britain had occupied Egypt and Sudan before that, while Libya fell to Italy (1904 CE).

This was regarding the Arab world. As for the wider Islamic world, colonial Europe divided it as well. India, the lands of Sindh (Pakistan), and Iran fell under British occupation. Turkey, under the name of independence and republic, was placed under the rule of Dönmeḥ Jews supervised by the Jew (Mustafa Kemāl Atatürk), who established the Turkish Republic and announced the abolition of the Khilāfah. Turkey thereby relinquished its legacy in the Arab and Islamic countries to the Crusader world, while France and Britain divided the Islamic countries in Central Africa.

As for Russia, its Tsars launched a colonial movement in the mid-sixteenth century that devoured Islamic kingdoms one after another. Russia occupied Crimea, Bashkiria, Tatarstan, and the Caucasian lands: Chechnya, Dagestan, Georgia, and Azerbaijan. It pushed eastward to swallow Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan. It had already seized all of Siberia, and the Tsarist armies encamped on the banks of the Jayhūn River (Oxus) on the borders of Afghanistan in 1904, after having toppled major Islamic capitals such as Merv, Bukhārā, Tirmidh, Samarqand, and Tashken. Then, Communist Russia, after the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, inherited these colonies after eliminating the Tsarist family. Russian Jews played a major role in the Communist Revolution, both in thought and execution.

As for the lands of Najd and Al-Ḥijāz, Britain seized them in a clever way, befitting the sanctity of the Ḥaram. Britain sponsored a young prince from the Āl Sa‘ūd family, who had sought refuge in Kuwait after the fall of the Second Sa‘ūdī State. The Colonial Office became acquainted with ‘Abd al-Raḥmān Āl Sa‘ūd through their chief agent in Kuwait, (Mubārak al-Ṣabāḥ), whom the leaders of Christianization in the Arabian Peninsula called (Mubārak the Great) for the services and facilities he provided them for Christianization in the Arabian Peninsula. [1] Britain thus offered ‘Abd al-Raḥmān Āl Sa‘ūd its assistance to reclaim his ancestral kingdom in Najd. Due to his old age, he presented his son ‘Abd al-‘Azīz in 1898. Britain financed its first campaign in Najd in 1901. Then, as a result of the difficulties he faced, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz adopted the idea of reviving the Wahhābī da‘wah and tried again the following year.

(1) See the lecture (Ṣāni‘ū al-Khiyām - The Tentmakers) by Shaykh Salmān al-‘Awdah – may Allāh sustain him.

With British assistance, which provided him with money, experts, and English officers, and because of his claim to carry the banner of the Wahhābī da‘wah, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz received help from the groups of Al-Ikhwān, the proponents of the Wahhābī da‘wah, who aided him in entering and seizing Najd. After deep consideration, Britain abandoned Al-Ashrāfin Al-Ḥijāz in his favor, placing all the lands of Najd, Al-Ḥijāz, and most of the Arabian Peninsula under the authority of ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān Āl Sa‘ūd, whom Britain declared Sultan of Najd and Al-Ḥijāz in 1935, leading to the establishment of the (Third Sa‘ūdī State). The British Crown concluded a treaty of subordination with ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, in which he committed not to deviate from their counsel and orders, and not to conclude any treaty or agreement without their permission, in exchange for the British Crown guaranteeing his throne for his lifetime and for his sons hereditarily after him. Britain then supplied ‘Abd al-‘Azīz to fight Al-Ikhwān and assisted him with aircraft, enabling him to eliminate their remnants in the famous Battle of al-Sabīlah, clearing the way for him and bringing the remaining proponents of the Wahhābī da‘wah under the cloak of his sultanate and kingdom.

After Britain gained control of Palestine, it cooperated extensively with the Jewish Agency for Immigration, established by the Zionist movement. It poured hundreds of thousands of Jews into Palestine, shipped from various European countries; the number of original Jews in Palestine did not exceed 15,000 when Britain occupied it. Muslims sensed the imminent danger, and the revolution led by Shaykh ‘Izz al-Dīn al-Qassām (raḥimahu Allāh), who came from the Syrian coast to revive Jihād in Palestine in 1936, erupted. Battles flared between Muslims and Jews, so Britain sought help from ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Āl Sa‘ūd to quell the revolution. He sent his son and foreign minister, Fayṣal, to persuade the Palestinians to stop the revolution and declare a truce. Fayṣal convinced their leaders to trust the promises of "our friend Britain," as he claimed. Thus, the main revolution that stood against the campaigns of displacement and Judaization in Palestine was aborted. Subsequently, various European countries continued their efforts to support the Jewish Agency for Immigration and supply the Jews with money and weapons, until their numbers reached 650,000 in 1947. The farce of the Arab armies' entry and defeat in Palestine took place in 1947, and the Jews declared the birth of the state of Israel, with the United Nations General Assembly, blessed by European countries, America, and Russia, rushing to recognize it.

Thus, the Second Crusader campaigns planted the Jewish cancerous entity in the holiest of Muslim sanctities, and the Jews occupied half of the city of al-Quds after Crusader Britain had indirectly seized the lands of Najd and Al-Ḥijāz through the deed of hereditary kingship for ‘Abd al-‘Azīz and his sons.

So...

The entire Arab and Islamic world fell under Western occupation, which did not hide its Crusader identity. General Allenby, while planting Britain's flag with its two crosses on the summit of the Mount of Olives in Bayt al-Maqdis, exclaimed: "Now the Crusades have ended!" Similarly, French General Gouraud went to the tomb of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, struck his grave with his sword, broke off a piece of it, and said to him: "We have returned, O Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn!" Mussolini, the ruler of colonial Italy, declared that he was bringing the glories of the Romans to the southern Mediterranean. Such was the behavior of the other European countries wherever they went.

These campaigns continued their direct, overt occupation throughout what was called the era of Old Colonialism, until Jihādī revolutions and liberation movements forced the colonizing states to change their methods to the stage of New Colonialism. The campaigns continued their devastation throughout the Islamic world in a more cunning and astute manner. The declaration of independence for Arab and Islamic countries began in the early 1940s, the last being the United Arab Emirates, whose "(independence!!)" was declared in 1973. As for the Islamic kingdoms occupied by the Russians, only some of them were freed from direct occupation upon the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1990.

As I mentioned earlier, the independence of these countries was nominal. The rise of Russia and America as two superpowers led each to inherit the tasks of New Colonialism in most of these countries, leaving France and Britain with only some colonial crumbs here and there.

Modern history has recorded that Jihādī revolutions, which combated colonialism and confronted the Second Crusader campaigns, ignited in all parts of the Islamic world and did not let colonialism enjoy peace. Revolutions would barely subside before flaring up anew. The revolutions of the ‘Ulamā’ forced Britain to withdraw early from Afghanistan. Then it departed from India and Pakistan after nearly two centuries of occupation. Similarly, revolutions in Iraq, Egypt, Sudan, and Aden forced it to leave after significant losses. Likewise, France exited Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, and Syria after devastating losses. In the same way, Italy left Libya, and Spain left Morocco, and so on and so forth.

A student of the course of the Second Crusader campaigns will find some important points of difference and development in the Crusaders' methods between the First and Second campaigns. Among the most important are:

The First Crusader campaigns were primarily religious, mixed with a secondary economic dimension. In contrast, the Second campaigns had a Crusader religious dimension, an economic colonial dimension, and a political dimension for the struggle for influence, as well as a civilizational dimension aimed at spreading the colonizer's culture and secular systems in the colonized countries.

The First Crusader campaigns focused only on the coasts of the Mashriq and Bilād al-Shām, in Bayt al-Maqdis and its environs, and the coasts of Syria and Lebanon. In contrast, the Second Crusader campaigns targeted the entire Arab and Islamic world, concentrating on the Middle East and supporting Israel in Bayt al-Maqdis.

The First Crusader campaigns aimed at occupying the land. In contrast, the Second campaigns aimed at occupying both the land and the Muslim individual, whom they intended to distort and alter in all aspects of his civilizational components.

And this is the most important observation: the First campaigns were carried out in a state of complete ignorance on the part of the Crusader colonizers regarding the Islamic land, its inhabitants, and all their civilizational, religious, and cultural components. In contrast, the Second campaigns were based on detailed knowledge and in-depth studies that enabled them to enter with clear insight, penetrating according to well-defined maps of the land and peoples, their psychological, ethnic, and religious composition, and their complete characteristics. This point requires the following consideration:

So, what was the state of the three authorities in leading Arab and Islamic societies?

The State of Islamic Authorities During the Second Crusader Campaigns:

On the Political Level:

It had completely fallen with the practical fall of the Ottoman Khilāfah (since the end of the eighteenth century) and then officially (1924 CE). The state of political leadership was often no better, if not worse, than the conditions of the warring emirs of the Mashriq during the Crusader and Tatar invasions. It can be said that Muslims were practically without political authority.

On the Religious Authority Level:

The religious authority was still alive. It was represented in that phase by the Imāms of the fiqhī madhāhib (schools of jurisprudence) and centers of religious enlightenment, such as major masjids in all Muslim countries. During this stage, the Ṣūfī ṭuruq (orders) emerged as a religious authority in most Muslim lands, as Ṣūfism had flourished during the Ottoman era and before. Thus, the ‘Ulamā’ and Ṣūfī Imāms called the common people to Jihād and resistance and personally led these Jihādī uprisings.

On the Social Authority Level:

The tribal and clan-based system was still cohesive in most of the Arab and Islamic world and was very much intertwined with the religious authority, which provided the popular base that fueled the revolution.

Thus, revolutions against colonialism swept through the entire Islamic world.

Examples include the revolution of Imām Shāmil in the Caucasus against the Russians, which lasted for nearly forty years, as well as the revolts of the Uzbeks and others in Central Asia, which the Russians brutally suppressed. Consequently, Muslims shifted their Jihād towards secretly preserving their religion and national identities. Revolts against the Russians have continued to erupt throughout their history. Similarly, revolutions against the British were led by the ‘Ulamā’ of Deoband, the Imāms of the Ḥanafī madhhab, and Ṣūfī orders in the Indian subcontinent, the lands of Sindh, and Afghanistan, which ultimately led to their withdrawal. The British also faced revolts in Iraq, the Mahdist Revolution in Sudan, and uprisings led by the ‘Ulamā’ of Azhar in Egypt, as well as the revolution of the ‘Ulamā’ of Yemen against the British. France, too, faced a fierce revolution in Algeria, as well as numerous acts of resistance in Morocco, Syria, and some African countries. ‘Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī led the Jihād against the Spanish and a coalition of European armies in the Moroccan Rif, famously defeating the combined armies of five European nations at the Battle of Anwal, where thousands of soldiers and more than a hundred generals were captured. Likewise, ‘Umar al-Mukhtār and the Senussis led the Jihād against Italy in Libya for over forty years. Such was the case in various countries of the Islamic world.

Thus, despite the absence of a political authority, the religious and social authorities managed to unite the Ummah and launch resistance through Jihādī guerrilla warfare, various forms of civil resistance, disobedience, demonstrations, and political struggle. This ultimately forced the colonizers to depart and grant those countries their independence. However, this was only after colonialism had managed to lay the foundations for the next phase of the Second Crusader campaign in a cunning and malicious manner, which came to be known as modern colonialism.

The power equation in the Muslims' struggle against the Second Crusader campaigns, during the phase from military colonialism to independence, after the Jews had become fundamentally involved since World War I, became as follows: The Nation of the Cross + the Nation of the Jews versus the Nation of Islām — the Nation of Islām was victorious.

Once again, we can say here that the resistance and confrontation were not solely the actions of limited gangs, secret organizations, or ideological elites. Rather, they encompassed the Ummah of Islām in every region, as people rallied around the leaders of Jihād and revolution. When the cause of the struggle became the cause of an Ummah confronting other nations, the Ummah was qualified for victory, and colonialism departed.

Here, the discussion shifts to the stage of modern colonialism, between the Second and Third Crusader campaigns. I addressed this in previous lectures covering this research under the title "The Second Stage of the Crusader Campaigns." However, I now find it to be an independent stage that paved the way for the Third Crusader campaigns. Therefore, I will address it here under a separate title, as follows:

The Stage of Political (Nominal) Independence and the Rise of Modern Colonialism

This stage extends from the attainment of independence in Arab and Islamic countries to the establishment of the New World Order (1990)—that is, from the 1940s to the 1970s, depending on when each country gained independence, until the fall of the Soviet Union and America's unilateral dominance in managing the world and leading the contemporary "Romans." European countries, Russia, and America, which had entered the colonial scene, transitioned into a phase known as modern colonialism. The Arab and Muslim lands have not been free from it to this day. America and its Zionist administration inherited the task of leading the Third Crusader campaigns, as we will clarify later, Inshā'Allāh.

As for this stage, in continuation of what the European colonizers had decided regarding the intellectual invasion of Muslims to consolidate their control, the colonizers wasted no time. They benefited from their previous experiences and the missionary, Orientalist, and colonial projects they had established. Means of intellectual and cultural invasion were introduced alongside the first occupying forces. Missionary schools and Western universities were opened, printing presses, social and cultural clubs, newspapers, and publishing houses were established. Colonialism spread ideas of Westernization and secularism and founded nationalist parties based on them to prepare these countries for the stage of independence. Through literary, intellectual, and cultural activities, colonialism encouraged Westernization processes. It also opened the doors wide for educated youth to travel to the colonizing countries to complete their university and postgraduate studies. They returned laden with its ideas and culture, dazzled by its civilization, their hearts and minds filled, with nothing left of their connection to their Ummah except their skin color and language! These efforts, undertaken during the colonial era, which lasted for decades in some countries and over a century in others like

Algeria and the Indian subcontinent, and even longer in other regions such as Central and peripheral Asia and some African countries, yielded highly significant results. These extremely clever colonial efforts formed the components of modern colonialism and paved the way for the Third Crusader campaigns. Among those results were:

1. The colonizer cultivated, under his own supervision, political elites in our countries, preparing them to replace him, protect his interests, and carry out his burdens using our own people. Thus, he reaped the benefits without bearing the losses of confrontation with the resistance, because these "national" elites appeared to their peoples as the guardians of independence.
2. Colonialism chose the form of government according to the conditions of each country: either ruling families inheriting kingship, as in the countries of the Arabian Peninsula, Jordan, and Morocco, under its sponsorship and supervision; or political parties that rotated power through a theatrical parliamentary life, as in India, Pakistan, and some Arab countries. For other countries, it chose the method of military coups and dictatorships, as in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. It also created a type of civil dictatorship in a third category. These authorities were to take over governance after their departure in what was known as the stage of independence.
3. The colonizer, through media spotlight and sometimes political and military theatrics, oversaw the creation of these elites upon whom he decided to rely, making them appear to their peoples as the architects of independence. The Jihādī efforts undertaken by the ‘Ulamā’, religious authorities, and the people who fought under the banner of Islām to achieve independence were stolen. Thus, applauding demonstrations of human herds, deformed by colonialism over time, marched carrying ideas of nationalism and patriotism, belonging to Western political ideologies such as socialism, democracy, communism, liberal capitalism, and others. Nominal independence was declared in our countries, and the people cheered and celebrated the artificial idols that took upon themselves the task of continuing the second phase of the Second Crusader campaigns. Modern colonialism thus took complete control of our lands.

4. The colonizer tied these systems—whose borders he had drawn and whose structures he had designed—to himself through various methods. Among the most important was the establishment of military bases for his armies in most of these countries, enabling him to deploy them and reassert control whenever he wished, and to use them in his international conflicts. He also bound these (independent!) regimes and countries with political, economic, military, cultural, and security treaties in a way that ensured their subservience even more than during the period of military colonialism.
5. Through its major monopolistic companies, the economic agreements that bound us, and by placing us under the compulsory supervision of international monetary institutions, the colonizer established what was practically an octopus that gripped all the resources of our countries. This ensured the plunder of our wealth, especially oil, gas, and mineral resources. He established this with his agents and partners from among our countrymen, who consisted of government officials and prominent merchants. Thus, economic colonialism sucked the blood of our peoples and the sustenance of our children, obtaining what it had come for with its massive armies, but without losses or soldiers in this phase.
6. The colonizer spread and protected Christianizing institutions. The countries of the Islamic world were subjected to intense Christianization campaigns. In the heart of the Arab and Islamic world, these campaigns only succeeded in making some Muslims doubt their religion and weakening their connection to

it. However, they were successful in the peripheries of the Islamic world, such as Central Africa and Southeast Asia (like the Philippines, Indonesia, Bangladesh, and Burma), where tens of millions of Muslims were converted to Christianity!

7. Modern colonialism, through these "valiant" deputies of his, worked to exclude the Islamic Sharī'ah and ruling by what Allāh has revealed in Muslim lands. Our sons, graduates of law faculties in Western universities, drafted constitutions, legislations, and laws based on the principles of Western law, Roman civilization, and its pagan constitutions. These "legislators," who usurped the "right of divinity and legislation," enacted laws and formulated constitutions derived from French and British law, which became the foundational structure of authorities and the political framework in Muslim countries.
8. As a result of a thorough study of our people and their religious, social, and general civilizational components, the colonizer worked to demolish the three authorities we discussed, which had been responsible for his defeat in the First and Second Crusader campaigns:

As for the political authority:

The Khilāfah was overthrown, and then the colonizer himself assumed political authority. Subsequently, he handed it over to the kings, presidents, emirs, and sultans he had installed, so they would follow him in everything. They would govern by his laws, establish their political systems on his principles, build their ideas and parties on his imported ideologies, and bind themselves to him with all ties of loyalty and affection. Thus, the political authority of Muslims was destroyed and disappeared completely since the fall of the Khilāfah, even in its symbolic form, in 1924 CE.

As for the religious authority:

The colonizer focused his war on mosques, ‘Ulamā’, and religious bodies independent of governments, such as al-Azhar in Egypt, and various associations of Muslim scholars and their institutions. Through coercion and bribery (literally, "the sword of al-Mu‘izz and his gold"), his deputies swayed many prominent figures, personalities, and scholars within the religious establishment. After colonialism, the governments of "independence" took over religious institutions and merged them into ministries called the Ministry of Awqāf, Religious Affairs, or similar names.

Most governments established hypocritical religious authorities that operated under the command of the Sultān, issuing Fatāwā tailored to royal and presidential wills. This happened to the administration of al-Azhar in Egypt, Zaytūna in Tunisia, the Council of Senior Scholars, the Commission for Commanding Good (al-Amr bil-Ma‘rūf), the Supreme Judiciary, and Da‘wah and Guidance in Saudi Arabia—and one can draw analogies for what occurred elsewhere.

State media and policies deliberately distorted the image of any sincere ‘Ulamā’, independent Imāms of mosques, scholars, and students of Sharī‘ah sciences who resisted. Their livelihoods were cut off, and they were besieged materially and morally. Over time, in the eyes of the "civilized" society, as they call it and promote it in the media, these figures were transformed into ridiculous models of backwardness, opportunism, and detachment from reality. Thus, governments monitored mosques, imposed Friday sermons (Jumu‘ah Khuṭbahs), and, in one way or another, co-opted this religious authority, which had been the Ummah's last refuge. This colonial plan succeeded to varying degrees across Muslim countries. Its success was striking in the Arab world, especially in Shām, Egypt, North Africa, and the Arabian Peninsula. It was total and complete in places like Turkey. In contrast, it was less successful in some countries and limited in others, such as Afghanistan, Pakistan, and places with similar circumstances. However, overall, the classical religious authority, which had historically preserved the emotional driving force of resistance for Muslims, was destroyed or paralyzed.

It is only fair to say and acknowledge that despite the prominent role played by religious authorities in confronting the occupation, they had been, since the Ottoman era, declining and suffering from diseases and ailments, such as the spread of Bida' (reprehensible innovations) and extremist, lax, and submissive Ṣūfī orders. The religious authority, in general, also suffered from a departure from the Sharī'ah-based scholarly methodology and a lack of creativity and Ijtihād. This made it easier for the colonizer and governments to isolate and dismantle them over time. Indeed, during the colonial era, the colonizer managed to win many of them over to his side, forming a class of "'Ulamā' of colonialism" that rivaled the "'Ulamā' of the Sultān" and surpassed them in their detrimental impact on the Ummah. It became apparent that this religious authority itself was in need of a renewal revolution to restore it to its correct origins, vitality, and historical merit.

As for the social authority:

It was dismantled with the rise of modern states and large cities, and the migration of workers, students, and employees from rural to urban areas due to the nature of contemporary civil society. This led to the disintegration of tribes, the weakening and fraying of clan ties, rendering them incapable of forming a cohesive bond (ʿaṣabiyyah) that would enable their leaders and heads to play a pivotal role in political events and changes. This disintegration varied from one country to another. While tribalism remains strong and dominant in some countries like Afghanistan, Yemen, and parts of the Arabian Peninsula and Africa, these ties have almost completely unraveled, and the influence of this authority has entirely vanished in most other countries due to contemporary social and economic transformations.

Thus, apostate (Riddah) regimes arose in the Arab and Islamic world to rule their peoples with iron and fire, carrying out all the tasks of colonialism for its benefit in order to preserve their thrones.

So, who confronted the calamities of this cunning stage of the Second Crusader campaigns, managed by its deputies from among the apostate rulers? Especially after the fundamental structures of the Ummah's authorities had been shattered and its elements of steadfastness and resistance had collapsed?!

Some opposition parties to these ruling regimes did resist colonialism in its political and economic objectives. However, most of these parties were also based on the same imported Western ideas. Most of them in the Arab and Islamic world adopted leftist nationalist or liberal democratic ideologies. Because these oppositions were also colonial constructs in terms of ideology, the colonizer could use them, employ them, eliminate them, or give them the opportunity to seize power by overthrowing the existing regime and replacing it with a new one from these secular parties and political oppositions. This occurred in a series of military coups in Syria, Egypt, Pakistan, Algeria, Iraq, Yemen, and Libya, and in many African or Southeast Asian countries. Colonialism also allowed for some democratic exchange of power in certain countries. Opposition parties replaced ruling parties through rotation, but the general situation and the fundamentals of ties to colonialism did not change in any significant way. Meanwhile, modern colonialism maintained its grip through economic exploitation, resource depletion, and control over the center of Crusader and Western intellectual influence via dilapidated governments whose external form it preserved while controlling everything through them. It did not permit any form of genuine democratic rotation of power like that practiced in its own country.

During the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, the Arab and Islamic world witnessed the nationalist and leftist tide surge to its peak. It reached power in many countries, plunging them into a state of dependency on the Soviet Union, albeit with some balancing of interests and ties with the West, as happened in Egypt, Algeria, Syria, South Yemen, Somalia, and elsewhere. The Cold War era and the conflict between the two poles created a situation that reflected upon our countries as political turmoil, resulting from the dependency of nationalist, patriotic, leftist, and liberal parties on either the East or the West. This was driven by the struggle of these pawns for power, influence, and collaboration with foreign entities that provided them with material, moral, or political support to attain power.

Thus, the Islamic peoples suffered from all those options that the East or the Crusading West allowed them to compete over. Meanwhile, all of them were commanded by their masters to exclude Islamic orientations, preventing them from forming a religious authority (marji'iyah diniyyah) that could elevate the Ummah to confront the collapse that had become comprehensive in all aspects of life.

During this period, Israel expanded to devour the rest of Palestine and the remaining part of Jerusalem, and even to occupy parts of neighboring Arab countries whose area exceeded six times the area of Palestine, through theatrical wars, the most significant of which was the setback (Naksa) of June 5, 1967.

Thereafter, Israel became a bitter reality, draining the Ummah's resources, trampling its pride, exhausting its political situation, and providing its Pharaohs with material for one-upmanship over their peoples.

And because Allāh the Exalted decreed the preservation of His Dīn and His Book, and the persistence of a group manifest upon the truth (ṭā'ifah zāhirah 'alā al-ḥaqq) within this Ummah, fighting for this Dīn, unharmed by those who forsake them or oppose them, and they remain so—the seeds of the Islamic Awakening (Şaḥwah) and the blessed revival (Nahḍah) emerged in this Ummah from the very first days after the fall of the Khilāfah. These took the form of schools with diverse methodologies and inclinations, yet all striving for a single goal: to restore the Ummah to its Dīn, its Sharī‘ah, and the rule of its Lord. I will leave the detailed discussion of the Şaḥwah phenomenon for the next two chapters. Here, I will suffice with mentioning the equation of the confrontation and the parties to the conflict during that period between the Crusaders and the resistance forces in this Ummah.

The phenomenon of the Islamic Şaḥwah spread in various forms. The most prominent were those that took the shape of political parties entering the political arena, seeking power to implement the Sharī‘ah. Some took the form of intellectual schools of creed (madāris fikriyyah ‘aqadiyyah), or reformist associations or groups aiming to reform the individual and society to qualify them for Sharī‘ah rule. In other places, it manifested as popular Imāms and Khaṭībs, public scholars (‘ulamā’ ‘āmmah), and callers to reform (du‘āt iṣlāḥ). At times, it even reached the point of armed confrontations with apostate governments (ḥukūmāt murtaddah). This phenomenon had its literary output, its writers, thinkers, and symbols. The civilizational struggle was reflected in many segments of society through a desire for religiosity; manifestations of ḥijāb and beards spread, the Islamic book became popular, and some religious customs and traditions began to permeate all Arab and Islamic societies.

The Crusading West and the atheist East, which supported the various ruling regimes, sensed the danger. They sounded their alarm bells and instructed the governments to begin campaigns of confrontation and liquidation against this nascent, living seed, to cut its roots before its trunk could grow tall, its branches leaf out, and it bear its fruit. Thus, the clash within the Ummah transformed from being directly with colonialism to a clash between individuals and groups of the Şahwah and the apostate governments, the creations of colonialism. This clash took many forms, including oppression, imprisonment, dissolving parties, closing newspapers and associations, and at times, it escalated to violent armed confrontations.

During the period from the beginnings of independence until the establishment of the New World Order and the launch of the Third Crusades led by America, almost all lands of the Islamic world were an arena of varying degrees of heat and turmoil for this conflict. After a new party entered the fray, its equation became as follows:

The Nation of the Cross + The Nation of the Jews + The Sect of Apostate (Rulers) versus The Islamic Şahwah → Result: The Şahwah was defeated.

Several extremely important matters are observable in this equation, which changed the nature of the conflicting forces and the outcome compared to what happened in the First and Second Crusades, including:

First: The disappearance of the overt role of the Crusaders and Jews in the confrontation, which became one of management and support from behind the scenes. The apostate sect, led by the rulers who are their allies, took the lead in the confrontation.

Second: The Ummah and its people withdrew from the confrontation due to the non-appearance of the real enemy. The conflict took the form of fitnah and infighting between the ruler and some classes of the ruled.

Third: The task of confronting these formidable powers fell upon the shoulders of the Islamic Şahwah, which constituted only partial forces, numbering in the tens, hundreds, or at best, thousands, depending on the country. This led to its crushing, derailment from its path, and failure to achieve its objectives.

Fourth: The important role of the official religious establishment and the battalion of the Sultān's scholars (‘ulamā’ al-Sultān) emerged in this stage of the conflict. They affirmed and assisted in the Ummah's withdrawal from the battle, confining it to the few groups steadfast on the truth. This establishment bestowed legitimacy and testimonies of Islām and Īmān upon the apostate rulers, granting them the title of "legitimate guardians" (Ūlī al-amr shar‘iyyīn). Consequently, they reinforced the conviction among the general populace that rebelling against them (khurūj ‘alayhim) is ḥarām, that confronting them is fitnah, and that their relations with the West and the colonial treaties they conclude fall within their صلاحيات (powers/authorities) as legitimate Imāms. This was blessed by the West, which sought to achieve it.

Thus, the pace of the clash between those governments and the Islamic Ṣaḥwah, in its various schools, particularly the armed Jihādī school, escalated since the mid-sixties. However, what happened at the end of this conflict was that by 1990, the deputies of colonialism and the vanguards of the Crusaders among our apostate rulers had defeated the forces of the Ṣaḥwah. This was achieved with the help of their colonial masters and strategic support from their hypocritical religious apparatuses and their formidable media machines. They managed to defeat the various schools of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah, practically leading them to failure, preventing them from achieving their goals, and cornering them into the bottleneck of crisis. Meanwhile, segments of the Ummah adopted the position of a spectator in this fateful battle, with utter apathy, swallowing oppression, enduring various forms of persecution, and living a miserable life.

It is very beneficial to present a summary of the colonial program of intellectual invasion from the beginning of the Second Crusades, led by Europe, up to the establishment of the recent Third Crusades, led by America.

The Course of the Tragedy and Its Causes Between the Second and Third Crusades (1798 - 1990)

The Course of the Tragedy and Its Causes Between the Second and Third Crusades (1798 - 1990 M):

In constructing this section, I will rely on some extremely important books in which our Shaykh, the martyr ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him), summarized the essence of the causes and nature of the comprehensive upheaval that occurred in the conditions of Arabs and Muslims during this period. These are the books: "Khaṭṭ al-Taḥawwul al-Tārīkhī" (The Line of Historical Transformation), "Aḍwā’ alā al-Qawmiyyah al-‘Arabiyyah" (Lights on Arab Nationalism), and "al-Saraṭān al-Aḥmar" (The Red Cancer). The material in these books forms a basis for understanding the reasons for our current situation and for understanding the programs of the current American campaigns. By reading these books, one quickly discovers:

That the American program today, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, concerning the Greater Middle East, the programs for changing educational and religious curricula, and Rumsfeld's programs for the "war of ideas," are nothing but a repeated application—albeit foolishly—of the European colonial program during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

I will quote extensive passages from them, with conciseness and slight adaptation, placing these quotations in quotation marks "...", indicating their source, which is: "Mawsū‘at al-Dakhā’ir al-‘Izām fīmā Uthira ‘an ‘Abdillāh ‘Azzām" (Encyclopedia of the Great Treasures of what was narrated from ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām). I will place my comments and additions within them in parentheses (Author's comment: ...). These three books of his—may Allāh have vast mercy on him—have spared me the necessary return to dozens of references covering the history and events of that period, something not feasible for me now as we live in a stage of hideouts and American pursuits—may Allāh disgrace them. I re-emphasize that the heritage of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh contains political, intellectual, and Shar‘ī treasures that make it a fundamental pillar for the intellectual and methodological upbringing of the Mujāhidīn in this age. May Allāh reward him with what he deserves.

Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

"The Islamic region has witnessed, during the past three centuries, a change that began slowly, then gradually intensified until, by the beginning of the first half of the twentieth century, the change reached its peak, and the path of imitating the West became overwhelming. It reached a point where an observer would initially think that this sweeping torrent could not be resisted, and that any attempt to confront it was a kind of futile absurdity or clear suicide. The battle of change occurred in three phases:

The First Phase: The encounter between the West and the East on the battlefield.

The Second Phase: The battle between the West and the East in the fields of thought, culture, and religion.

The Third Phase: The battle among the sons of the East themselves in the fields of thought, religion, and politics.

I. As for the First Phase:

The West had its advances and retreats during the Crusades, which then ended with its definitive defeat and its routed withdrawal.

II. As for the Second Phase:

The West employed numerous methods and used many means to cause the Muslims a slow death. Its goal in this phase was to brainwash Muslims of their Islām and to quietly remove them from the Dīn of Allāh to the dīn of the ṭāghūt, without causing a commotion or uproar.

Western agencies undertook the cultivation of a replacement class for them in all fields, handed over the reins of power to them, and removed the sincere ones from the institutions of guidance and construction. The departments of education and media—press, radio, and then television—fell into the hands of the class that had shed its (Muslim) Eastern identity and declared its loyalty to the (Crusading, atheist) West.

The mission of this period can be summarized in the words of Gibb, the English Orientalist:

'This—education—is the only way to Francize the Islamic lands and Westernize them. The focus was strong on creating a class that definitely adopts a viewpoint over which religion has no authority. Then, it would be possible to evacuate their land and hand over to them the reins of power therein because they are an extension of the occupier's thought.'

It is also represented by the words of Lord Macaulay, chairman of the educational committee in India:

'We must create a class who may be interpreters between us and the millions whom we govern; a class of persons, Indian in blood and colour, but English in taste, in opinions, in morals, and in intellect.'

And it is the same as the words of Lord Lloyd, the British High Commissioner, regarding Victoria College in 1936, M:

'And when the public gets to know this college, fathers will realize that educating their sons in it develops in them enough English sentiment to make them a link for understanding between the Easterner and the Westerner.'

III. As for the Third Phase:

The phase of 'national independence', as they like to call it, and the advent of local regimes, particularly military ones—this phase was the most impactful. Western civilization was imposed by military force, which was labeled national, progressive, and popular. These regimes, which arrived with the fanfare of 'national celebration' and were presented to the Ummah with enthusiastic popular chants, under this noise and clamor, the Westernized sons of the homeland—the rulers—erected gallows, crushed principles, uprooted values, and exterminated scholars and sincere individuals.

Indeed, the sincere ones suffered at the hands of their ruling kinsmen, in terms of torment and persecution, many times more than what they had seen during the days of the English and French. It is sufficient to give examples of this:

What the Pashtuns faced at the hands of Amānullāh Khān in Afghanistan.

What the Kurds faced at the hands of Muṣṭafā Kemāl Atatürk in Turkey.

What the Muslim Brotherhood endured at the hands of ‘Abd al-Nāṣir and his henchmen in Egypt.

And what a sincere face at the hands of the military regimes spread throughout the Arab and Islamic world. They are a single pattern and a single model in combating the truth and its people, weaving on the same loom as their predecessors and following their path.

The image of cruelty and brutality with which the West treated the sons of Muslims appears meager and small next to the image of how the local rulers (the 'dark-skinned English') treated them.

Lines of Change:

This change in the Islamic world proceeded along three parallel lines:

1 - The First Line: The line of moral corruption.

2 - The Second Line: The line of combating the sources of Islamic legislation and diluting the texts.

3 - The Third Line: The line of tearing apart the Islamic Ummah.

The First Line: Moral Corruption:

This is summarized in the words of Zwemer, head of the missionaries, at the Jerusalem Conference in 1934:

'...We want to produce a generation that has no connection to Allāh, and no connection to the morals upon which nations are built.'

So, the focus was on women and bringing them out (of their traditional roles/homes), establishing women's unions, theater, singing, acting, institutes of fine arts, sports institutes for girls, spreading nudity, swimming pools, fashion houses, the naked image, and beauty shops. Until women became, as Morroe Berger said in his book 'The Arab World Today': 'The educated Muslim woman is the furthest member of society from religious teachings and the most capable member of society to pull the entire society away from religion.'

The women's revolution against Islām clearly began in Egypt, starting with Munīra Thābit (the first Egyptian female journalist), whom they called 'The Rebel Girl.' She was a friend of Sa'd Zaghlūl and could intervene in steering the helm of governance.

Then came Hudā Sha'rāwī, who, during the 1919 revolution, led a women's demonstration where they burned the ḥijāb in public streets. Şafiyyah Zaghlūl, Sa'd Zaghlūl's wife, was the first wife of a leader to appear unveiled in public gatherings. She named herself in the English manner after her husband and gave herself the title 'Mother of the Egyptians.'

Her husband, Sa'd Zaghlūl, was a leader of the women's movement and said: 'I shared with my friend Qāsim Amīn his ideas, which he included in his book "The New Woman".'

Newspapers were published defending women's rights, including 'Fatāt al-Sharq' (Girl of the East), and magazines like 'Al-Hilāl,' 'Al-Muqtaṭaf,' and 'Al-Muṣawwar.'

Luṭfī al-Sayyid called for co-education and imposed it on the Egyptian University. Therefore, Hudā Shaʿrāwī praised this act, and it was later supported by Ṭāhā Ḥusayn, Samīr al-Qalamāwī, and others.

In Turkey, in 1929, a decree was issued prohibiting polygyny, eliminating the ḥijāb, the ḥarīm system, and the law of divorce. Women in Turkish cities appeared in revealing attire.

In 1965, Ḥabīb Bourguiba issued similar decrees in Tunisia, and so on in other countries.

The Second Line: Casting Doubt on the Sources of Islamic Legislation and Diluting its Texts

This was represented by attacking:

The Qurʾān itself: Distinguishing the Meccan Qurʾān and casting doubt on the Medinan, stripping the Qurʾān from revelation, and considering revelation as a psychological outburst or neurotic states.

The first among the progeny of Muslims to openly deny the divine origin (Rabbāniyyah) of the Qurʾān and loudly proclaim his rejection of its divine source was Ṭāhā Ḥusayn in his book 'Fī al-Shiʿr al-Jāhili' (On Pre-Islamic Poetry), in which he followed the method of doubt he inherited from Descartes.

The Noble Sunnah: The focus of hostility towards it was to destroy it as a primary source for explaining the Qurʾān, clarifying its generalities, restricting its absolutes, and specifying its general rulings.

The attack on the Sunnah came from many angles, the most important of which were:

Attacking the personality of the Messenger (ṣallallāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam) and disparaging him."

Focusing on Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī as the most authentic book after the Book of Allāh and casting doubt upon it: Abū Rayyah wrote "Aḍwā’ ‘alā al-Sunnah al-Muḥammadiyyah", Ṣāliḥ Abū Bakr wrote "Al-Isrā’īliyyāt fī al-Bukhārī", and Al-‘Arabī magazine wrote, "Re-examine al-Bukhārī, for not everything in it is authentic."

Focusing on undermining the personality of Abū Hurayrah as the most prolific narrator of Ḥadīth from the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam), and defaming the personality of Lady ‘Ā’ishah as a rich source for the transmission of this Dīn.

And now there is a broad call adopted by some regimes, such as (al-Qadhdhāfī) in Libya, to abandon the Sunnah entirely.

The Arabic Language: Considering it the language of the Qur’ān, they called for: Abandoning the rules of the language (grammar and morphology). This was advocated by Salāmah Mūsā, Ṭāhā Ḥusayn, and Tawfīq al-Ḥakīm, proponents of the rule "use a sukūn and you'll be safe."

Colloquial Arabic instead of classical: Starting with Wilhelm Spitta (the German director of the Egyptian National Library), then Willmore (the English judge), and Nallino Cox (the English agricultural engineer). Finally, Salāmah Mūsā and Qāsim Amīn came, and then Yūsuf al-Sibā’ī and Iḥsān ‘Abd al-Quddūs wrote in colloquial Egyptian.

Adopting Latin script instead of Arabic: This was called for by ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Fahmī from Egypt and Sa‘īd ‘Aql from Lebanon.

As for Muṣṭafā Kamāl Atatürk, he implemented this matter with iron and fire.

Propaganda for prose poetry instead of metered poetry, because classical poetry is one of the most important vessels of the Arabic language.

Islamic History: Focusing on the doubts within it and exaggerating the extent of disagreement among the Companions (raḍiya Allāhu ‘anhum). Focusing on the Abbasid Caliphate as a state of slave girls, wine, and pageboys, especially during the era of al-Rashīd, as promoted by "Kitāb al-Aghānī" by al-Aṣfahānī. Then, distorting the history of the Islamic Ottoman Caliphate and considering it a form of colonialism.

Replacing Islamic Culture with Western Culture:

In Egypt – the leader of the Arab world – the missionary conference held in 1906 recommended establishing a secular university to oppose al-Azhar, which "threatens the Church with danger," and for this university to be modeled on French universities. Thus, the Egyptian University was established (1908 CE), and after a period, Luṭfī al-Sayyid became its president.

Writings appeared calling for assimilation into the West, such as the writings of Ṭāhā Ḥusayn in his book "Mustaqbal al-Thaqāfah fī Miṣr" (The Future of Culture in Egypt), where he says: "We must follow the path of the Europeans and tread their way to be their equals and partners in civilization, its good and its evil, its sweet and its bitter, what is loved of it and what is hated, what is praised of it and what is blamed."

This trend began during the days of Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha through the writings of Rifā‘ah al-Ṭaḥṭāwī in "Takhliṣ al-Ibrīz fī Talkhīṣ Bārīz" (The Extraction of Gold in the Summary of Paris). The call intensified during the days of Khedive Ismā‘īl, and Ismā‘īl's line appeared in the writings of Muḥammad ‘Uthmān Jalāl, al-Ṭaḥṭāwī's successor. Ismā‘īl established a system for al-Azhar in 1872 CE. Then Dunlop came and took over guidance in the Ministry of Education, completely removing Islam from schools, disparaging al-Azhar, and attempting to diminish its status. A holder of an English language certificate would receive (12) pounds monthly, a holder of an Arabic language certificate would receive (4) pounds, while an al-Azhar graduate would receive (112) Egyptian qirsh.

Then, many schools emerged in this regard:

The first school (the school of complete assimilation into the West) and severing ties with Islam. Prominent names in this regard include: Ṭāhā Ḥusayn, Salāmah Mūsā, Luṭfī al-Sayyid and his brother-in-law Ismā'īl Maẓhar, and 'Abd al-'Azīz Fahmī.

The school of mixing and patching (between Islam and Western culture) was led by Shaykh Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī and Muḥammad 'Abduh.

In this field, calls rose and voices were raised with grand slogans, including:

Development: Meaning the dilution of Islamic texts and the introduction of atheism and Western secularism in a deceptive, glittering guise. An example of this is the law for the development of al-Azhar issued during 'Abd al-Nāṣir's time, which was a devastating blow to it.

Development also means building a bridge over the chasm created by Islam between the East and the West to achieve understanding and communication, which consequently leads to the tearing apart of the Islamic world, as Gibb says: "Perhaps new opinions and the necessities of life will finally succeed in scattering Islamic society and tearing apart its unity."

Connection with Greek culture as a basis for development.

Raising the slogan of freedom: Secular governments in the Islamic world provided intellectual freedom if people used it against religion.

The call for a universal religion: As advocated by (Kālgharlī). The meaning of a universal religion is the complete elimination of Islam and its dissolution into the crucible of global Judaism.

Rapprochement between religions: As advocated by (Āṣif 'Alī Qubṭī al-Ismā'īlī).

Conferences began to be held for this purpose.

The call for types of Islam: Such as Classical Islam and Modern Islam, as stated by Faḍl al-Raḥmān al-Hindī, and also by Aḥmad Khān, founder of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College (propagating Modern Islam influenced by Western doctrines). Also, the repetition of names like Indian Islam, Pakistani Islam, and Turkish Islam.

Secularism (secularism) (lā-dīniyyah – non-religiousness): So that Islam becomes exactly like Christianity, with no connection to life, as stated in the book "Al-Islām wa Uṣūl al-Ḥukm" (Islam and the Foundations of Governance) by ‘Alī ‘Abd al-Rāziq.

Religious reform: As they call it, similar to what happened in the program of the "Kemalist destruction of Islam" under the name of religious reform, as called by Smith, Brockelmann, and other Orientalists. The meaning of religious reform is changing the texts of Islam with new texts while retaining the name of Islam.

Colonialism, Orientalism, and missionary work—these three tentacles of the octopus hostile to Islam—proceeded side by side.

American universities, in particular, held several conferences to combat Islam, foremost among them the conferences held at Princeton University in America. Princeton University Conference in 1947 CE, titled "The Near East: Its Society and Culture."

Princeton University Conference in 1953 CE), titled "Islamic Culture and Contemporary Life."

The Lahore Conference, held in 1955 CE, was arranged by Western Orientalists and failed completely.

The Third Line: The line of tearing apart the Muslim Ummah:

Its meaning includes:

Nationalism: Arab, Kurdish, and Indian.

Global movements, Such as Communism.

Masonic-Jewish humanitarian calls and their branches, such as Lions Clubs, Rotary, Jehovah's Witnesses, and B'nai B'rith (Sons of the Covenant).

Kāfir (disbelieving) sects attributed to Islam: Such as: Qādiyāniyyah - Bābism - Bahā'ism - Nuṣayriyyah - Druze.

(End of quote.)

The Line of Historical Transformation

"Indeed, the most dangerous thing the Islamic Ummah has been exposed to is the process of internal transformation, i.e., spiritual, psychological, and intellectual defeat before its enemies. It thus submitted before idols, knelt at the feet of the ṭawāghīt (tyrants), and was afflicted by al-wahn (weakness), which the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam) defined as 'love of the world and hatred of death.' In the authentic Ḥadīth narrated by Aḥmad: 'The nations are about to call each other to attack you as diners call one another to a dish.' A questionnaire asked: 'Will it be because of our small number on that day?' He said: 'Rather, on that day you will be many, but you will be like the scum carried by a torrent. Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemy, and He will cast al-wahn into your hearts.' Someone asked: 'O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?' He said: 'Love of the world and hatred of death.'"

So how did the "best Ummah brought forth for mankind" become scum?

And how did beneficial goodness turn into foam and flotsam?

And how did lions beget monkeys?

And how did the lions of the jungle give birth to pigs?

Indeed, the most dangerous thing that can afflict nations is defeat in their depths. This is a fatal disease. The most severe blow that struck the Ummah in its vital core was the loss of self-confidence. People are victorious only when they interact with their principles, live by their beliefs, and find elevation in their Dīn. An Ummah that rallies around a sound ‘aqīdah, lives for it, and strives to revive it will never be defeated, no matter who its enemies are and no matter how many forces gather against it. This principle is what the Lord of Glory has inscribed as the cause of victory and defeat, as He, the Exalted, says:

{Or when a disaster struck you [on the day of Uḥud] after you had struck [the enemy] with one twice as great, you said, "From where is this?" Say, "It is from yourselves." Indeed, Allāh is over all things competent.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 165).

Defeat begins internally, and then it is reflected on the battlefield. The defect starts in the depths of the soul, then we see its effects as a rout in the fields of life—in behavior, morals, and dealings. So, how did the process of transformation take place?!

Europe and the War of Words instead of the War of the Sword

In the recent campaigns against Egypt (1249 CE), during the last days of the Ayyubids and the early days of the Mamluks, Louis IX, King of France, was taken captive and imprisoned in the Citadel prison. There, he had ample time for reflection to lay down important foundations for Crusader thinking on how to invade the Muslims. He wrote those important directives, the essence of which was:

"Muslims cannot be defeated as long as their ‘aqīdah is intact. The war against Muslims must begin with a war of words."

Thus, the Christian kings realized they had no way to remain. They began to rethink their method of invading Muslims and dealing with them.

Napoleon's campaign in Egypt (1798 CE) was a prominent point in the transformation of the battle and its methods. Napoleon invaded Egypt armed with the latest French weapons, cannons, and machine guns. Horses entered al-Azhar, and their hooves trampled the mats that had produced tens of thousands of the Ummah's scholars. Al-Azhar rose up and defended the dignity of this Dīn, disturbing

Napoleon's rest and keeping him sleepless. He could not achieve stability despite the collaborators who stood by him, like Ya'qūb the Copt and those who sided with him from the Byzantines (Rūm), Christians of Shām, and others. Finally, Sulaymān al-Ḥalabī attacked Kléber, Napoleon's deputy, whom he left behind in Egypt, and killed him.

The French withdrawal from Egypt was one of the most prominent landmarks in modern Europe, as it led Europe to resolve to wage a battle of the tongue instead of a battle of the spear. It moved towards uprooting this Dīn from the depths of this Ummah to plant in its place nationalism, 'aṣabiyyah (partisanship), and other slogans in an attempt to fill the void.

It was stated in the conference "The Near East and Its Culture," held by a group of Orientalists at an American university:

"In every Muslim country we entered, we dug up the earth to unearth pre-Islamic آثار (artifacts/remains). We do not aspire for the Muslim to revert from the Islamic 'aqīdah to a pre-Islamic belief, but it is sufficient to scatter his loyalty."

And in a report from one of the missionary institutes, penned by Nabīh Amīn Fāris: "While the Near East was an ambition for empire-building ideas, it was also an ambition for another group of people seeking to achieve through the word what their Crusader ancestors failed to achieve through the sword."

"Let us give an example of this with the corruption that began in the heartland of Islam, in Egypt and Shām."

Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha (Napoleon's Heir) (1904 - 1949)

Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha came to do what Napoleon failed to do. He wanted to turn Egypt into a piece of France and began by sending missions to France to brainwash the dispatched individuals. Among those who went there was Rifā'ah al-Ṭaḥṭāwī, who returned as an advocate for Western culture and wrote "Takhlīṣ al-Ibrīz fī Talkhīṣ Bārīz" (The Extraction of Gold in the Summary of Paris) and translated French law. Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha took a Frenchman - a physician - as his advisor, whose name was Clot Bey. This Frenchman had a great influence on the Westernization of Egypt. During Muḥammad 'Alī's reign, French laws were introduced to gradually replace the Islamic Sharī'ah. His private companions were tourists, consuls, and missionaries. One of the deepest negative impacts during Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha's time was that he opened the doors of Egypt and Shām, when it came under his control, to Christian missionaries. These doors had been closed to them due to the Ottoman Caliphate's strictness and firmness on this issue and its prohibition of missionaries.

The result of missionaries entering Shām was the establishment of two universities in Lebanon:

First: The Syrian Protestant College, established by the Protestants, which later became known as the American University of Beirut.

Second: The 'Azīr College, established by the Catholics, which later became known as the Jesuit University.

The American University was a launching point for many deviant opinions and trends that left deep impacts on the process of transforming the Arab world. Among these trends was the nationalist trend, which was intended to replace the 'aqīdah of Islam in hearts to fill the void left by Islam after it receded from all aspects of life.

It is stated in the book "The Arab Society" / Beirut University / Faculty of Arts: "The first association that began to call for Arab nationalism was a Christian association, the idea for which was inspired by a man named Ilyās Ḥabbālīn from the town of Dhūq Mikāyil. He was a French language teacher at the American University, teaching a class that included Ibrāhīm al-Yāzījī, Ya‘qūb Şarrūf, and Shāhīn Makāriyūs. The professor was an admirer of the French Revolution."

Arab nationalism, thanks to its leaders and advocates, most of whom were Christians, became a new religion that replaced Islam, as ‘Alī Nāṣir al-Dīn said in the introduction to his book "Qiṣṣat al-‘Arab" (The Story of the Arabs), footnote p. 38: "Arabism itself is a religion for us, the devout, long-standing Arab nationalists, both Muslims and Christians. For if every era has its sacred prophethood, then Arab nationalism is the prophethood of this era."

The American University and its schools in the region provided us with the leaders of nationalist parties in the region: Anṭūn Sa‘ādah founded the Syrian Nationalist Party, followed by Asad Ashqar, then George ‘Abd al-Masīḥ.

The Ba‘ath Party was founded by Michel ‘Aflaq, a Christian, and Zakī al-Arsūzī, a Nuṣayrī. The Arab Nationalist Movement was headed by George Ḥabash, under the guidance of his professor Constantine Zurayk, a professor at the American University.

It is stated in the Fifth Protocol of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion: "We have sown discord between each and every one in all the personal and national objectives of the Gentiles over twenty centuries."

Western countries succeeded in directing Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha to perform the greatest service to the West, including:

1. Shaking the authority of the Islamic Ottoman Caliphate over the East and fighting Turkey in many places.
2. Activating the Christian missionary movement in the region.
3. Transforming Egypt and Syria into countries that are Westernized in their thinking and life.

4. Striking the Islamic movement that appeared in the Arabian Peninsula (the Wahhābī movement).
5. Introducing Western laws to be applied to Muslims.

All five of these actions were dangerous and had a great impact on the lives of Muslims, especially regarding the introduction of the new religion (Napoleon's religion), i.e., French laws, and mixing them with divine law, thus creating a new, mixed religion from (the French religion and the Islamic religion). His right-hand man in altering the Dīn of Allāh was Rifā'ah al-Ṭaḥṭāwī. As for his main mentor, it was Dr. Clot, who directed Egyptian life in most of its aspects. As for striking the Wahhābī movement (the call to Tawḥīd) in the Arabian Peninsula, Muḥammad 'Alī sent his son Ibrāhīm Pasha in the year (1231 AH) (1815 CE) to the peninsula, and in the year (233 AH) (1817 CE), Ibrāhīm Pasha entered al-Dir'īyyah, the capital of the Da'wah, and crushed the Wahhābī movement.

Before we conclude the chapter on Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha, we must pause to consider Rifā'ah al-Ṭaḥṭāwī, who had the greatest impact on the process of transformation.

Al-Ṭaḥṭāwī (one of the members of Muḥammad 'Alī's missions to Paris) resided in Paris from 1826 to 1831. He returned and wrote his book, Takhlīṣ al-Ibrīz fī Talkhīṣ Bārīz (The Extraction of Gold in the Summary of Paris), which he wrote during his stay in France and presented to his teacher, Jomard. He expressed his profound admiration for France. In Takhlīṣ al-Ibrīz, he translated the French Constitution and glorified the French Revolution, which had shattered the Church and reduced it to a pile of historical remnants.

During the time of Khedive Ismā'īl, al-Ṭaḥṭāwī was his right-hand man in corruption and Westernization. During this period, he wrote his two books: Manhaj al-Albāb al-Miṣriyyah fī Manāhij al-Ādāb al-'Aṣriyyah (The Curriculum of Egyptian Intellectuals in the Methods of Modern Etiquette) and Al-Murshid al-Amīn lil-Banāt wa al-Banīn (The Trustworthy Guide for Girls and Boys). He showed a clear interest in Pharaonic history and called Ramses II (the Pharaoh of our master Mūsā): "the pride of the Egyptian state in the pre-Islamic ages and the lamp of its history." A Muslim's astonishment does not cease when seeing al-Ṭaḥṭāwī presenting the system of companies and interest-based (ribā-based) banks without comment. He considered French dance a type of shalbanah (elegance, youthfulness, and sport). He admired amusement, and al-Ṭaḥṭāwī encouraged the mixing of genders, the education of girls without restrictions or adherence to Sharī'ah limits, the prohibition of polygyny, and the restriction of divorce. He began to repeat a new slogan: "Brotherhood of the Homeland." This slogan later became a creed for advocates of nationalism and racism.

Al-Ṭaḥṭāwī, like his contemporary Khayr al-Dīn al-Tūnisī, who authored the book Aqṣam al-Masālik fī Ma'rifat Aḥwāl al-Mamālik (The Surest Path to Knowing the Conditions of Kingdoms), were the first messengers of Western civilization in our lands, who acted as vanguards to demolish the great edifice of Islām in the souls of its people.

The Salon of Princess Nāzli Fāḍil

Nāzli was the daughter of Muṣṭafā Fāḍil, the brother of Ismā'īl Pasha. Muṣṭafā was the crown prince, but Ismā'īl removed him, so he traveled to Turkey and then to Europe. There, his daughter Nāzli was raised, mastered several languages, married a Tunisian minister, and then returned to Egypt to carry out acts of sabotage that Western circles had failed to achieve. She opened her salon, which became a meeting place for power enthusiasts and a focal point for those who dreamed of prominence in the land, because the salon came under the patronage of Cromer, the British Agent in Egypt. The regular attendees of this salon were those who sought to benefit from the princess's prestige and wealth.

Among those considered the elite of her council:

- Sa'd Zaghlul: He came from the streets, without prestige, knowledge, or wealth – and headed her office, remaining unmarried until the age of thirty-six. Then he married Şafiyyah, the daughter of Muşţafā Fahmī, who was the Prime Minister under the British occupation for some ten years. The strange thing is this marriage to the Prime Minister's daughter, who was not yet fifteen years old. Şafiyyah later became known as Şafiyyah Zaghlul and was nicknamed "Umm al-Mişriyyīn" (Mother of the Egyptians).

Also among the salon's attendees were Shaykh Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī and his student Shaykh Muḥammad 'Abduh. I have come across a letter between the two Shaykhs concerning the princess, which is heartbreaking regarding the state of the leaders of Islamic thought at that time!!

Also among the salon's attendees:

Luţfī al-Khulī. Then Qāsim Amīn was brought, who had once responded to a Frenchman, D'Harcourt. This Frenchman had disparaged the status of women in Islām. So Amīn responded to him, explaining that Islām gave women their due status, preserved their fundamental role, and their modesty through their attire. Because of this article, Sa'd Zaghlul and Muḥammad 'Abduh incited Princess Nāzli against Qāsim Amīn, because his words detracted from the princess's standing as she advocated nudity and licentiousness. Then they suggested a solution for the princess to be pleased with him: that he write a book about women. So, in 1900 CE, he produced the book Taḥrīr al-Mar'ah (The Liberation of Women), which Qāsim Amīn and Shaykh Muḥammad 'Abduh co-authored. Years ago, this secret was discovered when Muḥammad 'Abduh's grandson announced that his grandfather was the author of Taḥrīr al-Mar'ah. The meaning of "liberation of women" was: liberating them from values, principles, modesty, and morals.

Britain continued to patronize this salon and its attendees until they brought them to positions of power:

Muḥammad ‘Abduh became the Muftī of Egypt. Sa‘d Zaghlūl became Minister of Education, then Prime Minister. And Luṭfī al-Sayyid (dubbed "Ustādh al-Jīl" - Professor of the Generation) became the president of the Egyptian University and imposed gender mixing in the university.

Luṭfī al-Sayyid: This is the one who used his newspaper, called Al-Jarīdah, to promote Cromer's views and defend them, and to call for Pharaonism and the shaping of a distinctive Egyptian personality.

The protégés of Nāzī Fāḍil's salon adopted this by separating Egypt from the Arab Islamic world.

For example, Sa‘d Zaghlūl, when asked about Arab unity, replied: "It is a unity of zeros."

Ṭāhā Ḥusayn followed this line, saying: "Religion and language are not suitable as a basis for political unity, and the Egyptian is Pharaonic before being Arab." Salāmah Mūsā published this statement in his newspaper, Al-Majallah al-Jadīdah, in 1928 CE because he was following the same line.

Ṭāhā Ḥusayn also said: "If Islām stood between me and my Pharaonism, I would renounce my Islām."

In 1927 CE, Zaghlūl died, and al-Naḥḥās became the leader of the Wafd party. British tanks imposed him as Prime Minister on February 4, 1942, against the will of King Fu‘ād.

- Ṣafiyyah Zaghlūl (Umm al-Miṣriyyīn) and Hudā Sha‘rāwī. Ṣafiyyah and Hudā had a great impact in corrupting the good fiṭrah (natural disposition) of Egyptian women. As for Ṣafiyyah, she managed the wheel of corruption from her position of power because her husband was Prime Minister, and she, as we mentioned, was the daughter of Muṣṭafā Fahmī, a former Prime Minister.

As for Hudā Shaʿrāwī, she was the daughter of Sulṭān Pasha, who sided with the English against the ʿUrābī Revolution. He received a large sum of money from the English for his collaboration, then contracted cancer. Before he died, he married his daughter to a wealthy man in his fifties named ʿAlī Shaʿrāwī, so she became Hudā Shaʿrāwī. ʿAlī Shaʿrāwī was an agent of the English, and Hudā was taken to Europe. Upon her return from her trip, on the ship's gangway, she removed her khimār (headscarf) and placed it under her feet, saying: "The age of darkness has ended forever." And she formed the "Egyptian Women's Association."

Cromer, the British Ruler of Egypt, and Reverend Dunlop

As for Cromer, he was the British Agent who administered Egypt from the occupation in 1882 until 1906. Dr. al-Nashshār said: "Cromer announced upon his arrival in Egypt that he would demolish the Qurʾān, the Kaʿbah, the Islamic family, and al-Azhar." [1]

Cromer focused his attack on the Ottoman State and assailed Islām through Turkey, which represented it. He spread English, fought Arabic, and advocated the idea of "Egypt for the Egyptians." He devalued al-Azhar and its men, promoted the Westernized class, and used to say:

"Patriots will find their best hope in the advancement of Muḥammad ʿAbduh's followers to gradually achieve an independent Egypt." [2]

Cromer authored the book Modern Egypt. He claimed that Islām is contrary to civilization and teaches its followers to hate those who differ from them!! And that it opposes progress, permits divorce, and prohibits ribā (usury/interest) and alcohol.

Luṭfī al-Sayyid was one of those who championed the defense of Cromer and his policies in his newspaper Al-Jarīdah, and in the newspaper Al-Muqaṭṭam.

As for Douglas Dunlop:

(1) Note his statement and the details of what will come regarding the Europeans' programs in what they called the "war of words" since the nineteenth century. Compare the program of Cromer, the British ruler of Egypt since 1882, with the program of Bremer, the American ruler of Iraq since 2003. And the strategy of Rumsfeld and Rice for the "war of ideas" and the "development of societies" – Arab and Islamic – religiously, culturally, politically, and socially! You will discover that what is happening now is merely a subsequent chapter to a previous one... The only difference is the stupidity in the American application, which is based on foolishness, ignorance, brutality, and the barbarism of the cowboy who was deprived of European culture and cunning!

(2) Now, an "independent" Iraq, gradually!!

He was one of Cromer's major misdeeds. Cromer had encouraged missionaries in Egypt and Sudan, but when he saw their naive way of approaching people in the streets, he feared that their work would lead to an awakening of the people and then ignite a national revolution with Islamic fervor. So, he limited their activity. The missionaries submitted a report to the British government, and Britain sent a reprimand to Cromer. He responded to the missionaries, "I will achieve, through one monk, many times what you do." He brought Dunlop in 1889, a monk who had graduated from a British theological college. Cromer appointed him Secretary of Education in 1897. Then, in 1906, he was appointed advisor to the Ministry of Education, and Dunlop was the de facto minister.

He implemented Cromer's policy: "A British mind and Egyptian hands." [1] And he raised his master's slogan:

"When the Qur'ān and Makkah disappear from the Arab lands, then we can see the Arabs progressing on the path of civilization." [2]

Dunlop fought the Arabic language and al-Azhar, and encouraged English. The teaching of science, mathematics, chemistry, and geography came to be in English. He fought higher education under the pretext that Egyptians were not fit for it. And he fought Islamic books or those with Islamic sentiment, such as the books of 'Alī Mubārak and 'Abd al-'Azīz Jāwīsh.

The most dangerous thing Dunlop did was that he designed the curricula that became a model for Arab countries, and he divided education into two sections:

- Religious: He made this exclusive to al-Azhar and its institutes.

(1) - Now, it's an (American-Jewish-British mind)... and Iraqi, Jordanian, Saudi, Pakistani, Egyptian hands... and so on to the end of the caravan of livestock!!

- And secular (Madanī): In this, he fought every religious word and prevented the employment of al-Azhar graduates, the people of true knowledge. If he needed some of them, he would pay one 112 Egyptian piasters per month. Such was the situation in Egypt – the pioneer of the Arab world – in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

(2) - Now America demands the removal of what it calls verses and sūrahs of Jihād and incitement to hatred from educational curricula. It promotes an abridged muṣḥaf (Qur'ānic text) they want to publish, calling it Furqān al-Ḥaqq!! It incites tolerance between wolves and sheep! And governments enroll Imāms in rehabilitation courses to avoid extremism!

In politics: Matters were in the hands of the English, as their Agent was the de facto ruler of the country, while the Khedive had no control over his affairs.

In the economy: Egypt's wealth flowed into English pockets.

Al-Azhar: Excluded from guiding the course of life.

Media: The radio was directed by Luṭfī al-Sayyid and his ilk, who was also the university president, as were the daily and periodical newspapers. Most magazines were in the hands of Christians, such as Al-Ahrām, Al-Muqaṭṭam, Al-Muqtaṭaf, Al-Hilāl – more than twenty of them were in Christian hands. And the Ministry of Education and curricula: in Dunlop's hands.

The University: In the hands of Luṭfī al-Sayyid. Then came Ṭāhā Ḥusayn to continue the role through his books Al-Shi'r al-Jāhilī (Pre-Islamic Poetry) and Al-Adab al-Jāhilī (Pre-Islamic Literature), to deny the divine origin of the Qur'ān, and he uttered his statement:

"The Torah can tell us about Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl, and the Qur'ān can tell us about Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl, but we do not consider these two as reliable historical sources." Then he took over the university, then the Ministry of Education. Some said, "The era of Dunlop ended, and the era of Ṭāhā Ḥusayn began."

In the late nineteenth century, the most dangerous event of the modern era occurred: the Basel Congress (1897 CE), convened by Herzl in Switzerland.

The Basel Congress in Switzerland (189)

Many historical commentators almost unanimously agree that the Basel Congress is considered the most dangerous event of the modern era. It was a turning point for the Islamic world, as after it, international Jewry diligently organized plans and perfected schemes and snares to trap Muslims in order to reach the Promised Land.

As for Herzl, he was an Austrian Jewish journalist born in 1860. In 1894, he attended the trial of the Jewish officer Dreyfus, who held French citizenship. This officer was accused of collaborating with Germany and was sentenced for treason to ten years and stripped of his military ranks. The trial deeply affected Herzl. He believed Dreyfus was unjustly convicted because of his Jewish religion and said – whoever wishes to be treated fairly in this society must triumph – and he resolved to work towards establishing a homeland for the Jews. A year after this event, in 1895 CE, he published his book Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State), which is similar to the book published by Moses Hess, Rome and Jerusalem.

In 1897, he managed to gather Zionist organizations at a World Zionist Congress in Basel. At the end of the congress, Herzl declared that the Jewish state had been established and set a timeframe for it

Most of the major events that took place in the Islamic region – particularly the Arab region – were aimed at the grand objective that Herzl, and the Jews behind him, set their sights on: reaching the Promised Land. The Jews faced a formidable obstacle that could not be overcome: the Ottoman State, headed by Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd II, who ruled between 1876 and 1909.

The Jews first attempted to entice the righteous Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd. Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd had ascended to the Khilāfah at a time when Freemasonry (al-Māsūniyyah) was on the verge of strangling the state.

Let us return to Herzl, who, after the conclusion of the Basel Congress in 1897, went to meet Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd. He took with him the Rabbi of Constantinople, Moses Levi, and they presented the Sultan with several offers, including:

- 1 - The establishment of an Ottoman fleet.
- 2 - Supporting Ottoman policy in the external world.
- 3 - Jewish assistance to the Sultan in improving his financial situation.
- 4 - The establishment of an Ottoman university in Jerusalem (Al-Quds).

Herzl said, "For example, if His Majesty (Mawlānā) agrees and sells us the ownerless lands in Palestine for the price he determines." The Sultan became angry and said:

"The lands of the homeland are not for sale. Lands acquired by blood are only sold for the same price."

Herzl did not give up and met the Sultan a second time in 1901. This time, they offered the Sultan himself 150 million English gold pounds. He said: "Even if you were to pay the earth full of gold, I would never accept this commission of yours. I have served the Islamic Millah and the Muḥammadan Ummah for more than thirty years, and I will not blacken the records of my Muslim forefathers and ancestors, the Ottoman Sultans and Caliphs."

This meeting was with Qaraşū, the Jewish Freemason lawyer who supervised the Salonica lodge.

Some sources reported that the Sultan shouted in Herzl's face, "Get out of my sight, you scoundrel!" and shouted at the chamberlain who had brought him in, saying, "Did you not know what this pig wanted from me?"

So Herzl flew with Qaraşū to Italy, and Qaraşū sent a telegram to the Sultan: "You will pay the price for this meeting with your person and your throne."

Herzl says in his memoirs: "Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd advised me not to take any further steps in this matter because he could not give up a single inch of Palestinian land, as it did not belong to him, but to his Islamic Ummah, which fought for it and watered its soil with the blood of its sons. ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd said: 'The surgeon's knife in my body would be easier for me than to see Palestine severed from my empire.' Then he said: 'Save your money, Herzl. When ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd is gone, you will take Palestine for free.'"

After this, the Jews resolved to overthrow ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd. In 1904, they detonated a carriage in front of the mosque where the Sultan performed the Friday prayer (Ṣalāt al-Jumu‘ah). Allāh saved him from death, but many people were killed.

The Freemasons clamored for his removal, and Freemasonry pushed its agents into high positions in the state, such as Talat Pasha; Anwar Pasha – Minister of War; Aristidi Pasha – a Greek who became Minister of Public Works; Jamal Pasha – Governor of Shām (Syria); Mustafa Kemal Pasha – commander of the Arab Eastern Front in World War I; and Jawid Pasha (David Pasha) – Minister of Finance.

Hussein Jahid Yalçın was one of the three members (American, French, and Turkish) of the conciliation committee between Arabs and Jews. The Sultan found himself increasingly surrounded by men bought by Freemasonry through the Committee of Union and Progress (Jam‘iyyat al-Ittiḥād wa-l-Taraqqī). His grip gradually weakened until they were able to force him to declare the constitution. He established the Chamber of Deputies (Majlis al-Mab‘ūthān), which included Jews, Christians, and Muslims, and Qaraşū joined the Chamber of Deputies.

The declaration of the constitution was a victory for Christians and Jews everywhere, to the extent that Georgi Zaydan, the Christian owner of Dār al-Hilāl, dedicated his book "The Ottoman Coup" to the "heroes"! They declared the constitution in 1908. Then the Freemasons managed to mobilize the army under the leadership of Maḥmūd Shawkat – an Arab – and the Chamber of Deputies convened to pass a resolution overthrowing the Sultan. The hand of Nāḥūm Ḥāyīm, the Rabbi of Constantinople, was prominent in this affair. The letter of deposition was presented to Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd by three individuals: 1 - Qaraşū. 2 - Aristidi Pasha. 3 - ‘Ārif Ḥikmat, whose mother had been a servant in the Sultan's palace; the Sultan had taken her son, ‘Ārif, and enrolled him in the navy until he became a naval aide-de-camp.

The removal of Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd from the Khilāfah occurred in April 1909. This was the greatest stab directed at Islam. On that night when Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd was deposed from the seat of power, we can say that: Actual Islam was removed from existence and witness, and Palestine – in reality – fell into the hands of the Jews.

Anwar Pasha – one of the prominent figures of Freemasonry and the coup against Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd – said, addressing Jamal Pasha: "Do you know, Jamal, what our sin is? We did not know Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd, so we became a tool in the hands of Zionism, and global Freemasonry bought us. We exerted our efforts for Zionism; this is our real sin."

Bernard Lewis says: "The Freemason brothers and the Jews secretly cooperated to remove Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd because he was a strong opponent of the Jews, as he vehemently refused to give any inch of land in Palestine to the Jews."

Turkey after Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd:

The righteous Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd fell due to Jewish Freemasonry, and Turkey came to be run by the Young Turks Association (Jam‘iyyat Turkīyah al-Fatāh) and the Committee of Union and Progress (Jam‘iyyat al-Ittiḥād wa-l-Taraqqī), which became a plaything in the hands of Freemasonry. The Turkish nationalism advocated by the Committee of Union and Progress was in Jewish hands.

Thus, calamities befell Turkey one after another. The Khilāfah was weak, manipulated by the Committee of Union and Progress – the nationalist advocates; these were secularists, not religious people. Masonic lodges spread like wildfire. Debts accumulated. And behind all this were the Jewish hands that engineered the overthrow of Turkey to reach the Promised Land.

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk Destroys Turkey and Abolishes the Khilāfah:

Turkey emerged shattered from World War I, and the major powers divided the inheritance of the "Sick Man!" – as they used to call Turkey. Europe was relieved of this terrifying ghoul that had disturbed its sleep for many centuries.

Mustafa Kemal emerged after his defeat on the Arab Eastern Front, and his personality came to prominence as a military leader through some military clashes with Greece. Plans were set in motion to highlight Mustafa Kemal. Some historical and political analysts believe that the silence of the three Allied powers, whose forces were stationed near the battlefield, was part of a plan to elevate Mustafa Kemal for the role awaiting him: fighting Islam and abolishing the Khilāfah.

The Allied powers withdrew from Turkey. When the British House of Commons confronted Curzon, who had agreed to withdraw Allied armies from Turkey, saying that Turkey would return to occupy Europe once more, he said: "Rest assured. Turkey will not rise again after we have stripped it of Islam and the Khilāfah."

The State of the Islamic World from the Mid-Nineteenth Century to the Mid-Twentieth Century.

In the first half of the twentieth century, the Islamic world was in a deep slumber, surrendering to humiliation, having grown accustomed to the whips of its executioners lashing its back.

The West, which held the Islamic world by the throat, had agreed on two matters: That Islam should not rise again.

That a Jewish state should be established in Palestine.

The Islamic world was divided into two parts: The Arab Islamic world. And the non-Arab Islamic world.

Conditions in the Arab Islamic World:

As for the Arab Islamic world: its beating heart was Egypt, which was in Britain's grip. We have seen how they wrought corruption there through the Muḥammad ʿAlī dynasty and their protégés. Jordan, Iraq, and Palestine were likewise under the yoke of British occupation, and their condition was no better than that of Egypt.

As for France, it controlled Syria, Lebanon, and North Africa, where it was determined to turn North Africa, from Tunis to Tangier, into a grand brothel reminiscent of Paris. It imposed the French language and issued the Berber Dahir (Berber Law) on May 16, 1930, which mandated the implementation of Berber customary laws and Berber personal status law instead of the Islamic Shariʿah. This was to differentiate between Arabs and Berbers, turn the country into an arena of ethnic conflict, and strip Muslims of their religion.

At the same time, Saʿīd ʿAql, Yūsuf al-Sawdā, and Victor Khallāṭ evoked the specter of Phoenicianism, revived names like Hannibal, created the Syrian Nationalist Party, and declared that Lebanon did not belong to the Arabs but was part of Mediterranean civilization. In Egypt, Salāmah Mūsā and Ṭāhā Ḥusayn promoted Pharaonism. Ṭāhā Ḥusayn declared in "The Future of Culture in Egypt" that Egypt is part of Mediterranean (European) civilization, not Arab, and is closer to the civilizations of Italy, France, and Greece than to the Arabian Peninsula. He stated that Europeans should be imitated in their food, drink, dress, and lifestyle.

As for Palestine: it was under the administration of the British High Commissioner – the Jew Herbert Samuel – who was paving the way for the establishment of a Jewish state there. Therefore, he inundated the major cities with theaters, cinemas, and nightclubs, in addition to controlling the curricula of secular schools and excluding Islamic education and Islamic history from school life. The radio was in their hands.

As for the Nuṣayrīs in Syria: France, in addition to the aforementioned British methods of change, sponsored the Nuṣayrī sect, whom they called 'Alawites' to confuse their matter among Muslims. This sect had taken from among themselves a god, Sulaymān al-Murshid, who had been a cowherd, and he took a messenger named Sulaymān al-Maydah, who worked as a camel herder. This Sulaymān al-Murshid was from the village of Jūbā Burghāl, east of Latakia. The French advisor would prostrate to him along with the other prostrators to increase the deviation of his followers. A robe was made for him with electric lights that would illuminate, and his followers would prostrate to him!

Conditions of the Rest of the Muslims in the Islamic World:

As for the Muslims in the rest of the Islamic world, one can speak extensively about their plight. In addition to the pervasive ignorance afflicting the majority of Muslims, colonial powers, led by Britain, encouraged deviant Sufi orders (al-Ṭuruq al-Ṣūfiyyah al-Munḥarifah) that understood nothing of Islam except negative isolation and patience with colonialism, considering it a trial from Allāh. They promoted wiping oneself on graves, erecting shrines, raising banners over them for blessings, preoccupying the people with the birthdays and coronations of shaykhs, then making supplications around their graves, swearing by their names, and offering flowers at their monuments.

Furthermore, new prophethoods were invented whose function was to abolish Jihād and entrench loyalty to Britain.

In India

Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad al-Qādiyānī was brought to prominence. This self-proclaimed prophet was born in 1840 in Qādiyān. He suffered from hysteria in his youth. In 1884, he declared the prohibition of Jihād against the English in his book "Barāhīn-i-Aḥmadiyyah."

In the second phase: he announced his resemblance to Christ in 1891 and published three books: "Fath al-Islām," "Tawḍīḥ Marām," and "Izālat Awhām."

He said: he was the Promised Messiah.

In the third phase, he declared himself a prophet in 1900, and he claimed that Allāh had combined all prophets in his person.

Bashīr Maḥmūd, one of the Qādiyānī propagandists, said: "Ghulām Aḥmad is superior to some of the Messengers of Strong Will (Ūlū al-‘Azm min al-Rusul)!!"

Many followed him to pledge allegiance (bay‘ah) to Britain. Maḥmūd Aḥmad, the khalīfah of Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad, says in his letter "A Gift to His Highness the Prince of Wales, son of George V, in 1931":

"I welcome you and assure you that the Aḥmadiyyah community is loyal to Britain and will remain loyal – In shā’ Allāh. The methodology of this community since its foundation has been to obey the existing British government, and this is a condition of the bay‘ah within it."

It is stated in Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad's book "Tiryāq al-Qulūb": "I have spent my life supporting and aiding the English government. I have authored books and pamphlets on prohibiting Jihād and the obligation to obey the English rulers, which, if collected, would fill fifty chests. I have published all these books in Arab countries, Egypt, Shām, and Kabul."

Bābism and Bahā’ism in Iran

This is another religion sponsored by Britain and eagerly spread by Russia to dilute the Islamic ‘aqīdah. The founder of Bābism was a Shiite named Mīrzā ‘Alī Muḥammad al-Shīrāzī, who called himself the Bāb, deriving his name from the fabricated ḥadīth: "I am the city of knowledge, and ‘Alī is its gate." He first claimed prophethood, then claimed to be the manifestation of Allāh. Then his disciple, Bahā’, founded the Bahā’ī religion.

In 1848, the Bahā'īs held a conference in Badasht, and Bābism announced the abrogation of Islamic Sharī'ah by Bābism. Bahā' was later executed, and his community fragmented into sects in various parts of Iran.

We should not fail to note that the initial nucleus of the Bāb's followers included a large number of Jews. A part of the Russian embassy's work in Tehran was confined to preparing the 'tablets' and organizing Bābī activities.

The call of Bahā' went through three phases: first, he claimed to be 'Īsā (Jesus), peace be upon him, then he claimed prophethood, and then he claimed divinity.

The School of Building Bridges to the West:

We have pointed out more than once that the West preferred not to use force except in cases of extreme necessity because it realized that, through its protégés from among the locals, it could achieve many times more than what its soldiers and air and naval fleets could accomplish.

The English, in particular, saw that one of the best ways to strike roots in Muslim lands was to establish schools that would bridge the gap between the polytheistic (mushrik) West and the Muslim East by diluting barriers, removing distinctions, and narrowing the distance between pure faith (īmān) and explicit disbelief (kufr) by confusing matters, mixing symbols, and demolishing the differences between Muslims and kāfirīn.[1] Among these schools were:

The school of Muḥammad 'Abduh in Egypt.

The school of Aḥmad Khān, and in his manner, Waḥīd al-Dīn Khān (in India).

The School of Muḥammad 'Abduh in Egypt:

Interpreters of historical events differ regarding the personality of Muḥammad 'Abduh, in analyzing his political stances, and his connection to the British occupation.[1]:

[1] America is now implementing the same program by opening cultural centers and advanced scientific and research institutions. It does so by taking academically outstanding students, and the children of the wealthy and political and social figures, on study missions to America to brainwash them and return them with American minds, culture, and spiritual allegiance. America declares in its propaganda for these mission programs that these graduates will take over the task of managing their countries in all fields and will be the future leaders of their countries!

Some say he is an extremist figure, seeing him as the reformer who awakened Egypt from its deep slumber, that he did his utmost to reform al-Azhar, and that he was unable to confront Britain and was thus forced to appease them in order to protect Islamic awqāf and undertake a radical reform of al-Azhar and its scholars. Among these are his student Muḥammad Riḍā, and Muḥammad al-Bahī.

Others believe he played a significant role in serving Britain, more so than outspoken secularists, because he built bridges between the Egyptian Islamic psyche and the hateful English psyche, and managed to convince many that cooperation with Britain was necessary.

Among those holding this opinion was Shaykh ‘Alīsh, the Shaykh of al-Azhar, who declared Muḥammad ‘Abduh a kāfir.

Whatever the case may be, there are major issues in the life of Muḥammad ‘Abduh that we cannot overlook:

1. His entry into Freemasonry, a fact confirmed even by his student, who also confirmed his receiving medals in Freemasonry from the American cultural attaché at the Lebanese Masonic lodge.

2. His siding with Cromer against Khedive Abbas... his high standing with the English and their intervention to support him in every predicament he faced. They also designated him for the position of Muftī in Egypt and confined him to it.
3. Muḥammad ‘Abduh was a frequenter of Princess Nazli's salon, as we mentioned before. Photographs of Muḥammad ‘Abduh have been preserved showing him mingling with some European women and other dissolute women of Egypt at that time.
4. Cromer used to say to Khedive Abbas: "Allow me to say that as long as Great Britain has influence in Egypt, Shaykh Muḥammad ‘Abduh will be the Muftī until he dies."

It is stated in Cromer's book "Modern Egypt":

"As for us, we do not differ, and we have no doubt that Muḥammad ‘Abduh was a Freemason, an agent of Britain, an apostate, an atheist regarding the dīn of Allāh. We agree with the Shaykh of al-Azhar of his time, Shaykh ‘Alīsh (may Allāh have mercy on him), who openly declared him a kāfir and explained the aspects of his apostasy—may Allāh fight him—and may He forgive the good, sincere, but gullible people who were deceived by him."

"Indeed, Muḥammad ‘Abduh was the founder of a modern school very similar to the one founded by Sayyid Aḥmad Khān in India, the founder of Aligarh University."

The English Orientalist Hamilton Gibb says in his book "Whither Islam":

"On the other hand, we find that Shaykh Muḥammad ‘Abduh built a bridge over the chasm separating dry traditional education from Egyptian education, which was subject to the rationalist school of thought that had invaded the East and West."

I have no doubt that Muḥammad ‘Abduh's tafsīr of the Qur’ān, conveyed by his student Muḥammad Riḍā, indicates a spiritual defeat in the face of the crushing pressure of the West upon the chests of Muslims and a deference towards Orientalists. He interpreted angels as natural forces, explained their prostration to Ādam as the subjugation of earthly forces to him, interpreted jinn as microbes, the Abābīl birds as creatures like mosquitoes and flies, and the stones of Sijjīl as germs!

So where did Muḥammad ‘Abduh stand in relation to the words of Allāh the Exalted: {And do not incline toward those who do wrong, lest you be touched by the Fire, and you have no protectors besides Allāh, nor will you be helped.} (Hūd: 113).

The School of Aḥmad Khān Bahādur in India:

The presence of sincere, mujāhid scholars in the Indian subcontinent, such as Shaykh Aḥmad ibn ‘Irfān ash-Shahīd (1842), who ignited the flame of enthusiasm and Jihād in the hearts of believers in the first quarter of the nineteenth century, alarmed Britain. Therefore, it resorted to cultivating religious protégés to erase the idea of Jihād from minds, inventing several schools such as:

The Qādiyāniyyah, presenting Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad as a prophet who abrogates Jihād.

Aḥmad Khān, the secularist who also called for the abolition of Jihād.

This Aḥmad Khān was born in 1817 in Delhi, then worked in the service of Britain as a secretary in the criminal justice system in 1837. When Muslims undertook Jihād in 1857, Aḥmad Khān stood against the Islamic revolution, saved many Britons from being killed, paid a huge sum of his money to rescue them, and wrote a book on the causes of the revolution in which he blamed the ignorant Muslims.

Britain awarded him the Star of India medal. In 1875, he established the "English Oriental College" in Aligarh, now known as the "Islamic University." He perished in 1898.

Among Aḥmad Khān's most significant attempts:

Establishing a new religion in which the three religions (Islām, Christianity, Judaism) would meld.

Attempting to prove the authenticity of the Gospels, about which he wrote a book in 1862 called "Tabyān al-Kalām."

He advocated the naturalist, materialist doctrine, and said that all prophets were naturalists who did not believe in God—and refuge is sought in Allāh—and he called himself "the Naturalist."

He claimed that prophethoods are acquired through spiritual exercises.

Abolition of the obligation of Jihād.

The School of Waḥīduddīn Khān in Delhi, India:

Waḥīduddīn Khān praised his predecessor Aḥmad Khān. Among his ideas found in his books were:

1. The call to establish a modern international center, on the condition that it completely avoids politics.
2. Leaving the world to its people and reminding people only of death.
3. Abolishing Jihād, calling for abandoning confrontation with the West, and advocating submission, humiliation, and patience.
4. That prophets were sent to corrupt believers.

The English Orientalist (Gibb) Writes About the Islamic World in 1932:

During the first third of the twentieth century, the Jews and their Western allies succeeded in various fields in the Islamic world...

They overthrew the Ottoman Khilāfah, dragged Turkey into World War I, shattered it, and divided its possessions. Arab leaders, in their naivety, sided with the Allies, especially the English, against their Muslim Ottoman Turkish brothers, thinking they would help them establish an independent Arab kingdom! But the realities previously indicated by the Qur'ān were otherwise! Lawrence (the British intelligence agent), who orchestrated the Great Arab Revolt against the Ottomans to aid Britain, which had lavished false promises on Sharīf Ḥusayn, the then governor of Makkah and the Ḥijāz, says: "I knew that if we won the war, our promises to the Arabs would become dead letters. Had I been an honorable advisor to the Arabs, I would have advised them to return to their homes. The leaders of the Arab movement understood foreign policy with a tribal, Bedouin understanding. The British and French were carrying out bold maneuvers relying on the Arabs' naivety, weakness, and simplicity of heart and mind, and they had trust in the enemy. I am most proud that English blood was not shed in the thirty battles we fought, because all the countries under our control were not worth, in my view, the death of a single Englishman..."

Weizmann later said: "Lawrence rendered great services to the Jews!"

Then the West, through education, began to inject venom into the veins of this Ummah. It corrupted the youth, corrupted women, destroyed family structures, introduced Masonic and Rotary clubs into the elite of societies, and spread fusūq through theater, cinema, and the media...

The English Orientalist Gibb says in his book "The Whither of the Islamic World": "Regarding 'Education': Pay attention to European colonialism's interest in education, and to their open declaration of their aims behind it. Remember the insistence and coercion practiced by America today to re-distort what has already been distorted of educational curricula, and the convening by Arab and Islamic governments, under American pressure, of dozens of conferences under the deceptive slogan: 'Developing Educational Curricula.' This is the only way to Europeanize and Westernize Muslim countries. The focus was strong on creating a class that definitively adopts a viewpoint over which religion has no authority. Then, it would be possible to evacuate their lands and hand over to them the reins of power, because they are an extension of the occupier's thought."!

He also says:

"Schools and institutes are not enough; they are but the first step. Attention must be turned to creating public opinion by relying on the press, for it is the most powerful and influential of European tools in the Islamic world. The editors of national newspapers are mostly progressives, and the newspapers are characterized by a predominantly secular tendency, as he sees it."!

He adds that education and the press have left Muslims largely non-religious:

"The Islamic world will, within a short period, become non-religious in all aspects of its life."

Gibb expresses his fears on two fronts:

1. Religious institutes.
2. Islamic movements: which he sees as developing with astonishing, amazing speed, and erupting suddenly before observers can discern from their indications anything that would cause them to be suspicious of them.

And he says: "Islamic movements lack nothing but leadership and the emergence of a Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn."!

The Leader of Missionaries (Zwemer) Describes the Muslims Desired by the West in 1933:

Zwemer, addressing missionaries at the Jerusalem Conference in 1933, says:

"Your mission is to take the Muslim out of Islām, so that he becomes a creature with no connection to Allāh, and consequently, no connection to the morals upon which nations depend in their lives. By doing so, you will be the vanguard of colonial conquest in the Islamic kingdoms. This you have done excellently over the past hundred years.

Read and reflect, and you will understand: that nothing has changed in the program of colonialism between the European Crusader Romans and the new American Zionist Romans. Except, perhaps, for what we have pointed out regarding the characteristics of the American cowboy, and his triad: foolishness, ignorance, and brutality... because he rushes the outcome, and because they are a dwarf people without history or civilization.

We have, in this era from the last third of the nineteenth century to the present day, eliminated all educational programs in the Islamic kingdoms, and we have spread in those regions centers of missionary activity, churches, societies, and Christian schools, those dominated by European and American states.

You have, by your means, prepared all minds in the Islamic kingdoms to accept treading the path that you have thoroughly paved.

You have prepared youth in the lands of Islām who do not know the connection to Allāh, nor do they want to know it. You have taken the Muslim out of Islām but have not brought him into Christianity. Consequently, the Muslim generation emerged according to what colonialism desired for it: not caring for great matters, loving comfort and laziness, and directing his concerns in the world only towards desires. If he accumulates wealth, it is for desires; and if he attains the highest positions, it is for the sake of desires that he generously spends the most precious of what he possesses."!

Zwemer also says:

"When colonial policy, since 1882 CE, eliminated educational programs in primary schools, it removed the Qur'ān from them, then Islamic history. Thus, it produced a generation that is neither Muslim, nor Christian, nor Jewish; a troubled generation, materialistic in its aims, not believing in a creed nor knowing truth, so that neither religion, nor dignity, nor the homeland has sanctity"!

Zwemer accurately described the generation during the nineteenth century and the first third of the twentieth century. But his prediction later failed, and Gibb's assumption, who believed the Muslim East would soon become secular, did not prove true.

Allāh – the Mighty and Majestic – was lying in wait for them. (For the Islamic Ṣaḥwah with its various schools arose, then it produced the Jihādī Ṣaḥwah, and the Ummah returned to seek salvation in the path of the Qur'ān).

{Indeed, those who disbelieve spend their wealth to avert [people] from the way of Allāh. So they will spend it; then it will be for them a [source of] regret; then they will be overcome. And those who have disbelieved - unto Jahannam they will be gathered.}
(Al-Anfāl: 36) (1)

The Nationalist Call and the Real Reasons Behind It:

The main reason: The West's attempt to take back the primary societal role from Islām as the sole bond and to substitute a new bond in its place, after the West's failure in the Crusades. So, it wanted to use the method of thought and tongue instead of the spear, to make it easier for the West to establish its foothold in our lands, especially after Napoleon's campaign in Egypt.

Muḥammad 'Alī Pasha and Ibrāhīm Pasha's ambition to create an Arab nationalist empire.

Getting rid of Muslim Turkey and eliminating it so that the West could inherit its possessions.

The Christians' attempt to get rid of Turkey because it applied the Jizyah to them and some exceptional duties, corresponding to Muslims paying Zakāh and performing military service to protect the Islamic state.

And out of a desire from the Christians to lead the societies in which they lived, direct their course, and become their masters and the elite of their people.

Historical Development of the Nationalist Idea:

Napoleon's campaign is considered the first point in the beginning of shifting the Arabs from Islām to nationalism. This idea fermented in Napoleon's mind following the resistance stirred by al-Azhar with the call of "Allāhu Akbar," and the West became convinced of this idea.

The French left Egypt in (1904) and Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha came. Muḥammad ‘Alī was an Albanian officer – who did not know Arabic – who came with the campaign sent by the Caliph to Egypt to resist Napoleon. Muḥammad ‘Alī was an ambitious and intelligent orphan, but he was illiterate, so he suffered from an inferiority complex due to his illiteracy. He wanted to civilize and develop Egypt, so he eliminated the Mamālīk and was proclaimed ruler of Egypt.

Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha and the French:

Muḥammad ‘Alī admired the French. Since his youth, he had a connection with a Frenchman named Leon (Lion). Then he brought Dr. Clot, the French physician, to Egypt to be his advisor. Clot suggested the idea of nationalism to him (Clot took care to instill in the students of the higher schools he managed the correct sense of Arab nationalism). Muḥammad ‘Alī began sending missions to France, and these missions returned carrying the seeds of the nationalist idea. Among them was Rifā‘ah al-Ṭaḥṭāwī, who stayed in Paris (1826 - 1831) and brought back the idea of the French nationalist revolution.

Ibrāhīm Pasha in Bilād ash-Shām:

Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha aspired to an Arab empire separate from Ottoman rule, and the West (the French in particular) made this appealing to him. So he sent his son Ibrāhīm Pasha, who occupied all of ash-Shām. Ibrāhīm's rule in Bilād ash-Shām lasted for seven years (1833 - 1840). These years had a profound impact on changing the course of events in ash-Shām for over a century.

So what did Ibrāhīm Pasha do in ash-Shām?

He abolished the Islamic rulings applied to Christians in ash-Shām and called for their equality with Muslims, as did his father in Egypt.

He encouraged missionary societies and their schools. As for his father in Egypt, his companions were always ambassadors, tourists, and missionaries. This encouragement of missionaries in ash-Shām resulted in:

The arrival of Protestant (American) missions, and among its prominent figures were [1]:

(Eli Smith), who worked tirelessly for Christianity from (1834-1857), moved the mission's printing press from Malta to Beirut. It began printing in Arabic and was the first press of its kind in Bilād al-Shām. Smith and his wife also established a girls' school in Beirut, the first of its kind in Bilād al-Shām.

(1) Note the early American attempts to infiltrate the region. They were unable to do so due to the strength of Britain, France, and other colonial powers at the time, until the opportunity arose and the time came for them to reap what their Protestant missionary ancestors, the Judaizing Christians, had sown.

Dr. Cornelius Van Dyck came as a doctor with the American mission and worked for 55 years in Bilād al-Shām. His efforts were perhaps the most valuable and influential individual foreign contributions to the cultural development of the country.

Nāṣīf al-Yāzījī (1800-1871) was a Lebanese Christian who worked with the American mission and in its printing press with Smith and Van Dyck. He and his son Ibrāhīm al-Yāzījī translated the Torah. His son Ibrāhīm was the first to establish the "Secret Society of Beirut" (Jam'īyyat Bayrūt al-Sirriyya), which had a nationalist character.

This Ibrāhīm was a Christian Freemason who lived between (1847-1906). He died in Egypt and was mourned by the Masonic lodges there. He was the author of the poem calling for revolution against the Turks:

Awaken and arise, O Arabs... The flood has surged until the knees are submerged.
Your destinies are lowly in the eyes of the Turks... Your rights are plundered at the hands of the Turks.

We shall seek our goal with the edge of the sword... Our purpose in its side shall not be frustrated.

Buṭrus al-Bustānī (1819-1883) was a Lebanese who worked as a translator at the American consulate in Beirut. He changed his religion from Maronite to Protestant due to his friendship with Smith and Van Dyck. The missionaries employed him as a teacher at the 'Abayh school. He translated the Torah with Smith, a task that took ten years. He published the dictionary "Muḥīṭ al-Muḥīṭ" and its abridged version "Quṭr al-Muḥīṭ," and "Dā'irat al-Ma'ārif lil-Bustānī" (Al-Bustānī's Encyclopedia).

During the strife of 1860 (between Christians and Druze in Lebanon), he published a magazine called "Nafīr Sūriya" (Syria's Clarion Call), advocating for national unity. In 1863, he founded "al-Madrasah al-Waṭaniyyah" (the National School), where he and Nāṣīf al-Yāzījī taught. In 1870, he launched a magazine called "al-Jinān" (The Gardens), a bi-monthly political and literary journal, with the slogan "Love of the homeland is part of faith." He also published the two newspapers "al-Jannah" (Paradise) and "al-Junaynah" (The Little Garden).

Al-Yāzījī and al-Bustānī are considered among the early pioneers of the idea of Arab nationalism. Their students established nationalist organizations that later bore fruit, resulting in this exclusion of Allāh's religion from life and the nurturing of pioneers who consider nationalism their supreme ideal, for which laws are made and sacrifices offered.

Among the fruits of the American mission, besides highlighting al-Yāzījī and al-Bustānī, was the establishment of the largest institute for nurturing nationalist thought, which is:

The American University of Beirut (1866):

Its name was initially the "Syrian Protestant College." Its first president was Daniel Bliss, an American clergyman with a doctorate in theology, who remained president of the university until 1902 and was succeeded by his son, Howard Bliss. The influence of the American University in the region is unparalleled in terms of nationalist thought. The university graduated generations of leaders of Bilād al-Shām for over a century. Among its professors known for fostering nationalist thought was Qusṭanṭīn Zurayq, under whom George Ḥabash studied.

The Catholic-Jesuit Mission: It established a lithographic press (1847) and founded the Yūsuf School, later known as the Université Saint-Joseph.

C - The Lazarists: They opened the ‘Ayn Ṭūrah College in Lebanon.

Nationalist Societies:

Among the activities undertaken by the missionary missions was the establishment of societies advocating nationalist thought, the most important of which were:

1. The Society of Arts and Sciences (1847):

Founded by the American missionary mission, headed by Smith, Van Dyck, al-Bustānī, and Nāṣīf al-Yāzījī. Within two years, its membership reached fifty, most of whom were Syrian Christians in Beirut. There was not a single Muslim or Druze among them. The society lasted for five years.

2. The Oriental Society (1850):

Founded by the Jesuits and supervised by Father Debrunner.

3. The Syrian Scientific Society (1857):

Its membership reached one hundred and fifty. In addition to its founders from the American mission's followers, some Muslims and Druze joined. It gained government recognition in 1868.

"The first voice to emerge for the Arab nationalist movement was that of Ibrāhīm al-Yāzījī, a member of the society, who recited a poem that took the form of a national anthem."

4. The Beirut Syrian Society (1875):

George Antonius says: "The first organized effort in the Arab nationalist movement dates back to the year 1875, i.e., two years before 'Abd al-Ḥamīd ascended to the throne, when five young men who had studied at the Syrian Protestant College – the American University – in Beirut formed a secret society. They were all Christians, but they realized the value of Muslims and Druze joining them. They managed to attract about twenty-two individuals from various religious sects, representing the chosen and enlightened elite of the country. Freemasonry had already entered Bilād al-Shām in the form known in Europe, and the founders of the secret society, through one of their colleagues, were able to win over the recently established Masonic lodge and involve it in their activities."

From this, we realize:

- That the beginning of organized nationalist work in Bilād al-Shām was through Christians.
- That these Christians were students or admirers of al-Bustānī and al-Yāzījī and were the fruit of the American mission's efforts.

- That among the founders was Ibrāhīm al-Yāzījī, author of the society's slogan: "We shall seek our goal with the edge of the sword... Our purpose in its side shall not be frustrated."
- Likewise, Fāris Nimr Pasha (a Lebanese Christian) and his brother-in-law Shāhīn Makāriyūs were among its founders. These three were well-known senior Freemasons.

So, the Masonic-Jewish hands were the ones that adopted the idea of Arab nationalism. These are the same hands that were simultaneously stirring Turanian nationalism, adopted by the Dönme Jews in Salonica, who held their meetings in the homes of Italian Jews.

And the one who inspired the idea of establishing the Secret Society of Beirut was a man named Ilyās Ḥabbālīn from the town of Dhūq Mikāyil. He was a French language teacher at the American University, teaching a class that included al-Yāzījī, Ya‘qūb Ṣarrūf, and Shāhīn Makāriyūs. The teacher was an admirer of the French Revolution.

It was suspected that Miḍḥat Pasha – a leader of Freemasonry, also known as Abū al-Aḥrār (Father of the Free) – was behind the formation of the society. A telegram sent by the British consul in June 1880 stated:

"Pamphlets inciting revolution have appeared in Beirut, and it is suspected that Miḍḥat is their originator." Miḍḥat was then the Wālī (governor) of Syria.

However, Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd's firmness and his monitoring of the society and its publications froze its activities. The most important of the society's publications was the third pamphlet, issued on December 31, 1880, which outlined their demands in four points:

- Granting Syria, including Lebanon, independence.
- Recognizing Arabic as an official language.

- Lifting censorship on freedom of education.
- Not sending Arab sons to fight with the Turks outside their countries.

Migration of Nationalist Advocates to Cairo:

As a result of Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd's campaign against secret nationalist societies, those early advocates of nationalism moved to Cairo, where the British Agent, Cromer, was entrenched. Christian families migrated to Cairo to disseminate secular ideas and the nationalist call from there, and to launch their fight against Turkey from there. Among the most prominent names that settled in Cairo were:

- Fāris Nimr and his brother-in-law Shāhīn Makāriyūs, owners of the daily newspaper al-Muqaṭṭam and the monthly magazine al-Muqtaṭaf, both of whom were Freemasons.
- Salīm Taqlā, who founded the daily newspaper al-Ahrām, which still exists today.
- Jurjī Zaydān: owner of Dār al-Hilāl publishing house and author of many works.
- Adīb Ishāq (director of the newspaper Miṣr) and Salīm Naqqāsh (director of the newspaper al-Tijārah). These two Christians worked under the direction of Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī, who founded these two newspapers.
- Rōz al-Yūsuf, who came from Bilād al-Shām and was a Christian. She feigned conversion to Islām and named herself Fāṭimah Yūsuf, but she named her newspaper after her old name, Rōz al-Yūsuf.
- Aḥmad Fāris al-Shidyāq – a Maronite who converted to Protestantism at the hands of the American mission, then came to Egypt and published the newspaper al-Jawā'ib, then converted to Islām at the hands of the Bey of Tunis. End quote. [1].

Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī, Muḥammad 'Abduh, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Kawākibī:

Here, I must refer to three preachers who dressed as scholars and are renowned worldwide as advocates of Islamic unity, yet at the same time, they attacked Turkey and sought to demolish the edifice of the Khilāfah. They are:

Al-Afghānī: He embraced many Christians and Jews. His personal physician was a Jew named Hārūn. His death was attended by Hārūn and another Christian named Jurjī Kanjī. He stayed in London as a guest of Mr. Blunt, the British author of "The Future of Islam." When the Caliph tried to prevent al-Afghānī from leaving Turkey, the British ambassador intervened on his behalf, and he left. Al-Afghānī was the head of the Eastern Masonic Lodge.

As for Muḥammad 'Abduh: He was a close friend of Cromer, who stated that Shaykh 'Abduh would remain Muftī of Egypt as long as Britain was there. He was a Freemason and a regular at Princess Nāzli Fāḍil's salon. Among his students were: Aḥmad Luṭfī al-Sayyid, the secularist who openly declared his kufr (disbelief) in his newspaper al-Jarīdah; Sa'd Zaghlūl; and Qāsim Amīn (author of the book "The Liberation of Women"). These individuals had a profound impact on the course of events in Egypt.

And 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Kawākibī (1849-1903): Most of his friends and students were Muslims, Jews, and Christians. His lessons were held at the Splendid Bar café. He called for pledging allegiance to an Arab Caliph in his book "Umm al-Qurā." He authored another book titled "Ṭabā'ī' al-Istibdād" (The Natures of Despotism). He advocated for equality between religions to achieve national cohesion:

"Let us manage our worldly life and let religions govern only the afterlife. Let us unite on a common word, which is: Long live the nation, long live the homeland, let us live free and cherished." "These nations of Europe and America have been guided by science to methods of national unity without religious [unity], racial harmony without sectarian [harmony], and political connection without administrative [connection]."

These three [1], their ideas were a prelude to secularism. Their views, as Albert Hourani says, were a bridge over which secularism crossed into Islām.

They shattered the psychological barrier between kāfirīn (disbelievers) and Muslims, and Muslim souls became receptive to imported ideas, foremost among them nationalism. Albert Hourani says:

"It is true that whoever reads Muḥammad ‘Abduh’s debates with Renan and Farah Anṭūn senses that he wanted to erect a dam against the secular trend to protect Islamic society from its flood. But what happened was that this dam became a bridge for secularism, which crossed over it into the Islamic world to occupy one position after another."

Then came Muḥammad ‘Abduh’s students to deepen this current and to lead with their secularism.

For example, Luṭfī al-Sayyid: deepened regional patriotism and championed the call for Pharaonic history.

And Sa’d Zaghlūl came: Cromer handed him the Ministry of Education so that he would advocate the Pharaonic regional national trend on both political and social levels. Cromer says he handed him the Ministry of Education because he was one of Shaykh ‘Abduh’s students.

And Qāsim Amīn came: to clarify the generalities and elaborate on the essence of what Shaykh ‘Abduh advocated, calling for the removal of the ḥijāb and the stripping of modesty from women's lives. Even the book "The Liberation of Women" earned Shaykh 'Abduh's admiration. He and his student Luṭfī reviewed its draft in Geneva in 1897, as mentioned by Luṭfī al-Sayyid and Qāsim Amīn.

[1] The three are: 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Kawākibī (the Syrian), and the two Shaykhs Jamāl al-Dīn (al-Afghānī) and his student Muḥammad 'Abduh (the Egyptian). It is regrettable that we were taught at all stages of education in our countries, as children and youth, that they were pioneers of reform, enlightenment, and liberation... Indeed, I remember that 'Abduh and al-Afghānī were considered part of the reformist school in the curricula of the Muslim Brotherhood and the Islamic Movement, and they were mentioned with praise and adornment... There is no power nor strength except in Allāh!

Therefore, the fiqhī (jurisprudential) chapters in the book are attributed to Shaykh Muḥammad 'Abduh – as is thought – because Qāsim Amīn had no knowledge of these issues.

In this context, Ismā'īl Maẓhar, owner of Majallat al-'Uṣūr (Al-'Uṣūr Magazine) and Luṭfī al-Sayyid's brother-in-law, is mentioned. Likewise, one must point to a finger of sabotage, which is 'Abd al-'Azīz Fahmī – Luṭfī al-Sayyid's close friend. Their third friend was Ṭāhā Ḥusayn, who was expelled from the university due to his explicit kufr (disbelief) in his book "On Pre-Islamic Poetry." Consequently, Luṭfī al-Sayyid resigned from the ministry (he was Minister of Education) in protest of Ṭāhā Ḥusayn's expulsion from the Egyptian University.

This group is the one that emptied the Egyptian people of Islām, replacing it with new ideas of Pharaonism, secularism, and irreligious nationalism. The friendship between these individuals and Shaykh 'Abduh might have been an attempt to bring this group closer to Islām. However, he was unable to do so after he became lenient – in order to attract them – regarding many Shari'ah rules that define al-walā' (loyalty), al-'adāwah (enmity), friendship, and boycott. He issued many fatāwā (legal edicts) to remove barriers between himself and Cromer on one hand, and between himself and this group on the other, such as the Transvaal fatwá, and his fatwá on mirrors and divorce, in addition to interpreting many Ghaib (unseen) verses in the Qur'ān in a way that almost removes them from the Arabic language and completely negates their content.

Cromer's 1906 report to the British government regarding Muḥammad 'Abduh's party stated:

"...These individuals are desirous of promoting the interests of their compatriots and co-religionists, but they are not influenced by the call of Pan-Islamism. Their program – if I have understood it correctly – includes cooperation with Europeans, not opposition to them, in introducing Western civilization to their country."

Cromer also says:

"I greatly doubt that my friend Muḥammad 'Abduh was anything but an Agnostic."

And his English friend Blunt says:

"I fear to say that Muḥammad 'Abduh – despite being the Grand Muftī – has no more confidence in Islām than I have in Catholicism."

The Nationalist Call at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century

The most truthful word regarding Muḥammad 'Abduh and his shaykh is that of Shaykh Muṣṭafá Ṣabrī, the Shaykh al-Islām of the Ottoman State:

"Perhaps Shaykh Muḥammad 'Abduh and his friend, or his shaykh, Jamāl al-Dīn, intended to play the role in Islām that Luther and Calvin – the leaders of Protestantism – played in Christianity. However, they did not succeed in establishing a modern religion for Muslims. Instead, their efforts were confined to assisting disguised atheism under the banner of progress and renewal."

Shaykh al-Islām Muṣṭafá Ṣabrī also states:

"As for the reformist awakening attributed to Muḥammad ʿAbduḥ, its essence is that he shook al-Azhar from its religious stagnation, thereby bringing many Azharīs steps closer to irreligion, while not bringing the irreligious a single step closer to religion. He was the one who introduced Freemasonry into al-Azhar through his shaykh, Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī, just as he was the one who encouraged Qāsim Amīn to promote unveiling (sufūr) in Egypt."

As for the advocates of Arab nationalism, in addition to the Christians of Shām in Cairo who took charge of directing thought throughout Egypt, there were also some Syrian Christians working in the other center, Paris. Among them was Najīb ʿĀzūrī. He was a Syrian Christian who, in 1904, founded the "League of the Arab Fatherland" (ʿUṣbat al-Waṭan al-ʿArabī) society in Paris. Its declared objective was the liberation of Shām and Iraq from Turkish control. In 1905, he published the book "The Awakening of the Arab Nation" (Yaqzat al-Ummah al-ʿArabiyyah) in French. In collaboration with French writers, he launched the magazine "Arab Independence" (Al-Istiqlāl al-ʿArabī), the first issue of which appeared in April 1907; it ceased publication after the declaration of the constitution in 1908.

1. Note the English-European focus on principal matters, a focus repeated today by American colonialism. Among the most important of these are:

- Diluting the issue of al-walāʾ wa-l-barāʾ (loyalty and disavowal), removing psychological barriers, and obscuring the clarity of Sharīʿah rulings regarding the distinction between the believer and the kāfir.
- The insistence on corrupting women as a gateway to corrupting the family, society, and the entire ummah.

Sāṭiʿ al-Ḥuṣārī, one of the leading nationalist writers, says: "Nationalism began with Najīb ʿĀzūrī, who placed his Syrian Arab hopes first in France and then in England." Najīb ʿĀzūrī's activities were a prelude to the Paris Conference of 1931.

The Paris Conference of 1913

Many writers on Arab nationalism consider the Paris Conference to be the foundation of modern nationalism. There were 24 participants, half of whom were Christians and half Muslims. Anīs al-Ṣāyigh says of it that it was devoid of demands for independence so as not to embarrass some European countries that were encouraging the nationalist movement and providing it with funds. Al-Zahrāwī, the president of the conference, stated to the correspondent of the French newspaper Le Temps (al-Ṭān) that the conference had no connection with non-Ottoman Arab provinces – meaning North Africa – as France was supervising the conference and ruling North Africa. He thanked the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The conference refused to include Egypt. They demanded that Arabic be made an official language in Arab countries, and the Unionist government was forced to negotiate with them by including three Arab ministers and five Arab governors in the state apparatus.

Important Factors in the Development of the Nationalist Movement

There were important factors that had a significant impact on fueling the fire of Arab nationalism in the first quarter of the twentieth century. Among the most important of these factors were:

1. The Committee of Union and Progress (Jam‘iyyat al-Ittiḥād wa-l-Taraqqī) seizing power in Turkey after the overthrow of Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd on April 27, 1909. The call for Turkish Turanian nationalism began. Among its philosophers was Khālida Edib – a Jewess – who later became Minister of Education, and Ziya Gökalp, a student of the Jew Durkheim and another Jew, Moiz Alp. It is known that all the leaders of the Committee of Union and Progress were Freemasons without exception, and not one of them was of Muslim origin or Turkish ethnicity. Enver was Polish; Javid was a Dönme Jew; Carasso was a Spanish Jew. The Committee of Union and Progress began imposing the process of Turkification on all Arab and other provinces.

Turkish was imposed in government offices (Dīwāns), schools, and curricula. The process of Turkification also began in state apparatuses. This became evident in the elections for the Chamber of Deputies (Majlis al-Mab'ūthān), which was elected after the declaration of the constitution in 1908. The Committee of Union and Progress supervised the elections to ensure the results favored the Turkish race. The result was that 150 Turks and 60 Arabs were elected, while Arabs outnumbered Turks in population by a ratio of 5:2. Amidst the joy of shackling Sultan 'Abd al-Ḥamīd's hands, the "Ottoman Arab Fraternity Society" (Jam'iyat al-Ikhā' al-'Arabī al-'Uthmānī) was established on September 2, 1908, a month after the constitution. This society lasted for eight months before being dissolved by the Unionist Committee.

The forced Turkification process at the hands of the Dönmeḥ Jews led to violent reactions from the Arabs, including the establishment of secret and public societies.

2. The formation of public and secret societies calling for Arab nationalism and the separation of Arab countries from the Turks, at least through self-rule within the Ottoman State, such that Arabs would manage their internal affairs like education, economy, and culture, while participating with the Ottoman State in external matters such as defense and others.
3. The appointment of Jamāl Pasha as governor of Bilād al-Shām, with Khālida Edib – the Jewess – as his confidential secretary. Jamāl Pasha was forced to appease the Arabs and treat them well at the beginning of the Great War (World War I), lest the Arabs join the Allied camp against Turkey. Jamāl Pasha took command of the Fourth Army in Syria. He sensed the presence of secret nationalist gatherings in Bilād al-Shām and knew that the Arabs were fed up with the actions of the Unionists and their Turkish chauvinism. So, the Arabs were looking for a way out, and their leaders contacted France. This led Jamāl Pasha to raid the French embassies in both Beirut and Damascus and seize documents proving contact between the leaders of organizations and societies with France, calling for Syria's secession from the Ottomans. However, Jamāl Pasha chose to turn a blind eye to the issue, hoping the Arabs would side with Turkey in the war.

After Jamāl sensed Sharīf Ḥusayn's intention to enter the war against Turkey on Britain's side, Jamāl Pasha became enraged and ordered the execution of 11 Arab figures on August 21, 1915, after a military trial in ʿĀlayh, Lebanon. On May 6, 1916, 21 other Arab figures were hanged, including ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Zahrāwī (president of the Paris Conference and member of the Turkish Senate), and Salīm al-Jazāʿirī, assistant to ʿAzīz al-Miṣrī in the Qaḥṭāniyya Society. This also took place for the second time in ʿĀlayh.

These executions caused a violent shock in the Arab world. Jamāl Pasha carried out the executions despite the intercession of Sharīf Ḥusayn and his son Fayṣal, but he did not listen to them. Prince Fayṣal ibn al-Ḥusayn was in Damascus at the time; he threw his kūfiyyah to the ground, stomped on it, and said: "Death has become sweet, O Arabs!"

4. Sharīf Ḥusayn's entry into the World War on Britain's side against Turkey. Sharīf Ḥusayn had remained in Turkey for sixteen years, and Sultan ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd feared him. After the declaration of the constitution in 1908, the Committee of Union and Progress chose him to be the Emir of Makkah, an appointment ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd opposed.

The constitution was declared on July 24, 1908, after long-term conferences managed by members of the Committee of Union and Progress, most of whom were Dönme Jews or Judaized Turks manipulated by the fingers of Freemasonry in the lodges of Salonica. The Committee used to hold its meetings in the homes of Jews of Italian nationality.

Seton-Watson wrote:

"The prominent fact in the formation of the Committee of Union and Progress is that it was non-Turkish and non-Islamic. Since its establishment, not a single member of pure Turkish origin appeared among its leaders. Enver Pasha was the son of a Polish renegade. Javid belonged to the well-known Jewish sect (Dönme). Carasso was one of the Spanish Jews residing in the city of Salonica. Talat Pasha was of gypsy origin who embraced Islām as a religion. As for Ahmed Rıza, one of their leaders during that period, he was half-gypsy in addition to being a follower of Comte's philosophical school." Seton-Watson adds: "The masterminds behind the movement were Jews or Muslims of Jewish origin. Financial aid came to them through the (Dönme) and wealthy Salonican Jews. They also received financial aid from international – or quasi-international – capitalism from Vienna, Budapest, Berlin, Paris, and London."

And Aubrey Herbert says:

"The Jews of Salonica, known as the (Dönme) – meaning the apostates – were the true partners of the Turkish revolution. These are of Jewish race, but their creed may not be originally Jewish. The common belief among people is that they are Muslims in name, but in reality, they are followers of the Torah of Moses. During the period we are discussing, no one knew anything about them, except for a few scholars specializing in Near Eastern studies. And no one dared to predict that this Jewish group known as the (Dönme) would play a major role in a revolution that had dangerous consequences in the course of history."

Sharīf Ḥusayn was looking for an opportunity to rid himself of Turkish rule, especially since he sensed that the Unionists in 1914 wanted to get rid of him.

His son, ‘Abdullāh ibn Ḥusayn, was then a deputy in the Turkish parliament. He contacted Kitchener (the British High Commissioner in Egypt) and Ronald Storrs (the Oriental Secretary at the British Agency in Cairo). He informed Storrs of the strong aversion between his father and the Turks and asked him about the possibility of Britain siding with the Sharīf if he declared war on Turkey. However, he received no encouragement from them. Kitchener told him: "It is not probable that Britain will stand by your father."

Prince ‘Abdullāh himself was a member of a secret society and believed in the benefits of Anglo-Arab understanding and was enthusiastic about it. The Great War broke out in August 1914. ‘Abdullāh was eager to declare war on Turkey, while Prince Fayṣal favored siding with them. In 1915, Fayṣal visited Damascus and Istanbul. In Damascus, he joined the "Al-‘Arabiyyah al-Fatāh" society and swore to support it.

The Sharīf declared war on Turkey on Monday, June 5, 1916. (And Subḥāna Rabbī! The Arabs' defeat was on Monday, June 5, 1967).

From near the grave of Ḥamzah ibn ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib – raḍiya Allāhu ‘anhu – in Madīnah, he declared war after Britain had promised him the independence of the Arab lands and his coronation as king over them. Kitchener had become the British Secretary of State for War, and McMahon took over as the British High Commissioner in Egypt. The well-known correspondence (the Hussein-McMahon Correspondence) occurred between him and McMahon, and they promised him the kingship of the Arab lands after their independence.

Sharīf Ḥusayn rushed with all his energy to fuel the fire of Arab zeal against the Turks. The Turks were defeated, and the Sykes-Picot Agreement occurred, dividing the Arab lands between Britain and France. Palestine was given to the Jews through the Balfour Declaration. The "beautiful" reward for Sharīf Ḥusayn was that Britain exiled him for six years and stripped him of his kingdom. The shock was severe to the Sharīf's nerves until paralysis struck him, and his body wasted away in sorrow and pain. Throughout his life, he poured out his wrath on McMahon and Lloyd George – the well-known British minister.

George Antonius says:

"I visited him months before his death in 1931 CE. Paralysis had shrunken him, and his handsome face had turned white with the pallor of death. He said to me: 'The English, my son, are honorable people in their words and deeds, in good times and bad: honorable, except for His Excellency, the venerable and intrepid Lloyd George, who is more like a clown and a fox. I say: a fox, God forbid your station! May Allāh have mercy on His Excellency Kitchener.'"

This was the sorrowful, painful result of cooperating with the English. And Allāh the Almighty spoke the truth:

{O you who have believed, if you obey those who disbelieve, they will turn you back on your heels, and you will become losers.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 149).

Some truthful, wise individuals had warned Sharīf Ḥusayn of the consequences of English treachery and this expected catastrophe. Shakīb Arslān wrote to the Sharīf when he heard of his intention to invade Syria with the Allied armies, saying: "Are you fighting Arabs with Arabs, O Emir, so that the fruit of the blood of their killer and their killed is England's seizure of the Arabian Peninsula, France's seizure of Syria, and the Jews' seizure of Palestine?"

Lawrence says in "Seven Pillars of Wisdom":

"I knew that if we won the war, our promises to the Arabs would become dead letters. Had I been an honorable advisor to the Arabs, I would have advised them to return to their homes. The leaders of the Arab movement understood foreign policy in a tribal, Bedouin manner. The British and French were carrying out bold maneuvers, relying on the Arabs' naivety, weakness, simplicity of heart and thought, and their trust in the enemy. I am most proud that English blood was not shed in the thirty battles I fought, because all the countries subject to us were not worth, in my view, the death of a single Englishman."

And Weizmann says, "Lawrence rendered us great services." This is the Lawrence they used to call – the uncrowned king of the Arabs.

The Committee of Union and Progress came to power and was relieved of the terrible ghoul that had long disturbed its repose and kept it sleepless (‘Abd al-Ḥamīd). Islamic Turkey became a puppet in the hands of Jewry, manipulated as it wished and whenever it wanted.

Its provinces became an open preserve for the Western wolves, enemies of Islam, and this mighty giant, the Ottoman State, was devoured piece by piece.

The West first swallowed the Balkan states: Austria, Hungary, Bosnia, and Herzegovina in October 1908 – that is, after the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) took power and only two months after the declaration of the constitution. Bulgaria seceded, Italy attacked Libya in the autumn of 1911, and then the Balkan War broke out in 1912. In these few years, the Ottoman State lost all its provinces in Europe (except for Eastern Thrace). It also lost that part of Libya consisting of the provinces of Tripolitania and Benghazi.

Turkey withdrew from Libya through an overt conspiracy of treason, evident to anyone with eyes. We should not fail to mention that Italian Jews were the masters of the Masonic lodges in Salonica, and in the homes of these Italian Jews, the meetings of the Committee of Union and Progress were held. So it is not surprising that the Committee of Union and Progress gave Libya as a modest gift to Italy in gratitude for their previous significant service.

In addition to this loss, Crete was lost, and Turkey's budget was groaning under the burden of military expenditures.

Nationalism after the First World War (1914-1918)

The Arabs' stance alongside the Allies against Muslim Turkey is considered a major turning point in nationalist thought and rallying on the basis of nationalism. The English never dreamed that the Arabs would stand with them, as kuffār, against their fellow Muslims in religion and creed, the Muslim Turks.

Lawrence (the British intelligence officer and "King of the Arabian Desert," as they call him) says:

"All the way to Syria, I was thinking and wondering: Will nationalism one day overcome religious sentiment? Will national belief overcome religious beliefs? More clearly: Will political ideals replace revelation and inspiration, and will Syria replace its religious ideal with its national ideal?"

The West considers this stance a turning point towards a new phase in nationalist thinking.

The Economist wrote in June 1962, under the title "Islam versus Nationalism," the following:

"Since the First World War, the Arabs have put nationalism first when they fought alongside the English – the kuffār – to liberate themselves from the Muslim Turks. With the exception of the Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn), there are no politically-minded people in the Arab world today who place the community of Islamic states above their Arab nationalism."

But after the First World War, although the nationalist experience was bitter, a new factor emerged: the heavy burden of colonialism weighing down the Arab world. This factor became a new string played by nationalist advocates and thinkers, especially after the increase in Jewish immigration to Palestine and the outbreak of the 1936 revolt in Palestine.

There are prominent points between the First and Second World Wars that led to an increase in nationalist thinking, the most important of which are:

British and French colonialism, which brought with it:

Secularism (lā-dīniyyah) into the state apparatus, and the elevation of a socially fragmented, morally unrestrained class, ready for hypocrisy, burning incense, and lighting candles for the new ruler. This class became the new colonizer, even though it was composed of people from the region.

The advocacy of nationalist ideas as an alternative to Islam, as a basis for thought and assembly, and the alienation from the religious direction, drawing lessons from the bitter, dark history of clergymen in medieval Europe.

The tune of liberation from colonialism became rich material for classes resentful of Islam, who wanted to portray certain periods of Turkish rule as an image of Islam representing stagnation, backwardness, and decline!!

The abolition of the Caliphate (al-Khilāfah) at the hands of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, and the subsequent serious consideration of establishing an Islamic activist organization to restore the Caliphate, and the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn) movement under Ḥasan al-Bannā.

3- The emergence of nationalist thought in the form of organizations led by Christians, and the rise of the Baʿth Party, Arab nationalists, and Syrian nationalists to the surface. The American University was a warm incubator for many of these ideas. End quote.

Let us examine a model of Arab nationalist thought and its political methodology, similar examples of which flourished in the Arab and Islamic world:

The Arab Socialist Ba‘th Party:

The Socialist Ba‘th Party was formed from two parties:

- 1- The Arab Ba‘th Party: Founded by al-Arsūzī and ‘Aflaq.
- 2- The Arab Socialist Party: Founded in 1938 by ‘Uthmān al-Ḥawrānī, its leadership later passed to Akram al-Ḥawrānī. Akram al-Ḥawrānī had joined the Syrian Nationalist Party in 1936 and withdrew from it in 1938 to join the Arab Socialist Youth Party.

On January 26, 1952, the first and second parties merged to form the Arab Socialist Ba‘th Party.

The Arab Ba‘th Party:

There is disagreement about the founder; some say Michel ‘Aflaq and Ṣalāḥ al-Bīṭār, while others say Zakī al-Arsūzī. However, the February 23 movement led by Ṣalāḥ Jadīd, the Nuṣayrī, in Syria in 1966, established al-Arsūzī as the spiritual father of the party. The Ba‘th is the heir to the "League of Nationalist Action" (‘Uṣbat al-‘Amal al-Qawmī), which was the organizational nucleus for both ‘Aflaq and al-Arsūzī. This league existed from 1932 to 1939. (1) (Al-Dhakhā’ir al-‘Āmm: vol. 1, pp. 882-889). In 1939, al-Arsūzī withdrew from it and formed the Arab Nationalist Party.

As for Zakī al-Arsūzī: he was a Nuṣayrī man, an atheist, who did not speak Arabic! Influenced by the principles of the French Revolution and Nazism, especially Nietzsche's book "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" regarding the death of God and the emergence of the Superman. He began learning Arabic after 1940! Al-Arsūzī considered the Arab Jāhiliyyah his highest ideal and regarded it as the golden Arab era.

Sāmī al-Jundī says: "I discussed the Qur'ān with him in 1946, and he criticized my religious inclination."

Principles of the Ba‘th Party:

Derived from the principles of the Nationalist Party formed by al-Arsūzī in 1939, whose symbol was the tiger.

1. Arabs are one nation.
2. The Arabs have one leader who emerges from the capabilities of the Arab nation, representing and expressing it.
3. Arabism (al-‘Urūbah) is our national conscience, the source of sanctities; from it, high ideals emanate, and according to it, the value of things is determined.
4. The Arab is the master of destiny. Al-Arsūzī interpreted this by quoting the Gospel: "Not a hair of your head will fall without the will of your Father in heaven."

Al-Jundī says:

"On November 29, 1940, we were in a room, and al-Arsūzī said: 'I think we should establish a party and call it the Arab Ba‘th Party.'"

"The principles of the Nationalist Party became the very same principles of the Arab Ba‘th Party."

Sāmī al-Jundī also says:

"We were rebels who revolted against all old values, enemies of everything humans had agreed upon; we disbelieved in all rituals, relationships, and religions."

"We were accused of atheism, and that was also true, despite all the justifications the Ba‘thists later claimed."

As for Michel 'Aflaq:

In March 1949, Ḥusnī al-Zaʿīm came to power, and the Baʿth supported him. Then they disagreed with him, and he threw Michel 'Aflaq in prison. 'Aflaq wrote a plea for clemency and was released. Then al-Ḥinnāwī came after Ḥusnī al-Zaʿīm and chose Michel as Minister of Education. He seized this opportunity to send Baʿthists on study missions to France; they returned and took over universities and administrations.

The conflict was intense among the party leaders, to the extent that in the 1955 elections for the Regional Congress, they were saying, "'Aflaq is an English spy, al-Ḥawrānī is French, and al-Biṭār worked for more than one state."

As for accusations of theft and moral crimes, they were too numerous to mention.

Here we note some observations:

1. The party was a haven where all those resentful of Islam or ambitious for power gathered. The Nuṣayrīs noticed it and joined it to be a ladder to their Nuṣayrī state. Ismāʿīlīs like Sāmī al-Jundī and 'Abd al-Karīm al-Jundī also joined it. And Druze: like Salīm Ḥaṭṭūm. And Jews: like Aḥmad Rabāḥ, who was the head of the party in Damascus. And Eli Cohen: the Israeli intelligence officer who went to Argentina, befriended Amīn al-Ḥāfiẓ, then entered Syria under the name Kāmil Amīn Thābit. He lived in the Abū Rummānah district of Damascus, and his apartment became the fortified stronghold where Baʿth leaders took refuge. Above Cohen's bed, Salīm Ḥaṭṭūm and 'Abd al-Karīm Zahr al-Dīn toasted victory on the day of the Baʿthist coup (March 8, 1963). Cohen was offered a ministry, but he consulted Ben-Gurion, the Prime Minister of Israel, who did not approve. He was called the "First Revolutionary Youth" and was the only civilian allowed to enter airports and military bases. Finally, the Indian embassy discovered he was Jewish through the wireless signals he sent daily to Israel. It was an international scandal. Cohen was tried, and those who tried him were his protégés and mentees. Perhaps he was promised release if he concealed the calamities of the ruling Baʿth Party. Salīm

Ḥāṭūm was the head of the military court that tried him. The case was swiftly closed, and Cohen was executed to bury in his chest the tragedies and misfortunes of the Baʿthist youths managed by international Jewry through women and wine.

2. The founders of the Baʿth Party were not originally Muslims. Zakī al-Arsūzī was a Nuṣayrī atheist, and Michel ʿAflaq was a Christian – it was said he was of Greek origin.

3. The principles of the Baʿth Party are clear kufr (disbelief): "Arabism (al-ʿUrūbah) is the source of sanctities; from it, high ideals emanate, and according to it, the value of things is determined. The Arab is the master of destiny." Thus, the high ideals are Arabism, not Islam or the Qurʾān and Sunnah.

4. The early followers of the Baʿth were atheists, enemies of all religions. Sāmī al-Jundī said in his book "Al-Baʿth": "We were Khawārij (dissenters/outsideers) against the laws that people had agreed upon, so we destroyed them all."

5. He also says: "Despite its claims of nationalism and patriotism, the party did not prepare a study on the Palestinian issue, the most dangerous Arab issue in the modern era."

6. The Nuṣayrīs climbed the Baʿth ladder and managed to take over the country militarily and civilly. On February 22, 1966, Ṣalāḥ Jadīd – the Nuṣayrī – removed Ahl al-Sunnah elements from positions of power. In 1970, when Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad came with the "Corrective Movement," he made the state purely Nuṣayrī.

7. Nationalist parties do not have an ideology (ʿaqīdah) regarding the universe, man, and life. Therefore, they remained merely a framework without substance. Thus, they were forced to fill their ideological vacuum with Marxism and socialism. Consequently, all nationalist parties became: "Arab in framework and appearance, communist in reality and essence." This was acknowledged by Jalāl al-Sayyid in his book "The Reality of Arab Nationalism," stating that a spontaneous current formulated economic issues because the dregs had emerged under the guise of progressivism and socialism, and that communism is the reality of this current.

8. The party committed suicide as soon as it came to power. In 1965 in Syria, Michel 'Aflaq criticized the military's dominance over the party and the exclusion of civilians from the party's central committees. 'Aflaq was expelled; indeed, he and the other founder, Ṣalāḥ al-Bīṭār, were sentenced to death. Al-Bīṭār was then pursued until the Nuṣayrīs assassinated him in his exile in Paris in 1981. As for 'Aflaq, he was embraced by the Iraqi Ba'th after it came to power in the 1968 coup against 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Ārif. His student, Ṣaddām Ḥusayn, who became Vice President and then President of the Republic of Iraq, brought him in.

Ṣaddām Ḥusayn was asked in a newspaper interview printed and distributed in Jordan in 1981: "What is your relationship with Michel 'Aflaq?" Ṣaddām replied: "The relationship of a son to his father. Without Michel, Ṣaddām would have been nothing." It is known that Ṣaddām was Michel 'Aflaq's personal bodyguard from the early sixties, and Michel used him to eliminate his political opponents. In 1979, President Ṣaddām Ḥusayn – from the early days of his rule – eliminated most of the party leaders for their principled opposition to his presidency.

Some of its leaders wrote about the party's tragedy, such as Dr. Munīf al-Razzāz ("The Bitter Experience") and Muṭā' al-Ṣafadī ("The Ba'th Party: Tragedy of Birth and Tragedy of Destiny").

The party ended in Syria as the Nuṣayrīs climbed over it and then killed it. They began to revel in transgressing all religions, values, and principles. They first used the offspring of Muslims who joined the Ba'th Party, then gradually eliminated them. Kufr became the state's slogan in all its apparatuses. Ibrāhīm Khlāṣ wrote in the Syrian People's Army Magazine (Jaysh al-Sha'b) on April 25, 1967:

"The only way to build Arab civilization and construct Arab society is to create the new Arab socialist man who believes that Allāh, religions, feudalism, capital, colonialism, the overfed, and all the values that prevailed in the previous society are nothing but mummified dolls in the museums of history." Exalted is Allāh above what the criminals ascribe to Him through their heresy!

Shafīq al-Kamālī said, praising Ṣaddām:

"Blessed be your sacred face among us... Like the face of Allāh, exuding majesty."

I seek forgiveness from Allāh the Almighty and repent to Him!! And exalted is Allāh above the slander of this dog, who soon met his retribution in this world before the Hereafter.

Tawfīq al-Kamālī's story with Ṣaddām is indeed one of the signs of Allāh. During the Iraq-Iran War (1979-1986), Khomeini offered to stop the war in exchange for Ṣaddām's resignation. In one of his private gatherings, this poet, Tawfīq al-Kamālī, said to his companions, "If only His Excellency the President would accept and spare the bloodshed..." Intelligence services reported this. Ṣaddām summoned al-Kamālī, who admitted his suggestion, apologizing that he thought it would be one of the President's many virtues for the nation. Ṣaddām ordered him to stick out his tongue, took it in his hand, and cut it off with a sharp knife. Thus, Ṣaddām cast away the tongue that had likened his filthy face to His (Allāh's), Exalted and Glorified. It was thrown into the dunghill it deserved, by the hand of the very tyrant he had praised. So, Glory be to Allāh, Lord of the Worlds.

I heard this story from one of the recordings of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him.

When Ba‘th forces entered Ḥamāh in 1964, they were chanting:

"Bring a weapon, take a weapon... Muḥammad's religion is gone and vanished."

In 1980, the Defense Companies and party members came out chanting: "Allāh has fallen!" "Al-Asad is our Lord!" "No god but the homeland, and no messenger but the Ba‘th!" "No god but Sājī!" (the son of Sulaymān al-Murshid, who claimed divinity among the Nuṣayrīs in the forties!).

In the second half of the eighties, after the suppression of the Jihādī revolution in Syria, a Ba‘thist-Nuṣayrī demonstration took place in the city of Ḥimṣ, whose soil contains the graves of tens of thousands of Ṣaḥābah (Companions of the Prophet), may Allāh be pleased with them. And they were chanting: "Depart, O Allāh, depart! Appoint Ḥāfiẓ in Your place!"

- (Ḥallak) means, in the dialect of that region, (ḥāna laka) – that is, (it is time for Allāh) to appoint Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad as a lord in His place. I seek forgiveness from Allāh, the Most High, the Great – and may Allāh’s curse be upon the atheist ṭāghūt.

9. The Ba‘th Party began at the start of the Second World War (1939), when Nazism and Fascism filled the world with their clamor, and thus it was influenced by them. For example, Zakī al-Arsūzī was influenced by Nietzsche, the philosopher of Nazism, especially by his book "Thus Spoke Zarathustra, concerning the death of God..." As for ‘Aflaq, he was similarly influenced by Nietzsche and Gide. Their ideas came as a summarization of the atheism and anxiety from which Nietzsche suffered, who used to call Christianity "the religion of lame dogs." The most important features of Nietzsche's philosophy are summarized in three points:

1. Atheism.
2. The idea of resurrection is what made Christianity "the ethics of slaves," as the hatred of the weak towards the strong made them suggest to them the idea of the Hereafter, so the strong surrendered to myths, and the darkness of Christianity enveloped the world.
3. Despair and anxiety: which are permanent conditions for human greatness.

Here is a comparison between the words of ‘Aflaq and the words of Nazism and Fascism:

1. "The Ba'th is the destiny of the Arab nation" corresponds to Mussolini's statement, "Fascism is the destiny of the Italian nation," which is the divine right according to Hitler, and it is the same as Trotsky's statement: "The Communist Party does not err because it is the embodiment of historical determinism."
2. "The Ba'thist creed cannot be reached by reason but by faith alone" corresponds to Mussolini's statement, "Fascism is not debated; it is perceived by intuition."
3. "The destiny that carried us the message of Ba'th has given us the right to command with force and act with cruelty" is the same as Mussolini's statement: "The destiny that carried us the message of Fascism has given us the right to command with force and act with cruelty."
4. "The Ba'th is the vanguard, and the masses must walk behind it," which is the same as Mussolini's statement: "Fascism is the rule of the chosen elite, and it must lead the masses." (Al-Dhakhā'ir al-'Izām: Vol. 1, pp. 889-892)

These testimonies remind me of what caught my attention during my history studies at Beirut University. I found in one of the assigned books on the unification of Italy a great similarity between the thought and actions of one of the proponents of Italian nationalism and unity – his name escapes me now – and what we used to hear of the ideas of 'Aflaq, al-Arsūzī, and the Ba'th Party in Syria. This included the tripartite slogan, naming their newspaper "Al-Ba'th," and other things. I have no doubt now that the ideas of the Ba'th were manufactured in the cellars of Freemasonry and Crusader conspiracies. I even read in a newspaper that the Pope said to 'Aflaq in one of their meetings: "You have succeeded, Michel, where the Crusades failed!"

Then came the experience of ‘Abd al-Nāṣir and the Free Officers, and their call for Arab nationalism, a model in Egypt similar to the preceding Ba‘th model in Syria and Iraq.

Military Coups and Nationalism

New ideas inevitably require military leadership to impose their views by force. In this way, Islam was replaced by nationalism and socialism.

Therefore, Western circles in our countries and the Orientalists recommended the necessity of bringing in young military leaders through whom the West could impose the principles it desired.

Qusṭanṭīn Zurayq says:

"The Arabs, in their new era, must have capable and progressive leadership, and they must discard the reactionary elements of their traditions. Only then can the enlightened group continue its struggle against reactionary elements in cooperation with the West."

And Gibb says:

"The success of development depends to a large extent on the leaders in the Islamic world, especially the young among them."

The idea of nationalism is an attractive, glittering issue that can easily deceive the masses in the name of liberation, progress, and patriotism.

Gibb says:

"The method by which the Westernized class was able to secure a firm grip on power in the state... Nationalism is a completely Western idea."

It is well known that military men have no knowledge of administering nations, caring for peoples, or managing the masses; hence, countries are run through them.

Steve Mead, an envoy from the US State Department, described the military faction of the 1952 coup in Egypt with a precise description that fits all military men: "These boys think they are members of a comical Robin Hood gang. They are happy to carry the title 'heroes of the revolution,' but I haven't found one who could explain to me what the goal of this revolution is... They don't care about politics... Perhaps this is fortunate for us, and for 'Abd al-Nāṣir with us... They need someone to tell them what to think and do."

After the assassination attempt on 'Abd al-Nāṣir in Manshia Square in 1954, some army officers asked 'Abd al-Ḥakīm 'Āmir what the revolution had achieved and the reasons for the incident. He frankly said, "He does not know what the revolution is achieving, and that Jamāl planned and executed everything, and he is the one who knows the future steps."

Morroe Berger says in his book "The Arab World Today":

"The military elite in the Near East—in Egypt, Sudan, Iraq, Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan—were important factors in bringing about change... So the Arabs became Westernized without having to go to Europe."

Miles Copeland says:

"If 'Abd al-Nāṣir had not been born, our game would have had to create him, meaning, to cultivate a dictator like him."

Therefore, 'Abd al-Nāṣir's call for nationalism in 1954 was at America's signal, as Miles Copeland – the American intelligence operative – explained. 'Abd al-Nāṣir's call had a profound impact on the Arab world, and nationalism would not have spread so widely were it not for Egypt and its leader. 'Abd al-Nāṣir paved the way for this nationalist proliferation, as well as the success of the Ba'ṯh, the infiltration of communism, and the decline of Islam from the entire region. But the ideas imposed on the region by force were uprooted from the earth – {like a wicked tree uprooted from the surface of the earth, having no stability}. As Bernard Lewis says:

"Taking any ready-made political system not only from a different country but from a different civilization and imposing it by Westerners or Westernized rulers in the East is a wrong act. Democracy was imposed by orders and decrees of the absolute ruler... The result was the establishment of a system unrelated to the country's past or present, nor to its future needs." (This is exactly what America imposes by force today in Arab and Islamic countries, which it calls the "Greater Middle East"!)

Ziya Gökalp, the Turk, called for the separation of religion from the state (secularism of the state) and advocated for adopting Western culture in its entirety, while retaining national culture. Or, to be more precise, he wanted to completely exclude Islam from life, without allowing people to call this act atheism or heresy; rather, people should call the destruction of Islam "peace."

Westerners consider Gökalp "the one who laid the theoretical foundations for the modern Turkish state," as Harold Smith says.

Turanian Turkish Nationalism

The first seeds of Turkish nationalism were sown within the military academy in Istanbul by German military professors who came to the college to train the Turks, who needed a strong army trained in modern means of power and advanced fighting techniques, especially as Turkey was fighting the entire world, which was attacking it from all sides. A German military mission arrived in 1883, headed by Colonel von der Goltz, and he worked for nearly thirteen years, during which the seed of nationalism was sown.

The second factor in the rise of Turanian nationalism was the migration of Hungarian and Polish refugees to Turkey after the failure of their revolution in 1848, and their conversion to Islam, whereby they became part of the influential class in the state. Among these was Konstanty Borzęcki, who later named himself

Muṣṭafá Jalāl al-Dīn Pāshā. This man was the head of the nationalist serpent that spread its venom into the minds and souls of the Turks. Bernard Lewis says:

"Borzęcki worked to transfer Polish nationalism and cast it in a Turkish mold. He was aided in this by the works of Western Orientalists researching Turkish affairs, which had a significant impact on the appreciation of ancient Turkish history and the belief in a distinct identity."

We must not fail to recall that all members of the Committee of Union and Progress (Jam‘iyyat al-Ittiḥād wa-l-Taraqqī) were Masons (a global Jewish organization), and that the Jews of Salonica were the driving force behind this committee. We recall again the words of Seton-Watson: "The prominent fact in the formation of the Committee of Union and Progress is that it was non-Turkish and non-Islamic." Thus, it overthrew ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd, Turkey, and Islam.

This call for Turkish nationalism had a detrimental effect, reflected in the souls of the Islamic peoples subject to Ottoman sovereignty. They began to demand independence and form secret societies to fight Turkey, especially after the shameful and strange behavior pursued by the Committee of Union and Progress. At the forefront of these peoples were the Arabs, who used this behavior as a justification to side with Britain against the Turks in the Great Arab Revolt led by al-Sharīf Ḥusayn. This had dire consequences for the Islamic world.

Toynbee says:

"The officers in Hamidian Turkey were the only class that could open a permanent intellectual window through which Western influences could penetrate. Therefore, in 1908, after thirty years of dark despotism, the new Turkish generation of military men was the spearhead of the Western liberal attack on Turkey."

Comparison between Turanian Nationalism and Arab Nationalism

Turanian and Arab nationalism converged on several key points, the most important of which are:

The purpose of both was to eliminate Muslim Turkey, and Sultan ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd in particular.

Both nationalisms began at approximately the same time, although Arab nationalism preceded Turanianism slightly.

Both nationalisms were secular and agreed on excluding Islam from life.

Both nationalisms originated in foreign environments: Arab nationalism in American institutions and the American University, while Turanianism originated in Jewish Masonic lodges supervised by Spanish, Polish, and Italian Jews.

The early pioneers of both states were not originally Muslims, nor were they of the ethnicity whose nationalism they advocated. For example, Borzęcki, who called himself Muṣṭafá Jalāl al-Dīn Pāshā – of Polish origin – worked to transfer Polish nationalism and cast it in a Turkish mold. Since the founding of the Committee of Union and Progress, not one of its leaders or commanders of pure Turkish origin emerged: Anwar Pāshā was a Polish renegade, Jāwīd was from the Jewish Dönme sect, Carasso was one of the Spanish Jews in Salonica, Ṭal‘at Pāshā was of Gypsy origin, and Aḥmad Riḍā was half Circassian and half Hungarian, influenced by Comte.

The early pioneers of Arab nationalism were all non-Muslims: Buṭrus al-Bustānī, Nāṣif and his son Ibrāhīm al-Yāziji, al-Shidyāq, Adīb Ishāq, Naqqāsh, Shumayyil, Taqlā, Ṣarrūf, Zaydān, Nimr, and Mishāqah – all of them, without exception, were Christians. Then came the twentieth century, and among their leaders were: Zakī al-Arsūzī (a Nusayri Turkmen) and Michel ‘Aflaq (a Christian) – leaders of the Ba‘th; Anṭūn Sa'ādah and George 'Abd al-Masīḥ – leaders of the Syrian Nationalist Party; and Ḥabash – one of the leaders of the Arab Nationalists Movement. All of them Christians!

Cardinal Bertoli said to the Pope: "Christianity in the East is what planted the revolutionary movements and movements of change. Names like Michel 'Aflaq, Anṭūn Sa'ādah, and George Ḥabash may explain what I mean."

Masonic-Jewish fingers were manipulating the vanguards of both movements. The first five who established the "Beirut Secret Society" were all Masons. Likewise, those who called for Turanian nationalism were Masons.

There were some masterminds orchestrating the overthrow of Islam in Turkey who moved to Cairo to continue their work! For example, 'Azīz al-Miṣrī was in the Committee of Union and Progress, then he established "al-Jam'iyyah al-Qaḥṭāniyyah" and "Jam'iyyat al-'Ahd." The Jewish Rabbi in Istanbul, Ḥāyīm Nāḥūm, moved to Cairo after the fall of the Caliphate in Turkey and had influence in Egyptian politics during 'Abd al-Nāṣir's time. Similarly, Ismā'īl Aḥmad Adham came from Turkey to Egypt, wrote the book "Why I am an Atheist," and founded "The Eastern Forum for Spreading Atheism."

Arab nationalism was influenced by American theories, and Turanianism was influenced by the French Revolution. Philip Hitti says: "It was a product of the contact between the Syrian mind and Western intellectual output that the principles of comprehensive Arab nationalism were born, drawing its inspiration mostly from American theories, unlike Turkish nationalism, which came later than Arab nationalism and drew its inspiration from the principles of the French Revolution."

Jewish fingers were prominent in Turkish nationalism. The Jews are still keen to tie the Arabs to their nationalism. Abba Eban – who was Israel's Foreign Minister – said in a lecture at Princeton University in America: "Some Arab leaders are trying to assess the extent of the Islamic tide after the recent defeat (1967), and in that lies the real danger to Israel. Therefore, it was one of our primary duties to keep the Arabs firmly convinced of their nationalist, not Islamic, lineage." (Al-Dhakhā'ir al-ʿIzām: Vol. 1, pp. 893-895)

Shaykh ʿAbdullāh ʿAzzām said:

Finally, we say: The reality of the Arabs clearly indicates that the results achieved by the nationalist, regionalist, and secularist calls are:

Severing the Arabs' connection to the Islamic state.

Tearing the Arab world into feeble statelets so that they remain in the grip of the Western and Eastern worlds, competing in their loyalty to America or Russia to protect their regimes in the region. (Al-Dhakhā'ir al-ʿIzām: Vol. 1, pp. 893-895)

The expansion of the Israeli entity, which has become a dragon opening its jaws, swallowing parts of Arab lands periodically.

Collapses in most social, political, economic, and military aspects.

The emergence of generations that have no specific identity, nor any principle in life, not knowing why they live. They are morally torn, socially decayed, familially disintegrated, their hearts are void. You see them with a new opinion every day, changing their ideas as they change their clothes in belief, economy, culture, and society. Zwemer – the leader of the missionaries – says, addressing the missionaries: "Indeed, you have prepared a youth in the lands of Islām who know no connection to Allāh, nor do they wish to know it. You have removed the Muslim from Islām, so the Muslim generation emerged according to what colonialism desired: uninterested in great matters, loving comfort and laziness, and focusing its worldly concerns only on desires."

This East has never witnessed unity or honor, nor did it have an entity except through Islām, which united it the first time, and it will not find itself again except through Islām.

Nationalism tore Europe apart, so the Arabs imported it to tear apart their Islamic Ummah, and even to fragment the Arab peoples themselves.

As Toynbee says, questioning and admitting the guilt of his country and civilization: "Is it really necessary for the Arab world to fragment as the Spanish Empire in America unfortunately did—into twenty independent states, living in narrow, Western-style molds? This is the second grim face of our Western civilization, and it is regrettable that the Arabic-speaking peoples imitate it completely. The allure of nationalism is attractive in such scattered Islamic societies, but nationalism will not lead these societies to a new life, but rather to a sentence of death and annihilation."

The tune played by the ruling classes in the Islamic and Arab world is the tune of nationalism. It is embellished and beautiful, delighting the ears and gladdening the hearts, but it is a narcotic through which peoples are slaughtered on the altars of desires, cheap sacrifices for the sake of tyrants and ṭāghūt. The gurgling sound reflecting the bloody hemorrhage has attracted many flocks to be led to their miserable and painful slaughter.

Gibb says:

"The method by which the Westernized class was able to secure its firm grip on power in the state... was nationalism... Nationalism is an entirely Western idea."

The reason for the spread of nationalism in the Arab world is the West's own domination over the Islamic world.

The English historian Toynbee says in his book "The West, the East, and the Future": "At the present time, when the West finds itself, since the Second World War, divided into more than forty independent, sovereign nation-states, it threatens the collapse of the entire house upon its inhabitants due to this internal division. Nevertheless, the West's prestige still holds enough power in the world to keep the germ of Western nationalism capable of spreading and infecting. It is hoped, however, that the Islamic world will be able to halt the spread of this Western political disease—nationalism—through the Islamic national sense of unity!!"

Nationalism is not the effective cure for our diseases; rather, it is a terminal illness from which we suffer.

Smith says: "The modern history of the Near East shows that abstract nationalism is not the appropriate foundation for undertaking the arduous duty. Unless the ideal is Islamic in some way, efforts will bear no fruit at all."

And how beautiful is the saying of our master ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, with which we conclude this discussion:

"We are a people whom Allāh honored with this religion (Islām), and whenever we seek honor in anything else, Allāh will humiliate us."

Allāh the Exalted said: {We have certainly sent down to you a Book in which is your remembrance. Then will you not reason?} (Al-Anbiyā’: 10). So, Muslims and Arabs are reminded by the Qur’ān; because of this Book, this Ummah is remembered. The Arabs first advanced humanity under the guidance of this Qur’ān, and they took the reins of humanity after adhering to the Book and establishing it in their lives.

{And indeed, it is a remembrance for you and for your people, and you are going to be questioned.} (Al-Zukhruf: 44). {Say, "O People of the Scripture, you are upon nothing until you observe the Torah and the Gospel and what has been revealed to you from your Lord."} (Al-Mā’idah: 68).

So, the people of the Qur’ān are upon nothing, and they have no weight or value unless they establish it among themselves, act by it in their lives, and apply it in their reality.

{And if We had decreed upon them, "Kill yourselves" or "Leave your homes," they would not have done it, except for a few of them. But if they had done what they were instructed, it would have been better for them and a firmer position.} (Al-Nisā': 66).

It was stated in the report of Delessert – the French Consul General in Syria – on 19/8/1956, which he wrote with the assistance of his aide, Blanc, the following: "One of the most prominent facts observed by anyone wishing to study these countries is the place that religion occupies in the souls of the people, and the authority it has in their lives. Religion appears everywhere and in every matter. In Eastern society, the effect of religion appears in public morals, in language, in literature, and in all social institutions. The Eastern man does not belong to a homeland in which he was born – the Easterner has no homeland – but to the religion into which he was born. Just as a man in the West belongs to a homeland, in the East he belongs to a religion. The nation of the Eastern man is the group of people who adhere to the same religion as he does, and every individual outside the fold of the religion is, to him, a foreigner, a stranger."

Jāhilī Nationalisms and Regionalisms

The West and its disciples everywhere have stirred up the tunes of connection to the Jāhiliyyahs (pre-Islamic states of ignorance) that predate Islām in order to sever the connection with Islām and bypass it.

In Morocco: The French administration tried to bolster the ethnic spirit among the Berbers of Marrakesh, so it issued the Berber Dahir on May 16, 1930, which decreed the implementation of Berber customary laws and their personal status law instead of the Islamic Sharī'ah.

In Indonesia: The Javanese-Hindu civilization was "discovered."

In Lebanon: Sa'īd 'Aql, Yūsuf al-Sawdā, and Victor stirred up the spectre of Phoenicianism, and they said that Lebanon does not belong to the Arabs, but is part of the Mediterranean civilization – Italy, and Greece.

In Egypt: Pharaonic civilization was promoted, especially after the discovery of Tutankhamun, and after Champollion solved the riddles of the Rosetta Stone. Salāmah Mūsā, Luṭfī Sayyid, then Sa'd Zaghlūl, and Ṭāhā Ḥusayn took up the call for Pharaonism. Names like Ramses, Pyramids, Nefertiti, Sphinx began to appear. The Sphinx was adopted as a symbol representing Egypt's renaissance. During Nasser's time, the High Dam was built, and UNESCO rallied the world to save the Pharaonic temple of Abu Simbel. The statue of Ramses – the Pharaoh of Moses – was moved to Cairo, costing millions. And the Turks began to chant the slogan "Turkey for the Turks" and Egypt "for the Egyptians."

Cuyler Young says of Louis Thomas:

"He was able to outline the historical and social circumstances of the movement that ended with modern Turkish leaders achieving the principle of Turkey for the Turks, and this principle was followed by most peoples of the region."

Therefore, the Kemalists used to say:

"We want to build a Turkish Islām that will be our own and part of our new society, like the Anglican Church, which is Christianity in the English style."

In Arab Egypt, the echoes of these cries resonated, mobilizing the Egyptian "parrots" manipulated by Western (specifically English) fingers, calling for the "Pharaonization of Egypt." Ṭāhā Ḥusayn said, "The Egyptian is Pharaonic before he is Arab," and he also said, "If Islām stood between me and my Pharaonism, I would renounce my Islām!"

Therefore, it is not surprising to see the West's great interest in antiquities and national museums, as Western bodies were established about a century ago to supervise excavations in the Islamic world to link Muslims to antiquities and to the values and figures that existed before the advent of Islām. So, Botta and Layard came to Iraq, Mariette worked in Egypt, and Schliemann in Turkey. Then they established departments of antiquities and national museums. It is not surprising after this to realize that the Jewish Rockefeller Foundation donated ten million dollars to establish a museum for Pharaonic antiquities and an institute to train archaeologists. Perhaps after this, we can understand the reason for the provision in Article 21 of the British Mandate for Palestine: "The Mandatory shall enact into law, and enforce, within the first year from the date of this Mandate, a special law for antiquities." All this is to cut their connection with their Islām and link them to the first Jāhiliyyah, so that the West can enslave them and humiliate them under its control.

Dr. Wilson said at the conference on Islamic Culture and Contemporary Life held at Princeton University in 1952: "In the countries of the Near and Middle East these days, there is a civilizational renaissance that is, on the one hand, new, and on the other hand, a revival of the old. The renaissance of the Christian West and its revival of knowledge were based on processes of thought and debate therein on classical and pagan works."

In Iran: The Safavids and the Pahlavi regime weakened the relationship with the Islamic world. The Pahlavi regime established an academy to get rid of Arabic vocabulary in Persian. The academy "discovered" the glory of ancient Iran, and the doctrine of Zoroaster re-emerged, occupying a prominent place in the Land of the Lion and Sun. New buildings began to be built in the old Achaemenid style. Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi held a celebration for the 2500th anniversary of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire. Other nationalisms also arose in Iran, such as the Baloch, Kurds, and Arabs.

In Iraq: Chauvinistic cries arose. Some called for Arab nationalism, the Kurds for their Kurdish nationalism, and the Turks for Turkish nationalism. Assyrian and Chaldean calls also emerged.

In India: The fire of Indian communalism flared up. Indians began to take pride in being Indian, and they looked to sever ties with the water of Zamzam in Makkah in favor of the Ganges River, and they sang praises of Hindu heroes (Bhima, Arjuna, Rama). They began to view the Arab conquest as colonialism, subjugation, and foreign occupation of the homeland. This, which Muslims take pride in, led Muslims to call for the establishment of a state where they could live an Islamic life, with Islamic thought, where the nationality of a Muslim is his creed, his religion, and his Islām.

Iqbāl said, addressing the Muslim – wherever he may be:

"Do not compare the nations of the West to your Ummah, for the Ummah of the Hashemite Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) is unique in its composition. They believe in their association based on homeland and lineage, but your association, O Muslim, is strengthened by the power of religion."

In Jordan and Palestine: Voices rose, glorifying ancient tribal glories, and disputes arose between the northern and southern tribes in eastern Jordan, and between Palestinians and the people of eastern Jordan. We began to hear of cities like Moab, Philadelphia, and Ammon.

The word of our Lord of Glory has indeed come true for us:

{Indeed, those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger - those will be among the most humiliated.} (Al-Mujādilah: 20). {And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life, and We will gather him on the Day of Resurrection blind.} (Tāhā: 124).

And the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) spoke the truth: "I have been sent with the sword before the Hour so that Allāh alone is worshipped. My provision has been placed under the shadow of my spear, and humiliation and subservience have been decreed for those who disobey my command. Whoever imitates a people is one of them."

We have tasted the bitterness of our distance from the Book of Allāh, we have drunk the pain of our deviation from the path of Allāh, and we have reaped from the seeds of nationalism the fruits of estrangement, fragmentation, loss, abandonment, and ruin:

{Do they not see that they are tried every year once or twice but then they do not repent nor do they remember?} (Al-Tawbah: 126).

The time has come for us to return to Allāh, to cast aside all the burdens of Jāhiliyyah from our hands, and to call ourselves to return to the path of happiness: {Then whoever follows My guidance will neither go astray [in the world] nor suffer [in the Hereafter].} (Tāhā: 123). It is either Allāh or annihilation, either Islām or destruction.

End of quote.

Communism in the Arab World during the Twentieth Century

"Jews supervised the organization and formation of communist parties in the Arab world; they were their leaders and planners.

The French Jewish communist, Robinson, says:

'Communist parties and sympathetic organizations were not established except in foreign circles in Arab countries, in Egypt and Palestine. They found few followers and were disconnected from the reality of those countries, and they ended without attracting much attention.'

Below are the Jewish names of the founders of communism in Arab countries:

1 - The Communist Party in Egypt:

The organization began in 1921 in Alexandria by a Russian Jew named Joseph Rosenberg, accompanied by his daughter Charlotte. In 1927, Moscow sent three Jews to form and monitor the organization.

Then Russia delegated the Egyptian Jew Henri Curiel and provided him with vast sums of money, with which he founded the Curiel Bank in Egypt and formed the Democratic Movement for National Liberation (Hadeto).

Then the 'Iskra' (Spark) organization was formed, the same name as the newspaper Lenin published in Switzerland before the success of the revolution. This organization was formed by the Jew Elie Schwartz, who later changed its name to 'Nahshem' (Towards an Egyptian Communist Party), and then it joined Hadeto.

The 'New Dawn Organization' was founded by the two Jews Yusuf Darwish and Raymond Douek, and later its name became 'D.Sh.' (Al-Dimuqrāṭiyyah al-Sha‘biyyah - Popular Democracy).

The 'Egyptian Communist Organization' (M.Sh.M): Founded by the two Jews Odette and her husband Lémon Sidney.

The 'People's Liberation Organization': Founded by Marcel Israel.

2 - The Communist Party in Iraq:

Founded by Jews, and most of its members initially were Jews. Its leaders included Sasson Dallal, Naji Shamil, Sadiq Yehuda, and Yusuf Hizqil, all of whom were Jews.

Qadri Qal‘aji narrates in his book 'An Arab's Experience in the Communist Party' (pp. 21-22), Professor Badr Shākir al-Sayyāb recounts – in addition to moral scandals we do not wish to dwell on – how he worked with his Iraqi communist comrades to spread communism, saying: 'We started playing every string whose tune matched what we wanted. We spread among Kurdish students that nationalists hated Kurds and their nationalism, while we considered them our brothers. We began to insult Arab nationalism in front of them, even disparaging Arabs, claiming that Arab history was nothing but a series of massacres and slaughters, and their great leaders were nothing but feudal executioners, and so on. We passed by our Jewish brothers without needing to invite them. And we exploited some female comrades to influence some students.'

3 - The Syrian-Lebanese Communist Party:

The party was founded in 1924, after the Palestinian and Egyptian Communist Parties. It was headed in Lebanon by Jacob Tepper, a Russian Jew, who was assisted by three Jews: Mik, Oscar, and Muller."

The Syrian-Lebanese Party was affiliated with the Jewish Communist Party in Palestine, and then it became affiliated with the French Communist Party.

4 - The Palestinian and Jordanian Communist Party:

The issue of Palestine was one of the major concerns occupying the minds of the leaders of the Bolshevik Revolution from its earliest days. Lenin in Russia issued a two-part decree concerning the Jews:

First: Considering hostility towards Jews (anti-Semitism) a legal crime.

Second: Supporting the establishment of a national homeland for the Jews in Palestine.

This decree was issued less than twenty days before the Balfour Declaration by Britain's Foreign Secretary on November 2, 1917.

Therefore, Russian communists focused on communist organization in Palestine.

The party founded in 1919 was the first in the region, initially formed by the Russian Jew Rozhstein. Moscow dispatched two Jewish stalwarts of the Russian Communist Party to organize in Palestine: Jack Shapilev and Radool Karn Borg. Initially, all members of the Palestinian Communist Party were Russian Jews.

Then Moscow sent Vladimir Jabotinsky, who became notably active in Palestine. Later, S. Averbukh, a Jew nicknamed Abū Ziyam, was delegated to organize the Communist Party in Arab countries. Averbukh was a friend of Lenin in Switzerland and one of the most prominent communists in Palestine. He headed the Communist Party in Palestine from 1924 to 1929.

Membership in the Palestinian Communist Party was initially restricted to Jews. A few Palestinian Arabs joined, but they were not trusted by the communist majority and were not privy to their secrets. In 1937, the first overt movement of the Palestinian Communist Party was established behind the facade of a workers' union in Haifa, with Emile Tuma as its secretary.

In Nazareth, a workers' union with Emile Habibi as its secretary, and in Jaffa, with Fu'ād Nassār as its secretary.

In 1939, the communists established the National Liberation League. Its secretary was the Jew Ben Faki, and his assistant was Tawfiq Tubi. The demands of this league were the evacuation of Britain and then the formation of a joint government between Jews and Arabs.

In the 1948 war, members of the National Liberation League transformed into leaders of armed gangs, slaughtering the Palestinian people. Some misguided youth withdrew, while enthusiastic communists defended the Jews and stood by them, including the lawyer Ibrahim Bakr in Nazareth, Fu'ād Nassār in Jaffa, and other Arab communist leaders in Palestine.

After the Nakbah of 1948, the Jewish Palestinian Communist Party began to oversee the remaining, unoccupied parts of Palestine. The party leadership included Emile Tuma, Tawfiq Tubi, and Emile Habibi; the latter two are members of the Knesset today. Communication between communists in the two parts of Palestine was facilitated by an Israeli officer and a communist press secretary working in the armistice committee. The Communist Party's publications were footnoted with a phrase in Hebrew at the bottom: "Printed by the presses of the Palestinian Communist Party," meaning (the occupied part).

In 1950, the West Bank was annexed to Jordan. Tal'at Ḥarb, a communist, was arrested in Ramallah while distributing communist leaflets he had brought from Israel. In 1951, security forces in Amman discovered a communist printing press registered with Hebrew numbers and phrases.

In 1952, Moscow ordered the separation of the Jordanian Communist Party from the Palestinian Communist Party. Fā'iḳ Warrād was still in the occupied territory, so Israeli forces allowed him to leave to become one of the leaders of the communist movement. The Ramallah region nominated him in 1956 as its representative in the Jordanian Parliament. On that day, Jerusalem presented Ya'qūb Ziyādīn – the Christian communist – as its representative.

In 1957, the Jordanian Communist Party was dissolved, its leaders arrested and imprisoned in the al-Jafr detention center. Fu'ād Nassār, secretary of the Jordanian Communist Party, delivered several lectures, the first of which was "Communism and Israel," in which he said: "We know, and everyone knows, that Israel is a de facto reality and a state with its political, economic, and military entity. The Jews are a people like any other, with the right to life. I recognize the Jews as a state because the sun cannot be hidden with a sieve."

When Fu'ād Nassār died in Amman in 1977, the Israeli Communist Party (Rakah) held a memorial service for him in Nazareth. The party leader, Meir Vilner, attended, as did Tawfiq Tubi, Emile Tuma, and Tawfiq Ziad – the originator of the idea of Yawm al-Ard (Land Day) – March 30. This Tawfiq [Ziad] is a member of the Israeli Knesset and was collecting donations in America in 1978 with the Israeli flag.

Telegrams are still exchanged between the Jordanian and Israeli Communist Parties. For instance, the Jordanian communist bulletin in April 1977 stated the following: "The Council also highly appreciated the principled and firm positions of the progressive forces in Israel itself, foremost among them the Communist Party (Rakah)."

Mahmoud Darwish and Samih al-Qasim, the two Palestinian communist poets – representatives of the occupied land – carried the Israeli flag at the Sofia International Conference.

Professor Sa'd Jum'ah says: "It has been proven beyond any doubt that there is a unified organization, ideological coherence, planning, and integration in planning and objectives between the Israeli Communist Party and the Arab communist parties. Anyone who has experienced the troubles of governing in Jordan knows that many Arab communist publications used to reach us across the border from Israel, and that many leaders of the Jordanian Communist Party were thrust upon us from Israel after being mentored and trained by the misleading masters of the Zionist party." End quote. (Al-Dhakha'ir: 974-976).

Arab Communists and the Palestinian Cause:

We have seen previously that communist organizations in the Arab world were all supervised and nurtured by Jews. As for the communist leaders who claim Arab identity, they were raised by Jewish masters after their minds were changed to become Jewish. The Jews pinned great hopes on these pupils and on the advancement of socialism in the region.

In 1948, Arab communists – from Palestine – wrote to Moscow: "Making Palestine a national homeland for the Jews is the only way and the successful means to Bolshevize the Arab world."

When the partition plan was announced, and after Russia declared its blatant support for the resolution, Arab communists reverted to supporting partition. The Secretary-General of the Arab Communists, Khalid Bakdash, declared: "The reactionary Arab governments are responsible. They opposed the friendly Soviet Union until the last moment and did not seek its friendship. It is true that the Jews are not a nation, but they are a people with the right to life."

Rafīq Riḍā (a member of the leadership of the Lebanese-Syrian Communist Party), who defected from Khalid Bakdash and was his assistant, revealed: "The Communist Party leadership was as enthusiastic as Ben-Gurion about the revival of the Jewish state in Palestine. In their view, Israel was an oasis of democracy in the Near East, and the dispersed Israeli people had to meet in the Promised Land. The duty of international solidarity, according to the aforementioned leadership, is at the core of Marxist principles. Therefore, in their view, Israel's existence has humanitarian justifications that transcend national justifications and realities."

Everyone knew the shameful position of communism towards their brethren. They collectively condemned the displaced Arabs – who were defending their entity, their lives, their dīn, and their honor. They attacked them and considered them aggressors, while describing the Jews as oppressed. They considered the defense of Palestine to be religious reactionism and a conspiracy against the Jews.

In Iraq, the communists said: "The Iraqi people proudly refuse to fight the brotherly Israeli people."

The party secretary in Iraq, Yusuf Salman (nicknamed Fahd), said: "Welcome to the establishment of two states, Arab and Jewish, in Palestine, provided they embrace socialism and ally against Arab religious reactionism."

The Egyptian Communist Organization wrote on May 15, 1948, under the title "The Armies of the Arab Countries Invaded Palestine": "This war is a reactionary war that serves the Arab bourgeoisie and suppresses the rising revolutionary proletariat (the Jews) in Palestine."

After the establishment of Israel, communists began to call for peace with it. They continuously distributed articles by Samuel Mikunis, secretary of the Israeli Communist Party, which he published in the Cominform newspaper under the title "For a Lasting Peace."

Fu'ād Nassār (secretary of the Jordanian Communist Party in 1957) delivered a lecture in al-Jafr in which he said: "We know, and everyone knows, that Israel is a de facto reality and a state with its political, economic, and military entity. The Jews are a people like any other, with the right to life. I recognize the Jews as a state because the sun cannot be hidden with a sieve."

After the Palestinian revolution began and gained strength, communists infiltrated its ranks and began to promote their slogan "Differentiate between Jew and Zionist" in order to dilute the Palestinian cause.

They said: We do not fight honorable Jews; we only fight Zionism.

And we do not know how to differentiate in the public sphere between an "honorable Jew" – as they claim – and a Zionist, while the leaders of Zionist organizations believe that every Zionist is a Jew. Indeed, Zion refers to the southern part of Jerusalem (Mount of the Jebusites), then the Jews began to apply it to Jerusalem, calling it "Daughter of Zion." And in the Torah: "Sing, O Daughter of Zion; shout, O Daughter of Jerusalem."

Herzl says: "Zionism is the return to the fold of Judaism before it becomes the return to the Promised Land."

Ben-Gurion says: "I am a Jew first and an Israeli second, because I believe that the State of Israel was created for the entire Jewish people and on their behalf."

The leaders of the Palestinian revolution and its organizations began to educate the youth with "revolutionary culture"!! The culture of Mao and Guevara, the revolutionism of Lenin and Stalin, the ideas of Marx, and the life of Castro. They taught the youth twenty terms around which they would revolve... imperialism, bourgeoisie, demagoguery, proletariat...

And the youth thought they had acquired something new, for which they had replaced the dīn of Allāh – Exalted and Majestic is He – and they exchanged the verses of Allāh and the sacred things for a paltry price.

They declared war against "reactionism" (the dīn of Islam), leading to internal conflict that spread to every home, between brother and brother, son and father, and daughter and mother.

The officials of the Anṣār organization (the communist one) – which we only heard about through papers – began to attend the trade union complex in 1969-1970, saying: "Our enemies are (Zionist imperialism, not the honorable Jews!!)."

The revolutionary factions in the municipality of the capital, Amman, celebrated Lenin's centennial birthday for a whole week on April 10, 1970. Not a crossroads, nor a door, nor a grocery store, nor a shop remained without a picture of the "great" Lenin plastered on it!! – The planter of the state of atheism on earth –.

As for their bases, we saw them up close. Their codenames were Abū Jahl, Abū Lahab, Mao, Guevara, and Ho Chi Minh.

As for their night's secret: it was cursing the dīn of the Lord. As for their food: they used to hunt dogs with their rifles and then eat them, because for them there is no difference between a dog and a sheep, as the claim of differentiation is a reactionary myth brought by a Bedouin in the desert named Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him).

And we saw them when the Muslim mujāhid youth, who carried arms, would raise the adhān in fida'ī gatherings, the sons of Lenin and Mao Zedong would clap, curse, and raise their voices, saying: "If you ask about me, these are my values... I am a Marxist-Leninist internationalist!"

And Allāh the Great has spoken the truth: {And when you call to prayer, they take it in ridicule and amusement. That is because they are a people who do not use reason.} (Al-Mā'idah: 58).

And the Muslim mujāhid youth who languish in chains in Israeli prisons – when they perform ṣalāh – still suffer from the commotion created by those who work for George Habash and Nayef Hawatmeh. How many disputes and clashes have occurred because a Muslim youth criticized Mao, Guevara, Lenin, or Marx.

After the end of revolutionary activity in Jordan, we saw some leftist leaders like George Habash reappear in (Democratic South Yemen) – the land of 'Ād – organizing universities and institutes for Mao, Marx, and Lenin.

And I wondered how the English could cooperate with the proponents of Arab communist nationalism, were it not that it is a single front dedicated to fighting Islam and its people.

("The English Cross enables the communists in Yemen to raise their sickle and (their hammer) and organizes the vanguards of Arab nationalism represented by a person named George – his name is not Arabic –") this is to terrorize the Yemeni Muslim people in their fiṭrah, and to send explosive devices to North Yemen to demolish installations and kill children and girls.

Then I realized the dimensions of the global conspiracy against Islam and its people. As for values and morals, they have no consideration among the socialist revolutionaries. How many female "comrades"!! were deceived in the name of Palestine. You would enter their bases – especially – in city offices like Amman, and find those in tight trousers who sleep to the tunes of music and wake up to the strings of the oud among groups of "beetles" and hippies!!.

In a demonstration at the University of Jordan in 1979, their voices rose, saying: "Our legitimate demands are bread, freedom, and the young man next to the young woman."

I saw a young man approach them as some regional chauvinism began to appear. This good young man said to them: "O brothers, I address you in the name of Islam." Then one of the misguided revolutionary socialist "comrades" stood up to him, saying: "Our demands on the lists are reactionary; we don't want to see it," meaning: We do not want to see Islam. End quote. (1)

The Defeats and Disintegration of Arabs and Muslims and Their March Towards the Abyss During the Second Half of the Twentieth Century:

Thus, the second half of the twentieth century witnessed the independence of Arab and Islamic countries. It was a formal, orchestrated independence that, in reality, was no more than a transformation in the methods of the colonial occupiers to what became known as modern colonialism. Colonialism fragmented the Arab world into about 22 states and the Islamic world into a total of more than 55 states. Various models of ruling regimes were imposed on these countries through precise and direct arrangements by the colonial powers. Among them were hereditary ruling families, especially in areas of significant natural resources, particularly oil regions. There were also oppressive military dictatorial regimes, especially in areas of activism, awareness, and culture, such as in Iraq, al-Shām, and Egypt. And there were dictatorial regimes that cloaked themselves in the Western liberal system, among others.

However, all these regimes governed their peoples with oppression, injustice, and subjugation. They subjected them to policies of impoverishment and enforced ignorance, leading them down paths of immorality, spreading indecency, and into misguidance and error.

Furthermore, all these regimes, without exception, ruled by man-made laws imported, wholly or partially, from the colonizing West.

During those years, the Islamic world declined to the bottom of the list of underdeveloped nations, suffering from a massive and diverse range of crises. (1) (Al-Dhakhā'ir al-'Izām: 984-986). Because of this, and because of the various intellectual and political currents of differing inclinations and desires that the West introduced into these lands—ranging from the philosophies of the atheist, communist, socialist East to the heresies of the permissive, licentious, liberal West—a bitter struggle for power arose in many of these countries. Political blocs opposing the ruling regimes managed to come to power, presenting alternative models that were no less in their kufr, injustice, misguidance, and decay. The saga of loss and crises continued.

Many of these artificial regimes also engaged in regional wars among themselves. Neither a shared religion nor even nationalistic ties between rulers prevented these wars. There was war between Iran and Iraq, between Iraq and Kuwait, between Yemen and Saudi Arabia, and between Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Wars occurred between Libya and Chad, between Algeria and Morocco, between Syria and Jordan, and between Syria and multiple factions in Lebanon. Border disputes arose between the Gulf emirates, between Saudi Arabia and Qatar, and between Qatar and Bahrain. Fierce fighting took place between the Jordanian regime and the Palestinians, between the Syrian regime and the Palestinians, and between various Lebanese factions and the Palestinians. Threats nearly ignited wars between Syria and Turkey, between Syria and Iraq, between Sudan and Eritrea, and between Sudan and Chad... and so on, with these conflicts and wars that claimed hundreds of thousands of lives and impoverished both lands and people. Not a single one of these conflicts could be considered a struggle between right and wrong, nor did any of them have a trace of legitimate cause for shar‘ī fighting. Rather, it was fighting based on the whims of kings and rulers, so that glory might belong to so-and-so, from the ruling gerbils in Muslim lands.

In light of these conditions, our enemies became covetous of us. The Jews occupied two-thirds of Palestine in 1948, due to the treachery of the leaders of the seven Arab armies. Then, in 1967, they occupied what remained of Palestine, including East al-Quds and the blessed al-Masjid al-Aqṣā, in addition to lands from Syria, Egypt, Lebanon, and Jordan, an area more than five times the size of Palestine. All of this was due to the treachery of the regimes in Ba‘thist and Nuṣayrīyyah Syria, Jamāl ‘Abd al-Nāṣir's Egypt with its Arab nationalism, and the regime of the long-standing Freemason King Ḥusayn in Jordan. In 1973, the Nuṣayrīyyah regime in Syria and the regime of the traitor Anwar al-Sādāt transformed the Arabs' sole, orphaned victory against the Jews into a military and then political defeat in the famous Ramaḍān War, after the historic crossing of the Suez Canal by Egyptian forces under cries of Allāhu Akbar, and the magnificent advance of Syrian forces that reached Lake Tiberias and landed their troops in the Golan Heights.

Since the treacherous agreements of President Sādāt in 1980, followed by the disengagement agreements between al-Asad's Nuṣayrīyyah Syria and Israel, and then the subsequent betrayals primarily orchestrated by Yāsir ‘Arafāt, the Palestine Liberation Organization, and then the so-called Palestinian National Authority, the Arabs lost everything, including their land, holy sites, and even their dignity, before an Israel backed by America and Europe. As for the Islamic world, various forces of kufr encroached upon and occupied many of its regions. India occupied Kashmir, Russia retained the Caucasus and the Central Asian republics, and Muslims lost their independence and most of their lands in Eastern European countries, as well as in many African and Southeast Asian countries.

Since 1990, when America took up the banner of aggression, controlled the world, and made the "Greater" Middle East—comprising most of the Arab and Islamic world—an arena for its invasions, imperial ambitions, and colonial plunder, the Arab and Islamic world reached the abyss of decay, disintegration, and defeats. The prelude to this was the occupation of Afghanistan and the entry of joint American-Jewish-Crusader forces into the capital of al-Rashīd (Baghdad) in April 2003.

In short, the last seven decades have recorded a black, sorrowful history for Arabs and Muslims, in which the land was filled—between the tyranny of rulers and the aggression of colonizers—with injustice, oppression, tribulation, darkness, defeats, and calamities whose extent only Allāh knows.

Roots of Tribulation and Causes of Defeat:

Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh perfume his resting place) said:

"The Lord of Might (Jalla Jalāluhu) summarized the causes of defeat in a single line.

Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger – those will be among the most humbled.} (Al-Mujādilah: 20). And Allāh the Exalted said: {And whatever strikes you of disaster – it is for what your hands have earned; but He pardons much.} (Ash-Shūrā: 30). And Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, if you obey those who disbelieve, they will turn you back on your heels, and you will become losers.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 149). And Allāh the Exalted said: {And do not incline toward those who do wrong, lest you be touched by the Fire, and you will have not protectors besides Allāh, nor will you be helped.} (Hūd: 113). And in the authentic Ḥadīth narrated by Aḥmad:

“I have been sent with the sword until Allāh alone is worshipped, and my provision has been placed under the shadow of my spear, and humiliation and subservience have been decreed for those who disobey my command, and whoever imitates a people is one of them.”

So, the summary of the causes of defeat is:

- We disobeyed Allāh, so we were defeated.
- We forgot Allāh, so we were forgotten.
- We defied Allāh, so we were humiliated.

He (may Allāh have mercy on him) added: "And I present to you some news from the Arab world during the sixties and seventies as proof:

1. The Syrian army kidnapped the intelligence director of Irbid (northwest Jordan). The intelligence director of Daraa (southwest Syria) immediately responded by cursing the Āl al-Bayt. When told, "Should you not exclude the noble Messenger?" he replied, "He is at the top of the list."
2. One of the (accursed) leaders of Palestinian organizations in Jordan, before the Black September turmoil, said: "If the hand of Allāh reached out to us, we would cut it off." Exalted is Allāh above what they associate with Him.
3. In Egypt in 1967, a play called "The Origin of the Story," written by (Bakr al-Sharqāwī), was performed. Its hero was (Allāh, Glorified is He), and the play claimed that man was created before Allāh. Exalted is Allāh above what the deniers blaspheme.
4. The Egyptian tanks that entered Sinai in the 1967 war had written on them "Our Nāṣir (helper) is Nāṣir!" meaning, the one who will grant us victory is (Jamāl ‘Abd al-Nāṣir)! Meanwhile, the Jews wrote texts from the Torah on their tanks.

5. On January 24, 1965, for the first time in Damascus's history, tanks entered the Umayyad Mosque while worshippers were inside. Two hundred of them were martyred, and the mosque was closed for days to remove the Muslim blood that had stained its curtains and miḥrāb.
6. On that day, the Damascus radio announcer said: "We will not allow those who lived in this country fourteen hundred years ago to impose their old systems on us and to lay down for us foundations for life in this era."
7. In the city of Jenin / West Bank / Palestine, a demonstration emerged from Jenin Secondary School. They attacked the Ikhwān center, took out copies of the Qur’ān and exegeses, tore them up, and trampled them underfoot along the main street. This was in April 1967, two months before the [Israeli] attack.
8. When Jamāl ‘Abd al-Nāṣir executed the Islamic thinker Sayyid Quṭb – may Allāh have mercy on him – the people of Nablus / Palestine distributed Kunāfah in celebration of this "victory."
9. One educated woman told me while debating: "Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb did not achieve what ‘Abd al-Nāṣir did." Her husband became angry and said: "By Allāh, Muḥammad did not achieve what ‘Abd al-Nāṣir did."
10. The night password in some bases of the Democratic Front in Jordan in 1969 was: "Curse the Lord, and revile the religion." For example, the (Harasta) base.
11. In a gathering of fedayeen in the village of al-Rām / Irbid / Jordan in 1969, when the Muslim youth (the Ikhwān al-Muslimūn) would call the adhān for prayer, members of the Democratic Popular Front / Nayef Hawatmeh and the Popular Front / George Habash would line up opposite them chanting:

"If you ask about me, these are my values... I am a Marxist-Leninist internationalist."

I saw this with my own eyes.

- i. (Leila Khaled) calls her group the (Guevara) group and declares in a Lebanese newspaper that she is (Marxist) and that she is too great to believe in Allāh because it is "absurd."
- ii. (Fadwa Tuqan) declared in an Israeli newspaper that she denies the existence of Allāh. The Israeli writer tells her: "This is why we built and you demolished... and we triumphed and you were defeated."
- iii. Sa'd Jum'ah says: "We have documents proving that American and British intelligence were behind the Ba'th coup in Iraq on September 17, 1968. The liaison with foreign intelligence was the notorious agent (Lutfi al-'Ubaydi), and al-'Ubaydi was in constant contact with a number of Ba'thists, foremost among them Aḥmad Ḥasan al-Bakr."
- iv. Haykal writes in Al-Ahrām (January 15, 1971), borrowing the words of the French writer Malraux: "I have a vision of Islām spreading rapidly in Egypt, and that Egypt is always searching for a Pharaoh to represent the sublimity of its spirit... Islām did not spread rapidly after the Arab conquest, but it spread rapidly after the Caliphate when the Caliph – with temporal and spiritual authority in his hand – became a Pharaoh wearing a turban instead of a crown."
- v. The Iraqi Ba'th newspaper wrote – when the Ba'th first took power in Iraq – about Michel 'Aflaq "(the returning god)." Their poet said:

"O my master, my object of worship, and my god... The torment of your divine fragments is enough for me, enough!"

vi. Ibrāhīm Khlāṣ said in the Syrian "People's Army Magazine" on April 25, 1967 (one month before the defeat):

"The only way to build Arab civilization and construct Arab society is to create the new Arab socialist man who believes that: Allāh, religions, feudalism, capitalism, colonialism, the over-satiated, and all the values that dominated the previous society are nothing but mummified puppets in the museums of history."

vii. Elements of the units, companies, and party members – affiliated with the authorities in Syria – put up banners saying the following: "Down with Allāh," "Al-Asad is our Lord,"

"No god but the homeland, and no messenger but the Ba‘th."

This was in Rajab 1400 AH, corresponding to May 1980 CE.

And I think this quotation of such scum is sufficient.

And I will take you to another page about our enemies – the Jews.

1. Dayan's daughter says in her book "A Soldier of Israel": "Our muscles were trembling [with fear] when we heard that the enemy was on the southern front, but when the Rabbi came and prayed with us, fear turned into security." (And she says: "The rituals in the Torah stipulate that soldiers be given canned food on the Sabbath. When they brought us fresh, cooked food before the battle – on Saturday, June 3, 1967 – the soldiers refused to eat, so the Chief Rabbi issued a fatwā permitting this during mobilization.")
2. Golda Meir says: "The sole basis of our strength is the connection of every Jew in the world to us, a connection of faith."

3. Ben-Gurion and Zalman Shazar attended Churchill's funeral procession. It was a Saturday, so they walked about 6 km because riding in a car is forbidden for them on the Sabbath, even though they had reached extreme old age.
4. Ben-Gurion wrote to De Gaulle – Prime Minister of France – in 1967, saying: "The secret of our survival after the Babylonian and Roman destruction and the hatred of the Christians who surrounded us for a thousand years lies in our spiritual connection to the Holy Scripture. When the British Royal Commission came at the end of 1926 to study the future of the Mandate, I told them: Our Mandate is the Torah. We have drawn our strength from it to resist an ordinary world and to continue in the faith of our return to our land."
5. In the final pages of Weizmann's memoirs – which is considered a general recommendation for Israel – "Our goal is to build a civilization based on the strict ideals of Jewish ethics; from those ideals we must not deviate.... If Jews, in their activities, aim for true values... when God looks with compassion upon His children who have returned after a long wandering to their home to serve Him, with a psalm on their lips, reviving their ancient land and making it a center of human civilization."
6. When Dayan entered al-Quds in 1967, he said: "O, the vengeance for Khaybar!" And the Israeli soldiers – I heard their recorded voices from Israeli radio – said: "Muḥammad died... Muḥammad died... and left behind daughters."
7. The Rabbi refused to officiate the marriage contract of (Ben-Gurion's daughter), the Prime Minister of Israel, because her mother was not Jewish, and the Torah considers lineage through the mother.

8. Begin said during a meeting with Sādāt about the West Bank: "I am a man who believes in the Torah. My spiritual father Jabotinsky raised me – just as Ḥasan al-Bannā raised Sayyid Quṭb among you. I consider withdrawing from the West Bank a violation of the Torah and my spiritual principles."
These brothers told me about our brothers in the occupied territory of 1948 who translated it from Hebrew.
9. Ben-Gurion said when he entered al-Quds in 1967: "This is the dearest day to me since I entered the Promised Land."
10. After the occupation of al-Quds (1967), Levi Eshkol came carrying a small piece of paper on which he had written his wishes and placed it in a crack in the Wailing Wall (al-Burāq Wall for Muslims), as old women do among us.
11. In a radio interview with an Israeli soldier on the Suez Front in the summer of 1969, the announcer said to him: "You are a young man of twenty, and you came to Israel after the Six-Day War from California. What motivated you?"
The young man said: "My religion motivated me and my faith drove me to come to the Holy Land to fulfill the message of the prophets, and the happiness I feel in defending my religious beliefs is unparalleled by any happiness in this world."
12. Israel has revived the Hebrew language – the language of the Torah – after it had become archaic for three thousand years. So names like Histadrut, Knesset, and Eilat have become the names of institutions and cities.
13. Have you understood, after this comparison, why the Jews were victorious?
And let not some be deceived by their saying: "We Muslims are better than the Jews in any case." ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with them) wrote to Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ: "Now then, I advise you and the soldiers with you to have taqwá of Allāh in all circumstances, for taqwá of Allāh is the best preparation against the enemy... Indeed, the sins of the army are more to be feared than their enemy, and Muslims are only granted victory through their enemy's disobedience to Allāh... If we are equal to them in disobedience, they will have an advantage in strength... And Allāh gave the Zoroastrian disbelievers authority over the Jews, even though they were People of the Book." (End quote).

End of the quotation from the words of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him).

The New World Order 1990 and the Launch of the Third Crusades Led by America

The West consolidated its control over the resources of the Islamic world. And its plan succeeded in appointing its allies to manage its affairs without incurring any losses. Major American and European monopolies siphoned off the cream of our countries' bounties and wealth, without any oversight or accountability, and without any sign of resistance. The Soviet Union collapsed after its historic mistake in Afghanistan, as we have seen. And the leaders of NATO declared that they had chosen Islam as an alternative strategic enemy. The international and regional campaigns to combat terrorism, following the Afghan Jihād against the Russians, bore their fruit. The cadres of the Jihādī current and its organizations were dispersed, and the West achieved what it wanted in dismantling them. The political Islamic Awakening (Şahwah) was besieged, its parties were domesticated, and led into labyrinths of futility and paths of deviation. The situation stabilized for Israel, and Palestinian revolutionaries became engaged in the Oslo Accords! And senior Muslim scholars issued fatāwā affirming the legitimacy of the American presence in the Arabian Peninsula! They also issued fatāwā affirming the legitimacy of normalization with the Jewish occupation of Palestine and Bayt al-Maqdis!!

Thus, there was apparently no visible reason for the West to return to the method of military campaigns against Muslims. But the surprise was that the West, led by America and with the subservience of Britain, NATO Europe, and Russia, decided to advance militarily on the Islamic world in general, and the Middle East in particular, in what appeared to be a new direct reoccupation, and a new American-British Crusader Sykes-Picot.

So why did the West take this step? Knowing that its spoils were arriving effortlessly, without toil or blood, delivered by Arab and Muslim leaders!

In my opinion, this is due to several reasons. Some relate to the Crusaders and their new leadership—America and its allies. Some relate to the Jews and their Zionist project in Israel. And some relate to the new circumstances in our Islamic world and its Jihādī awakening. I will summarize these in the following points:

Reasons for the Third Crusader Campaigns against the Islamic World since 1990:

First: Reasons Related to the New Romans (America - Europe - Russia):

1. The severe economic deterioration, recession, inflation, and decline in financial revenues in the Western industrial world, due to many reasons, the most important of which is the shrinking of colonial revenues from the Third World as a result of the awakening of peoples and their realization of the value of their wealth, and the emergence of some national regimes working to alleviate poverty in their countries and stop the bleeding of plunder from their national reserves towards the colonial West. Western civilization also suffered as a result of luxury and affluent living, from a decline in the productive sector of society in the fields of agriculture and basic industries, at the expense of a massive expansion in the non-productive consumer segments of luxury professions (Arts - security - research - merchants - athletes, etc.). The trade balance also declined due to the inability of poor countries to consume what rich countries produce and their decreased purchasing power, consequently, the industrial West's ability to sell its products decreased. There are also two fatal factors that have eroded the economic and social structure of Western civilization, which many Western researchers and writers have recently elaborated on with boldness and frankness, sounding the alarm about them: these are (the spread of ribā in all joints of the Western economy) and (women working in men's fields of work and abandoning their position in the home). Due to (ribā), the Western economy has experienced what Allāh warned would happen to those who engage in it—destruction (al-mahq), as Allāh the Exalted said: {Allāh destroys ribā}. So the Western economy, and most of the global economy, is practically heading towards (al-mahq). Women's work also led to the spread of unemployment among men. It also led to the destruction of the family's social structure and economic decline. All this and more made colonial powers, led by America and Britain, need to increase their colonial revenues to cover their economic deficits by controlling the sources of wealth, especially energy sources (oil and gas) in the Middle East, the Arab-Persian Gulf, and the Caspian Sea region. So that America could control the nerve center of the global economy and consequently drain it for the benefit of its own economy.

2. The allure of power that dominated the American administration and the madness of the imperial dream:

American military power swelled enormously, to the point where it alone became greater than the combined capabilities of NATO and Russia, according to reports from global strategic studies centers. Its technological capabilities also advanced astoundingly, making it a legendary, undisputed power, especially in air capabilities, cruise missiles, and control over the entire earth through the vast espionage capabilities of satellites and its ability to direct missile, air, and naval strikes. Its possession of the world's largest nuclear arsenal naturally gave rise to the American administration's dream of unilaterally ruling the world. The writings of its theorists were replete with this, perhaps even two decades before the demise of the Soviet Union, as they adopted and theorized about unilateral world rule, planning for the twenty-first century to be an American century, for America to lead the Roman civilization, inherit its glories, and conquer the world. It was natural for America to think of subjugating its allies and defeating its adversaries by seizing the lifeline and nerve center of the industrial world—that is, by directly occupying and possessing the oil sources. And controlling the world's strategic passages, deploying its forces in all its corners, preventing the rise of any opposing power, and possessing strategic weapons of mass destruction. These convictions crystallized in the late twentieth century among a group of theorists and politicians in the Republican Party who called themselves (the Neoconservatives). Who unfortunately adopted the doctrines of the Zionist dream, the establishment of Israel, and the gathering of Jews therein as a prelude to the descent of the Messiah after a global war with Muslims... and so on with their nonsense, in which religious myths are mixed with colonial dreams.

3. The endeavor of European countries and Russia to assist America out of fear and greed, in addition to the deeply rooted Crusader doctrinal motive common to all of them:

The fear that America alone would effectively possess the sources of energy and power and control them. And greed for the gains that participation could bring, with which to patch up their collapsing economies. Led them all to participate effectively in the Second Gulf War. European participation reached no less than 25%, while Britain alone contributed 15%, and the American proportion of the forces, which numbered one million soldiers, exceeded 55%. The (Desert Storm) or (Liberation of Kuwait) war, as they called it, resulted in the destruction of Iraq and its army, and the entrenchment of Britain and America in the heart of the Arab and Islamic region in 1991. Europe, France, Britain, and the Vatican also participated principally in the Crusader war against Muslims in Bosnia (1994-1996) in order to unify religion on the European continent, which was striving for unity based on a Crusader identity. As for Russia, it undertook an independent Crusader chapter in Chechnya in the Caucasus from (1994) to the present day, where the bloody saga continues with European and American participation through silent support or political and media stances. Until America launched its major campaign against Iraq in the Third Gulf War, which they called (Iraqi Freedom!), carried out by America and Britain with active logistical participation from all NATO countries, despite the opposing stance of France, Germany, and Russia, who soon joined the colonial bandwagon for a share of the Iraqi cake. They unanimously recognized the American occupation of Iraq in the Security Council, then continued their descent towards the American path with a reluctance that faded over time into blatant impudence. Thus, the Crusader campaigns materialized due to this intrinsic motive.

Second: The Maturation of the Zionist Project and the Jews' Approach to the Date of Demolishing Al-Masjid al-Aqṣā and Announcing the Kingdom of Greater Israel According to Talmudic Dreams:

Senior Zionist leaders did not hide in their writings and interviews their greatest dream, which is the establishment of Greater Israel from the Euphrates to the Nile. Nor were they ashamed to declare their intention to demolish Al-Aqṣā and erect the alleged Temple of Solomon on its ruins. They also did not hide their intention to establish a purely Jewish state and what that entails of expelling the remaining Muslims and Arabs from the land of Palestine.

After Israel, in cooperation with America, domesticated the ruling regimes in neighboring countries, or what are called the "collar states," and managed, through Sadat, to dismantle the Egyptian army, reducing it to less than a third in number and armament, and after the traitor King Hussein, ruler of Jordan, and his son after him, guaranteed them their longest border with a neighboring country. The Nuṣayrīs in Syria also undertook the gradual dismantling of the Syrian army, the largest and most heavily armed in the region, and the Christians of Lebanon ensured the security of its northern borders. The Jews moved to the stage of imposing political, economic, and cultural normalization on Arab countries, and even aspired for this to include the Islamic world. No Arab military powers remained in the region except Iraq, and no Islamic powers except Pakistan, so the Jews set their sights on the goal of destroying the Iraqi army first. Then the Pakistani [army]. And since they could not do this themselves, it was necessary to bring in Crusader armies, especially the American army, to carry out the mission. Also, the Jews, due to their inherent humiliation, abjectness, fear, and cowardice, do not trust their own army—superior in numbers and armament to the sum of the remaining military strength in neighboring countries—even with more than 250 nuclear warheads ready to destroy any targets they wish around them. They fear that the Arab and Islamic peoples will rebel against their ruling puppets in Arab and Muslim capitals, and find themselves, with their six million, surrounded by hundreds of millions of angry people who harbor hostility towards them and possess enough sacred grudges to crush them if those peoples get the chance. Therefore, the Jews worked to bring in Christian armies to be stationed in the region, to remain, and to work on fragmenting its states into smaller entities and instigating internal sectarian and ethnic wars. This would ensure stability, sovereignty, and military superiority [for Israel], and even ensure that Israel is the only state in the region possessing an army.

This goal was not difficult for the Zionists after their intrigues, cunning, acts of infiltration and espionage, buying of loyalties, and penetration in the Jewish manner over half a century, led to Jewish control over the American government and the governments of most NATO countries. Statistics indicate a frighteningly high percentage of ministers, government members, parliament members, influential agencies, major political parties, all global media outlets, cinema and television production apparatuses, and newspapers... all of them are Jews, or children or spouses of Jewesses. This means their Jewishness is determined according to the doctrine that considers the son of a Jewess to be Jewish. This is in addition to their complete control over the banking system, major global financial institutions, and their control over the United Nations and its subsidiary organizations. The Jews have reached the great 'uluww (haughtiness) mentioned in the Qur'ān, and here they are, spreading corruption in the land as they wish. Jewish rabbis who infiltrated Christianity, especially the prevalent Protestant denomination in America and Britain, were able to invent and establish in America extremist Crusader ecclesiastical denominations and organizations based on a duality of doctrinal source, such that the doctrine in the United States became Zionism, Israel's hopes and dreams, and the superiority of its chosen people. Until the supporters of these organizations and churches reached tens of millions, their financial resources amounted to billions, and their ownership of television networks and media outlets made them a tyrannical empire, enabling the Zionist lobby to manipulate the US Congress and American elections as it pleased. Thus, new theorists emerged in American politics in both the Democratic and Republican parties, especially in the latter, and they undertook to support Israel's programs, which were close to achieving their goals. And so the Jews drove the American army and the Crusader armies of Europe to occupy the Middle East, commencing this by destroying the last remaining army, the Iraqi army, through the 1991 war and the 2003 war.

Thus, they would avenge the Jews against Iraq and the land of Babylon, according to their beliefs, avenge the Babylonian captivity period, and make the descendants of those ancestors taste the most heinous forms of humiliation and disgrace, just as they ensured the dismantling of Iraq and the crushing of its capabilities. Pressure was renewed towards Syria, where the compulsory conscription system was abolished for the first time in its history since independence. This will reduce the size of the Syrian army, which numbers nearly a million soldiers, to less than 20% of its strength, to be based on volunteers, the vast majority of whom are Nuṣayrīs and members of other religious minorities. Sunni Muslims, who are the overwhelming majority of Syria's population, will remain an unarmed majority whose skin the Jews and their agents can flay whenever they wish. America's attention is also openly turning towards dismantling and dividing Turkey, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt. And it deploys in the Near Middle East—what they call the Central Command area of operations—more than 1.5 million American soldiers, about a million of whom are stationed in Arab countries from Baghdad to Tangier, with about two-thirds of them in the Middle East region!!! Thus, Zionist reasons were fundamental to the presence of the Crusaders. And Bush's announcement these days of the launch of what he called the (Greater Middle East) project.

Third: Reasons Related to the Conditions of the Islamic World:

As will be detailed in the following two chapters regarding the path of the Jihādī Islamic Awakening. The activity of the Islamic Awakening, which proceeded along three axes – da‘wah (proselytizing), political, and armed Jihādī – led to it becoming a terrifying specter threatening the interests of the Crusaders and the Zionist project in the region. Parties adopting the Islamic project spread and managed to form large parliamentary blocs in several Arab and Islamic countries. Some even formed governments, as in Turkey, or nearly did so, as in Algeria. The da'wah activities of various schools of the Awakening also led to the Islamization of large sectors of society, even if only emotionally. However, more dangerously, the authorities' suppression of various peaceful fields of the Awakening, which was an arrangement to besiege it, led to the expansion of the Jihādī Awakening and an increase in its achievements and experiences, especially after its cadres matured and grew through the first experience of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan (1984-1992). The Islamic phenomenon posed a real threat to Arab and Islamic regimes, and the Crusaders became uneasy about the performance of those regimes they had established in the region, as well as their fate. Despite the success of these regimes in suppressing all schools of the Awakening, causing them to fail in achieving their goals and practically pushing them into the mire of crisis, the West, having studied our civilizational makeup, knows the danger of the ember hidden beneath the currently still ashes. It saw its actual military presence as the best guarantor of its interests and decided it must implement a new Sykes-Picot agreement to divide the already divided and fragment the already fragmented entities, thereby securing its interests, as it imagines, by itself and under the guard of its soldiers' bayonets.

Thus, these three reasons converged for these Third Crusader Campaigns to advance and once again sweep through the Middle East.

Stages of the Third Crusader Campaigns (1990 - 2003)

1. The First Iraq War (Desert Storm – Kuwait Liberation War)

America inaugurated its Crusader campaigns immediately after the collapse of the Soviet Union (1990) by implementing its program, prepared since the mid-seventies, for which it had formed the Rapid Deployment Forces to control oil sources. Many studies and books at the time discussed scenarios of fabricating a threat to the Gulf states, either from Iraq or Iran, to justify American intervention.

Indeed, as became known in the media, Ṣaddām Ḥusayn was lured by the American ambassador in Baghdad and enticed to occupy Kuwait. The Iraqi army had reached a high level of proficiency after the first Gulf War with Iran (1979-1987). Since then, American and British forces established a heavy presence in the region. As I mentioned earlier at the beginning of this research, the governments of Arab countries, led by Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, Morocco, Pakistan, Syria, Jordan, Egypt, and Turkey, actively participated. Their armies fought the Iraqi army under American command. However, the most prominent factor in the shifting power dynamics of the Third Crusader Campaigns was the entry of official religious institutions, the establishments of the "scholars of the Sultan," and a large segment of the Islamic Awakening's leadership into this American-led alliance. The treacherous rulers pushed them to issue Fatāwā that legitimized the presence of the Crusaders, their stationing in the Arabian Peninsula, and their control over the heartland of Muslims. But the most calamitous aspect of this matter was the slide of the domesticated and corrupt among some Awakening leaders into signing Fatāwā that legitimized this, as a result of their entry through the gates of democracy to become part of the official authorities in apostate governments. This Fitnah was part of the price paid by those who dabbled in the swamps of un-Islamic politics, as they transgressed what was narrated from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him):

"Whoever frequents the gates of rulers will be put to trial (iftutan)," and "A servant does not draw nearer to the ruler except that he becomes further from Allāh."

American forces crushed the Iraqi army, leaving more than 300,000 dead among civilians and military personnel, and destroyed Iraq's infrastructure, built over half a century of independence. Then, they imposed a deadly siege on Iraq for thirteen years, during which more than one and a half million Iraqi children were killed, not to mention their relatives who died due to acute shortages of food and medicine.

Thus, America prepared Iraq for the next war, in which it finished it off in March and April 2003.

Immediately after the first Iraq War, and as a precautionary measure against the anticipated resistance that would arise in reaction to these Crusader campaigns – a resistance expected from Jihādī movements and the youth of the Islamic Awakening – America launched its campaign to hunt down Jihādīs and symbols of the Jihādī Awakening under the pretext of combating terrorism. The pace of global and regional security conferences escalated during the Clinton administration, which succeeded Bush Sr., as America continued its attacks on the Islamic world. It maintained the siege on Iraq, forced Arab and Islamic countries into normalization projects with the Jews, and took upon itself the task of combating "Islamic terrorism," as they described it.

2. Crusader Massacres of Muslims in the Balkans and the Caucasus (1994 - 1997)

Amidst the momentum of the American Crusader onslaught against the Islamic world and claims of combating terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism, the Russians exploited the global circumstances to confront Muslims and launched their bloody war on Chechnya. The most heinous massacres were committed, and Chechen Muslims were subjected to a war of extermination, for which they continue to offer sacrifices in the thousands to this day...

Similarly, Serbs and Croats, with support from the Vatican and the backing and silence of European countries, waged a war of extermination against Muslims in Bosnia and then Kosovo. The most horrific massacres were perpetrated, claiming hundreds of thousands of Muslim lives under the very eyes and ears of the United Nations, even within its protected zones, as happened in the Srebrenica massacre. There, French protection forces, tasked with guarding a UN safe haven, withdrew to allow Serb militias to kill more than 8,000 Bosnian Muslim civilians, mostly women, children, and the elderly, in the largest series of genocidal massacres in Europe since World War II.

3. The Siege of the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan and its Destruction (2001)

It did not sit well with the Americans and NATO-Europe, who had planned and executed the civil war between Mujāhidīn factions in Afghanistan (1992-1996) to implement the United Nations program. This program stipulated that the Western Red Cross, succeeding the Eastern Red Hammer and Sickle, should rule Afghanistan after the weapons and Jihādī expertise accumulated in Afghanistan were consumed in that civil war. It did not sit well with them that fate would surprise them with the emergence of the Ṭālibān and their success in implementing Sharīʿah and establishing the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan. Nor did it sit well with them that the global anti-terrorism campaigns against Jihādī current cadres and Arab Afghans would result in their return to Afghanistan, forming, alongside the Ṭālibān, a focal point that deeply troubled America, the West, and their deputies among the apostate rulers.

So, America and Europe began economic and political siege operations against the Islamic Emirate from its inception. This continued under the Clinton administration, which concluded it by firing 75 cruise missiles at some camps of Arab Mujāhidīn and the Ṭālibān. The siege persisted under Bush Jr., who proclaimed he was entrusted by the Lord with a message to reform the world and was heading a Crusader campaign to combat Islamic terrorism. He inaugurated that campaign after the September events by invading Afghanistan, destroying the Islamic Emirate, and exterminating whomever he could of the Arab and Muslim refugees in Afghanistan in December 2001.

4. The War of Occupation of Iraq (March 2003) and the American Advance on the Middle East

We have already discussed this sufficiently, which obviates the need for repetition.

The State of Authorities in the Islamic World and the Jihādī Current Standing Alone Against the Third Crusader Campaigns

As for the political authority for Muslims:

As we have discussed, Crusader colonialism destroyed it with the fall of the Khilāfah, and it has not been re-established since. Instead, the rulers of Muslim lands became part of the power equation alongside the Crusaders, and this became even more atrocious during the Third Crusader Campaigns.

As for the religious authority:

The treacherous agent governments undertook its liquidation in all Arab countries and most of the Islamic world, as previously mentioned. The Islamic Awakening attempted to offer an alternative and take the reins of authority. Prominent scholars, qualified and distinguished leaders, and numerous leading figures from its various schools emerged and became qualified. However, for many reasons that we will discuss in detail in the following paragraphs, the Awakening was unable to provide an alternative to the classical authority represented by the Imāms of the four Madhāhib, jurisprudential references, and Imāms of the Ṣūfī orders. In essence, it could not become a popular authority possessing the obedience and allegiance of the Muslim populace...

Thus, there was no qualified religious authority to confront the Third Crusader Campaigns.

As for the social authority:

We had previously spoken of its disintegration since the mid-twentieth century due to colonialism, social development towards industrialization, migration to major cities, and the breakdown of tribal bonds. This process continued at an accelerated pace. The role of nomadic and rural areas in politics declined in favor of major cities and urban life, which gives no weight to these bonds. With the exception of some Islamic countries like Afghanistan, Yemen, and a few others, this authority was too weak to play a role in the confrontation. It had been the policy of all rulers to eliminate this authority, disarm tribes and clans, implement policies of division among them, and weaken each one individually. Naturally, these authorities were always subordinate to the religious authority, or to both religious and political authorities. Therefore, this authority was also absent from the arena of confrontation, like its predecessors in this recent confrontation.

So, who stood up to the Third Crusader Campaigns from 1990 to 2001?

In truth, and in short...

The Third Crusader Campaigns advanced after having cleared away all potential for resistance before them. They had virtually eliminated all authorities and, to a large extent, the elements necessary for the emergence of resistance and confrontation among Arab and Islamic peoples. If the Second Campaigns had proceeded with insight and experience from two centuries of the First Campaigns, and from 500 years of studies and research on this Ummah at all levels thereafter, then these new American-Jewish Crusader campaigns come against the backdrop of all that, in addition to the experiences of the Second Campaigns and the services provided by the class of apostate rulers and their Westernized agents for half a century or more.

All means of success were also available to them. While there might have been some balance in the on-the-ground confrontation data between the forces of the First and even Second Crusader Campaigns and the Mujāhidīn forces that faced them in numbers and equipment, the regression of Muslims to the abyss of backwardness in most fields, the rise of American civilization technologically and militarily to the peak of development, and the aforementioned destruction by their ruling deputies of all potential for resistance, practically left the arena almost empty in this conflict. The confrontation today has become completely imbalanced.

As for a summary of the pulses of resistance to the Third Crusader Campaigns and their apostate and munāfiqīn (hypocrite) collaborators during (1990 - September 2001), the most important can be mentioned in chronological order, as I recall them now, as follows:

- The Armed Jihād Movement in Algeria (1991-1995), which was eliminated over the following two years through a successful and highly complex intelligence operation involving cooperation between Algerian, French, and some Arab intelligence services. The Jihād was derailed and destroyed after being isolated from its popular base due to its deviation (for details on that experience, one can refer to the book - My Testimony on the Jihād in Algeria - by the author).
- The armed Jihādī confrontations that took place in Libya against the Gaddafi regime (1993-1995), the most prominent of which was the attempt by the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group (LIFG). The regime managed to curtail its military activity within Libya, and it shifted to clandestine organizational da‘wah work and activity in exile.
- The Movement for the Enforcement of Sharī‘ah in northwestern Pakistan (1996), which the Pakistani government crushed amidst the indifference of the Muslim populace and the failure of the Awakening movements in Pakistan to support it.

- The Aden-Abyan Army Movement in Yemen, led by the martyr Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār (may Allāh have mercy on him), which was nipped in the bud (1998).
- The Jihādī Youth Movement in the Nabatiyeh mountains, northern Lebanon, led by the martyr Abū ‘Ā’ishah al-Lubnānī, which was nipped in the bud (1999).
- The Ṭālibān movement, which started in 1994, established the Emirate in 1996, and fell in late 2001. Along with the Arab, Pakistani, and Central Asian Jihādī groups that joined it, it was one of the most significant Jihādī phenomena of the past decade.
- The Palestinian Armed Intifāḍah, which began in 2000 and continues to this day. It is one of the most important chapters of Jihādī confrontation and resistance against the Third Jewish-Crusader Campaigns.
- A number of limited Jihādī attempts and individual initiatives undertaken by Mujāhidīn against various forms of Crusader presence in the Arab and Islamic world, which occurred in different countries during the past decade. This includes some modest resistance operations in Saudi Arabia against the Americans, the most important of which were the Riyadh and Khobar bombings.
- Resistance and self-defense operations carried out by remnants of the Jihādī current in the face of the post-September manhunt campaign in various countries around the world. This was particularly true in confronting the disaster perpetrated by the Pakistani government during its pursuit of survivors on its territory, which resulted in the deaths of dozens of Arab Mujāhidīn and the capture of over 600 of them, who were handed over to America to be held in the historic Guantanamo detention camp and other American prisons in various locations...

- Jihād movements that spread in Central Asia against communist governments backed by the Soviet Union, especially in Tajikistan (1993-2001), followed by those in Uzbekistan (1997-2001).
- Likewise, the Jihād of Muslims in East Turkestan (Xinjiang) (1996-2001) against the Chinese government.
- This is in addition to the resistance and confrontation movements against Crusader forces in various Jihād arenas during this period, such as the Jihād in Bosnia (1994-1996), as well as in Chechnya during the same period and subsequently, which is still ongoing. Also, the heroic confrontation carried out by Mujāhidīn in Somalia. And the old and ongoing Jihād movements during this phase in the Philippines, Kashmir, Eritrea, Burma, Indonesia, and other fronts that ignited or were already active and continued against the Crusaders and other colonialist Kuffār.
- In addition to some operations carried out by the al-Qā'idah organization against the American presence in the region, the most important of which were the bombings of the American embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, and the bombing of the USS Cole in Aden. Then came the last of them, the martyrdom operations in New York and Washington (September 11, 2001), which opened a new chapter of confrontation between the Crusaders and the Muslims and changed the face of history and the dynamics of the conflict.

Upon careful study of the equation of conflict between the Muslims and the Third Crusader Campaigns from 1990 to the occupation of Iraq in 2003, we find that its equation has taken the following form:

The nation of Jews (headed by Israel) + The nation of Christians (headed by America, Britain, NATO countries, and Russia) + Factions of apostate rulers in the Islamic world + Forces of hypocrites (headed by the official religious establishment, the scholars of the Sultan, and the corrupt among the leaders of the Awakening in our lands) vs. The armed Jihādī current (groups and individuals) = The resistance forces were defeated, the Jihādī current was besieged, the Islamic Awakening was paralyzed, and the Ummah exited the battle.

● A Contemplative Pause with the Equations of Conflict between Muslims and the Three Crusader Campaigns:

We found that the equations of conflict with those campaigns were as follows:

The First Crusader Campaigns (1050-1291): Its equations were:

Nation of the Cross vs. Nation of Islam = The Nation of Islam was victorious... (1)

The Second Crusader Campaigns (Old Colonialism Phase) (1800-1970):

Nation of the Cross + Nation of Jews vs. Nation of Islam = The Nation of Islam was victorious... (2)

The Second Crusader Campaigns (Modern Colonialism Phase) (Independence Phase):

Nation of the Cross + Nation of Jews + Factions of Apostate Governments vs. The Islamic Awakening (Sahwah) =

The Islamic Awakening was defeated, and the Ummah exited the battle (3)

The Third Crusader Campaigns (American Phase) (1990-2003):

The nation of Jews (headed by Israel) + The nation of Christians (headed by America and Britain) + Factions of apostate rulers in the Islamic world + Forces of hypocrites (headed by the official religious establishment, the scholars of the Sultan, and the corrupt among the leaders of the Awakening in our lands) vs. The armed Jihādī current (groups and individuals) =

The resistance forces were defeated, the Jihādī current was besieged, the Awakening was paralyzed, and the Ummah exited the battle (4)

And if we wish to make some explanatory observations for a deeper understanding of these terrible historical equations and the great lessons we can derive from them, so that we may realize the reasons for defeat and seek the components of victory where it occurred, so that it may be repeated for us, by Allāh's permission, we find the following:

1. The first truth these equations present to us is that, in summary, we were victorious in equations (1) and (2), defeated in (3), and crushed in (4). It is perfectly clear that we were victorious when the Ummah confronted its enemy militarily despite the vast disparity in numbers and equipment. In our current contemporary reality, there are repeated examples of this, as happened in Afghanistan when the Ummah confronted its enemy with all its strata, and this was partially repeated in Chechnya and Bosnia, even though we are in a time of defeat and retreat.

Likewise, the equations clarify that we were defeated when a limited segment confronted the enemy while the Ummah stood by watching, and we were crushed when most of this segment withdrew from the confrontation, and indeed a portion of the Ummah joined the enemy, leaving only a small handful of Jihādīs in the confrontation. It is as if the equations can be simply summarized in two equations:

Ummah of Islam... vs. Nations of Kufr... = ...We were victorious.

Elite of the Ummah vs. Nation of Kufr + Hypocrites of the Ummah = ...We were defeated.

So, the first lesson learned from this example and these equations is that we must bring the Ummah back to the confrontation so that "the confrontation becomes a battle of the Ummah and not conflicts of an elite," as is currently the case. The first thing this necessitates is that the elite convinces the Ummah that whoever stands with the enemy is not from it but is part of the enemy – {And whoever is an ally to them among you, then indeed, he is [one] of them} – and that confronting him is from the core of Jihād and not a fitnah.

2. That the Ummah mobilized when it had an exemplary Sharī‘ah authority/reference point to move it, whereas neither the Sahwah nor its Jihādī elite could form an authority that could convince the Ummah to move with it. Any elite undertaking resistance must work to form an authority that includes Jihād leaders, its scholars, thinkers, and symbols, and rally the Ummah around it.
3. That the enemy was defeated before us in the arenas of military confrontation, but it triumphed over us when it paved the way for its invasion with an intellectual and civilizational invasion, and dismantled the infrastructures that generate the seeds of resistance in the Ummah. We must begin by restoring this structure, in addition to what is necessary for launching the resistance as we previously indicated. (Refer to: The Presented Levels of Resistance).
4. That the Jews entered the Second Crusader Campaigns as an auxiliary element in old colonialism, but they transformed into a leading and driving vanguard for the Third Crusader Campaigns. We must confront them in this capacity and give the destruction of their vanguard, Israel, and their tool, America, a priority commensurate with the scale of their role and danger in the coming stage.
5. Equations (3) and (4) show that the murtaddīn (apostates) practically decided the battle in favor of the Crusader-Jewish enemy by deceiving the Ummah with their false affiliation to Muslims and their forged national identity. Therefore, the vanguards of Jihād and resistance, their directed media, and their intellectual leaders who theorize about the future of action must re-emphasize the role of the primary instigators of the murtaddīn – who are the Crusaders – and direct the resistance towards them. This is because doing so will re-engage the Ummah in the battle and convince it to fight the murtaddīn as followers of the Crusaders, seeing them as part of the real and primary enemy, and as nothing more than a mere cover for it.

6. The last equation highlights America's role as a leading power in the campaigns and as a main bloc in military weight, which gives confronting it a major priority. It also draws attention, by understanding the internal contradictions within the Crusader alliance and between its three axes (America-Britain / Western Europe / Russia), to the necessity of working to dismantle this alliance and isolate the American-Zionist axis as much as possible. A detailed explanation of this will come in the political theory section of Chapter Eight, inshā'Allāh.
7. Through observation, we find that all European peoples stood behind their armies and kings, supporting and endorsing them in the First and Second Crusader Campaigns. However, the spread of concepts of civilizational communication and peace movements in many segments of European society, and the increased knowledge of Islam in Europe, led vast, million-strong crowds to adopt positions of opposition and condemnation towards those campaigns, even in Britain. Meanwhile, the overwhelming majority of the Zionist-leaning American society stood behind its Judaized Crusader president, Bush, and his soldiers. This is a matter that must be considered as we formulate future theories of resistance.
8. A look at the final picture of the equation shows it has returned to its form in the early days of Islam, to be:

Jews + Christians + Mushrikīn + Murtaddīn + Munāfiqīn vs. The Jihādī Believers.

Thus, we return as we began, and Islam and its steadfast, patient, believing people return as strangers, just as they began as strangers. So, ṭūbā (glad tidings) to the ghurabā' (strangers) of the first and the last, and we ask Allāh to make us among them.

9. The final observation. It is of utmost importance and constitutes a fundamental pillar in understanding the nature of our current conflict, and it must be a fundamental pillar of the Jihādī creed of the resistance in this era. It is the following important paragraph:

- The role of the hypocrites from among the scholars of the Sultan, and the corrupt from among the leaders of the Islamic Awakening, in the defeat of the Muslim Ummah and its Jihādī vanguard before the enemies:

10. Before the contemporary Crusader campaigns during the independence era, especially after the new American Crusader campaign.

As we discussed in the previous chapter regarding the emergence of the school of the scholars of the Sultan in Islamic history, since the transformation of the Khilāfah Rāshidah into the biting kingship, then the coercive kingship, then the establishment of the rule of the ṭawāghīt. And how Muslims followed the sunan (ways/patterns) of those before them, the Jews and Christians. And authority among them became, as it had been throughout history in all misguided kingdoms, based on "the ruler, the priest, and the aides." The scholars of the Sultan lined up at the gates of the Umayyad sultans from the second half of the first Hijrī century, merely fifty years after the death of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him). And the sayings of the scholars of truth who shunned the gates of the emirs have recorded for us some texts forbidding those scholars of the Sultan, denouncing them, and warning the common people of their corruption. For, in opposition to that miserable group of scholars of the Sultan, there arose scholars of truth who proclaimed it, held the emirs accountable, and upheld Allāh's right concerning rulers and ruled. This group (scholars of truth) continued to dwindle while the faction of the scholars of the sultans expanded over time, and its role became corrupted with the increase and development of the corruption of kingship from biting, to coercive, to the kingship of the ṭawāghīt. Until today, a category of "scholars of colonialism" and "jurists of the Pentagon" has arisen, and the machinery of the war of ideas has been equipped with "scholars of counter-terrorism" under the leadership of Rumsfeld...! And to Allāh belongs the command before and after.

The role of this wicked faction of scholars of the Sultan was limited in supporting the First Crusader Campaigns, as the Ummah and its religious authorities stood against that Crusader invasion. The role of the corrupt among them was limited to supporting kings and emirs who betrayed their Ummah and collaborated with them, such as al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā'īl Ayyūb, king of Damascus, who allied with the Crusaders, allowed them into the markets of Damascus, sold them weapons, and gave them possession of some Muslim fortresses, as well as some emirs of al-Andalus who collaborated with the Christians, gave them possession of Muslim fortresses, and cooperated with them. Historical documents have mentioned some of this, such as what was said by Imām Ibn Ḥazm, who lived at that time in the fifth Hijrī century, i.e., the eleventh Gregorian century. Ibn Ḥazm said about the emirs of al-Andalus in his time, in his book Al-Talkhīṣ fī Wujūh al-Takhlīṣ:

"This is a matter by which we have been tested, we ask Allāh for safety. It is an evil fitnah that has destroyed religions, except for whom Allāh the Exalted has protected, for many reasons that would take long to discuss. The crux of it is that every administrator of a city or fortress in any part of this al-Andalus of ours, from one end to the other, is at war with Allāh and His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), striving to spread corruption in the land. This is due to what you see plainly of their launching raids on the wealth of the Muslim subjects who are under the rule of their opponents, and their permitting their soldiers to commit highway robbery. They impose jizyah, customs duties, and taxes on the necks of Muslims. They give Jews and Christians authority over the main roads of the Muslims, excusing themselves with necessities that do not permit what Allāh has forbidden. Their aim in this is to perpetuate the enforcement of their commands and prohibitions.

So do not deceive yourselves, and do not be fooled by the fussāq and those affiliated with fiqh, who wear sheep's skins over wolves' hearts, who beautify evil for the people of evil, and support them in their wickedness.

So, our deliverance from it is to hold our tongues, completely and in detail, except for enjoining good or forbidding evil and condemning all of them. By Allāh, if they knew that worshipping crosses would advance their affairs, they would rush to it. We see them seeking help from the Christians, empowering them over the sanctities of the Muslims, and perhaps even giving them cities and fortresses willingly, emptying them of Islam and filling them with church bells.

May Allāh curse all of them and unleash upon them a sword from His swords. Whoever is unable to do that, I hope that taqiyyah will suffice him, and that he denounces [it] with his heart. This is despite the fact that if all those who denounce [it] with their hearts were to unite, they would not be overcome in their affair." End quote.

Thus, the Crusader colonialism that led the Second Crusader Campaigns from the seventeenth century to the mid-twentieth century did not overlook the role of this malicious segment in supporting its occupation, aborting resistance, and drying up its roots in the Ummah. Just as the Muslim kings and sultans of that era did not neglect their role in subjugating and enslaving the peoples and extracting their obedience, the colonizer did not neglect it either. The English were able, in every place they occupied in the Islamic world, to recruit some scholars and some Sufi leaders of ṭarīqahs for themselves in Egypt, Sudan, the Indian subcontinent, and elsewhere. Cromer, the British delegate overseeing the colonization of Egypt, wrote many letters to Muḥammad ‘Abduh (Shaykh of al-Azhar at the time), praising him and his cooperation. And when Muḥammad ‘Abduh died, Cromer wrote to his government mourning him as one of Britain's most loyal friends in Egypt!! As Muḥammad ‘Abduh and his teacher al-Afghānī before him had played a prominent role in the Westernization movement and the intellectual invasion among Muslims, even to the extent of becoming members of the first Masonic lodge in the Middle East!!

Indeed, the English went further than using scholars of the Sultan; they created new madhhabs (sects/schools of thought) from scratch and found millions of followers for them over time in the Indian subcontinent, such as the Qādiyāniyyah, the Bahā’iyyah, and others, the most important objective of their creation being to abolish Jihād against the English. France also managed to recruit some scholars from al-Shām and North Africa, and leaders of some Sufi ṭarīqahs, who issued fatwās stating that "France is the decree of Allāh (qadar Allāh)." And whoever fights it is like one who fights the decree of Allāh and rejects what has been decreed and written for the Muslims!

Some Muslim scholars and Shaykhs of ṭarīqahs in Central Asia and the Islamic kingdoms in the Caucasus and surrounding areas also played a prominent role in hypocrisy towards the Tsars, the Bolshevik Revolution, Lenin, and Stalin himself. Documents are available for those who wish to collect them, and this is not the place for exhaustive investigation.

When colonialism departed and national governments and local political parties were established, every party came to have its shaykhs and religious scholars for their electoral campaigns and candidate lists. And every government since that time has had its ministers of Awqāf and fatwā authorities who act hypocritically towards it. Among what we recall in Syria is that Aḥmad Kaftārū, the then Minister of Awqāf, throughout the Nuṣayrī rule in Syria from 1970 until the time of writing (i.e., throughout the era of Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad and his son Bashār), was, in 1954, leading the electoral campaign for Khālīd Bakdāsh, the founder of the Syrian and Lebanese Communist Party, who introduced atheism and communism to Bilād al-Shām. He led his electoral campaign in the mosques! In opposition to the electoral campaign of the Muslim Brotherhood and its candidate, Dr. Muṣṭafā al-Sibā'ī, may Allāh have mercy on him. He used to deliver a sermon after the Jumu'ah prayer in the Umayyad Mosque to praise Khālīd Bakdāsh, who would pray eight rak'ahs of the Sunnah prayer after Jumu'ah! While the people and the shaykh waited for him to finish his nawāfil (supererogatory prayers) so they could begin the electoral campaign... Ponder this!!

And so, the Ba'th Party had its scholars of the regime in Syria, until Shaykh Dr. al-'Allāmah Sa'īd Ramaḍān al-Būṭī, in a lecture in Istanbul, Turkey, when asked about the Ḥamāh massacre, which claimed the lives of approximately 50,000 Sunni Muslims from the Syrian Muslim populace at the hands of the Nuṣayrī army and its commander Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad, al-Būṭī said: "The criminals used them as human shields (he means the Mujāhidīn when the city rose up with the Mujāhidīn), so it became permissible for the Wālī al-Amr (ruler) to kill them!" Al-Būṭī's spectacles are numerous, and it would take too long to mention them here. The latest of them was when he led the Janāzah prayer upon the death of Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad, choked with tears as he prayed aloud so that the official television would broadcast his (audible!) du'ā' during the Janāzah prayer. He said: "O Allāh, we – meaning he and those praying behind him from the intelligence services, senior Nuṣayrīs, and Ba‘thists – [testify] that he – meaning Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad – has met You testifying that there is no god but You and that Muḥammad is Your servant and Messenger. O Allāh, gather us – meaning this esteemed assembly and their imām, al-Būṭī – with him in the highest Firdaws!!!!!!!!!!."

This al-Būṭī had his exploits and endeavors in supporting the Lebanese (Christian) and Jordanian (Masonic) governments, and some rulers of the Gulf states. He held a high position in the Ḥasaniyyah Lectures under King Ḥasan II in Morocco. And al-Būṭī's strange book, Al-Jihād: Kayfa Numārisuhu wa Kayfa Nafhamuhu (Jihād: How We Practice It and How We Understand It), in which he concluded that those who wage Jihād against the rulers in this era are not martyrs of truth, nor even rebels!! Rather, they are mischief-makers in the land whose ruling is that they be killed, or crucified, or that their hands and feet be cut off from opposite sides, or that they be exiled from the land!... Among his latest 'achievements' was his fierce stance with the Algerian government against the pioneering Jihādī uprising in Algeria, before the intelligence services took over its leadership and tainted it with takfīr! He did not even approve of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), so he attacked it and considered it to be rebelling against the legitimate government!..

In Egypt, ‘Abd al-Nāṣir had some shaykhs of al-Azhar who issued fatwās for him to kill Sayyid Quṭb and his brothers, and that their repentance was not permissible after he had power over them. And al-Sādāt after him in Egypt had fuqahā’ (jurists) for normalization and peace with the Jews, such as Shaykh al-Sha‘rāwī, who wrote poems praising Fārūq, then wrote poetry praising ‘Abd al-Nāṣir's coup against King Fārūq! And he praised the latter! Then he deified al-Sādāt, and it was he who responded to those who opposed al-Sādāt after his treacherous visit to Jerusalem by saying that the President is in the position of one who is not questioned about what he does, while they are questioned!! Thus, he placed him in the position of the Lord, Exalted is He above what the deniers deny! Then al-Sha‘rāwī acted hypocritically towards Mubārak until just days before his grave closed upon him, in a well-known incident... And he was the one who read the statement signed by six scholars, including the Shaykh of al-Azhar, the Muftī of the State, the Minister of Awqāf, Shaykh Muḥammad al-Ghazālī, and Shaykh al-Qaraḍāwī, in which it was stated that the acts of violence against the government were not Jihād but rather forbidden terrorism. They stated verbatim: "That is because we do not know that the rulers of Egypt have rejected any ruling of Allāh"! This was during the era of Ḥusnī Mubārak, who inherited the Pharaonic throne and with it inherited those who went astray from Egypt's sorcerers and soothsayers. For it was not seen that he rejected any ruling of Allāh in (Egypt)! The Muslim country where prostitutes pay income tax by law to the Ministry of Finance, being considered part of the tourism facilities!!. As for the series of 'Ṭanṭāwiyyāt' (Ṭanṭāwī-isms) from the fatwās of the recent Shaykh of al-Azhar, Sayyid Ṭanṭāwī, they are too infamous for me to recall and too numerous to be present in mind. The latest of them was his support for France in banning Muslim women from wearing the ḥijāb...!

Similarly, the Āl Sa‘ūd in Saudi Arabia had the Council of Senior Scholars, the Call and Guidance (Da‘wah wa al-Irshād), the Supreme Judiciary, and other official religious institutions that had their 'achievements' since King Fayṣal established them. And say the same about the scholars of Morocco (al-Maghrib al-Aqṣā) who bow and prostrate to the king, excusing themselves with the claim of the angels' prostration to Ādam, arguing it was a prostration of gratitude and not of worship. And why should they not prostrate as the angels prostrated to Ādam, when the angels are better than them, and the king is one of Ādam's descendants – most likely –!

And let us not forget the testimony of Abū Shaqrah, the (Salafī) scholar in Jordan, who said that he examined the state of the Ummah and found that the Mujaddid (reviver) of the fifteenth Hijrī century is His Majesty King Ḥusayn the Great, may Allāh protect him. And we do not know how the problem was resolved with the scholars of Saudi Arabia who held a conference on the centenary of King ‘Abd al-‘Azīz's entry into Riyadh with the help of the English, and found that the Mujaddid was King ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Āl Sa‘ūd! And so, say the same about all Arab and Islamic countries and the stance of the scholars of the regime with their kings, presidents, and princes, and their justification of their ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, and the torment and taxes they inflict upon the people, leading up to their allegiance to the Jews and Christians...

But more calamitous than the hideous role played by the scholars of the regime alongside the governments of the ṭawāghīt and the Second and Third Crusader campaigns, is the surprising role played by some corrupt individuals from the leadership of the Islamic Awakening (al-Ṣaḥwah al-Islāmiyyah) itself. For if the hypocritical scholars played the role of the evil muftī alongside the regime, then some of those Awakening leaders themselves entered the regime and became its pillars, under the pretext of maṣlaḥah (public interest) and the art of the possible. As we shall see in the next chapter, in shā’ Allāh. And so, as they represent the Dīn and Islamic work, and some of them belong to the sector of scholars, the tribulation was completed by them, forming, along with the scholars of the regime and the official religious establishment, the crutch of soothsaying alongside the rulers.

But the most malicious role of the faction of the scholars of the regime emerged with the advent of the Third Crusader campaigns led by America since 1990 against the Middle East. When the hordes of Americans, Europeans, their apostate allies, and their soldiers advanced upon us, the scholars of the regime, the jurists of misguidance, and the corrupt ones in the Awakening undertook to clear the mines before those soldiers, destroy any possibility of resistance that might arise, and preemptively strip it of legitimacy. The ruling regime in Saudi Arabia and its religious apparatus organized this, initiating the issuance of fatwās permitting seeking help from kuffār (disbelievers) out of necessity by the legitimate Wulāt al-Umūr (rulers), and conferring legitimacy upon what happened. Thus, they blocked the path for anyone thinking of Jihād. The Makkah Conference of 1990, to which 413 prominent Muslim scholars, Awakening leaders, and religious figures from all fifty-eight countries of the Islamic world were invited, was a key event. Of them, 398 figures attended. They issued a final communiqué that legitimized the American presence and cooperation with it against Iraq, deeming it a legitimate seeking of assistance. Then the calamities continued with fatwās being issued from Saudi Arabia permitting normalization with the Jews, as the Muftī of the land, Shaykh Ibn Bāz, issued the fatwā. The enormity of this fatwā can only be understood when we know that Peres, the then Prime Minister of Israel, when he mentioned it before the Knesset members, they stood up applauding it. Peres praised the 'moderate' Shaykh and called on Muslim youth to follow the opinions of this 'venerable' Shaykh and not to pursue the opinions of the likes of the extremist Ḥizbullāh... So Ponder to what extent the fitnah and tribulation have reached!

Over a black decade (1990-2000), the official religious apparatus, the scholars of the regime, and the agents of the Islamic Awakening within the ruling apostate authorities, their parliaments, and ministries, undertook to combat the Jihādī current, hand in hand with the counter-terrorism project led by America, for which dozens of security conferences were held in the world and in Arab and Muslim lands. This led to the displacement of the Mujāhidīn and their being torn to shreds.

And when the state of Sharīʿah was established in Afghanistan at the hands of the Ṭālibān (1994-2001), these agent religious authorities undertook to overthrow it, hand in hand with the American Crusader efforts, at the behest of their rulers. Even in blatantly sensitive matters, those agent scholars and leaders were not ashamed to render those 'noble' services. One of the clearest and most heinous examples of this is when the Amīr al-Mu'minīn in Afghanistan, Mullā Muḥammad 'Umar, made the decision to demolish the giant ancient statues of Buddha, a team of these scholars and symbols of Islam, headed by Shaykh al-Qaraḍāwī, rushed to Afghanistan – pushed by their rulers who were pushed by their masters, and instigated by international Crusader organizations – to prevent the demolition of the idols! It was a scandal for the official religious apparatus in the Arab and Islamic world, especially in Saudi Arabia and Egypt, who took that glorious deed of the Ṭālibān as a cause to defame them and work for their downfall. This is what America achieved in late 2001, with the active participation of the government of Pakistan, the Gulf states, and their hypocritical religious structures.

And when some limited Jihādī operations were carried out shortly after the First Gulf War in 1991 until the year 2000 against the Crusader invaders, the Council of Senior Scholars issued the ugliest fatwās, ruling that the Mujāhidīn were causing 'corruption in the land' (ifsād fī al-arḍ) and that their punishment was execution, amputation, and exile. So they called the people to fight them and threatened them with not entering Paradise, which had become the property of the Muslim 'Popes' residing in Saudi Arabia, distributing its estates to the people, and determining who would smell its fragrance and who would not, just as the Christian Popes did in the Middle Ages!

And when the events of September 2001 occurred, and America used them as a pretext, marched on Afghanistan, and overthrew the legitimate Imārah (Emirate) there, George Bush then launched his Crusader campaign under the banner of 'Combating Terrorism.' The hypocritical structure of Muslim scholars and many leaders of the Awakening rushed to join that campaign with all competence, sincerity, and dedication.

It is enough to fill the heart with sorrow and the soul with grief to follow the religious programs and Jumu'ah sermons on satellite channels today, from al-Masjid al-Ḥarām to al-Masjid al-Nabawī to al-Azhar Mosque to the major mosques in the capitals of Arab and Muslim countries, to witness the leading role played by the official religious establishment and the 'noble' services it provides to America. It has reached the point where programs for combating terrorism, pouring out wrath and misguidance, and accusing of belonging to the Khawārij, criminal gangs, and drug cartels are directed against anyone who dares to resist America in its Crusader invasion and to confront the apostate rulers of our lands who lead the vanguards of its campaign. There is no space for evidence here, though I have collected much of it in drafts of a research I was preparing before the fall of Kabul, titled Al-Furqān bayna ‘Ulamā’ al-Raḥmān wa ‘Ulamā’ al-Sultān (The Criterion Between the Scholars of the Merciful and the Scholars of the Regime), and their examples from the scholars of Banū Umayyah to the fuqahā’ of the Pentagon today. I ask Allāh to help me compile and publish it once again.
